The poems entitled "A Casket of Gems" are written in the decasyllabic quatrain much favoured by poets of the last century, though in an artistic spirit altogether opposed to Mr. Arnold's treatment. From Dryden to Wordsworth poems in this measure might be cited, perfect in continuity, any one stanza of which may be separately considered as self-contained and flawless. The Elegy of Gray and the stanzas on Sir George Beaumont's picture of Peele Castle may be taken as test examples, though appropriate illustration might be supplied by many an inferior bard. We make random quotations of Mr. Arnold:—

> An Aureus of the Roman Empire—see!
> And on its face, in plain imperial letters,
> MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS—He
> Was Master of our earth. Rome's iron fetters,
>
> Linked over lands and seas, were held by him,
> The awful purple of the Cæsars wearing;
> And triumph-crowned! for, mark, along the rim
> DEVICTUS MARCOMANNIS. He was bearing
>
> That year Pannonian laurels (one—six—eight—
> In era of our Lord), &c.

There are one hundred pages of these slack-jointed stanzas, not less difficult to read nor less ear-defying. Nor is it possible to discern any unsuspected subtleties of modulation or novel musical progression that might account for their disregard of an ideal form. If this is poetic diction, Dryden and the master-poets wrote in vain.

Of Mr. Arnold's remaining poems, "A Queen's Revenge" is decidedly the most striking. This translation from the Mahâbhârata deals with the adventure of the five Pandu princes and Draupadi their queen, who, wearied of their twelve years' exile in the forest, present themselves singly in disguise at the court of Virâta, the ruler of the Matsyas, and hire themselves in his service in menial ways. Not even the story of Nala and Damayanti is more characteristic of the Sanskrit epic than this curious episode. The catastrophe, vigorously rendered by Mr. Arnold, may be likened in its sudden violence and horror to an incident in the fortunes of the Volsungs.

* Lotus and Jewel. By Edwin Arnold, M.A., C.S.I. London: Trübner & Co.

BRACTON'S NOTE BOOK.*

OUR notice of this book has been delayed, but we make no apology for it. Such a work as this of Mr. Maitland's outlives many generations, not only of three-volume novels, but of histories made easy and ephemeral text-books, before there is time for it to be duly assimilated by those whom it concerns. Those persons, indeed, are at present a small class. It is barely known to the general educated public that English law has a history. The study of that history has until of late years had every kind of external difficulty against it. Even among lawyers, those who have either time or inclination for it have been, and still are, a minority. When we count up those who can and will grapple with the original evidences, and go behind the classical system of the Common Law to investigate its ideas and methods in active formation, we are left with a minority of that minority. Nevertheless, the students of our legal antiquities are on the increase. We are becoming aware that without the history of law the history of institutions and manners is incomplete. And in the field of strictly legal affairs the whirligig of time has brought about revivals of ancient needs and ancient claims of right, and practising lawyers whose pastors and masters could barely make out a "black-letter" authority of any kind have been driven back to Year Books and even to unpublished records. The antiquary without the lawyer is oftentimes blind; the lawyer without the antiquary may fight as one that beateth the air; the historian is every day more convinced that he cannot walk safely without having both of them on his right hand and on his left. It already signifies much for us, and for our children it will signify more, that interest in this kind of study gains ground quite as steadily in America as in England.

Now for the limited but increasing class of students in question Mr. Maitland's edition of the thirteenth-century Note Book which he attributes to Bracton is a book not so much to read as to live with. Whatever else this collection of cases may be, it is a collection diligently made from the records of a vital period of English law by a lawyer of that period who had ample access to the original rolls of the courts, and whose materials, lines of work, and habit of legal mind, and even opinions on special and rather minute points, coincided in a singular way with Bracton's. He gives us the means of verifying a great number of Bracton's authorities; he gives us not a few comments identical in substance with Bracton's text. Every student of Bracton, therefore, must henceforth take this book for his companion; and this is as much as to say that the book is indispensable to every one who claims or desires to have any judgment of his own about the English legal system of the thirteenth century, or any material part of it. These cases being now accessible in print, any such student must make sure of what they have to tell him before committing himself, whether for his own satisfaction or for the persuasion of others, on any point of thirteenth-century jurisprudence which is capable of doubt or demands explanation. One need not have read as many thirteenth-century documents as Mr. Maitland to know that there are still many such points.

* Bracton's Note Book: a Collection of Cases decided in the King's Courts during the Reign of Henry the Third. Annotated by a Lawyer of that time, seemingly by Henry of Bratton. Edited by F. W. Maitland, Reader of English Law in the University of Cambridge. 3 vols. London: Clay & Sons. Cambridge: Deighton, Bell, & Co.

And when we say the matter is accessible, we do not mean only that it has been carefully copied and printed. Whether the student is looking for examples of a particular form of action, or illustrations of terms and usages, or for what may throw light on the identification or history of a place or person, he will find everything done for him that good editing and indexing can do. Mr. Maitland's first volume is more than useful; in form and arrangement it is a model apparatus criticus, and we shall be greatly surprised if, in the course of that continued working use which alone can be a final test, it does not make good all the promise of its form. The introduction, moreover, differs from many documents of the same kind in that it is excellent reading. Mr. Maitland has lived in spirit with the judges and suitors of King Henry III.'s reign, and has that firm grasp of human affairs remote from us in time and circumstances, but none the less human, which is to be found only where strenuous research and intimate knowledge are informed by the sympathetic tact of a true scholar. And the exposition is enlivened with touches of more than book-knowledge. Mr. Maitland has not only identified places with map and gazetteer; he knows and loves Bracton's country and the country of one at least of his masters, the region that extends from the borders of Somerset and Devon across Dartmoor and into the Cornish moors. When the student begins to feel dusty, let him turn to Mr. Maitland's paragraph on the "geography of the cases" (vol. i. p. 103) and be refreshed. And if he would enter into Mr. Maitland's beatitude, Beati omnes qui ambulant, he can do no better than follow his indications when occasion serves, remembering, however, that a man must have his loins well girt if he is to cover Dartmoor ground at the learned Reader's pace. It sufficiently appears that Mr. Maitland is not only robustus venator coram Domino among the rolls in the Record Office, but robustus ambulator in vacation times.

The intrinsic value of these cases does not in any way depend on their connexion with Henry of Bratton (such appears to be the true form of the name), or with his treatise extant in many MSS., first printed in 1569, and since twice reprinted, the second time rather worse than the first, but never yet critically or competently edited. A book which gives, in Mr. Paul Vinogradoff's words, "a copious and careful selection of cases from the early practice of Henry III.'s reign," a good number of them being from Rolls not now extant, can stand on its own merits in any event. But the identification of this Annotator with Bracton, first proposed in 1884 by Mr. Vinogradoff, and accepted and supported by Mr. Maitland, must still be a matter of no small interest. Mr. Maitland sets forth his reasons with exemplary caution and modesty, but does not disguise the fact that to himself they seem sufficient. They involve too much of cumulative detail to be abridged without losing much of their force. But, subject to this warning, it may be convenient to state the points of the argument.

1. The Annotator and Bracton used the same rolls, and mainly the decisions of the same two judges, Raleigh and Pateshull.

2. Bracton, the only author of the time known to have cited cases at all, cites altogether some 500, and some 200 of those are among the Annotator's collection of about 2,000.

3. The Annotator's comments are in many cases closely like Bracton's, and like them in rather minute points of individual opinion and style.

4. There are certain marginalia in the Note Book which seem to be the concise memoranda of a man very familiar with the subject-matter, and to refer to persons and suits that would naturally have been familiar to Bracton.

5. The Annotator and Bracton both made the same mistake—the great and extraordinary mistake of misplacing the famous protest of the Barons, "Quod nolunt leges Angliæ mutare," known to later lawyers under the rubric of the Statute of Merton, in the series of events of which it was part.

Here we have ample evidence to go to a jury that the Annotator was no other than Bracton himself. It is not conclusive proof; other suppositions might be found to explain the facts without resorting to the extreme one of mere coincidence; and it is conceivable, as Mr. Maitland himself points out, that something absolutely inconsistent with Bracton's authorship may yet be discovered. But if the Annotator was not Bracton, we seem to have only two lines of conjecture left. We must think of the Annotator as some friend or subordinate of Bracton's who was allowed to use Bracton's materials for some unknown purpose of his own, or else as some one whose materials, collected again for some unknown purpose, were used by Bracton with such confidence that he copied even a serious mistake in dates. About either of these hypotheses, or any variation of them, there is obvious difficulty. There is not any apparent difficulty in the simpler hypothesis that the Annotator and Bracton were the same person. In the absence, therefore, of any evidence the other way, we conceive that the title of Bracton's Note Book is justified. It will be remembered that in the thirteenth century we are nothing like in sight of the time when every student of the law kept a large commonplace book, and many of the same authorities would naturally be found in the commonplace books of any two contemporary students. No other contemporary MS. of at all the same character as this Note Book is known to exist.

It would be tempting in one way to build upon this collection of cases some theory of a Bractonian school, and we shall not be at all surprised if some ingenious person attempts it when the book has had time to become known. But we do not think much would come of such an attempt. There is nothing to show that Bracton founded a school. His work was abridged in Britton and Fleta, and, indeed, some of the extant MSS. of Bracton are throughout, or in considerable parts, rather abridgments than copies; but that was all. The lawyers of later centuries never quite made up their minds whether his treatise was authoritative or not. It is certain that in several points which he thought important his doctrines failed to secure adoption. All we know of him tends to show, so far as it goes, that he held a distinguished but rather isolated position.

We shall not undertake to give any account of the matter contained in this Note Book. To do so would be to embark at large upon the law and procedure of the thirteenth century. As regards Mr. Maitland's editing we will only add that we are at one with him in abjuring the delusive show of accuracy given by the use of special types. With a facsimile of the MS. we know where we are, and with a printed text giving the editor's reading of the MS. we know where we are. The compromise of "record type" is a thing of naught. An editor who cannot be trusted to extend the ordinary contractions of a mediæval MS. cannot be trusted to distinguish them. One who can be so trusted can also be trusted to make a special note of anything which is really capable of doubt. The state of Bracton's text is only remotely connected with the present subject; but many scholars will echo Mr. Maitland's pious hope that some day there may be a real edition of Bracton, and will supply, what Mr. Maitland's modesty has kept back, the name of the man who is probably best fitted to edit hi 1.

RUSSIAN COMPOSITION.*

THE study of the Russian language must have made considerable progress during the last twenty years, if we draw conclusions from the comparative frequency with which manuals ar 1 grammars are now printed to facilitate it. This is probably in consequence of the stimulus imparted quite recently by Government in awarding a gratuity of 200*l.* to such officers as qualify as interpreters in it; and the Civil Commissioners now hold half-yearly examinations in Russian at which Indian officers may present themselves as well as those of the British army proper.

The special object of this little volume is to afford assistance in acquiring a good Russian official style, and, what is quite as difficult and useful, a facility in deciphering manuscript in that tongue. It is emphatically a book of exercises, and complementary to a manual by the same author in which the grammatical structure of the language is unfolded. Denying that Russian is difficult to learn—an opinion which an Englishman will accept with considerable reserve—the author maintains that by adopting his plan—i.e. plunging into the middle of exercises and working out complete sentences by aid of the attached vocabularies—the student will rapidly master it. The system, though far from a novelty, is undoubtedly correct, and has been almost universally adopted, especially in Germany, where people have occasion to familiarize themselves with so many dialects and forms of speech. The ancient method of bewildering the learner in a labyrinth of grammatical forms with no practical application has fallen into disuse. Great care, however, is required in the preparation of these vocabularies, or otherwise the student will be disgusted with, metaphorically speaking, looking for a needle in a bundle of hay. The first sentence, for instance, in Exercise I. is as follows:—"The boy read, the girl listened"; but, turning to the corresponding vocabulary, we do not find the Russian equivalent of "to listen" specified as such. True we find it opposite the verb "to attend, obey"; but the beginner cannot be expected to know by intuition that this is the word he is to use.

However, the exercises appear to be very serviceably put together. The Table of Conjunctive Prepositions strikes us as lucidly arranged. Sir Edward Thornton's despatch to M. de Giers on the delimitation of the Afghan frontier may be profitably studied with its Russian version collated and not alone from a linguistic point of view. But the distinctive feature of the work is formed by the collection of Russian manuscript appended to it, the handwritings ranging from good round pothooks to the nondescript scratches which are jerked from the busy official pen. With laudable foresight a key for the interpretation of these hieroglyphics is provided for the use of the neophyte.

THE CHOLERA IN SICILY.†

SIGNOR ANTONIO PALOMES'S work recently published in Palermo, entitled Il colera ed i Siciliani, is rather an onslaught on Signor Crispi than an account of the dreadful epidemic which made such havoc a few years ago in Sicily. Doubtless the feeling of distrust and jealousy which has existed for centuries between the Italians of the various former subdivisions of the peninsula is still formidable, especially in the southern provinces, where the people are by no means too well pleased to be governed in all things by i Piemontesi. We readily grant, however, that possibly the central Government at Rome acted with considerable ill judgment and procrastination in its method of dealing with the Sicilian outbreak of cholera; but we can scarcely credit that their somewhat confused and essentially red-taped proceedings were the result of deliberate and inhuman calculation. Signor Palomes is too bitter, and his bitterness blinds him to facts; although, to be sure, after making terrible accusations against Signor Crispi and giving what appears to be authoritative documentary evidence in support of his assertions, he exclaims, "Io non esagero, non invento, non insulto—giudico." There is, however, very little about the cholera in his book, and a very great deal anent Signor Crispi's well-known anti-clerical opinions and proceedings. The volume, however, which has had an immense success in the South of Italy, is important, if it be only as affording another proof of how intense is party spirit in Italy even now, and how unfortunate it is that some modus vivendi has not as yet been arrived at between the Courts of the Vatican and the Quirinal. Before Signor Crispi's advent to power there seemed, indeed, some chance that at last a reconciliation between the State and the Church in Italy was imminent. Since he has become Minister this much to be desired consummation appears as far off as ever. It should never be forgotten that hitherto a portion of the Italian people has shown that, though it is willing to adopt decidedly sceptical views in religious matters, it has emphatically declared it will accept of no other determined form of religion than the Roman Catholic. The attacks on the clergy, and even its persecution—for in reality it has not fared much better in Italy since 1860 than it has more recently in France—have ended in an undesirable result; it has only weakened the religious sentiments of the country without improving its moral tone, for it is universally admitted that public and private morality in all parts of Italy has fallen of late to a lamentably low state, partly possibly from the bad effects of a perfect inundation of scandalous literature translated or imitated from the French, and still more so from the rapid diminution of religious sentiment.

---

* Aid to Russian Composition. By Ivan Nestor-Schnurmann. London: Allen & Co. 1888.

† Il colera ed i Siciliani. Ricordi di Antonio Palomes. Palermo, 1888.

La Riforma is acknowledged to be the official organ of the actual Italian Prime Minister, Signor Crispi, and it suffices to turn over a few of its latest numbers to see how bitterly day by day he permits the journalists in his service to attack religion and its ministers, who are never mentioned, even when performing their duties, in its columns but with sneering contempt and ridicule. Signor Palomes declares that Signor Crispi treated the clergy of Palermo during the visitation of the cholera with calumnious ribaldry. He accused them—and from all accounts most unjustly—of grossly neglecting their duties towards their afflicted flock. Herein lies Signor Palomes's chief grievance against the Premier, and he makes considerable capital out of it. We cannot enter into the details which he gives in support of his charges: but it is satisfactory to know that even the ultra-Radical press of Sicily eagerly defended the cause of the Archbishop of Palermo and his priests, and proved that their conduct was quite as heroic as was that of Cardinal San Felice and his clergy in Naples during the outbreak of cholera in 1885 and 1886. The success of this book shows us but too well how very restless is the state of mind of the Italians at present in religious and social matters, and it indicates how eager the vast majority of the nation is to see the national religion once more resume its proper position. It is certainly rather singular to observe that those who rule the destinies of Italy cannot learn a lesson from contemporary France, and note how the theories they are so eager to carry into practice in Italy have failed there, and how an unchristianized people is fast becoming absolutely ungovernable. The Papacy is established in the heart of Italy, and such Italians as choose to belong to any acknowledged form of Christianity are determined to remain faithful to the Church, of which the Pope is chief pastor. This being the case, the Italian Government seems to us to have but two alternatives to follow—it must either eventually come to terms with the Pope, or it must unchristianize its people after the fashion of ces Messieurs of the Clubs at Belleville and Montmartre. Signor Palomes is quite right when he says that it would be better to endeavour to improve the sanitary conditions of the country, the habits of the people, and to elevate the tone of the public press, by inducing it to treat religious and other serious subjects at least with becoming respect, than to fill the minds of the half-educated with theories which are, after all, only feebly imitated from the least practical schools of French and German so-called freethought. Perhaps a crusade in favour of soap and water would have better results than the much talked of and not a little derided demonstrazioni in favour of the glorification of Giordano Bruno, which, after all, have been mere parades of bad taste, carried on under the very windows of the Vatican, at a time when the Catholic world is celebrating the Jubilee of its able chief. The Pope is possibly much to blame in many ways; but at the same time it occurs to us that there is very little to be gained by wantonly irritating him, and with him the widely extended and powerful Catholic world over which he rules supreme. Signor Crispi in a few months has managed to make himself the bête noire of Roman Catholics throughout the world. With Signor Palomes we really fail to see what he has gained by it. Certainly if the Italians to a man were forthwith to embrace the doctrines of the "advanced," and refuse all religious belief whatever, the solution of the question would be easy enough. The Pope would, perforce, have to leave a capital which no longer contained an inhabitant who believed in his claims. So long, however, as the vast majority of the Italians elect to remain Roman Catholics, we, who are quite unprejudiced in the matter, cannot help thinking that the sooner the Premier moderates his dislike to this special form of religion and its Head, the better for all concerned. This is the real drift of Signor Palomes's book, and, while we condemn the impatient manner in which he frequently expresses himself, we cannot help thinking that, in the main, he is right.

LUCIAN'S DIALOGUES.*

IT may seem at first sight not a little odd that such a writer as Lucian should not have earlier made himself a place in the extensive collection of translations known irreverently as "Bohn's Cribs." Nor does that injurious appellation supply a reason; for writers far less used in colleges and schools—Ammianus Marcellinus, Strabo, Velleius Paterculus—as well as far less tempting to the general reader, have long been included in the list. But there is no doubt that the Pantagruelist of Samosata, as he has been called with rather less unreason than is usual in such parallels, has been hitherto strangely and almost unaccountably neglected in the ordinary classical curriculum. There have no doubt been various excerpta and analecta from him, prepared for school use; but unless we mistake they have been less and less used of late years. One of the best classical scholars, in the best sense of the word, now living, confessed not long ago that he "knew very little of Lucian," and we have known another scholar (this time not merely in the best, but in the straitest and strictest sense of the term, as understood by the latest and newest lights of scholarship) fall in warmly with the opinion of a light and careless person that nothing was more wanted than an edition of Lucian which should be at once literary and scholarly. The English Universities, where, if anywhere, he ought to have found a home, have given Lucian an almost entirely cold shoulder; no German scholar ever could understand him except by miraculous interposition; and there seems to be a general idea in France that when you have got Voltaire in the best of all languages it is idle to trouble yourself about another Voltaire who had the impertinence to come first and to write better in another and inferior tongue. Why all this is we are not prepared or concerned to say. The unorthodoxy which used to be charged against Lucian would not have deterred foreigners, and there ought to be enough scholarship in England to inform Englishmen that it rests on no solid ground. Every competent authority has long ago given up the "Philopatris" as far later than Lucian's time; and the certain expressions of the Peregrinus story are merely such as would be natural in a heathen sophist of the middle of the second century, who knew nothing of the Christians except that they were a harmless but rather benighted and unpolished sect. And it is certainly carrying orthodoxy rather far to object to Lucian for making fun of Zeus and Hermes. But we may have something more to say on this when we have said something of Mr. Howard Williams's present work.

We are unable to compare his translation with any other, for the simple reason that, to speak frankly, we do not know any other, though we may boast a tolerable familiarity with the original, from the first lines of the Ἐνύπνιον to the last of the Epigrams. Considered in itself, Mr. Williams's version is very fair, if not always impeccable. He seems to attach a rather unnecessary importance to Wieland's translation, judging from his constant reference to it in the notes; we must leave him to square his own encomium of Reitz with William Dindorf's description of that worthy as "hominem si quem alium suscepto negotio imparem"; and we certainly should not ourselves have translated δοκεῖς γὰρ ἀληθές τι ἐρεῖν "for you seem to have some inkling of the truth," a version which loses the whole point of the phrase. "You seem to be going to say something true" is, of course, the right rendering. Furthermore, in his introduction, while noting very properly the extraordinary influence of Lucian on the Renaissance, it is at least strange that he does not notice the Cymbalum Mundi of Desperiers—the closest, the boldest, and the most remarkable, though by no means the most legitimate, reflection of the Lucianic spirit at that time. Yet again, the sentence, "Rabelais, though there is no evidence that he took part in illustrating so congenial a mind, must have been greatly indebted to him," is singularly vague, and might well have been exchanged for, say, half a page showing how some of the most characteristic things of Gargantua and Pantagruel—the visit of Epistemon to Hades, the great voyage itself, Lanternland, and so forth—are borrowed, of course, as genius borrows, more or less directly from Lucian. But we are not at all bent on finding fault with Mr. Williams. He has given here the Dialogues of the Gods, of the Sea Gods, and of the Dead; the Ζεὺς τραγῳδός, the Ζευς ἐλεγχόμενος, the Θεῶν ἐκκλησία, the Κατάπλους, and the "Menippus." At least another volume, if not two, might with advantage be added. The Hetæric dialogues, despite their alarming title, are, with the rarest exceptions, not at all more "improper" than much of the matter which Mr. Williams has given, are at least equally interesting, and are simply full of the comedy of manners. And of few of the minor dialogues and dissertations cannot as much be said. We do not want the Ἔρωτες, though we are not so sure as Mr. Williams is that they are spurious; but the 'Ἀληθὴς ἱστορία is simply one of the capital works of antiquity, in so far as characteristics suitable for translation go, and of all the eighty-two "numbers" into which the works, certain and doubtful, are ordinarily divided, there are certainly not twenty, if there are ten, which fail to display the Lucianic quality.

---

* Lucian's Dialogues. Translated by Howard Williams. Bohn's Classical Library. London: Bell & Sons. 1888.

What that quality is it would be unfair not to allow Mr. Williams himself to show; so let us take the little by-play of the goddesses as they go down with Hermes to Ida to be judged by Paris:—

Hermes. Let us start off straight for Phrygia, I leading the way, and do you follow me without loitering, and keep up your spirits. I am personally acquainted with Paris; he is a good-looking youth, and amorous into the bargain, and very competent to judge in all such matters. He would not give a bad judgment.

Aphrodite. That is all fair, and you speak quite after my mind—that he is the right judge for us. [Confidentially] But is he a bachelor, or has he some wife or other living with him?

Hermes. Not absolutely a bachelor, Aphrodite.

Aphrodite. How do you mean?

Hermes. Some lady of Ida appears to be keeping company with him—well enough in her way, but countrified and dreadfully boorish. However, he does not seem to be excessively attached to her. But, pray, why do you put these questions?

Aphrodite. I asked quite indifferently.

Athena. Holloa! you Sir, there, you are exceeding your commission in communicating with her in private.

Hermes. It was nothing extraordinary, Athena, and nothing against you. She only asked me if Paris is a bachelor.

Athena. And pray, why is she so inquisitive about that?

Hermes. I don't know. But she says it occurred to her quite casually, and she had no purpose in asking.

Athena. Well, is he unmarried?

Hermes. I think not.

Athena. What then? Has he a desire for the military life, and is he at all ambitious for glory, or is he altogether devoted to his herds?

Hermes. The exact truth I am unable to say: but one must suppose that a young fellow like him would be eager to acquire fame in these things, and would like to be first in fighting.

Aphrodite (pouting). Do you see? I don't find fault, nor charge you with talking to her on the sly—for such sort of querulousness is peculiar to people not over much pleased with themselves; it's not Aphrodite's way.

Hermes. Indeed she asked me almost exactly the same question as she did you: so don't be in a pet, and don't imagine you are worse treated, if I answered her somewhat frankly and simply.

On which all that we have to note critically is that "boorish" is too strong for ὄρειος; that "exceeding your commission" is not strong enough for παραπρεσβεύεις, which means doing the mission "on the cross," "acting treacherously"; that "Why does she bother about that?" would be better than "Why is she so inquisitive about that?" and that the stage directions "Confidentially," "Pouting," &c., are not in the original, and are an unnecessary concession to the modern and very inartistic desire to have everything said; while "as she did you" ought to be "as you did," though this, like the other, would be an interpolation. Mr. Williams's version, however, gives the general tone not inadequately, if with a certain substitution of familiarity for urbanity, and every one can see how curiously modern that tone is. Yet it is almost an insult to Lucian to use the word "modern." What he really is is universal—as all the great writers are. Full as he is of local colour, he always combines with this temporary matter the matter which is not temporary. Take the little touches in one of the finest of all the dialogues—the dialogue between Zeus and Hera about Ixion—and note the admirable distinction of the reprobate masculine humour of the one speaker from the feminine, though highly creditable, incapacity to appreciate humour of the other. Compare with Mme. Cardinal those ancient forerunners of hers, the mothers of Philinna, and Corinna, and Musarium, and, though most certainly the comparison will leave M. Halévy a clever man, it will leave Lucian a cleverer. Read the "Lexiphanes," remember that it was written seventeen hundred years ago, and ask whether, with the slightest possible changes, it might not have been written, and would not have been a masterpiece, yes to-day? By common consent no sharper satire of contemporary charlatanry has ever been written than the pieces on Alexander and on Peregrinus. The "Lucius" is, of course, contested, and the exact relations between it and the romance of Apuleius present one of the most interesting problems that a scholar, who was in both senses a critic, could possibly occupy himself upon. We confess to a certain leaning both to its genuineness and its authenticity. If it be accepted take it with—if it be rejected take without it—the "Vera Historia," and you have altogether masterly instances of previously unexampled narrative. But space would, in any article possible here, fail us to go through half the pieces which dwell in the memory of every Lucianist.

Two things there are, however, which are common to all, and must be, however briefly and inadequately, noticed—the Lucianic style and the Lucianic wit. Of the latter it may be said that it is the first instance we have in satirical literature, and that there is no reason to believe that it is a borrowed instance, of the realization of the great secret of humorous prose—restraint and lightness of touch. Aristophanes was deprived by his dramatic necessities of the opportunity of showing that he knew this secret, though he doubtless did know it; and elsewhere we have no opportunity of comparison. All the great satirists since have borrowed from Lucian his grave and precise manner, his lightness of allusion, the rapid touch with which he leaves a jibe rather to develop itself to the reader than to be kicked and stamped into him. As for his style, the text has had far less trouble taken with it than the text of authors infinitely less worthy of trouble, and it is in parts uncertain. As in other similar cases, moreover, its extreme accomplishment and facility are apt to deceive the reader. Any one with a mere smattering of Greek can read Lucian sufficiently to enjoy him; it may be doubted whether any one knows Greek well enough to have thoroughly exhausted his infinite and curious felicity. That he was steeped in Plato, as Charles Lamb was steeped in Fuller, Burton, and Browne, is evident; and in both cases the result of the imitation has been a thing in itself inimitable.

JACK'S YARN.*

JACK'S Yarn is rather too much broken up for art, but it is a very reasonably good yarn none the less. With the interludes we would dispense—there is too much of the British sailor "Ha la Mr. T. P. Cooke" in them altogether, and the author dangs his old lee scuppers and shivers his poor old timbers not much more naturally than the artful party who accosted that "hinnocent young girl," Eliza Davis, of Guilford Street, by Brunswick Square. These things, however, are skip, and the rest of the book may be read with pleasure. We have met worse things by far than the cruise of the Hornet and the doings of her crew. Let us suppose that in the old war-time several young gentlemen—twenty or thirty of them—bought or freighted a schooner, and started to cruise into the south seas. It would follow as a matter of course that they would fight Frenchmen, and beat them, make an example of pirates, and see many kinds of quaint savages. The crew of the Hornet went through these experiences, and on the whole very creditably. On one occasion they did not quite come up to the proper level. It was when they had sunk a pirate boat and did not proceed to attack the ship herself and haul down the Jolly Roger, which was their manifest duty as a preliminary to stringing her wicked ship's company at the yard-arm. This, however, was their only error, and on all other occasions they behaved with proper spirit. When the author sends another Hornet on another cruise, as we hope he will, he ought to make a capital boy's book out of it. All that he will have to do will be to repress his inclination to play the rollicking British tar himself, and to stick more closely to his story. No healthy-minded boy will stand being interrupted in the middle of such delightful things as pirates and South Sea Islanders by the intrusion of somebody's old aunt. Mr. Brown writes well about the pirates and the islanders, and that is surely quite enough. He knows either by experience or by reading something more than a little of the Pacific Islands, and could surely use them as theatre and background of a story. The illustrations by Mr. R. T. Pritchett are entitled to praise. They are pretty in themselves and they do illustrate. The ships are "alive" and graceful. What is also not a matter of course, they are generally accurate, though we have looked in vain on page 121 for a boom where a boom ought to be. The Pacific Islands are delicately touched.

WOLSEY.†

CANON CREIGHTON'S Cardinal Wolsey is exactly what one of a series of short biographies of English statesmen ought to be; it gives the reader a clear idea of the place that Wolsey holds in the history of our national development, and presents a comprehensive and well-proportioned picture of a subject that to an untaught eye seems at first sight to have little unity. Wolsey's claim to be recognized as the "greatest political genius whom England has ever produced" rests, not on any immediate or definite achievement, but on the fact that he drew out the latent power of his country, and taught Englishmen their own strength. He accomplished this by giving England a foremost place in the affairs of Europe; he made her respected by other nations, and so inspired her with a new spirit of self-reliance, and paved the way for the glories of the sixteenth century. Accordingly Canon Creighton devotes the larger part of his volume to Wolsey's foreign policy, a subject on which he is peculiarly entitled to speak with authority; he vindicates the Cardinal from the old reproach of having allowed his policy to be swayed by eagerness to obtain the Papal office—of which, indeed, he can scarcely be said to have been unduly ambitious—and shows that he was in reality influenced by the desire to strengthen the position of England abroad, to bring her "into full accord with European sentiment," to make her powerful and respected, and then to work out the domestic reforms that he believed were needful for her welfare, not by a merely insular policy, but in concert with the other States of Latin Christendom. When he entered on his career as a statesman, the mediæval conception of Europe as "one great commonwealth presided over by Pope and Emperor" was rapidly passing away, and a struggle for supremacy had already begun between the rulers of France and Spain. The League formed to prevent Charles VIII. from gaining the preponderance in Europe marked, as is well pointed out here, a new departure in European affairs; their course was for the future to be governed by combinations of great States. During the reign of Henry VII. England, on the whole, stood aloof from these combinations. Domestic troubles had reduced her to the position of a third-rate power, and the King devoted his energies to building up the royal authority, and while he claimed a right to have a voice in the arrangements of Europe, took no active part in them. Henry VIII. at once threw himself into Continental politics, and at first followed the lead and trusted to the assurances of his father-in-law, Ferdinand of Aragon. After engaging in a war with France, which brought him little profit, he found himself tricked by Ferdinand and deserted by Maximilian, whom he had subsidized and benefited. It was at this juncture that Wolsey, of whose earlier life and employments a sufficient account is given, assumed the direction of the foreign policy of England, and scored his first success by bringing about an alliance with France. In four years' time he made his country, which had lately been held of small account, the mediator of a European peace, and before long showed both Charles V. and Francis I. that it was worth while to make considerable efforts to secure her good will. At last the time came when the two rivals were seriously bent on war. An excellent account is given of Wolsey's efforts at mediation at the Conference of Calais; they failed, though not through any fault of his; indeed, as Canon Creighton remarks, he was only the first of a long series of English statesmen who have found that endeavours to make peace when war is really imminent, and when their own country is not prepared to back up her counsels by force, only bring upon her charges of duplicity, and are likely to involve her in the quarrel she seeks to compose. The success which had attended Wolsey's attempt to make England the "mediator in the politics of Europe" was not achieved without many checks and reverses of fortune, and the most serious difficulties with which he had to contend were those which proceeded from his master's "vanity and obstinacy." When after the overthrow of Francis at Pavia he laboured for peace, because he knew that "England's strength lay in a powerful neutrality," Henry flattered himself with hopes of French conquest and grew less satisfied with his Minister's policy, and Wolsey began to see that his position depended on his power of making himself useful in forwarding the King's wishes. He lived at a time when a statesman was necessarily a royal servant, and was forced to recommend himself by his subservience to the royal will—a condition of office not necessarily more dishonourable than that which impels modern statesmen "to bid against one another for an opportunity of carrying out what they think to be the will of the people." Henry was a hard master, and brought his great Minister to his fall by setting him to perform a task which, whether he was successful or not, would have equally been fatal to the ends for which he laboured. Wolsey's conduct with regard to the divorce is criticized with much discernment. Canon Creighton possesses the rare faculty of looking at affairs of the past in the light in which they must have presented themselves to those actually concerned in them, and while he allows that it would have been better for Wolsey's fame had he refused to involve himself in this discreditable business, points out why, nevertheless, "he ought not greatly to be blamed for agreeing to promote it." Although at the time of Wolsey's fall his "dream of a united Europe cautiously moved by England's moderating counsels" had vanished before the force of circumstances, his endeavours were not without their effect on the position of the kingdom in the eyes of other nations, on the spirit in which Englishmen learnt to think of their country, or on the future action of the King. So, too, though his domestic policy was to some extent a failure, it prepared the way for the action of men who brought about larger results, though by ruder and more vulgar means than those he hoped to employ. He strengthened the Monarchy, for he regarded it as the only instrument powerful enough to enforce reforms; and though he was unsuccessful in his attempt to override the privileges of Parliament, he taught Henry one part of the secret of his future triumphant despotism—the King learnt from him to represent himself as the only source from which the nation could expect help and guidance. But Henry was, as Canon Creighton observes, "a better Englishman than Wolsey," and whereas Wolsey sought to convince the people that it was their interest implicitly to obey the King's will, Henry cajoled them into the belief that his will was merely the expression of their own aspirations. The conservative character of the reforms that Wolsey attempted to effect in ecclesiastical affairs is carefully drawn out, and some interesting remarks will be found on the relation in which these schemes of reform stand to his policy as a whole, and to the drastic measures that took their place. The story of the great statesman's fall and last days is told with much pathos, chiefly with the help of Cavendish's touching narrative, and the last chapter is devoted to a masterly summary of Wolsey's work as a statesman, and an estimate of his contribution to the history of English politics.

* Jack's Yarn; or, Perils in the Pacific. By Robert Brown, A.B. London: Griffith, Farran, & Co. 1888.

† Twelve English Statesmen—Cardinal Wolsey. By Mandell Creighton, M.A. Oxford and Cambridge, D.C.L. of Durham, LL.D. of Glasgow and Harvard. London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1888.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE remarkable revival of interest in critical literature in France has been more than once noticed here; and we have in M. Jules Tellier another candidate for a share of the attention bestowed on MM. Lemaître, de Bonnières, Faguet, and the rest. The interest of Nos poètes (1) lies partly in the number of names not known at all in England, and we suspect very little known in France, which it contains. M. Tellier's remarks on most of them, and on most of their better-known companions (survivors to a man almost of the old Parnasse, though scattered in sometimes very un-Parnassian directions), are frequently acute, clever, and well expressed. But they seem to us to suffer from the same defect which attaches to most of this school of critics, from M. Lemaître downwards, that they are not judgments, but more or less smart sayings. Now we know that it is now rather a sin to know Greek; but still critic used to mean "judge."

M. Maurice Bouchor's Les symboles (2) comes pat enough after M. Tellier's book, in which the author is duly and not unkindly noticed. Those who remember M. Bouchor's advent, heralded as that not merely of a new poet, but of a new poet who was going to enfoncer the Parnasse and start a school half-Shakspearian, half Bérangerish, may be surprised to find a volume all about Vishnou and Odin, and the Edda, and the Vedas, and Prometheus and Enin—almost pure Leconte de Lisle, in short, though with rather less indulgence in *k*s and *h*s and accents of all kinds. But this is the way of new poets.

M. Escande (3) styles himself "député," and really if any large numbers of his colleagues are like himself, the threatened Boulangiste purge of the French Chamber may be said to have considerable excuses. A man who cannot write the commonest English name correctly (in two sentences we have "Hoove" for Howe and "Hottam" for Hotham), who tells us gravely that "Irish wild" is an "expression courante à Londres," and who says that there was a "terrible insurrection" in Ireland in 1759 (a phrase in the context bars the charitable suggestion of a misprint), is simply incompetent to write about Anglo-Irish matters. And we may add that M. Escande's judgment seems to be on a par with his information.

M. Munier-Jolain (4) appears to us to have committed the not unusual fault of treating a subject in itself neither unpromising nor uninteresting at too great length for an essay and not at length enough for a book. But his studies of Patru, Mauléon, and Desèze (for to these three subjects the book practically comes) are well enough worth reading.

To speak frankly, we do not think Criminology (5) one of the promising -ologies. A criminal is a man or woman who has committed crimes, and we have never discerned in the various attempts to discover, after the fact, that before the fact he or she was criminally given, either philosophical cogency or practical use. If any one thinks differently, he will find in Signor Garofalo a patient, an exhaustive, and not unfrequently an acute discourser on the various theories on the subject; in M. Féré a physiologist who deals in muscular curves, the nexus of which to his subsequent dealing with criminality we do not too clearly discern.

Baron Hulot's (6) book of travels is a pleasant volume, describing (chiefly) a visit to Canada. It has become fashionable of late for French tourists to visit this lost French possession, and we have before noticed their puzzlement and half chagrin at a fact which the Baron—a straightforward and ingenuous person—communicates very frankly. The French Canadians are enthusiastically French in every point but one—they have not the least wish to belong to France. One of them asked Baron Hulot plumply what chance they had of French government exhibiting such a combination of tradition and progress as they now enjoyed? In short, to be Frenchmen and English subjects is all they ask. And to think that if the Black Prince had not gone wool-and-fever-gathering in Spain, if Henry V. had had a longer life and a better English title, this inestimable blessing might have happened to all men of French blood!

The sixth volume of the pretty Jouaust Montaigne (Paris: Librairie des Bibliophiles) has appeared.

We love not interviewing; but M. Maurice Barrès's account of Huit jours chez M. Renan (Paris: Dupret) is as prettily printed as it is written in bad taste.

We have known paradoxers who disputed the competence of actors as teachers of elocution, maintaining that the elocution of the stage is a thing per se. If there is any truth in this, it is less true of the French stage—at least the French classical stage—with its long récits and monologues, than of ours. And M. Dupont-Vernon's reprinted L'art de bien dire (Paris: Ollendorff) has all the appearance of a manual both scientific and practical.

(1) Nos poètes. Par Jules Tellier. Paris: Dupret.

(2) Les symboles. Par Maurice Bouchor. Paris: Charpentier.

(3) Hoche en Irlande. Par G. Escande. Paris: Alcan.

(4) Les époques de l'éloquence judiciaire de France. Par Munier-Jolain. Paris: Perrin.

(5) La criminologie. Par R. Garofalo. Paris: Alcan. Dégénérescence et criminalité. Par Ch. Féré. Paris: Alcan.

(6) De l'Atlantique au Pacifique. Par la Baron Etienne Hulot. Paris: Plon.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

IN A Dictionary of Lowland Scotch (London: Whittaker) Dr. Charles Mackay, some odd exercises in philology notwithstanding, gives us a good, sound, useful piece of work, and one, we take it, that is not like to be soon bettered or replaced. Jamieson's big book is practically inaccessible to the general, and to the student even is scarce so serviceable as it might have been. Dr. Mackay has written for everybody who is interested in the language, and if his excursions into Celtic are "frequent and painful and free" (to speak giddily of a very solemn subject), and his definitions not always quite so felicitous as might have been expected of him, his illustrations are neat, and his selection of words is copious, enough for most of us. There be, even to this day, great numbers of Southrons who cannot read Burns at all, and to whom the noble idiom of Cuddie Headrigg and the Mucklebackits and Andrew Fairservice is at once an eyesore and a heartbreak; there is a still vaster body to whom the "Aberdeen-awa'" of Dr. MacDonald is merely impossible; and to all these Dr. Mackay will be found the most serviceable of men. Of course they need not concern themselves with his derivations; for that way perplexity lies, and confusion, and much argument and heat. Nor must they always take his accuracy for granted, nor imagine (for instance) that there are many Scotsmen who are capable, as Dr. Mackay is capable, of turning such a proverb as "A hantle littles maks a muckle"—home sown, home grown, and racy of the soil—into such a poor "monster of mixtures" as "Every little helps to mak' a muckle." These reservations made, they will get little of him but is instructive or entertaining or both.

Mr. G. F. Armstrong's Mephistopheles in Broadcloth (London: Longmans) is distinguished by a certain quality of mild and decent impudence which goes some way to making it tolerable reading. His Mephisto is terribly gentlemanly, to be sure; also he is more long-winded than it becomes the Fiend to be; and, furthermore, he rejoices in an innocent freshness of mind which (here he presents analogies with Mr. Wills's hero) induces him to believe that he is really indulging in satire, when to the average mind he appears to be only giving way to a natural tendency to silliness. This said, it may be cheerfully admitted that he is not always bad company, and that his last couplet—deserves to be remembered. There is far more variety and a great deal less ill-nature in Mr. A. Wilmot's anthology, The Poetry of South Africa (London: Sampson Low). Mr. Wilmot has done his work discreetly, and has made a really interesting book. Of course his collection is lacking neither in echoes of Ingoldsby and Macaulay nor in depressing examples of humorous verse. That it would be so was scarce to be expected; for when an English-speaking community begins to lisp in numbers, these are the numbers in which lisping comes easiest. But it includes a good choice of the lyrics of Thomas Pringle, abounding in life and colour and spirit, and smacking bravely of such influences as Byron and Sir Walter; and for that alone it deserves to be applauded and approved. It remains to add that the book would be none the worse for a glossary. What, for example, is a "Smouse"? a "voerslag" what? What are "ungazis" and "velds" and "carbonatjes"? 'Tis the age of Umslopogaas, it is true; but these things are scarce understanded of the people even now.

> But hark! . . Time's up! . . Farewell, my children! . . Pah! . .
> Ha! ha! ha! ha! ha! ha! ha! ha! ha! ha!—

Two books from America. Mr. Whipple's Outlook on Society, Literature, and Politics (Boston: Ticknor. London: Trübner) is a good specimen of that curious and novel egoism which the American Cousin has developed—the egoism which leads him to conclude that the expression of his opinions is a matter of moment to the world at large. His ancestor was the cock known to Mrs. Poyser, who fancied that the sun got up to hear him crow. But his ancestor did not write books, and he does; and the difference is (to say the least of it) appreciable. Mr. Whipple wrote with scarce less sense than self-confidence, which is saying a great deal; but he had a gift of naïveté which is not common to his country-men, he was undeniably personnel and shrewd, in the present volume he tells some good stories by the way, and he may be read with a certain interest—an interest other than retrospective—and a complete forgetfulness of what a local (and patriotic) journal calls "the entire calmness of his reasoning." Mr. Andrew Preston Peabody's Harvard Reminiscences (Boston: Ticknor. London: Trübner) is less entertaining and suggestive, but contains, for all that, a good deal of interesting matter. The author, a Harvard man for over half a century, has redacted a volume of memories and inferences concerning the men he has known, in one or other official capacity, during the time of his connexion; and although his style is dry, and his interest in human life and character by no means of the strongest or the most apprehensive, he yet contrives to tell us something about a number of men—Henry Ware, Josiah Quincy, Stephen Higginson, John Snelling Popkin, Folsom, Willard, Oliver Stearns, Sibley and Putnam and Ticknor—who did good work in their several ways and degrees, and are well worth knowing and remembering.

Of Antipodean Notes (London: Sampson Low), by "Wanderer," there is not much to say that is positive except that it means well and is uncommonly dull reading. The author is neither immodest nor unintelligent; he has done his best according to his lights; he has seen Victoria and New South Wales and New Zealand, and he has written a book in which his observations and conclusions are set forth with honesty and a desire to provide both profit and entertainment. There is nothing against it all but the suspicion, to begin with, that he is more or less superfluous, and the certainty before we reach the end of his second chapter that, as far as the public is concerned, he might just as well have stayed at home. Mr. J. G. Cox's Jubilee-tide in Rome (London: Burns & Oates) appears to consist of a number of letters contributed, in the journalistic way, to The Tablet. It is not very good reading; but it contains Herr Lenbach's excellent and admirable portrait of Leo XIII., and is very neatly and prettily got up; and it will have, no doubt, a certain number of readers. Mr. W. M. Reid's Indigo (Calcutta and London: Thacker) is atrociously illustrated, but sets forth, with an abundance of detail, the circumstances of planter life "in Tirhoot and Lower Bengal." The author's object is to be "instructive, interesting, and, it may be, amusing to friends at home"; and assuredly it is attained.

We have also to acknowledge the receipt of new editions of Mr. B. Bradshaw's Bathing Places (London: Trübner), as complete a guide to those in want of change of air as exists; and of Mr. Herbert Fry's Royal Guide to the London Charities (London: Chatto & Windus); with cheap (sixpenny) reprints of Vivian Grey, Sybil, Coningsby, and Contarini Fleming from Messrs. Routledge; and cheap (two-shilling) reprints of Ismay's Children, by the author of Hogan M.P., Mr. Christie Murray's Aunt Rachel, Hugh Conway's Living or Dead, Mr. Norris's My Friend Jim, and Mrs. Oliphant's Sir Tom and A Country Gentleman and his Family from Messrs. Macmillan.

In the review of novels published last week (Saturday Review, p. 479) the author of Marahuna was wrongly spoken of as "Miss" Marriott Watson instead of "Mr."

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

NOTICE TO ADVERTISERS.

The ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT has been REMOVED from 38 to 33 Southampton Street. All communications respecting ADVERTISEMENTS should therefore be addressed to Mr. JOHN HART, 33 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

The SATURDAY REVIEW is duly registered for transmission abroad.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW may be obtained in Paris every Saturday of Mr. J. G. FOTHERINGHAM, 8 Rue Neuve des Capucines, and of Messrs. GALIGNANI, 224 Rue de Rivoli.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,696, APRIL 28, 1888:

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

SUN LIFE OFFICE.

ESTABLISHED 1810.

EXTRAORDINARY RESULTS.

THE profits paid this year in cash by the SUN LIFE OFFICE have been exceptionally large, surpassing those hitherto given, and for which the Society has been so justly noted, and average 196 per cent. of the annual premium (nearly two premiums) now payable in cash; or 332 per cent. of the annual premium (more than 3¼ premiums) added to the sum assured, exemplified more fully, at the average age 35, by the following table :

Years in force	Annual	Cash			Addition
		£	s.	d.	£	s.	d.
5	Premium,	28	2	1	59	11	11
10		51	9	9	101	3	8
15	aged 35,	52	13	3	95	0	2
20		52	15	9	86	12	3
25	£1,000,	61	1	6	91	16	0
30		79	15	5	112	3	5
35	£28 6 8	82	15	1	108	8	0
		£408	12	10	£654	15	5

Thus a Policy of £1,000 becomes one of over £1,654, or cash has been returned which, improved at 4 per cent., would equal £709, or the premium is totally extinguished.

Full examples at various ages will be supplied on application, but the above may be considered as representative.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

The next Division of Profits will take place in January 1892, and persons who effect New Policies BEFORE MIDSUMMER NEXT will be entitled at that Division to rank for Five full years' Bonus, and so obtain one year's additional share of Profits.

Obtain and read the Prospectus of the Society.

Address—THE JOINT ACTUARIES, SUN LIFE OFFICE, LONDON.

NIAGARA IN LONDON. COLOSSAL PICTURE of the GREAT FALLS. Original Effects, by Philippoteaux. Pleasant Lounge, Music, American Museum, Electric Light. Admission, 1s. No Fees. Ten A.M. to Eleven P.M. WEDNESDAY, 2s. 6d. Ten to Six ; 1s. Six to Eleven. Praised by entire Press.—YORK STREET, Westminster. St. James's Park Station. 3,000 Visitors Daily.

NETHERLAND WATERWAYS. — WATER-COLOUR SKETCHES, by W. L. WYLLIE, R.I.
Done on a Cruise in "The Ladybird." To be seen at ROBT. DUNTHORNE'S GALLERY, at the Sign of the "Rembrandt Head," in Vigo Street. Admission, including Log, 1s.

FRENCH GALLERY, 120 Pall Mall.—The THIRTY-FIFTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION of PICTURES by ARTISTS of the CONTINENTAL SCHOOLS is NOW OPEN. Admission, 1s.

ART UNION of LONDON.—The ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING to receive the COUNCIL'S REPORT, and to Distribute the Amount Subscribed for the Purchase of Works of Art for the Year 1888, will be held in the Royal Adelphi Theatre on Tuesday next, May 1, at Half-past Eleven for Twelve o'clock precisely, by the kind permission of Messrs. A. & S. Gatti.
112 Strand. ZOUCH TROUGHTON, Hon. Secretary.

ARTISTS' GENERAL BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION for the RELIEF of DISTRESSED ARTISTS, their WIDOWS and ORPHANS.
The ANNIVERSARY DINNER will take place at the "Whitehall Rooms," the Hôtel Métropole, on Wednesday, May 16, at Six o'clock.
The Right Honourable DAVID PLUNKET, Q.C., M.P., in the Chair.
Dinner Tickets, including Wines, One Guinea.
Donations will be received and thankfully acknowledged by
Sir JOHN EVERETT MILLAIS, Bart., R.A., Honorary Secretary.
PHILIP CHARLES HARDWICK, Treasurer.
DOUGLAS H. GORDON, Secretary, 19 St. James's Street, S.W.

MISSION TO DEEP-SEA FISHERMEN.

BRIDGE HOUSE, BLACKFRIARS BRIDGE, E.C.

THE

ANNUAL MEETING

Will be held at EXETER HALL, on WEDNESDAY, MAY 16.

At 2.30 There will be a Recital on the Great Organ by Mr. CHURCHILL SIBLEY, interspersed by Solo Singing.

At 3 The Chair will be taken by Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Bart., K.C.M.G., G.C.S.I., C.I.E., Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs. About 300 SMACKSMEN are expected on the Platform. Admission to the Afternoon Meeting will be by Tickets only. The prices being 10s. 6d., 2s. 6d., 1s., and 6d.

The EVENING MEETING will be

At 7 Under the Presidency of THOMAS GRAY, Esq., C.B., when there will be some new and beautifully painted Dissolving Views—Illustrations of Life in the Trawling Fleets—accompanied by personal testimony of the Smacksmen, with Solo and Chorus Singing. Tickets, 1s. and 6d. each.

ENGLISH LITERATURE. — A COURSE of TEN LECTURES to LADIES will be given on Thursday Afternoons, commencing the second week in May, by a Lady (Camb. Higher Local Certificate), near Oxford Circus. Fee for the Course, 21s. Single Lecture, 3s.—For Syllabus, Address "CANTAB," care of Davies & Co., Advertising Agents, Finch Lane, Cornhill.

WILLIAM S. BURTON'S ELECTRO-SILVER PLATE.

A NEW STOCK of choice DESIGNS, heavily silver-plated and highly finished, at reduced NET PRICES.

Biscuit Boxes	8s. 0d. to 105s.	Egg Steamers	10s. 0d. to 45s.
Butter Dishes	6s. 0d. to 50s.	Fish Carvers	15s. 0d. to 100s.
Cake Baskets	21s. 0d. to 120s.	Entrée Dishes	27s. 0d. to 70s.
Claret Jugs	12s. 0d. to 105s.	Egg Frames	18s. 0d. to 70s.
Cruet Frames	12s. 0d. to 210s.	Coffee Pots	14s. 0d. to 120s.
Teapots	10s. 0d. to 90s.	Tea and Coffee Sets	61s. 0d. to 400s.
Toast Racks	7s. 0d. to 42s.	Pickle Frames	21s. 0d. to 70s.
Kettles and Stands	55s. 0d. to 210s.	Nut Cracks, in case	8s. 0d. to 12s.
Afternoon Tea Sets	43s. 0d. to 111s.	Liquor Frames	30s. 0d. to 160s.

Breakfast Dishes, revolving covers	60s. 0d. to 150s.
Salad Bowls and Servers	18s. 0d. to 110s.
Dessert Knives and Forks, ivory handles	4s. 0d. per pair.
Do. do. pearl handles	6s. 0d. "
Fish-eating Knives and Forks	6s. 6d. "
Six Napkin Rings, in case	14s. 0d. to 42s. 0d.
Four Salt Cellars and Spoons, in case	24s. 0d. to 65s. 0d.

Lamps, Clocks, Bronzes, Cases of Knives, Spoons, and Forks, &c.

WILLIAM S. BURTON'S SPOONS AND FORKS.

ELECTRO-SILVER PLATE ON BEST NICKEL.

Best Quality. Strongly Plated.	Fiddle or Old Silver.	Bead, Thread, King's, or Shell.
Table Forks or Spoons ... per dozen	£1 8 0	£2 0 0
Dessert Forks or Spoons ... "	1 0 0	1 8 0
Tea Spoons ... "	0 11 0	1 0 0

The above are of the highest quality, will wear for 20 years as STERLING SILVER, and are THIRTY PER CENT. LOWER than a similar quality is usually sold for.

CUTLERY WARRANTED.

	Table.	Cheese.	Carvers.
	s. d.	s. d.	s. d.
3½-inch Ivory Handle Table Knives per dozen	15 0	11 0	7 0
3½ " ditto ditto to balance .. "	21 0	16 6	7 0
4 " ditto ditto ditto .. "	23 0	16 0	8 0
4 " ditto ditto ditto .. "	28 0	21 0	8 0
4 " ditto ditto ditto .. "	32 0	22 0	8 0
4 " ditto fine ditto ditto .. "	34 0	25 0	10 6
4 " ditto ditto, African .. "	40 0	32 0	15 0
4 " ditto, Silver Ferrules .. "	40 0	32 0	17 0
4 " Electro-Silver Handles .. "	23 0	19 0	7 6

The handles of the above knives are GUARANTEED SECURE, and the blades the best REFINED SHEAR STEEL, warranted to retain their cutting power.
Carriage paid. Samples at above rates, post free.

WILLIAM S. BURTON, ELECTRO-SILVER PLATER,

CUTLER, and GENERAL FURNISHING IRONMONGER, 88 Oxford Street, W.; and 1, 2, 3, and 84 Newman Street, W.

LAMPS AND OILS.

A CHOICE SELECTION of KEROSENE, MODERATOR, and other LAMPS.
COLZA OIL, finest ... 2s. 6d. per gallon.
KEROSENE, finest Pure Water-White ... 1s. "

DO NOT PINCH THE NOSE
BUT GO TO
L. K. LEON & CO.
OPTICIANS, 167 PICCADILLY, W.
BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

and purchase a pair of their Patent Self-Adjustable Eye-Glasses, fitted with cork nose-pieces, which can be worn by any one with comfort. The most difficult faces fitted. All our lenses are carefully adapted to the sight, and being made periscopic, of best axis cut pebbles, are guaranteed to give perfect comfort.

We have no Agents. 20,000 Sold at the Colonial Exhibition.

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.

NOTICE is HEREBY GIVEN, That the next Half-yearly EXAMINATION for MATRICULATION in this University will commence on MONDAY, June 18, 1888.

In addition to the Examination at the University, Provincial Examinations will be held at University College, Aberystwith; University College, Bangor; Queen's College, Birmingham; University College, Bristol; University College, Cardiff; the Ladies' College, Cheltenham (for Ladies only); St. Gregory's College, Downside; New College, Eastbourne; the Herriot Watt College, Edinburgh; the Royal Medical College, Epsom; the Yorkshire College, Leeds; University College, Liverpool; the Owens College, Manchester; the School of Science and Art, Newcastle-on-Tyne; University College, Nottingham; the High School, Oswestry; Firth College, Sheffield; Stonyhurst College; St. Cuthbert's College, Ushaw; and St. Edmund's College, Ware.

Every Candidate is required to transmit his Certificate of Age to the REGISTRAR (University of London, Burlington Gardens, London, W.) at least one Calendar Month before the commencement of the Examination.

April 20, 1888. ARTHUR MILMAN, M.A., Registrar.

TRINITY COLLEGE, GLENALMOND (in the Perthshire Highlands).

SIX SCHOLARSHIPS of £50 a year will be offered for competition in July.

The MODERN SIDE gives a special and systematic practical education for BOYS entering early upon life.

The CLASSICAL SIDE prepares for the Universities. BOYS are prepared for the Indian Civil Service, Army, and other EXAMINATIONS.

For particulars, prospectus, &c., apply to the Rev. the WARDEN, Glenalmond, Perth, N.B.

ISLE of WIGHT COLLEGE, Limited, near Ryde.

Visitor—The Right Rev. the LORD BISHOP of WINCHESTER.

President—The Right Hon. LORD ROLLO.

Chairman of Council The Attorney-General, Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Q.C., M.P.

Vice-Chairman Lieut.-General Sir HENRY DALY, K.C.B., C.I.E.

Head-Master—Rev. I. D. TEESDALE, M.A., New College, Oxon.

Eight Assistant-Masters. Classical and Modern Departments. Army and Navy Classes.

Boarders are received by the Head-Master, and by three Assistant-Masters, including the French Master (in whose house French is exclusively spoken). Special arrangements for Indian boys. The College stands in Twenty-one Acres, and enjoys all the advantages of a Southern climate. Private Chapel, Gymnasium, Racquet and Fives Courts; Sea Bathing and Boating. For Prospectuses, apply to the Rev. the HEAD-MASTER.

HEIDELBERG COLLEGE, Heidelberg.

Principals.

Dr. A. HOLZBERG, Ph.D., M.A., Heidelberg.

A. B. CATTY, B.A., Christ's Coll., Cantab.

WALTER LAWRENCE, M.A., St. John's, Oxon.

Preparation for Army and all Exams. Conversation and Correspondence Classes in French and German. Playground of 7 acres. Swimming; Gymnastics.

BRADFIELD COLLEGE, BERKS.

FOUR FOUNDATION SCHOLARSHIPS, annual value Ninety and Eighty guineas (covering Tuition and Boarding Fees), FOUR WARDEN'S ENTRANCE EXHIBITIONS, annual value Fifty guineas, and FOUR MINOR ENTRANCE EXHIBITIONS annual value Thirty guineas will be offered for competition by Examination, beginning May 29, 1888. Candidates must be between Eleven and Fifteen on August 1, 1888. Subjects of Examination—Divinity, Classics, Mathematics. Boys destined for a Modern Side education may offer French instead of Greek, and are eligible for the Exhibitions only.

Separate Papers for those over and under Thirteen. For further particulars apply to the WARDEN.

CLIFTON COLLEGE.—CLASSICAL, MATHEMATICAL, and NATURAL SCIENCE SCHOLARSHIPS. NINE or more OPEN to COMPETITION at MIDSUMMER 1888. Value from £25 to £50 a year, which may be increased from a special fund to £90 a year in cases of scholars who require it. Further particulars from the HEAD-MASTER, or SECRETARY, The College, Clifton, Bristol.

ROYAL INDIAN ENGINEERING COLLEGE, COOPERS HILL, STAINES.

The course of study is arranged to fit an ENGINEER for employment in Europe, India, or the Colonies. About FIFTY STUDENTS will be admitted in September 1888. For Competition the Secretary of State will offer Fifteen Appointments in the Indian Public Works Department and Two in the Indian Telegraph Department. — For particulars, apply to the SECRETARY, at the College.

RADLEY COLLEGE—SIX SCHOLARSHIPS (of the value, four of £50, one of £30, one of £20), tenable for four years, will be offered for competition by Examination, commencing June 6, 1888. Candidates must be under fourteen on the 1st January, 1888. For further particulars, apply to the WARDEN, Radley College, Abingdon.

FETTES COLLEGE, EDINBURGH.—A number of OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS, varying from £60 to £20, will be open for Competition in July, to Boys between Eleven and Fifteen. For particulars apply to HEAD-MASTER.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.

The SUMMER SESSION will begin on Tuesday, May 1, 1888.

The Hospital comprises a service of 750 beds (including 75 for Convalescents at Swanley). Students may reside in the College within the Hospital walls, subject to the collegiate regulations.

For particulars apply, personally or by letter, to the WARDEN of the College, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, E.C.

A Handbook forwarded on application.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—An EXAMINATION to fill up VACANCIES on the Foundation and Exhibitions will begin on Tuesday, July 10. For particulars apply to Rev. the HEAD-MASTER, Dean's Yard.

POWIS EXHIBITIONS.

ONE EXHIBITION, of the value of £60 a year, tenable at any College or Hall at either of the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge, is intended to be filled up after an Examination of the Candidates, which will take place at King Edward's School, Birmingham, on September 20 and following day.

Candidates are requested to send their Names, Addresses, and Certificates of Baptism, with Testimonials of Conduct and Character, on or before the 1st day of August, to CHARLES SHAW, Esq., care of Messrs. Park, Nelson, Morgan, & Gemmell, 11 Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C. Candidates must be Members of the Church of England, Natives of Wales, or of one of the four Welsh Dioceses, under Twenty Years of Age upon the 10th day of October next, acquainted with the Welsh Language, and intending to become Candidates for Holy Orders.

The Candidates will be examined by the Rev. A. G. Edwards, Vicar of Carmarthen, M.A., Jesus College, Oxford; and H. R. Tottenham, Esq., M.A., Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, in Welsh Reading, Composition and Speaking; the Gospel according to St. Matthew and the Acts of the Apostles in Greek; the Fifth and Sixth Books of the Iliad; the Sixth Book of Thucydides; the Seventh Book of the Æneid; Xenophon's Anabasis, Cicero de Officiis, and Latin Prose and Verse Composition. Those who fail in Welsh will not be further examined.

The Exhibition will be tenable (during Residence) for Four years by an Exhibitioner who at the time of his Election is not legally a Member of either University, and will in his case date from Matriculation; and by an Exhibitioner who at the time of his Election is legally a Member of either University till the close of the Term in which the Degree of Bachelor of Arts is due to the Holder.

April 25, 1888.

RUGBY SCHOLARSHIPS and Places on the Foundation. Examination begins Tuesday, June 11.

MESSRS. BUSHNELL & ERSKINE, Graduates of Oxford and Cambridge, assisted by a Wrangler, prepare PUPILS for UNIVERSITY MATRICULATION and WOOLWICH and SANDHURST. 19 Suffolk Square, Cheltenham.

ARMY and C. S.—An experienced CANTAB (Mathematical and Classical Honours) receives a few only. Arrangement for Militia Candidates. Places [illegible] Pupils. Highest references.—Apply to J. ABBOTT, Winchester House, Earl's Court, S.W.

SURREY, WOKING.—TO BE LET, or SOLD, a spacious RESIDENCE, lately used as a Public School, with Dormitories for nearly fifty Students, besides Principal's and Servants' quarters and Chapel. Surrounded by charming pleasure-grounds, cricket field, paddock, and kitchen garden, gardener's cottage, and outbuildings, in all [illegible] acres, situate on an elevated and exceptionally healthy plateau.—Terms of Messrs. Dauvan & Co., 4 Whitehall, London.

HELP WANTED.

Thousands of Fishermen are engaged all the year round in providing OUR TABLES with Fish. These men, who FOR US hazard their lives and toil through furious blast and sleety storm (not only cut off from the comforts of home, but at TWO DAYS' DISTANCE FROM SURGICAL OR MEDICAL AID), may rightly claim some small share in the privileges we so richly enjoy. THIS THEY CAN ONLY HAVE THROUGH THE PRESENCE OF THE MISSION VESSELS, carrying to the Fishermen the message of Divine mercy and love, affording relief in sickness, and cheering dull lives by their presence.

Eight Vessels now cruise with the North Sea Trawling Fleets. Each Vessel is specially fitted for this service, and is at once a Church, Dispensary, Library, and Club. Funds are being raised for the Maintenance of a New Hospital Mission Vessel ("The Queen Victoria"), which is greatly needed; accidents are so numerous as to simply appal an average Landsman. Who will help this great work? Small or Large Offerings will be thankfully acknowledged.

Mission to Deep-Sea Fishermen.

PATRON: HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

OFFICE: BRIDGE HOUSE, BLACKFRIARS BRIDGE, E.C.

E. J. MATHER, Founder and Director.

LEA & PERRINS' SAUCE.

In consequence of Imitations of

LEA & PERRINS' SAUCE,

which are calculated to deceive the Public,

LEA & PERRINS beg to draw attention to the fact that each bottle of the Original and Genuine

WORCESTERSHIRE SAUCE

bears the Signature of

LEA & PERRINS.

 Sold Wholesale by the Proprietors, Worcester; CROSSE & BLACKWELL, London; and Export Oilmen generally.

Retail by Dealers in Sauces throughout the World.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
For Improved and Economic Cookery.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
The only sort ever guaranteed GENUINE by Justus von Liebig.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
The finest Meat-Flavouring Stock, USE it for Soups, Made Dishes, Fish, Game, and other Sauces.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
Efficient TONIC in all cases of Weakness and Digestive Disorders.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
Highly recommended as a Nightcap instead of alcoholic drinks.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
GENUINE ONLY with facsimile of JUSTUS VON LIEBIG'S SIGNATURE in BLUE INK across label.

ASK FOR

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
With BLUE SIGNATURE.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA.

This pure Solution is the best remedy for Acidity of the Stomach, Heartburn, Headache, Gout, and Indigestion.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA.

The safest and most gentle Aperient for delicate constitutions, Ladies, Children, and Infants.

180 Bond Street, London; and all Chemists.

Mr. C. B. HARNESS, Consulting Medical Electrician and Inventor of the world-famed Electropathic Belt, may be consulted daily free of charge, personally or by letter, at the ELECTROPATHIC ESTABLISHMENT of the Medical Battery Company, Limited, 52 OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W. (corner of Rathbone Place). All in search of health should call to-day, if possible, or write at once. Thousands of testimonials. Note only address, as above.

P. and O. MAIL STEAMERS FROM LONDON TO

BOMBAY, GIBRALTAR, MALTA, BRINDISI, EGYPT, ADEN, and COLOMBO........ } every week.

CALCUTTA, CHINA, STRAITS and JAPAN, AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND, and TASMANIA.. } every alternate week.

Direct Services from MARSEILLES, NAPLES, and BRINDISI, to the EAST.

CHEAP RETURN TICKETS.

For particulars apply at the Company's Offices, 122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., and 25 Cockspur Street, London, S.W.

ILFRACOMBE.—The ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn Tennis Courts, large Swimming Bath. Private Bath. Descriptive tariff of Manager.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.—Sold by all Stationers throughout the World.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C. — The COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. The YEAR CLOSED with a DEFICIT of OVER [illegible]. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond, 49 Charing Cross, S.W.

ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

CLOSING of the LISTS.—The GATLING GUN, Limited.—NOTICE is Hereby Given that the LIST of APPLICATIONS for Shares will be CLOSED This Day, SATURDAY, April 28.—By Order.

20 Bucklersbury, E.C., April 28, 1888.

THE GATLING GUN, Limited.

In reply to numerous enquiries, I am instructed to say that arrangements have been made pending the construction of the Company's Works for the execution of all Orders, thus providing for the carrying out of the Company's contracts without any delay.

T. DUNDAS PILLANS, Secretary pro tem.

INTENDING SUBSCRIBERS CAN INSPECT THE GUN UPON APPLICATION TO THE SECRETARY, AT THE OFFICES OF THE COMPANY, 20 BUCKLERSBURY, E.C.

THE GATLING GUN, Limited.

Incorporated under the Joint-Stock Companies' Acts, 1862 to 1883.

CAPITAL ... ... £800,000.

Divided into 45,000 Ordinary Shares of £10 each (£450,000), entitled to 20 per cent. dividend after the Preference Shares have received 8 per cent., and to a further pro ratâ share of surplus profits; 35,000 8 per cent. Cumulative Preference Shares of £10 each (£350,000), entitled to 8 per cent. Preference dividend, and to a pro ratâ division of surplus profits after the Ordinary Shares have received 20 per cent.

Of the foregoing Capital £266,660 will be reserved and allotted to the Vendor in fully paid-up Shares as part payment of the purchase price; of the balance, which is now offered for Public Subscription, £180,000 is, in accordance with the terms of the Contract, apportioned as working Capital. It is estimated that the sale of the foreign rights, or the granting of licences to manufacture under them, will alone produce a sum equal to a return of the entire Capital.

The payments for each description of Share will be £1 on Application, £2 on Allotment, £2 10s. on 10th May, £2 10s. on 31st May, £2 on 29th September, with privilege to pay up in full on Allotment. Share Warrants to Bearer will be issued free of expense to such of the Subscribers under this Prospectus as may desire to have them. The sale of this remarkable Gun has to be numbered by thousands, and over the whole world. It has stood the test and opposition of powerful cliques and vested interests, and, with its recent improvements and new mechanism, is pronounced positive and certain in its action, the rapidity and certainty of its operation enabling the Gun to fire 1,200 shots per minute, at all degrees of elevation or depression, which, it is claimed, is something no other Machine Gun can do.

Directors.

The Earl DE GREY, 12 Bruton Street, W.

Colonel G. A. CURZON (late 2nd Life Guards), Holmwood, Boscombe, Hampshire.

Major-General J. C. HAY, C.B., 25 St. James's Street, S.W.

ALEXANDER STAVELEY HILL, Esq., Q.C., M.P., 13 King's Bench Walk, Temple, E.C.

A. J. MACDONALD, Esq., Director of the New Oriental Bank Corporation, Limited, and formerly President of the Bank of Bombay.

JOHN LINDSAY SCOTT, Esq., of Mollance, Castle Douglas, N.B., and 38 Green Street, Grosvenor Square, W.

The Hon. ARTHUR WALSH, M.P. (late 1st Life Guards), the Carlton Club, Pall Mall, S.W.

*FREDERIC COURTLAND PENFIELD, Esq. (late Vice-Consul-General of the United States).

* Will join the Board after Allotment.

Consulting Engineer.—RICHARD J. GATLING, Esq.

Constructing Engineer in-Chief.—J. G. ACCLES, Esq.

Solicitor.—E. F. B. HARSTON, Esq., 34 Clement's Lane, Lombard Street, E.C.

Auditors.—Messrs. MONKHOUSE, GODDARD, & CO., 28 and 29 St. Swithin's Lane, E.C., and Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

Bankers.—The NATIONAL BANK of SCOTLAND, Limited, 37 Nicholas Lane, London, and its Head Office and Branches in Scotland; Messrs. COX & CO., Craig's Court, Charing Cross, S.W.; the NEW ORIENTAL BANK CORPORATION, Limited, 40 Threadneedle Street, E.C.

Secretary (pro tem.)—T. DUNDAS PILLANS, Esq.

TEMPORARY OFFICES—20 BUCKLERSBURY, E.C.

PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed for the purpose of purchasing all the existing patent rights for Europe and the whole Eastern Hemisphere of the world in and about the well-known machine gun called the "Gatling Gun," owned by the Gatling Gun Company of America, with all present and future improvements.

The business of the manufacture of this gun has hitherto (with trifling exceptions) been carried on in America, but by the arrangements made between the Vendor and this Company, it has been stipulated and agreed that the American owners shall not manufacture for nor sell to any country outside of the Western Hemisphere any of these guns, thus securing to this Company a practical monopoly in the manufacture and sale thereof.

In France and a few other countries the law requires patented articles to be manufactured within the country, therefore in such countries sub-companies may be constituted or licences granted.

The value of the Gatling Gun is too well known to require any argument to support or exemplify it. It has a world-wide character and reputation, not relying upon any theoretical description or problematical utility, its perfection and usefulness having been tested and proved upon hard-fought battle-fields, where human lives and great events depended upon its merits. The tests made by the United States Army and Naval Ordnance Boards in January, 1883, show that the new improvements have rendered jamming practically impossible.

The Gatling is an infantry and naval arm and without an equal. Each Gatling Gun will fire about twice as many bullets per minute as any well-drilled company of infantry, and using the Gatling service rifle ammunition will kill at 2,800 yards, and one gun will, as proven by experience, discharge 1,200 bullets per minute.

The adaptability of this gun to fast or slow firing is complete and under the absolute control of the officer in charge, which is understood to be a very important feature in machine gunnery.

The Gatling Gun is the only machine gun which can fire at a great angle of depression or elevation, and no fort, however well manned, could hold out an hour if the Gatlings were near enough to produce the rainbow or curved fire.

A Gatling Gun placed in one street can fire over the tops of buildings into a parallel street with great effect, by means of its positive feed device, which makes high-angle or parabolic fire practical.

The history of the Gatling Gun in the recent British wars and campaigns establishes it to be the most effective weapon known, and many celebrated British leaders testify to its merits.

The following countries have made purchases of Gatling Guns, principally of the American Company, but all future purchases for Europe and the Eastern Hemisphere will have to be made of or through this Company or some subsidiary Company formed by this Company for that purpose:—

The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.	Switzerland.	Cuba.	India.
United States of America.	Russia.	Chili.	Japan.
United States of Columbia.	Prussia.	China.	Persia.
United States of Mexico.	Italy.	Brazil.	Peru.
	France.	Portugal.	Siam.
	Germany.	Argentine Republic.	Turkey.
	Egypt.	Hayti.	Tunis.
	Denmark.	Hawaiian Islands.	Spain.
	Canada.	Honduras.	South Australia.

The Government of the United States of America, by their purchase of Gatling Guns, have given evidence of their appreciation of the value of this weapon, to which may be added the testimony of the following States, which have supplied their militia organizations with these guns:—

Alabama.	Illinois.	Maryland.	Ohio.
Arkansas.	Indiana.	Massachusetts.	Pennsylvania.
California.	Iowa.	Michigan.	Rhode Island.
Colorado.	Kansas.	Mississippi.	South Carolina.
Connecticut.	Kentucky.	Missouri.	Tennessee.
Delaware.	Louisiana.	New Jersey.	West Virginia.
Georgia.	Maine.	New York.	Wisconsin.

Some idea of the commercial value of this gun may be formed from the following estimate:—

1. That every European Army is incomplete in its equipment without Gatling Guns.
2. That every armed ship, no matter of what description, will find a Gatling Gun most useful.
3. That any naval or military Power, whether European or otherwise, will find Gatling Guns a necessity.
4. That every foreign municipality, city, and commune where a police force exists will find the new Gatling Police Gun of incalculable value.

Each police gun can be charged, pointed, and fired by one man, and will throw about 700 bullets per minute.

The manufacture of guns and ammunition has proved a very profitable business to capitalists and shareholders: even where they could claim no special or exclusive rights, premiums have ranged as high as 280 per cent., and dividends amounted to as much as 30 per cent. How much, therefore, may be reckoned upon as the result of working a monopoly over almost the whole world, in a gun proved, tried, and acknowledged to be the first of its description and class?

The manufacturing business of the Company will be carried on in this country in premises specially suited to the purpose, and under the direction and control of J. G. ACCLES, Esq., whose services have been secured by the Directors; and the business will include the manufacture of metallic cartridges by the most recent and improved machinery for that purpose. The manufacture in the United States will be limited for the future to work for the Western Hemisphere, as the guns can be manufactured here for a considerable sum less per gun than in the United States.

Mr. ACCLES states that the weight of a ten-barrelled gun to fire Gatling Service cartridges at the rate of 1,200 shots per minute will not exceed 138 pounds, and that the police gun of a similar character, but with six barrels, will not exceed 80 pounds.

It is not deemed at all unlikely that for outlying and distant countries, such as China, Japan, &c., from which very large orders may be expected, that subsidiary Companies will be formed, and local manufactories established. Should such be the case the Shareholders may fairly calculate upon greatly increased profits accruing from these sources.

For obvious reasons no calculation is offered of the cost of manufacture or other expenses, nor of the amount of profits to be made, the Directors preferring that intending investors should draw their own inferences and arrive at their own conclusions, based upon the well-known character of the gun and the results of the working of kindred and similar institutions. The surplus profits of each year, after payment of the interest on the Preference Share Capital of £350,000, and after paying 20 per cent. dividend on the Ordinary Share Capital of £450,000, and setting aside such a sum as may be deemed advisable as reserve, will be divided pro ratâ between the Preference and Ordinary Share capital of the Company.

The following Contracts have been entered into:—

A Contract dated 20th April, 1888, between the Gatling Gun Company of the United States of America, of the one part, and Charles Edwin Green, of the other part; a Contract, dated 20th April, 1888, between the said Charles Edwin Green (the Vendor), of the one part, and the Gatling Gun, Limited, of the other part; and a Contract dated the 20th April, 1888, between the Gatling Gun, Limited, of the one part, and James George Accles of the other part.

The Vendor, Charles Edwin Green, who is the Promoter, has fixed the purchase price at the sum of £620,000 (of which £266,660 is to be paid in fully-paid Shares of the Company in pro ratâ proportion of Preference and Ordinary Shares, the same being the largest amount allowed by the rules of the Stock Exchange), and he pays all the expenses of advertising, printing, commission, law charges, and brokerage incidental to floating the Company up to and inclusive of the Allotment of the Shares.

This Company not only acquires the exclusive rights for all existing patents in every country excepting in the Western Hemisphere, but acquires any further patents and improvements that may become the property of the Gatling Gun Company, this Company paying for the necessary stamps and expenses for taking out said patents.

The foregoing Contracts, together with the Memorandum and Articles of Association, will be open to inspection at the Offices of the Solicitor to the Company during the issue of this Prospectus.

Applications for Shares must be made on the Form accompanying the Prospectus, but the Directors reserve to themselves the right to give priority in the Allotment of Ordinary Shares to those applicants who apply for both descriptions of Shares.

In the event of no Allotment being made to any applicant, the deposit will be returned in full, and without delay. If part only of the Shares applied for by any applicant be allotted to him, the surplus of his application money will be retained by the Company, and credited upon the Shares allotted to him.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application can be obtained at the Bankers, or of the SECRETARY at the Temporary Offices of the Company, 20 Bucklersbury, London, E.C.

April 21, 1888.

THE GATLING GUN, Limited.

Replying for "The Navy," at a dinner of the Cutlers' Company, Lord Charles Beresford said:—"The great value of machine guns has been shown. With the Gatlings the landing parties had cleared the streets of Alexandria, and prevented Arabi from returning, and if they had been allowed to land immediately after the bombardment, they might have dispersed the crowds laden with loot, have captured Arabi, Toulba Pasha, and other leaders, and saved the town; but the Government had promised that no man should land, and they were bound by the promise."

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

PROVIDENT LIFE OFFICE,
50 REGENT STREET, LONDON, W.

ABSTRACT OF ANNUAL AND QUINQUENNIAL REPORT OF THE DIRECTORS, FEBRUARY 17, 1888.

Proposals were received for New Assurances amounting to £539,861. Of these 954 were accepted, and Policies granted for £462,363, the annual Premiums upon which were £16,012; these figures show an increase upon the year 1886 of 101 in the number of Policies issued, £76,583 in the amount assured, and £2,449 in the new annual Premiums.

Proposals for £77,698 were declined or not completed.

The Claims for the year were £239,278, an increase of £10,070 upon the amount for 1886.

The Annual Income is now £319,719. The total funds at the close of the year were £2,501,290, an increase of £15,344.

On the 31st of December last was completed another Quinquennial period, and in accordance with the terms of the 54th Clause of the Deed of Constitution, a Valuation of the Liabilities under all Policies of Assurance has been made by the Actuary.

The Valuation of the Assets and Liabilities results in a surplus of £151,123 4s. 4d., yielding, after setting aside the ample reserve provided for under the Deed of Constitution, £6,804 18s. to the Shareholders; while the reversionary value of £218,756 14s. 2d. will be allotted to the various Policies entitled to Bonus.

KINNAIRD, Chairman.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY.
Established 1836.
LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.
INCOME and FUNDS (1885).

Fire Premiums	£582,000
Life Premiums	198,000
Interest	138,000
Accumulated Funds	£3,297,000

STANDARD LIFE OFFICE.

HALF A MILLION paid in Death Claims every year.
Funds—SIX AND A HALF MILLIONS, increasing yearly.

83 KING WILLIAM STREET, E.C.
3 PALL MALL EAST, W.

PHŒNIX FIRE OFFICE.
LOMBARD STREET and CHARING CROSS, LONDON.—Established 1782.
Insurances against Loss by Fire and Lightning effected in all parts of the World.
Loss claims arranged with promptitude and liberality.
WILLIAM C. MACDONALD } FRANCIS B. MACDONALD } Joint Secretaries.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.
Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PALL MALL, S.W.
Subscribed Capital, £1,200,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000.
E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

ACCIDENTS ALL THE YEAR ROUND.—Provide against them by Policy of the RAILWAY PASSENGERS' ASSURANCE COMPANY, 64 Cornhill, London. Hon. EVELYN ASHLEY, Chairman. Annual Income, £248,000. Invested Capital and Reserve Fund, £275,000. Compensation Paid for 126,000 Accidents, £2,500,000. Moderate Premiums—Favourable Conditions—New Concessions. Prompt and Liberal Settlement of Claims. West-end Office, 8 Grand Hotel Buildings, W.C.; Head Office, 64 Cornhill.
WILLIAM J. VIAN, Secretary.

THE INSURANCE POLICYHOLDERS' MUTUAL PROTECTION LEAGUE, Limited.
Every one Insured or intending to Insure should read the League's Publication, PROFIT or PLUNDER? &c.
To be had post free for 6d. on application to the SECRETARY of the League, 8 Warwick Court, Grays' Inn, London, W.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.
THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the purchase and sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

FINDLATER'S WHISKIES.
BEST OLD IRISH and BEST ISLAY MALT
41s. per dozen bottles.
Are the production of the Old-fashioned Pot Stills, matured and mellowed by age only.
Note the bronze green label, with Trade Mark, a "Stag's Head."
33 WELLINGTON STREET, Covent Garden, and 219 BROMPTON ROAD, S.W.

FRY'S
J. WYBRANTS OLPHERTS, M.D., says: "I find it the most agreeable beverage of the kind I have ever tasted, delicious both in flavour and odour."
PURE CONCENTRATED
S. BUCKNILL, M.D., says: "Your Pure Concentrated Cocoa is so extremely nice that I have ordered it for family use."
COCOA.

"SECURUS JUDICAT ORBIS TERRARUM."
APOLLINARIS.
"THE QUEEN OF TABLE WATERS."
The filling at the Apollinaris Spring during the year 1887 amounted to 11,894,000 bottles.

STRUVE'S
BRIGHTON SELTZER WATER.
PREPARED FROM THE WORLD-RENOWNED SPRING OF THE
ROYAL GERMAN SPA, BRIGHTON,
And supplied uninterruptedly to Royalty by Royal Warrant of His late Majesty King William IV. and H.M. the Queen-Empress Victoria.
OF ALL CHEMISTS AND WINE MERCHANTS THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY.
Carriage Paid on Six Dozen and upwards.
ROYAL GERMAN SPA, BRIGHTON.

"A LETTER was received from Mr. H. S. Parker, acknowledging the receipt of the samples of tea. He had lettered the samples, and sent them to Messrs. Hawes and Hertz, who had kindly tested them. The report of the testing was then opened, and it was found that the sample marked G, at 1s. 6d. per lb., was the 'best value at the price.' The Rev. S. B. Burnaby then asked for the name of the firm tendering sample G.—The Chairman: 'Messrs. Barber & Co., of Regent Circus.' The result was considered to be extremely satisfactory, as the sample supplied by Messrs. Barber was taken from the stock already supplied by them."—The Metropolitan, April 3.

2½ lbs. Samples sent free per Parcels Post for 4s. 3d., 4½ lbs. for 7s. 6d., 6 lbs. for 10s., 8½ lbs. for 14s., 10½ lbs. for 16s. 0d., to any post town in the United Kingdom and Channel Islands. Postal orders from 1s. 6d. to 10s. 6d. may be had at all Post-Offices for 1d.

BARBER & COMPANY,
274 REGENT CIRCUS, OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.
61 Bishopsgate St., E.C.; 102 Westbourne Grove, W.; King's Cross, N.; 42 Gt. Titchfield St., W.; Boro', London Bridge; and at Brighton, Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, Bristol, Preston, and Hastings.

BOOKS, &c.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly, London. All the New and Standard Books. Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c. Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s. allowed off NEW BOOKS. Catalogues of New, Surplus, and Second-hand Books, on application. A Special Catalogue of handsome Gift-books at greatly reduced prices.
JOHN BUMPUS, BOOKSELLER TO HER MAJESTY,
350 Oxford Street, London.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates per annum, paid in advance:

	£	s.	d.
Any part of the United Kingdom	£1	8	2
India and China	1	12	6
Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America	1	10	6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

Now ready, at all Libraries, 3 vols. 31s. 6d.
PEARL STUTTON'S LOVE. A Novel. By J. G. HOLMES, Author of "Sir Richard's Revenge."
WYMAN & SONS, 74, 76 Great Queen Street. And all Booksellers.

Now ready, 5s.; by post, 5s. 6d.
MRS. A. B. MARSHALL'S COOKERY BOOK.
New. Complete. 70 Engravings. 468 pp.
Sauces, Stocks, Soups, Fish, Hot Entrées, Cold Entrées, Removes, Roasts, Second Course Dishes, Vegetables, Breakfast and Luncheon Dishes, Sweets, Puddings, Cakes, Jellies, Creams, Savouries, Menus; the Art of Dinner-Giving, Glossary, French and English Names, and Instructions for Writing Menus; Food Calendar, Marketing. Every Recipe has been carried out by Mrs. A. B. MARSHALL, and written out by her accordingly. None are copied from other books.
Can be ordered from MARSHALL'S SCHOOL OF COOKERY,
30 and 32 Mortimer Street, London, W. And of all Booksellers.

Revised Edition, pp. 324, bound 1s., or 12 stamps.
HOMŒOPATHIC FAMILY INSTRUCTOR. By Drs. R. and W. EPPS. Describes fully and prescribes for general diseases.
London: JAMES EPPS & CO., 48 Threadneedle Street; and 170 Piccadilly.

MATTHEW ARNOLD'S LAST ARTICLE.

See THE CENTURY for MAY. Also "SIBERIA AND THE EXILE SYSTEM," by GEO. KENNAN, with Map and 16 Illustrations; "THE PERSONALITY of LEO XIII.," with Portrait and Autograph; "A LOCOMOTIVE CHASE," Illustrated; &c. &c.
The time to Subscribe, being No. 1 of a New Volume, Monthly, 1s. 4d.

ST. NICHOLAS MAGAZINE for Young Folks. The MAY Number contains Papers on JOSEF HOFMANN, with Portrait. And many other Essays, Stories, and Poems, profusely and beautifully Illustrated. Monthly, 1s.

LONDON: T. FISHER UNWIN, 26 PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

ACTS OF PARLIAMENT
PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS,
AND OFFICIAL PUBLICATIONS
ARE OBTAINABLE FROM
EYRE & SPOTTISWOODE,
EAST HARDING STREET.

"He must have been an enemy to entertaining knowledge who first spread the report that Blue Books are dry reading. A more misleading idea could hardly be conceived."—Daily Telegraph.

"People who complain that Blue Books are dull ought to dive into some of the collections of Consular Reports lately published by the Foreign Office, and they would find good reason for changing their opinion."—Morning Post.

"Every political club should have these books......I think the people of the country ought certainly to read them......If I could get these works taken by every political club, and read, I am certain the people of this country would make a most tremendous movement in favour of economy."—LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.

If you want to purchase an Act of Parliament, a Bill under discussion in either House of Parliament, a Return compiled for the use of Members, or a Report made by the Members of a Royal Commission or a Select Committee; or if you require any Naval or Military Book, or any Publication issued by the Government,

APPLY TO
EYRE & SPOTTISWOODE,
Sole Agents for Official Publications,
EAST HARDING STREET, LONDON, E.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS:
FROM ONE GUINEA PER ANNUM.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS:
FROM TWO GUINEAS PER ANNUM.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY:
For Books exchangeable by the Library Messengers,
FROM TWO GUINEAS PER ANNUM.

ALL THE BEST AND MOST POPULAR BOOKS OF THE SEASON ARE IN CIRCULATION AT MUDIE'S LIBRARY.

MUDIE'S CLEARANCE LIST contains many thousand Volumes of Standard and other Works withdrawn from circulation, and now offered for Sale at Greatly Reduced Prices.

Prospectuses and Clearance Lists sent postage free on application.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY,
LIMITED,
30 TO 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.

BRANCH OFFICES:
281 REGENT STREET, AND 2 KING STREET, CHEAPSIDE.

Now ready, 2 vols. fcp. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

SELECT ESSAYS
OF
THOMAS DE QUINCEY.
Narrative and Imaginative.

Edited and Annotated by DAVID MASSON, LL.D.
Professor of English Literature in the University of Edinburgh.

CONTENTS: Vol. I. On Murder considered as one of the Fine Arts—Early Memorials of Grasmere—Revolt of the Tartars—Editorial Introductions, Foot-notes, and Explanatory Appendices.

CONTENTS: Vol. II. The Spanish Military Nun The English Mail Coach—Suspiria de Profundis—Editorial Introductions, Foot-notes, and Explanatory Appendices.

EDINBURGH: ADAM & CHARLES BLACK.

Now ready, post 8vo. 6s.

A HISTORY OF POLITICAL ECONOMY.
By J. KELLS INGRAM, LL.D.
Trinity College, Dublin.

CONTENTS: Introduction—Ancient Times—The Middle Ages—Modern Times—The Historical School—Conclusion.

EDINBURGH: ADAM & CHARLES BLACK.

Post free, 1s.

The INCREASE of CANCER in ENGLAND, AND ITS CAUSE.
A Letter to the Registrar-General. By JOHN FRANCIS CHURCHILL, M.D.

DAVID STOTT, 370 OXFORD STREET, W.

"The delightful humour of Praed has made many a reader love him as well as laugh with him."—Daily News.

Just published, crown 8vo. cloth, bevelled, 5s.

PRAED'S POLITICAL POEMS: the Political and Occasional Poems of William Mackworth Praed. Edited, with Introduction and Explanatory Notes, by Sir GEORGE YOUNG.

"Now, for the first time, is afforded the opportunity of judging the entire work of a writer whose keen wit and untiring vivacity assign him a foremost place among English satirists."
Morning Post, April 20.

"It will be difficult to imagine a greater treat for the lover of political verse, crammed with topical allusions......If Praed's life had been spared he might have rivalled Horace himself. ......Gratitude may blunt our critical powers, for we must own to having read these pages with ever-increasing enjoyment."—Daily News (in a leading article), April 21.

"Praed has his acknowledged place in literature as a master of the light touch in verse. He wrote such graceful, elegant, humorous songs as are seldom heard to-day........Praed's power of lightness and of satire is nowhere shown to better advantage than in the political poems that came from his pen......The collection is full of hearty amusement, and will receive a hearty welcome."—Scotsman, April 16.

London: WARD, LOCK, & CO., Salisbury Square, E.C.

A BOOK FOR EVERY GENTLEMAN'S LIBRARY.

Just published, Fifth Edition, royal 12mo. cloth, 12s. 6d.

WIGRAM'S JUSTICE'S NOTE-BOOK. Containing a short Account of the Jurisdiction and Duties of Justices, and an Epitome of Criminal Law. By the late W. KNOX WIGRAM, Esq., J.P. Fifth Edition. By WALTER S. SHIRLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"We have found in it all the information which a Justice can require."—Times.

STEVENS & SONS, Law Publishers, 119 Chancery Lane, London.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

READY MAY 1, AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

THE GREAT CRYPTOGRAM: FRANCIS BACON'S CIPHER in the SO-CALLED SHAKSPERE PLAYS. By IGNATIUS DONNELLY, Author of "Atlantis" and "Ragnarok; or, The Age of Fire and Gravel." 2 vols. royal 8vo. 30s.

THE TABLE OF CONTENTS.

Book I.—THE ARGUMENT. Part I. William Shakspere did not Write the Plays. Part II. Francis Bacon the Real Author of the Plays. Part III. Parallelisms.
Book II.—THE DEMONSTRATION. Part I. The Cipher in the Plays. Part II. The Cipher Narrative.
Book III.—CONCLUSIONS.

THREE CRUISES of the "BLAKE." By ALEXANDER AGASSIZ, Director of the Museum of Comparative Zoology at Cambridge, Mass. 2 vols. 8vo. fully Illustrated, 42s.

The steamer "Blake," of the U.S. Coast Survey, made three cruises in 1877-78, 1878 79, and 1880, to the Straits of Florida, the Yucatan Bank, the Gulf of Mexico, the Caribbean Sea, and along the Atlantic Coast from Charleston to George's Bank. These volumes give the results of the dredging along the coast and in deep water; describe the contour of the ocean bed, the fauna and the thermic conditions of the sea; and contain a statement of what had been learned from previous explorations, as well as the extensive, varied, and deeply interesting facts ascertained by the three cruises specially reported. The volumes are illustrated with maps, sections, and figures of the deep-sea fauna. The scientific value of the work is amply guaranteed by its authorship.

THE LAND of the PINK PEARL; or, Recollec-tions of Life in the Bahamas. By L. D. POWLES, late Circuit Justice in the Bahama Islands. 1 vol. demy 8vo. with Map, cloth, 10s. 6d.

The object of this work is to draw attention to an obscure corner of Her Majesty's dominions, but little known on this side of the Atlantic, yet not devoid of a special interest of its own, for it was one of the Bahama Islands that Columbus first sighted when he discovered the New World.

TURBANS and TAILS; or, Sketches in the Un-romantic East. By A. J. BAMFORD, M.A. Crown 8vo. cloth, 7s. 6d.

"I pity the man who can travel from Dan to Beersheba and cry, ''Tis all barren.'"
STERNE.

MAURY (Commander M. F.), LIFE of. Compiled by his Daughter, D. F. MAURY-CORBIN. Edited by Mr. CLEMENTS MARKHAM, C.B. Demy 8vo. cloth, 14s.

 Commander Maury's name is well known as the author of "The Physical Geography of the Sea and its Meteorology," which work has passed through over twenty editions in this country alone.

NEAR and FAR: an Angler's Sketches of Home Sport and Colonial Life. By WM. SENIOR ("Red Spinner"), Angling Editor of the "Field," Author of "Waterside Sketches" &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

"Both for young and old these pages are good reading..........Mr. Senior's book will be welcomed by all good anglers." Daily Telegraph.

ANTIPODEAN NOTES. Collected on a Nine Months' Tour Round the World. By "WANDERER," Author of "Fair Diana," "Dinner and Dishes," &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 7s. 6d.

LIGHTS and SHADOWS of MELBOURNE LIFE. By JOHN FREEMAN. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

NEW BOOK OF POEMS by DR. OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, entitled

BEFORE the CURFEW, and other Poems, chiefly Occasional. By O. W. HOLMES, Author of "Our Hundred Days in Europe" &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 5s.

THE SONGS of the BIRDS; or, Analogies of Animal and Spiritual Life. By the late Rev. W. E. EVANS, M.A., formerly of Burton Court, Herefordshire, and Canon of Hereford Cathedral. New Edition, with numerous Illustrations, small crown 8vo. cloth extra, 6s.

HANDBOOK of SURGERY. By Dr. F. ESMARCH. An entirely New Translation from the Third German Edition, by R. FARQUHAR CURTIS, M.D. Demy 8vo. with 647 Illustrations, leather binding, 24s.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

THOMSON (J.) and HARRIS-SMITH.—ULU: an African Romance. By JOSEPH THOMSON, Author of "Through Masai-Land," &c.; and Miss HARRIS-SMITH. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

CABLE (G. W.)—BONAVENTURE: a Prose Pastoral of Acadian Louisiana. Crown 8vo. 5s. (New Volume of Low's "Standard Novels.")

HOEY (F. C.)—A STERN CHASE. By Mrs. HOEY. Cheaper Edition, crown 8vo. cloth, 6s. (New Addition to Low's "Standard Novels.")

RUSSELL (W. C.)—The FROZEN PIRATE. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. Cheaper Edition, crown 8vo. with Illustrations, cloth, price 6s.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.
MAY NUMBER.
Now ready, 1s.

ALEXANDER WILLIAM KINGLAKE. From a Photo. by Elliott and Fry, London. Frontispiece.

LONDON AS A LITERARY CENTRE. First Paper by R. R. BOWKER. Illustrated with 27 Portraits. From Photographs by Sarony, Hollyer, Lewis, Bassano, Barraud, King, Apollony, Cameron Studio, Mayall & Co., London Stereoscopic Company, Elliott & Fry, and St. James Photographic Company.

MATTHEW ARNOLD—Martin Farquhar Tupper—Philip James Bailey—William Morris—Lewis Morris—Earl Lytton—Jean Ingelow—Christina G. Rossetti—Leslie Stephen—Walter Pater—John Addington Symonds—Frederick Max Müller—Sidney Colvin—Philip Gilbert Hamerton—Herbert Spencer—John Tyndall—Thomas Henry Huxley—Sir John Lubbock—Cardinal Newman—Cardinal Manning—Archdeacon Farrar—Rev. H. R. Haweis—James Anthony Froude—W. E. H. Lecky—Samuel Smiles—W. H. Mallock—Dr. William Smith.

RUSSIAN CONVICTS IN THE SALT-MINES OF ILETSK. By HENRY LANSDELL, D.D. With 15 Illustrations.

Part V. of WM. BLACK'S New Novel "IN FAR LOCHABER," &c.

LONDON: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON SEARLE, & RIVINGTON, LIMITED,
ST. DUNSTAN'S HOUSE, FETTER LANE, FLEET STREET, E.C.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.'S LIST.

Crown 8vo. with 8 Illustrations and 2 Maps, 7s. 6d.

A FIGHT with DISTANCES: The States, The Hawaiian Islands, Canada, British Columbia, Cuba, The Bahamas. By J. J. AUBERTIN, Translator of "The Lusiads."

Large crown 8vo. with Portrait, 7s. 6d.

MADAME DE MAINTENON. By EMILY BOWLES.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

SYLVIA ARDEN. By OSWALD CRAWFURD, Author of "The World we Live In," "Beyond the Seas," &c.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

HIS HERITAGE. By LINDA GARDINER. With Frontispiece by Gordon Browne.

"The narrative is brisk and nowhere flags."—Academy.
"Much artistic perception is displayed......and genuine sense of humour."—Morning Post.
"A narrative of keen and concentrated interest."—Scotsman.
"A remarkably pleasant, interesting, and clever story."—Glasgow Herald.

Crown 8vo. 5s.

THE KINSHIP of MEN: an Argument from Pedigrees; or, Genealogy viewed as a Science. By HENRY KENDALL.

Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

INFANT HEALTH: the Physiology and Hygiene of Early Life. By H. PERCY DUNN, F.R.C.S., Assistant Ophthalmic Surgeon and Pathologist to the West London Hospital.

Crown 8vo. 8s. 6d.

THE SCIENCE and ART of RELIGION. By S. B. G. MCKINNEY, M.A., L.R.C.S. Edin., L.R.C.P. Edin.

Price 1s.

POETS as THEOLOGIANS. By H. SCHÜTZ WILSON, Author of "Alpine Ascents and Adventures," "Studies in History, Legend, and Literature," &c.

Small crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

TALES and LEGENDS in VERSE. By E. COOPER WILLIS, Q.C.

Small crown 8vo. 2s.

MATIN SONGS.

LONDON: 1 PATERNOSTER SQUARE.

GRIFFITH, FARRAN, & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

A. M. MONRO'S NEW NOVEL.

Cloth boards, 6s.

CRANE COURT.

By A. M. MONRO,

Author of "The Beautiful Lady of Chichester."

A Story of Country Life.

Next week, at all the Libraries, 3 vols. 31s. 6d.

THE NEW NOVEL BY A. E. SCHLÖTEL.

WHO IS VERA?

A Novel wherein English and Russian Lives are interwoven.

By A. E. SCHLÖTEL,

Author of "Still a Wife's Sister."

ALSO, NEXT WEEK.

With Photographs and Facsimiles of Autographs, price One Guinea.

THE LETTERS OF DOROTHY OSBORNE TO SIR WILLIAM TEMPLE.

1652–54.

Edited by EDWARD ABBOTT PARRY,

Barrister-at-Law.

Written during her long and romantic engagement with Sir William Temple, they not only tell a very interesting old-world love story but give a complete and accurate picture of certain phases of social and domestic life in the seventeenth century.

GRIFFITH, FARRAN, OKEDEN, & WELSH, ST. PAUL'S CHURCHYARD, LONDON.

HURST & BLACKETT'S NEW NOVELS.

THE WEB of FATE: a Dramatic Story. By W. J. WILDING. 2 vols.

IN WHITE and GOLD: a Story. By Mrs. F. H. WILLIAMSON. 3 vols.

JOY COMETH in the MORNING: a Country Tale. By ALGERNON GISSING. 2 vols.

BERNARD and MARCIA: a Story of Middle Age. By ELIZABETH GLAISTER. 3 vols.

A WILY WIDOW. By HENRY CRESSWELL, Author of "A Modern Greek Heroine" &c. 3 vols.

VIRGINIA TENNANT. By the Author of "A Golden Bar," "Christina North." 2 vols.

LONDON: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED.

Now ready,

UNIFORM WITH "LITTLE LORD FAUNTLEROY."

SARA CREWE;

Or, What Happened at Miss Minchin's:

AND EDITHA'S BURGLAR.

By FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT.

Illustrated by R. B. BIRCH.

Small medium 8vo. cloth gilt, price 5s.

NEW VOLUME IN THE LONDON LIBRARY.

BY MRS. F. H. BURNETT.

Small crown 8vo. sewed, 1s.

THE FORTUNES OF PHILIPPA FAIRFAX.

 A Complete List of Mrs. Burnett's Works and our Catalogue can be had of all Booksellers, or post free from the Publishers.

LONDON: FREDERICK WARNE & CO., 15 BEDFORD STREET, STRAND.

MRS. E. M. FIELD'S NEW WORK.

NOTICE.—The Second Edition of "ETHNE" is now ready, and to be had at all the Libraries, crown 8vo. cloth boards, 6s., with Etched Title and Frontispiece.

"Without exaggeration one of the most beautiful tales of ancient Irish life that has ever come under our notice. The character of Ethne is a masterpiece."—Public Opinion.

"A very attractive and interesting book......Delightfully fresh and picturesque."—Guardian.

LONDON: GARDNER, DARTON, & CO., PATERNOSTER BUILDINGS.

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

A Dictionary of Universal Knowledge.

Entirely NEW EDITION, with numerous Maps and Illustrations.

Now ready.

Vol. I. cloth, 10s.; half-morocco, 15s.

To be completed in Ten Volumes, issued at intervals of a few months.

"For many, probably most, people, this work contains all they are ever likely to require."—Times.

"The advent of a new edition, accurate, liberal, and cheap, will be welcomed with a very general approval."—Daily Telegraph.

"The various articles are clear and accurate."—Morning Post.

"We have consulted it constantly, with increasing admiration for its uniform accuracy."—Daily Chronicle.

"No book of its size gives more information, or gives it on the whole with greater accuracy."—St. James's Gazette.

"The new edition has made a splendid start."—Liverpool Courier.

"The new Encyclopædia will be a library in itself, and will be certain to be highly appreciated wherever the English language is spoken."—Liverpool Mercury.

"The best cheap work of the kind published in this country."—Scotsman.

W. & R. CHAMBERS, 47 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON; AND EDINBURGH.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S LIST.

THIRD EDITION, NOW READY.

MR. AND MRS. BANCROFT ON AND OFF THE STAGE.

WRITTEN BY THEMSELVES.

2 vols. demy 8vo. 30s.

"The best of recent theatrical books—the best in style, the best in variety, the most amusing, accurate, and complete—is the life-story of Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft, which has recently taken the town by storm. Mrs. Bancroft possesses, in a very marked degree, the difficult art of anecdote; her part of the book is as interesting as a romance; she is everything by turns, but never dull; she can tell a story in the manner of Marie Wilton, and can relate a touching one after the style of Dickens. Luckily, in their journey through life, Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft have taken notes of all they saw and observed, and the result is contained in one of the best and most interesting books of the season. Two distinct classes of readers will be attracted by the Bancrofts' book—first, the lover of good stories; secondly, the stage historian, for, thanks to the accuracy and foresight of Mr. Bancroft, he has made his work an invaluable book of reference. The two clever people who first made society take up the stage will find their entertaining volumes quickly taken up by society."—Illustrated London News.

The Fourth Edition will be ready at all Libraries and Booksellers' on May 1.

Now ready, 1s.

THE TEMPLE BAR MAGAZINE

Contents for MAY, 1888:

1. FROM MOOR ISLES. By JESSIE FOTHERGILL, Author of "The First Violin" &c. Part III. Chaps. 1–5.
2. DICKENS'S CHARACTERS AND THEIR PROTOTYPES.
3. A POET OF PROSE.
4. CAROLINE.
5. PRINCE BISMARCK AND THE GERMAN REICHSTAG.
6. FORGET ME NOT. (Conclusion.)
7. GLUCK.
8. THE ROGUE. By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "Mdlle. de Mersac" &c. Chaps. 16–19.

THE LIFE of LORD CARTERET. By

ARCHIBALD BALLANTYNE. 1 vol. demy 8vo. 16s.

"A valuable contribution to our political history."—Times.

WHAT I REMEMBER. By THOMAS ADOLPHUS

TROLLOPE. Second Edition, 2 vols. demy 8vo. with Portrait, 30s.

"Especially rich in details concerning artistic and literary celebrities."—Globe.

THE COURT and REIGN of FRANCIS the

FIRST, KING of FRANCE. By JULIA PARDOE. A fine New Edition in 3 vols. demy 8vo. with numerous Illustrations on Steel, 42s.

"A more vigorous presentment of men and manners has seldom been given to the world than may be found in these volumes."—Pall Mall Gazette.

A HOLIDAY on the ROAD: an Artist's

Wanderings. By JAMES JOHN HISSEY. 1 vol. demy 8vo. with 40 Illustrations, 18s.

"Mr. Hissey has chosen a delightful subject for his pen and pencil......A book full of healthy enthusiasm and agreeable description."—Spectator.

THE LAST of the VALOIS; and the Accession of Henry of Navarre, 1559–1589. By CATHERINE CHARLOTTE, Lady JACKSON. 2 vols. large crown 8vo. with Portraits on Steel, 24s.

NEW WORKS OF FICTION.

NARKA. By KATHLEEN O'MEARA, Author of

"The Old House in Picca[d]illy" &c. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

"A novel among a thousand."—Vanity Fair.

LOYALTY GEORGE. By Mrs. PARR, Author of "Adam and Eve" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"Here [we] have a clever, pleasant writer at her very best; and [e]xceedingly good that best is.—In 'Loyalty George' there is a humour and power and a pathos that carry the reader out of himself, take him away to the breezy Devon coast, and make the impetuous, natural, loving girl more real to him than the last flesh and blood young person, dressed as per fashion, whom he has met in the park......One of the most charming novels that has been published for many a day."
Vanity Fair.

THE PARTING of the WAYS. By Miss

M. BETHAM-EDWARDS, Author of "Kitty" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

JOAN VELLACOT. By ESMÉ STUART, Author of "Muriel's Marriage" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

SIX-SHILLING EDITIONS.

SHERIDAN LE FANU'S NOVELS.

Each in 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

UNCLE SILAS.	THE HOUSE BY THE CHURCHYARD.

IN A GLASS DARKLY.

"The most fearsome book in the world."—St. James's Gazette.

RHODA BROUGHTON'S NOVELS.

Each in 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

COMETH UP AS A FLOWER.	RED AS A ROSE IS SHE.
GOOD-BYE, SWEETHEART!	SECOND THOUGHTS.
JOAN. NANCY.	BELINDA.
NOT WISELY, BUT TOO WELL.	DOCTOR CUPID.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.
PUBLISHERS IN ORDINARY TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

SHORTLY WILL BE PUBLISHED, UNIFORM WITH "ARGOT AND SLANG,"

A NEW AND ORIGINAL SLANG DICTIONARY, ETYMOLOGICAL AND HISTORICAL.

First and only Complete Edition, printed exclusively for private circulation and limited to 650 Copies (500 for England and 150 for America), each Copy numbered.

2 vols. fcp. 4to. printed in antique style on hand-made paper, with good margins, price to Subscribers, 31s. 6d. per volume; or Roxburghe, 42s.

SLANG, JARGON, AND CANT.

A Dictionary of Unconventional Phraseology,

EMBRACING

English, American, and Colonial Slang; Tinkers', Yiddish, Pidgin and Anglo-Indian Slang, Quaint Expressions, Vulgarisms,

THEIR ORIGIN, MEANING, AND APPLICATION.

Compiled and Edited by

ALBERT BARRERE,

Officier de l'Instruction Publique; Professor R.M.A. Woolwich; Author of "Argot and Slang" &c.

AND

CHARLES G. LELAND, M.A., &c.

Author of "The English Gypsies and their Language" &c.; "Hans Breitmann" &c.

IN CO-OPERATION WITH

P. BERESFORD HOPE.	REV. BLOMFIELD JACKSON, M.A., King's College.
E. BROOKSMITH, B.A.	ALFRED GERMAN REED.
SIR PATRICK COLQUHOUN, Q.C., LL.D., K.C.M.S., G.C.S.G.	JOHN HOLLINGSHEAD.
THE EARL OF SUFFOLK AND BERKSHIRE.	HAMON LE STRANGE.
EGERTON CASTLE, M.A., F.S.A.	CHARLES MACKAY, LL.D.
MAJOR ARTHUR GRIFFITHS.	JOHN A. P. PRICE, M.A., M.D. Oxon.
REV. J. W. HORSLEY, M.A.	PROFESSOR DOUGLAS B. W. SLADEN, B.A. Oxon; B.A. LL.B. Melbourne.
	And others.

The Work treats of the fashionable and unfashionable slang of Modern Society, the special colloquialisms of the Arts, Professions, Diplomacy, Journalism, and Commerce, the jargon of the Sporting World and the "patter" and flash phrases of thieves and the disreputable classes generally. It gives those peculiar everyday colloquialisms current in the United States, and the rich and racy Slang of the Fifth Continent—the mighty Australian Commonwealth of the future.

Information in every case has been gathered at the very source from all classes of society, and in every branch of slang contributors have been employed (more than twenty in number), who have been assisted by several gentlemen specially engaged to search the literature of the day for words and expressions.

The work is accompanied by an exhaustive introduction.

Full Prospectus post free on application.

Gentlemen wishing to Subscribe for this work are requested to send in their names at an early date.

The right is reserved to raise the price after a certain number have been sold.

Applications for Copies to be made to G. MAY (Messrs. WHITTAKER & Co.), 2 White Hart Street, Paternoster Square, London, E.C.

AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

This day, 3 vols. post 8vo. 25s. 6d.

THE FAT OF THE LAND.

A Novel.

By MARY LESTER (MARIA SOLTERA),
Author of "A Lady's Ride across Spanish Honduras."

THE LAND BEYOND THE FOREST.

Facts, Figures, and Fancies from Transylvania.

By E. GERARD,
Author of "Reata," "Beggar my Neighbour," &c.

2 vols. with Map and Illustrations, 25s.

"She has given a delightfully varied and interesting, and, for general information, sufficiently complete, account of the 'Land beyond the Forest.' The book is more readable than most fiction.......Of her charming style it is unnecessary to speak to English readers. Her matter and method combine to make the book entertaining far beyond the average of books of its class."—Scotsman.

"The author draws a fascinating picture of the wild beauty of the country, and the outcome of her researches, historical and theological, is presented to the reader in the taking style with which those who know Madame Gerard's past work are familiar. Altogether 'The Land beyond the Forest' should rank as a standard work on its subject and will be found as full of entertainment as of information."—Graphic.

"She is able to lend a certain charm to the strange and interesting facts which she has to tell of the 'Land beyond the Forest.'"—Athenæum.

"One of the brightest and most enjoyable books of its kind that has come our way for a good many years.......There is not indeed a dull page to be found between the covers of the two volumes, the interest of which is indefinitely increased by a large number of admirable illustrations."—Manchester Examiner.

THE BLACKSMITH OF VOE.

A Novel.

By PAUL CUSHING,
Author of "Misogyny and the Maiden," "A Woman with a Secret," &c.

3 vols. post 8vo. 25s. 6d.

"It is an idyl in prose, in which we are given the finest idiom, the keenest humour, the most picturesque eloquence, and dramatic force of no mean order. The workmanship of the book is delightful from first to last, and the character of Abel Boden is a masterpiece after its kind. The story itself takes the most powerful hold on the reader's sympathies, and the series of magnificently painted pictures which are constantly recurring are as attractive as they are impressive. They are a plot and a mystery which must please the most fastidious."
Whitehall Review.

"The story increases in interest as it proceeds, and the author gives ample evidence of strong descriptive and dramatic powers."—Pictorial World.

"Is a powerful and interesting novel which should increase the reputation of its talented author."—Scotsman.

TIMAR'S TWO WORLDS. By MAURUS

JOKAI. Authorised Translation by Mrs. HEGAN KENNARD. 3 vols. post 8vo. price 25s. 6d.

"It is long since we met with a story so vigorous—so full of human sympathy, of strength and pathos.......We regretfully close this delightful book."—Saturday Review.

"Not only as its author's masterpiece, but as a masterpiece of European literature, pervaded by a primeval freshness of style that should titillate the palate of the most jaded novel-reader."—Athenæum.

"It is strong in incident, graphic and picturesque in descriptions of scenery and events, intensely dramatic in construction."—Scotsman.

"Throughout marked by poetical imagination and true dramatic instinct."—Morning Post.

"Emphatically a great novel."—Echo.

"A novel of bright originality, of shrewd conception—a really delightful story."
Daily Telegraph.

"A fine story—powerful, pathetic, and dramatic."—St. James's Gazette.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

ILLUSTRATED BY TWENTY-FOUR PHOTOGRAVURES.

MEMOIR of PETER DE WINT. By WALTER ARMSTRONG, B.A. Oxon., Author of "Alfred Stevens," "Scottish Painters," &c. Illustrated by 24 Photogravures from the Artist's Pictures. Super Royal 4to. 31s. 6d.

UNIFORM WITH AND COMPLETING MR. AINGER'S EDITION OF LAMB'S WORKS.

LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB.

Newly arranged, with Additions, and a new Portrait.

Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by the Rev. ALFRED AINGER, M.A., Canon of Bristol. 2 vols. Globe 8vo. 10s.

The Athenæum says: –"With these volumes Canon Ainger's loving labours in a delightful field of literature are complete........Not only is Mr. Ainger a judicious critic, but it is evident that during the years he has devoted to Lamb no Dryasdust could have been more painstaking in gaining information at first hand from every source open to him. His accuracy, too, is remarkable."

Now publishing, Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. each.

TWELVE ENGLISH STATESMEN:

WILLIAM the CONQUEROR. By E. A. FREEMAN, D.C.L., LL.D. [Ready.

The Saturday Review says:—"A little book, of which the learning and solidity are beyond dispute........Mr. Freeman has given in this volume a vigorous sketch, which is more than a summary of what he has said before. He has given an admirable account of William's training, William's character, and William's work – an account which could not be amended within its own limits."

CARDINAL WOLSEY. By Professor M. CREIGHTON, M.A., D.C.L., LL.D. [Ready.

WILLIAM the THIRD. By H. D. TRAILL. [Ready.

OLIVER CROMWELL. By FREDERIC HARRISON. [In June.

HENRY the SECOND. By Mrs. J. R. GREEN. [In the press.

 Seven other Volumes to follow as announced.

UNIFORM EDITION OF

DEAN CHURCH'S MISCELLANEOUS WRITINGS. In 5 vols. Globe 8vo. 5s. each. Now publishing in Monthly Volumes. Vols. I., II., and III. are ready.

Vol. I. MISCELLANEOUS ESSAYS. | Vol. II. DANTE, and other ESSAYS. Vol. III. ST. ANSELM.

The other Volumes to follow are SPENSER, in June; BACON, in July.

LIBRARY EDITION.—Vols. I.–V. ready.

THE WORKS of LORD TENNYSON.

Library Edition. A New Edition in Eight Volumes. Globe 8vo. 5s. each. Each Volume may be had separately, and they are being published (Vols. I. to V. are ready) as follows:—

POEMS. 2 vols.	BALLADS: and OTHER POEMS. [June.
IDYLLS OF THE KING.	QUEEN MARY: and HAROLD. [July.
THE PRINCESS: and MAUD.	BECKET: and OTHER PLAYS. [August.
ENOCH ARDEN: and IN MEMORIAM.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL LIBRARIES.

By THOMAS HARDY.

Wessex Tales: Strange, Lively, and Commonplace. By THOMAS HARDY, Author of "The Woodlanders," &c. 2 vols. Globe 8vo. 12s.

By W. E. NORRIS.

Chris. By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "My Friend Jim" &c. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 21s.

By Mrs. OLIPHANT.

Joyce. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of "The Second Son," "Hester," &c. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE,

No. 343, for MAY. Price 1s. Contains:

1. CHRIS. By W. E. NORRIS. Chapters 16–18. (Concluded.)
2. SYDNEY SMITH. By GEORGE SAINTSBURY.
3. GENTLEMEN EMIGRANTS.
4. THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY. By STEPHEN WHEELER.
5. IN THE DALES SIXTY YEARS SINCE. By Lady VERNEY.
6. THE REVERBERATOR. By HENRY JAMES. Chapters 8–10.
7. PURITANISM. By Rev. J. FRASER.

SOME RECOLLECTIONS of KAISER WILHELM I. By G. M. RHODES. See

THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE

For MAY. Profusely Illustrated, price 6d.; by post, 8d. CONTAINS:

1. KAISER WILHELM I. Engraved by E. SCHLADITZ.
2. SOME RECOLLECTIONS OF KAISER WILHELM I. By G. M. RHODES. Illustrated.
3. THE MEDIATION OF RALPH HARDELOT. Chaps. 27–30. By Prof. W. MINTO. (Continued.)
4. A SONG OF SPRING. By CLEMENT SCOTT.
5. GLIMPSES OF OLD ENGLISH HOMES—III. HINCHINGBROOKE. By ELIZABETH BALCH. Illustrated.
6. COACHING DAYS AND COACHING WAYS. "The Dover Road." Part II. By W. OUTRAM TRISTRAM. With Illustrations by Herbert Railton and Hugh Thomson.
7. LIL: A LIVERPOOL CHILD. By AGNES C. MAITLAND. (To be continued.)
8. ET CÆTERA. By H. D. TRAILL.

MACMILLAN & CO., BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

RE-ISSUE OF THE GREVILLE MEMOIRS IN EIGHT MONTHLY VOLUMES.

A JOURNAL of the REIGNS of KING GEORGE IV., KING WILLIAM IV., and QUEEN VICTORIA. By the late CHARLES C. F. GREVILLE, Esq. Clerk of the Council to those Sovereigns. Edited by HENRY REEVE, C.B. D.C.L., Corresponding Member of the Institute of France. (8 vols.) Vols. I.—V. Crown 8vo. 6s. each.

RESEARCHES on DIAMAGNETISM and MAGNE-CRYSTALLIC ACTION, including the Question of Diamagnetic Polarity. By JOHN TYNDALL, D.C.L. New Edition. Crown 8vo. 12s.

OUR SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY through FRANCE and ITALY. By JOSEPH and ELIZABETH ROBINS PENNELL. With a Map and 120 Illustrations by Joseph Pennell. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"This is a holiday book, and befittingly humorous and light......The drawings are very dainty and suggestive, and to artists and those who understand this kind of work they must always be a source of delight."—Art Journal.

The FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES of CHEMISTRY PRACTICALLY TAUGHT, by a New Method. By ROBERT GALLOWAY, M.R.I.A. F.C.S., Honorary Member of the Chemical Society of the Lehigh University, U.S. With 71 Woodcuts and numerous Exercises and Answers. Crown 8vo. 6s. 6d.

REMINISCENCES of FOREIGN TRAVEL. By ROBERT CRAWFORD, M.A., lately Professor of Civil Engineering in the University of Dublin, Author of "Across the Pampas and the Andes." Crown 8vo. 5s.

"For those whose delight is in tales of sport and adventure there is good entertainment in this book......There are twenty-eight chapters and not one of them but is worth reading."—Saturday Review.

A MISSING CHAPTER of the INDIAN MUTINY. By Lieut.-General CHARLES LIONEL SHOWERS, Political Resident in the Meywar States (Rajputâna) during the period in question. With Map and 3 Illustrations. 8vo. 8s. 6d.

METEMPSYCHOSIS: a Vision after Midnight; and other Poems. Fcp. 8vo. 5s.

MEPHISTOPHELES in BROADCLOTH: a Satire. By GEORGE FRANCIS ARMSTRONG, M.A., D.Lit. Fcp. 8vo. 4s.

MARAHUNA: a Romance. By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"A very clever story and one deserving to be read by the judicious........The conclusion is picturesque, not to say tragic, and the mystery of Marahuna's origin and nature is not solved any more than a reader of taste would wish it to be solved."—Saturday Review.

EPOCHS OF CHURCH HISTORY.

Edited by the Rev. Canon CREIGHTON, M.A. Fcp. 8vo. 2s. 6d. each.

"Among the series of class-books and educational manuals now so numerous, there are few that offer such sound preparative material for honest study as the 'Epochs of Church History.'"—Saturday Review.

HILDEBRAND and HIS TIMES. By W. R. W. STEPHENS, M.A. Prebendary of Chichester, and Rector of Woolbeding, Sussex. [Just published.

The ENGLISH CHURCH in other LANDS. By the Rev. H. W. TUCKER, M.A.

The HISTORY of the REFORMATION in ENGLAND. By the Rev. GEORGE G. PERRY, M.A.

The CHURCH of the EARLY FATHERS. By ALFRED PLUMMER, D.D.

The EVANGELICAL REVIVAL in the EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By the Rev. JOHN HENRY OVERTON, M.A.

The HISTORY of the UNIVERSITY of OXFORD. By the Hon. G. C. BRODRICK, D.C.L.

The CHURCH and the ROMAN EMPIRE. By the Rev. A. CARR.

The CHURCH and the PURITANS, 1570–1660. By HENRY OFFLEY WAKEMAN, M.A.

The CHURCH and the EASTERN EMPIRE. By the Rev. H. F. TOZER, M.A.

HISTORIC TOWNS.

Edited by E. A. FREEMAN, D.C.L. and the Rev. WILLIAM HUNT, M.A. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. each.

"The names of the writers are a pledge for the efficiency of their work; while the books carry their own evidence that they are not too long or too expensive."—Guardian.

COLCHESTER. By the Rev. EDWARD L. CUTTS, B.A. With 4 Maps. [Just published.

LONDON. By the Rev. W. J. LOFTIE. With 3 Maps.

EXETER. By E. A. FREEMAN. With 4 Maps.

BRISTOL. By Rev. W. HUNT. With 4 Maps.

OXFORD. By the Rev. C. W. BOASE. With 2 Maps.

Now ready, price Sixpence.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE, No. 67—MAY.

CONTENTS:

EVE. By the AUTHOR of "JOHN HERRING," "MEHALAH," &c. Chaps. 37–41.
FOODS FOR MAN—ANIMAL AND VEGETABLE: a Comparison. By Dr. B. W. RICHARDSON.
THE PYTCHLEY HUNT, PAST AND PRESENT. By G. B.
THE SONG OF A SPRING SILENCE. By Miss KATE CARTER.
WOMEN'S WORK AND WAGES. By DAVID F. SCHLOSS.
THE ARCHBISHOP'S STATUE. By A. K. H. B.
UNCLE PIERCE. By CHARLES BLATHERWICK. Chapters 10–12.
AT THE SIGN OF THE SHIP. By ANDREW LANG.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO.'S NEW AND STANDARD BOOKS.

NEW EDITION OF ROBERT BROWNING'S WORKS.

This day is published, price 5s.

The FIRST VOLUME, containing "PAULINE" and "SORDELLO," of

A NEW AND UNIFORM EDITION OF THE

COMPLETE WORKS OF ROBERT BROWNING

This Edition will consist of 16 volumes, small crown 8vo. A Volume will be issued Monthly. It will contain more than one Portrait of Mr. Browning, at different periods of life; and a few Illustrations. The price will be 5s per volume.
There will also be a Large Paper Edition of 250 Copies, printed on hand made paper. This Edition will only be supplied through Booksellers.

"The 'Cornhill' is the most interesting of English magazines."*—VANITY FAIR. "The magazine reader will find no better investment for his sixpence."—PALL MALL GAZETTE. "The 'Cornhill' still holds its place as the best of the sixpenny monthlies, and deservedly so."—SCOTTISH REVIEW.

Ready this day, New Series, No. 59

THE "CORNHILL MAGAZINE" FOR MAY,

Containing, among other Articles of interest, THE LAVISH OPPIR [illegible] THE GRAND TOUR—Mr. SANDFORD IV. VII.—WITH THE DUKE—A LIFE'S MORNING, by the Author of "Demos," "Thyrza," &c. Chaps. 9 and 10, &c. &c.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S NEW NOVEL.

NOTICE.—The FOURTH EDITION of "ROBERT ELSMERE," 3 vols. by Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD, is ready this day at all the Libraries.

Price 15s each in cloth; or in half-morocco, marbled edges, price 20s.

Volumes I to XIV. (ABBADIE—DAVENANT), Royal 8vo. of the DICTIONARY of NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY. Edited by LESLIE STEPHEN.

Volume XV. will be issued on June 26, and further Volumes at intervals of Three Months.

Times "Absolutely indispensable to every well furnished Library."
Athenæum "In fulness, in thoroughness, and in general accuracy it leaves little or nothing to be desired."

Quarterly Review—"A Dictionary of National Biography of which the country may be justly proud."
Truth "The magnum opus of our generation."

NEW EDITION OF "HARE'S VENICE."

Just published, Second Edition, Revised, fcp 8vo cloth limp, 3s 6d.

VENICE. By AUGUSTUS J. C. HARE, Author of "Walks in Rome," "Cities of Central Italy," "Cities of Northern Italy," "Florence," &c.

New Volume of Smith, Elder, & Co.'s Popular 2s. Series.

Ready this day, Cheap Edition, fcp 8vo boards, pictorial cover, 2s.

THE HEIR of the AGES. By JAMES PAYN, Author of "Lost Sir Massingberd," "By Proxy," "The Canon's Ward," &c.

WORKS BY SIR ARTHUR HELPS, K.C.B.

FRIENDS in COUNCIL. First Series. 1 vol. crown 8vo 7s 6d.

FRIENDS in COUNCIL. Second Series. 1 vol. crown 8vo. price 7s 6d.

COMPANIONS of MY SOLITUDE. Essays written during the Intervals of Business. An Essay on Organization in Daily Life. 1 vol. crown 8vo 7s 6d.

Also the following Volumes of a small crown 8vo Edition:

COMPANIONS of MY SOLITUDE. Small crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

FRIENDS in COUNCIL. Second Series. 2 vols small crown 8vo 7s.

ESSAYS WRITTEN in the INTERVALS of BUSINESS. To which is added An Essay on Organization in Daily Life. Small Crown 8vo 3s 6d.

WORKS BY LESLIE STEPHEN.

HOURS in a LIBRARY. First Series. Second Edition. crown 8vo 9s.
CONTENTS: Defoe's Novels—Richardson's Novels—Pope as a Moralist—Mr. Elwin's Edition of Pope—Some Words about Sir Walter Scott—Nathaniel Hawthorne—Balzac's Novels—De Quincey.

HOURS in a LIBRARY. Second Series. Second Edition, crown 8vo 9s.
CONTENTS: Sir Thomas Browne—Jonathan Edwards—William Law—Horace Walpole—Dr. Johnson's Writings—Crabbe's Poetry—William Hazlitt—Mr. Disraeli's Novels.

A HISTORY of ENGLISH THOUGHT in the EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. Second Edition. 2 vols. demy 8vo 2[illegible]

THE SCIENCE of ETHICS: an Essay upon Ethical Theory as Modified by the Doctrine of Evolution. Demy 8vo 16s.

LIFE of HENRY FAWCETT. Fourth Edition. Large crown 8vo with 2 Steel Portraits [illegible]

WORKS BY MATTHEW ARNOLD.

IRISH ESSAYS and OTHERS. Crown 8vo 7s 6d.
CONTENTS:—The Incompatibles—An Unregarded Irish Grievance—Ecce, Convertimur ad Gentes—The Future of Liberalism—A Speech at Eton—The French Play in London—Copyright—Prefaces to Poems.

LAST ESSAYS on CHURCH and RELIGION. Crown 8vo. with a Preface, 7s.

MIXED ESSAYS. Second Edition, crown 8vo 9s.
CONTENTS:—Democracy—Equality—Irish Catholicism and British Liberalism—Porro Unum est necessarium—A Guide to English Literature—Falkland—A French Critic on Milton—A French Critic on Goethe—George Sand.

ON the STUDY of CELTIC LITERATURE. 8vo. 8s. 6d.

LITERATURE and DOGMA: an Essay towards a Better Apprehension of the Bible. Popular Edition, with a New Preface. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

GOD and the BIBLE: a Sequel to "Literature and Dogma." Popular Edition, with a New Preface. Crown 8vo 2s 6d.

ST. PAUL and PROTESTANTISM: with other Essays. Popular Edition, with a New Preface. Crown 8vo. 2s 6d.
CONTENTS:—St. Paul and Protestantism—Puritanism and the Church of England—Modern Dissent—A Comment on Christmas.

CULTURE and ANARCHY: an Essay in Political and Social Criticism. Third Edition, with a Preface and Alterations. 8vo 7s.

PASSAGES from the PROSE WRITINGS of MATTHEW ARNOLD. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.
CONTENTS:—1. Literature—2. Politics and Society—3. Philosophy and Religion.

WORKS BY AUGUSTUS J. C. HARE.

PARIS. Crown 8vo. with Illustrations, 10s.; or 2 vols., cloth limp, 10s 6d.

DAYS near PARIS. Crown 8vo. with Illustrations, 10s.; or 2 vols. cloth limp, 10s 6d.

STUDIES in RUSSIA. Crown 8vo. with numerous Illustrations, 10s 6d.

SKETCHES in HOLLAND and SCANDINAVIA. Crown 8vo with Illustrations, 5s.

CITIES of SOUTHERN ITALY and SICILY. Crown 8vo. with Illustrations, 12s 6d.

WALKS in ROME. Twelfth Edition. 2 vols. crown 8vo. with Map, 18s.

WALKS in LONDON. Fifth Edition. 2 vols. crown 8vo. with numerous Illustrations, 21s.

WANDERINGS in SPAIN. Fifth Edition. Crown 8vo. with Illustrations, 7s. 6d.

MEMORIALS of a QUIET LIFE. 3 vols. crown 8vo. Vols. I. and II. 21s.; Vol. III. with numerous Photographs, 10s 6d.

DAYS near ROME. Third Edition. 2 vols. crown 8vo. with Illustrations, 18s.

CITIES of CENTRAL ITALY. 2 vols. crown 8vo. with Illustrations, 21s.

CITIES of NORTHERN ITALY. 2 vols. crown 8vo. with Illustrations, 21s.

THE LIFE and LETTERS of FRANCES, Baroness BUNSEN. 2 vols. crown 8vo. with Portraits, 21s.

FLORENCE. Second Edition. Fcp. 8vo. limp cloth, 2s. 6d.

 MESSRS. SMITH, ELDER, & CO. WILL BE HAPPY TO FORWARD A CATALOGUE OF THEIR PUBLICATIONS POST-FREE ON APPLICATION.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

Printed by SPOTTISWOODE & CO., at No. 5 New-street Square, in the Parish of St. Bride, in the City of London; and Published by WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, No. 38 Southampton Street, Strand, in the Parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, in the County of Middlesex.—Saturday, April 28, 1888.

THE

SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,697, Vol. 65. May 5, 1888. [Registered for Transmission abroad.] Price 6*d*.

THE POPE'S CIRCULAR.

IF the circular of the POPE on the subject of "id belli "genus quod audit the Plan of Campaign, et ea interdictionis forma quæ Boycotting nuncupatur," is really of so little importance, as certain Separatists endeavour to make out, it is somewhat surprising that these same Separatists devote to it such continued study, and regard it with such evident consternation. The practice belies the theory. And it can hardly be doubted that the practice is the more sensible of the two. If the circular be taken only at its lowest valuation as evidence of the Pope's conviction that the Parnellite side is not the winning side it would be a serious thing. But it is much more. Here at least there has never been any self-deception as to the immediate extent or the probable results of the interference of the POPE through the channel of the Holy Office. Just as we have been unable to share or understand the singular contention that HER MAJESTY'S Ministers are calling in a foreign potentate because they are helpless themselves, so we have been and are equally unable to hope that the plain and simple declaration of the head of one of the chief branches of the Christian Church, as to the Christian lawfulness of certain practices at which part of the subordinate clergy of that branch have been conniving, will be followed by immediate reform. Proclamations of any kind against vice and immorality rarely suffice by their mere publication to convert the vicious and immoral into models of Christian practice, and we do not know that this particular proclamation is likely to have any better fate than others in that respect. Even National Leaguers admit in terms that murder is not right; even Archbishop WALSH may have condemned it; and yet murder has been going on merrily for years. The real importance of the Circular is quite different, and it is very well understood by the Irish Gladstonians, if not by the English, who, to do them justice, rarely know more about Ireland than that here are eighty and odd persons who used to be troublesome to Mr. GLADSTONE and were therefore to be persecuted, while they are now useful to him and are therefore to be assisted.

Ireland, it is said by DAVITT, and echoed by other Gladstonians, does not take her politics from the POPE; and therefore the POPE'S pronouncements on political points are, it is inferred, bruta fulmina. It would be almost sufficiently interesting to note in this the cool assumption or the innocent admission that the Plan of Campaign and Boycotting are "political" things; but this assumption or admission, whichever it is, is only part of a much larger fallacy of which Gladstonians are certainly the propagators, and perhaps in some cases the dupes. The formidable and troublesome disease which now, owing chiefly to the mismanagement of politicians, has obtained such a hold upon Ireland is in only a very small part of it political at all. Undoubtedly—and this fact is rather awkward for other Gladstonians, though the assertion of it is well enough in DAVITT'S mouth—there is a political part; there are some who wish for political changes which may vary from the establishment of a municipal system of democratic jobbery on the American model to the separating of Ireland from all connexion of any sort whatever with Great Britain. But it is a contention of Gladstonians themselves that this, in its more extensive sense, affects comparatively few Irishmen. It may be added that, if it stood by itself, nothing would be easier to deal with. But those who direct the movement, aided, as we have said, by the mismanagement, if not worse, of English statesmen, and of one in particular, have succeeded in yoking with this abstract and not very powerful principle or motive others which come much closer to the average Irishman and work much more strongly on him. They began with the ancient grudge of the peasant against his landlord, his ancient craving for a larger share of that landlord's property. They worked in with this the unreasoning Irish hate of Englishmen—a hate of which Mr. CHILDERS, good Home Ruler as he is, had so sharp an experience last week. They mixed in, further, the strange unruliness, the tendency to be against the law or against the Government, which also exists. But their crowning triumph was when they enlisted also the religious, not to say the sectarian, feelings of the Irishman. No former leaders of Irish agitation, not even O'CONNELL, had won these heartily to their aid, and when the intriguers at the Vatican secured the confirmation of Archbishop WALSH'S election, Mr. PARNELL might at last boast that he had the most powerful, the most far-reaching, the most ubiquitous, the most intimately organized institution in Ireland on his side.

Every one who knows the lamentable history of the last eight years knows how the misconduct of certain of their number, and the natural indisposition of the POPE to offend one of the most devoted of his various flocks, have led the Irish Roman Catholic clergy into the abetting, the protecting, the positive contriving of crime. Even when these last troubles began most of the better class of this clergy were, if not openly on the side of law, justice, and honesty, yet disposed to help it as far as they could, and it is but recently that priests have positively courted prominence and competed for commissions in the army of rent-stealers, boycotters, cattle-maimers, and murderers. If no positive approval from Rome could be quoted, the tempter who had to deal with any wavering Catholic could point triumphantly to the fact that no positive condemnation of the League practices came from Rome. And those whose weary duty it is to read the League newspapers know with what constant industry ecclesiastical and political matters are mixed up, alternated, entangled the one with the other, so that Unionists and Protestants are, somehow or other, identified. With the active patronage of the hierarchy from archbishops to curates, with the silence of Rome, it would have been strange indeed if the Irish peasantry did not begin to think that the Plan of Campaign and Boycotting were, somehow or other, specially blessed, or at any rate condoned, by the Church. And let any one remember that religious feelings are still so strong in Ireland that girls like the CURTINS and NORAH FITZMAURICE will dare the cruellest insults rather than neglect their religious duties.

It is the avowed hope of the Separatists that this feeling, which easily let itself be enlisted on the side of crime, will not so easily be turned against that side. That, of course, remains to be seen. It is, no doubt, much easier to persuade a man that religion bids him rob and harry and persecute his neighbour than to persuade him at the bidding of religion to do justly and to love mercy. And it is, of course, possible that the baser sort of Irish priests and bishops will, if they do not absolutely defy the POPE, do their best to neutralize the teaching of his Circular, hint that it is only due to English pressure, and suggest that the faithful may still continue to rob landlords, murder land-grabbers, and boycott murdered men's daughters as before. All this, also, remains to be seen. But the gain from Cardinal SIMEONI'S transmission of Cardinal MONACO'S decision in conclave with his brethren of the Congregation, that it is "not" lawful to have recourse to the Plan of Campaign and boycotting, is surely plain enough. Although the Nationalists are trying to make out that the POPE has been misinformed, every Irishman, except the most miserably ignorant, knows that the POPE sent his own messenger, who associated freely with the persons most trusted by Nationalists, and had every possible means of arriving at just conclusions as to facts. The curious and rather pitiful attempts made in the same quarters to bandy logic with the Holy Father, to show that he really does not mean to prohibit anything that has been going on, and to argue that what is prohibited is something that has not been going on, exhibit a lamentable consciousness of the true state of the case. As to faith, the reply of the Congregation is categorical, formal, and admitting of no possible evasion. It is "not lawful" to have recourse to the sword and spear of the National League, to the Plan of Campaign, and to boycotting. Some honest priests will certainly repeat and inculcate this; some dishonest ones will do the same from fear or interest; others of the dishonest will at least be more guarded and hesitating in their inculcation of the contrary. And the consequence will and must be that the conscience of the people will not be permitted, as it has been for months in the one case, for years in the other, to salve itself with the thought that these unlawful means are lawful. That is to say, one element at least, and not the least weighty, has been taken out of the scale of disorder and put into the scale of order. If that is nothing, the POPE's interference is nothing; if that is much, it is much.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

THE eldest sons of peers are exempt from that irreverent distaste for their fathers' opinions which has been attributed to the eldest sons of kings. It has naturally occurred to those of them who have seats in the House of Commons that in questions of rank and title, as of property, remaindermen are as much interested as tenants for life. With one exception, they appear to deprecate the agitation against the House of Lords. If it succeeded, they would be direct, though not immediate, sufferers. To the number of twenty-one they assent to the use of the homœopathic remedy by which the present Government hopes to check the morbid appetite for change. Two heirs of peerages are prepared for a more heroic treatment of the disease; but Mr. MARJORIBANKS and Lord WOLMER only pledge themselves in indefinite language to a thorough reform of the House of Lords. Mr. BERNARD COLERIDGE, "being in favour of a "single Chamber democracy," is unable to "agree with any "of the contemplated reforms of the House of Lords." It would be interesting to ascertain whether, if Mr. COLERIDGE had not been the eldest son of a peer, he would have had the opportunity of either attacking the House of Lords or taking any part in public life. Another and equally plain-spoken heir apparent doubts, with much reason, whether reform in any shape will appease the clamour for the abolition of the House of Lords. "Nothing," in Mr. CHARLES W. MILLS's judgment, "would satisfy the pre-"sent opponents of the Upper Chamber but a House of "Lords willing to ratify the most Radical measures of the "most Radical House of Commons." The more sanguine majority includes several intelligent and able members of Parliament, and the list is headed by the political leader of a considerable party. Lord HARTINGTON gives his adhesion to the mildest proposal of three or four suggested alterations, approving of no more startling principle than that of "reinforcing the hereditary element in the House of Lords "by introducing a system of life peers." Seven of the twenty-one signataries think that "a modification of the "hereditary principle is desirable, either by a system of "selection or by a test of service." In assenting to a vague and indefinite theory of change they are much less prudent than Lord HARTINGTON. All the impracticable fancies of Lord ROSEBERY and Lord DUNRAVEN might be introduced under a system of selection. In grammatical accuracy the dissentient seven have some advantage over the more cautious fourteen. Life peers supply but a paradoxical method of reinforcing the hereditary element. A limited creation of such peers may more accurately be said to reinforce the nominated element, which now consists of the bishops and the law lords.

Lord SALISBURY has always consistently supported the system which he now proposes to embody in an Act of Parliament; but he appears to be fully aware that a limited creation of life peers will have little practical effect. It is not known that any statesman or diplomatist of the first rank has in recent times declined a peerage on the ground of insufficiency of fortune. There could be little harm in decorating with titles and with nominal legislative functions half a dozen men of letters and professors or practitioners of science; but they would for the most part be merely ornamental members of the House of Lords. Of the most popular authors of the last generation, one who still survives has already accepted a peerage. Lord MACAULAY would have been entitled to the dignity on official and Parliamentary grounds if he had never written a line, and it may be remembered that he remained a silent member of the House of Lords. THACKERAY and DICKENS were both exceptionally ignorant of public affairs; but it may be admitted that they would have done no discredit by their personal character to any position of honour which they might have occupied. Several of the most eminent members of the Civil Service have in late years been elevated to the House of Lords; but they have necessarily been promoted at the end of their career instead of at the beginning, and, probably for that reason, they have almost uniformly abstained from taking any part in government or legislation. On the whole, it is certain that the elevation of a few non-hereditary peers would be practically inoperative; but perhaps Lord SALISBURY may be well advised in doing something in the nature of an ostensible reform. What else he could do, if he wished to effect a change, it is not easy to conjecture. The proposal of transferring the nomination of peers from the Crown to the County Councils is a specimen of the absurdities which are involved in schemes for the attainment of impossible objects. The only harm which life peers will do will consist in a disturbance of traditional associations. The hereditary character of the House of Lords is a principal cause of the considerable influence both of the collective body and of its individual members. Life-peers will add nothing to its authority; but, on the other hand, they will take little or nothing away. The system was partially introduced when the law lords were created, a few years ago. It had been previously discredited by the unconstitutional attempt of Lord PALMERSTON and Lord CRANWORTH to revive an obsolete prerogative in the case of Lord WENSLEYDALE. The experiment, and its failure, might have served Sir W. HARCOURT as an illustration of the distinction which he drew between legal and constitutional proceedings.

The Declaration which has been almost unanimously signed by twenty-five eldest sons of peers is principally important because it reminds those who read it that a considerable number of such fortunate persons has been elected to the House of Commons. There can scarcely be an equal number of members who would be probable candidates for life-peerages. It seems a cynical paradox to affirm that property and birth command more popular deference than personal merit or ability; but aristocracies have never acted on grounds of moral or intellectual superiority. Great possessions and high rank afford a better security than the most brilliant genius for attachment to law and order. It is possible that they may lose the beneficial influence which they have always exercised in England; but, as long as eldest sons of peers are preferred to their less privileged neighbours as Parliamentary candidates, it will be evident that aristocratic claims are still recognized by the people. In some of the projects for remodelling the House of Lords which have lately been devised there were provisions for enabling peers to waive their privileges for the purpose of getting rid of their chief political disqualification. If they were allowed the choice of becoming candidates for seats in either House, the wisest among them would decline to exchange their secure position for the uncertainty of popular choice. Lord SALISBURY may have formerly, if not at present, sympathized with the grievance of exclusion from the more ambitious career. Even now he may perhaps share the not infrequent regret of his followers that he cannot encounter in person his most formidable antagonist; but the hardship, if any, affects only a few, and all but the chief political leaders are sufficiently represented if they can procure the return of their sons to the House of Commons. Even a Scotch peer who, in default of election as a representative, has no place in either House, is not without consolation for his disability. Almost every member of the community suffers the same misfortune, though he may be eligible to the House of Commons, and, perhaps, sometimes be not exempt from the House of Lords.

It may be hoped that ingenious reformers will be satisfied with the promised concessions. The only sweeping change which, if it were practicable, would, perhaps, strengthen the House of Lords, would be the creation of a hundred Liberal peers whose adherence to their party could be guaranteed. Mr. GLADSTONE'S nominees uniformly become Conservative as the promoters of revolution display more and more audacity. The rapid changes of his own opinions perplex his former adherents who are removed from political competition. Not a single Irish peer is prepared to take his seat in the Home Rule Parliament. Scarcely a tenth part of the House of Lords can be trusted to follow Lord GRANVILLE. The agitators against the House of Lords are consequently entitled to complain that it only represents one party. The life peers, who will be elderly persons of moderate tempers and fixed opinions, will for the most part subside into the mass of the existing majority. It is possible that Lord SALISBURY may reconsider his expressed intention of providing for the temporary or permanent disqualification of disreputable peers. Their number is so insignificant that the appearance of their names in the catalogue of peers causes little scandal and no inconvenience. There are at least as many and as objectionable offenders against morality in the House of Commons, and the statement that such persons must have obtained the votes of a constituency would, if it were relevant, only serve as an argument against popular suffrage. Some discreditable persons are among the most active members of the House of Commons. In the House of Lords persons of the same description are almost always absent or silent. It is at least satisfactory to know that they are powerless for mischief. If they are to be excluded from the House, their expulsion or suspension must be grounded on some kind of trial; and every inquiry will attract attention to conduct which in the majority of cases has been publicly exposed. The question is not of primary importance; but the addition of a new penalty to the consequences of misconduct would be in some respects an anomaly. A peer who has been notorious in the Divorce Court or on the Turf will seldom take his seat among his equals.

Some writers who have taken part in the recent discussion are beginning to discover the mistake of supposing that inconvenience arises from the occasional presence in the House of a number of peers who are not constant attendants. As long as the leader of the majority commands votes enough to secure his victory, the presence of a number of the rank and file of the party has no practical effect. If at any future time Liberal politicians revert to the constitutional doctrines which they once held, the House of Lords will cease to be, as at present, virtually unanimous. An Assembly which will offer no opposition to the Local Government Bill cannot be accused of contumacious obstinacy. All the measures of which Mr. GLADSTONE is accustomed to boast must have passed the House of Lords, and few of his proposals after they have been sanctioned by the House of Commons have been finally rejected. It cannot be denied that the House of Lords is threatened, but it is doubtful whether its best means of defence is to fly before its assailants.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

COMMENT and complaint as to the condition of our national defences do not cease. Neither do they become less vehement or less confusing, but rather the contrary. To be sure they do not attract much attention, and, if many voices are crying, they are all crying in the wilderness. General HAMLEY, who is as sure of his hearing as any man, for the excellent reason that he knows how to be both audible and interesting, complains of the—to soldiers—hardly intelligible indifference of the country to the danger of its position. The General accounts for it in his own way:—"As small objects in the foreground conceal the large "features of the distance, so the Wine and Coal Duties, the "Conversion of the Three per Cents; nay, the exposure of "the unveracity of prominent politicians, the antics of "light-headed seekers for notoriety, the howls of some "truculent treasonmonger at being subjected to a discipline "all too light for his offences, and a succession of similar "incidents which will be forgotten in a week, fix the atten- "tion of the public; while for the comparatively far-off "event, on our security from which every social and poli- "tical calculation must be based, we can only spare a "passing glance." In all this there is much truth. If man does look before and after, he seldom looks forward beyond the end of his nose, or back past the last thing that annoyed him. For the rest, the events of a man's daily life are of some importance to him; and then, when "National "Defence" is in question, so many big voices (we do not mean General HAMLEY) keep shouting at a poor man, "Believe "or be ——," that revolt is natural, or even pardonable. Our naval and military advisers must, we are afraid, lay their account with this indifference of people who are not immediately threatened. They may console themselves by remembering that, if they had not to gain the most sweet voices of electors, they might have to beware of the antics of a light-headed mistress, or the pigheadedness of a camarilla, or the folly of a king with a taste for music and the moral sublime. Sir JABEZ WINDBAG is not worse than LOLA MONTES, though less pleasing to the eye. Our Sparta may be better, or worse, than others; but it is ours, and there is nothing for it but to keep pegging away. It behoves us to peg in the right way, and on the right places—also to remember that failure to win the fight you have to fight is no proof that you could have won another.

The Nineteenth Century, in which General HAMLEY has written the words we have quoted, contains not only his article on "The Defencelessness of London," but a paper by Lord CHARLES BERESFORD on that congenial subject "The "Admiralty Confusion." The large space given to these kindred matters may be a proof that there is, after all, some considerable interest felt in them. Of Lord CHARLES BERESFORD'S article we do not propose to say much. He who can get more out of it than a vehement assertion of the writer's belief that "there is confusion worse than death" in that little isle must have enviable powers of reading between the lines. Much general statement there is, but very little in the way of argument to show that it is more than an expression of opinion. At the end, too, there is the cheerful remark that, beyond doubt, "the evidence to be "given before the Royal Commission on the system of "administration for the navy will"—will do what all the evidence given before all our Royal Commissions has not done yet. Lord CHARLES must have been too intent on gazing on the pilot stars to see all the inquiries of late years and what has come of them—mere changes of partners and chassees and bows and variations of the figures in a shambling square dance. General HAMLEY deals with his subject in another fashion. He at least gives us a businesslike treatment in large lines of a definite problem. "Given that an enemy has landed, what "would he probably do against London, and in what "position would the town be?" This is General HAMLEY'S problem, and he has no difficulty in showing that the capital of this country would, as things stand, be helpless against the attack of even a flying column of any size. Then he proceeds to inquire what can be done to enable it to defend itself. He does not ask for a great reorganization of our forces, but simply for the proper use of what we have. The Volunteers and militia of London and the Home counties ought to be—so we understand him—especially told off for the defence of the capital and prepared for their work in peace. They should be drilled on the ground they would have to fight on and for the especial kind of fighting they would be called on to do. No attempt should be made to turn them into a manœuvring army. The object should always be to train them to fight on familiar ground and under conditions explained to them beforehand. The positions should be surveyed, the lines marked out, so that when the time came every man should know where to go and what to do. Then, when the pinch did come, we could employ whatever resources we had—inferior guns for want of better, and half-drilled men if fully drilled were not forthcoming—to the best effect. Here, at least, is the scheme of a workman who does not waste time in complaining of his tools, but makes the utmost of what he has. Supposing the case to arise, this plan of General HAMLEY'S, the most scientific of scientific soldiers, would at least provide men who must needs be more or less guerrilleros with a chance of fighting under the only circumstances in which the guerrillero can face regular troops with any chance of success—where, that is to say, cover and his local knowledge compensate for his inferiority in discipline.

But, allowing as fully as possible the merits of General HAMLEY'S scheme, is it not a wonderful thing that an English officer should be found at this time of day seriously asking how London is to be protected against a foreign occupation? We should have thought that it ought to be covered by the fleet off Ushant. It is not General HAMLEY'S fault that he has to consider the problem under other conditions. He sees plainly enough that the navy is the first line of defence, and says so—only he doubts whether it is strong enough for the work—or rather he has no doubt on the matter, and, therefore, holds it incumbent on us to be prepared to take care of ourselves for a time. We—if we understand him aright—are not disposed to go with him when he says that the condition of preparedness "would, "in any case, confer on the fleet the inestimable advantage "of perfect freedom of movement." If by this General HAMLEY means that the fleet would be free in a time of war to leave the Channel without a sufficient squadron, we cannot agree with him. It would be a frightful misfortune if an enemy's war-ships and transports were left at sea unmolested even for a few days. A mere hostile landing would be a disaster even if the invaders were driven into the water in an hour, and so many of them killed that all the gravediggers of Kent and Sussex had to be busy burying them for a month. The first thing to do is to make that impossible, and it can only be done by putting the fleet on a proper footing. It is surely somewhat ominous to find an officer so thoroughly competent to realize this truth as General HAMLEY talking with resignation of actual invasion, and arguing that we must already prepare for the worst. Even if London ought to be fortified, the measure should be taken as part of a general scheme in which the strengthening of the fleet would be the most important feature. It is one of our misfortunes that our defence is generally attended to piecemeal. The soldier writes mainly as a soldier, even when he recognizes the importance of the navy, and the sailor as a sailor, even when he does not forget that one great duty of the fleet is to open the road for the army. In this way we have a see-saw of alternate attention and neglect for army or navy, according as either service catches the public ear. On no occasion have the two been treated as they should be—that is, as parts of one whole. At this moment it ought to be the main object to all who have the interests of our national defence at heart to put a stop to this rivalry between the services, which is as dangerous as the confusions and divided responsibilities in the departments. A scheme of national defence ought to treat the fleet, the army, the militia, and the Volunteers as really parts of the same force. Soldiers and sailors must necessarily think of their own business first; but it is in the power, and it is certainly the interest, of the country they are to defend to arrange that they shall hunt together, and not roam about independently in search of game.

PUBLICANS' LICENCES.

IN the case of SHARP v. WAKEFIELD a Divisional Court has delivered a judgment which will seriously alarm the holders of beer and spirit licences. A case had been stated by the Quarter Sessions for Westmorland on appeal from a refusal of the licensing justices to renew a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors to one RIDDING, occupier of an old-established inn. The Court of Quarter Sessions sustained the decision of the licensing justices, and SHARP, the owner of the inn, now raised the question whether the refusal of the licence was justifiable. The Quarter Sessions assigned as reasons for their judgment "the remoteness of the house "from police supervision and the character and necessities "of the locality and neighbourhood." Remoteness from police supervision, whatever may be the exact meaning of the phrase, seems to imply an assumption that there was no excess of similar accommodation in the neighbourhood. The ground of refusal would, according to the decided cases, be insufficient if it were founded on a general rule. When the justices have resolved that no more licences shall be granted in a particular district, the judges have decided that the refusal was illegal, inasmuch as the justices have not exercised their discretion in the special case. It now appears that, by first withholding police protection, and then insisting that the police supervision is insufficient, justices are considered to exercise their discretion. It is not apparent from the newspaper reports whether this argument was used at the hearing of the appeal. For the present it must be taken for granted that the law is correctly laid down by Justices FIELD and WILLS. The question is so important that it will almost certainly be raised in the Court of Appeal, and probably the party which may be then defeated will take it to the House of Lords. At present the case is a remarkable illustration of the uncertainty of English law and of the frequent carelessness exhibited in legislation. A few years ago the country was everywhere studded with beerhouses, retailing their commodities under an Excise licence, which was granted as a matter of course, and over which the justices had no control. Parliament was, as it seems, anxious to remove all impediments to the unlimited sale of beer, and at the same time it was universally understood that the holder of a spirit licence was entitled to a renewal, except in the case of misconduct, which must be proved on oath. The system would have lasted till now, and the Inland Revenue Office would have considered the interests of the revenue exclusively, if the beerhouses had not become, as might have been expected, centres of drunkenness and disorder. Nearly twenty years ago the power of granting all licences was conferred on the justices, but Parliament still took precautions against capricious disturbances of the trade. While applicants for new licences were required to appear at the Brewsters' Sessions, those who only asked for renewal were exempted from attendance, except when the renewal was opposed after notice on grounds which must be proved on oath. It was under this state of law and practice that Lord ROMILLY declared in the case of DAY v. LUKHE that "the transfer of a licence was "a matter of course. No discretion is exercised by the "justices." As a transfer requires the sanction of the justices, the law on this point seems now to be reversed. As usual, the apparent inconsistency of judicial decisions is explained by minute and almost imperceptible variations in the circumstances of successive cases. The shades of difference are here more than usually delicate. The justices are prohibited from taking into consideration any principle which might justify their action, and they are therefore confined to a moral rule of thumb. There is no better reason, as it appears to the laity, for refusing the renewal of a licence than that there are already too many public-houses in the town or village. Some judges have added as an illustration the imaginary cause of refusing renewal of a licence because the applicant had red hair. The licence cannot in either case be refused because the justices are not deemed to have exercised the discretion which ought to apply only to the person immediately concerned. Those who are interested in the subject will find all the cases cited and discussed in the elaborate judgments of Justice FIELD and Justice WILLS. Their conclusions are beyond dispute, unless and until they are reversed on appeal. The law is that interpretation of statutes and of precedents which has been affixed to either by a competent Court. The difficulties and obscurities which attach to any authoritative interpretation of the law are material, not as objections to an established rule, but as apologies for practices which may have been founded on an opposite theory.

The perplexity of the unlearned is not a little aggravated by an exactly contrary judgment delivered a week ago by the Irish Court of Queen's Bench, and reported in the last number of the Observer. After a full examination of the authorities, the Court unanimously affirmed the right of the holder of a licence to unconditional renewal, except for cause shown on sufficient evidence. Justice WILLS, in his judgment in the Divisional Court, refers to a number of cases "which were cited by Mr. Justice FITZGERALD in "the case of K. v. Recorder of Dublin as authorities "that licences were matter of property. They (the judges "sitting in the Divisional Court) did not support that "view, and the Irish case itself was no authority on "the point, Irish and English law being so different." It must be assumed that Justice WILLS spoke of a difference which affected the immediate question, but the Chief Justice of IRELAND, in delivering judgment, expressly stated that the Court had taken into consideration all the English cases. He must, therefore, apparently have satisfied himself that, whatever may be the difference of English and Irish law on other points, the judgments of the Courts of both countries on the right of renewal were founded on the same principles. It is notorious that the extent of discretion allowed to justices has long been the subject of constant and vehement controversy, yet the party which might have cited Irish authority for its conclusions has never, as far as is known, referred to the state of Irish law, nor have the enemies of the publicans pointed out any difference between English and Irish law. The Irish Court of Queen's Bench will perhaps be accused of having given too much weight to arguments derived from natural justice, public expediency, and common sense. It is true that such matters ought to influence legislation rather than the interpretation of the law, but there are at present two parallel or independent contests to be determined, each on its own special grounds. The point of law will be determined probably in the Court of final appeal. The claim of the disestablished publicans to compensation is not the less just, even if it appears that publicans and justices have for many years habitually misunderstood the law. If it appears that the innocent holder of a licence has, as the Irish Court of Queen's Bench declares, an indefeasible right to renewal, it is unnecessary to rest his demand on any less solid ground. An unfavourable judgment would abolish the legal right which he was supposed to possess, but it would leave untouched his moral claim to compensation.

As Mr. Justice FITZGERALD appears to have said, licences are property, not only if they are found to have a legal guarantee for renewal, but because they are invariably dealt with for valuable consideration. An old-established inn or tavern in a populous town is often sold for thousands of pounds, and, until lately, both vendor and purchaser have fully believed that, in default of misconduct, the acquisition of the licence was as safe an investment as the purchase of the bricks and mortar or of the site of the house. Probably in a majority of cases the incoming tenant has borrowed a portion of the purchase-money on the security of the good-will, which again depends on the certainty of renewal of a licence. Even Lord COLERIDGE, always the earnest advocate of Radical doctrines, admitted in a late speech on the subject that publicans could not justly be dispossessed without compensation. The previous part of his speech had excited some natural surprise, as an extra-judicial decision communicated to a public meeting on a question which is immediately before the Courts. Perhaps there may have been some sufficient justification for a course which is at least unusual. Whatever may have been his motives or reasons, Lord COLERIDGE would agree that a public speech is not exempt from criticism. The publicans may accept his recognition of their equitable claims as the admission of an adversary, and their advocates are fully at liberty to question his legal conclusions. Parliament is bound to protect any property which has been accumulated under its express or tacit sanction. If the public interest so required, it would have been easy at any time to enact that all new licences should be held at the absolute discretion of the justices. A Legislature which has connived at the existing practice must, if it holds that a mistake has been committed, provide at the public expense a remedy for those who have been injured. Indifference to the security of vested interests is nearly the greatest crime which a Legislature can commit, and undoubtedly there may be important vested interests in property which is not held by a strictly legal tenure. The right of selling alcoholic liquors formerly needed no permission, the trade being as lawful as any other ordinary occupation. At that time the owner of a public-house was as fully protected in his business as a grocer, a tailor, or a blacksmith. When a licence was imposed, probably in the first instance for purposes of revenue, general custom recognized the right of dealing in liquor, subject to definite conditions. No dispassionate legislator can have supposed that he was giving every bench of justices an unqualified right to deprive a respectable tradesman of his livelihood. The grievance would be the more intolerable because a more reasonable body of justices in a neighbouring district might refuse to be the instruments of confiscation. The Government will, as Mr. RITCHIE's recent statement proves, not be guilty of the culpable weakness of receding from its pledge to withdraw the licensing clauses if the House refuses compensation.

CRICKET.

IN the spring, not only a young man's fancy, but that of persons who have seen a great deal more of the game than he has, lightly turns to thoughts of cricket. This is the golden chain that unites all ages. We may no longer sympathize with the thoughts of love to which the young man lightly turns when the wanton lapwing, in obedience to the law of sexual selection, gets himself another crest. Youth is easily moved in that direction, like M. PAUL BOURGET's hero, who became so very much more enamoured when he was putting the White Rose scent on his pocket-handkerchief before going to call on the married lady. But who can receive without emotion the little red-leather tickets of the M.C.C. and the Surrey Club, enclosing the list of matches? In the spring a fuller crimson comes upon the Surrey ticket, or seems to come, as the imagination dreams on approaching events. This year the Australians are here again, which is a joy to reflect upon, for they have always hitherto put interest and excitement into matches. Most matches we are obliged to contemplate in the spirit of devout but unemotional artistic criticism. When Middlesex plays Gloucestershire, only members of the Western county care very much who wins. For Middlesex who can feel any local affection? The dwellers therein would as lief be beaten as not, if only they see good cricket. Nor does Yorkshire v. M.C.C. move us as patriots. Only the Schools and University matches can so excite observers that, as in COBDEN's year, they break their umbrellas into fragments, much as the Jews of old, regardless of expense, rent their robes when deeply stirred. Now about the Australians it is different. We want to win, not always, nor even too frequently, for then the excitement would cease, but we want to win often, and in the great events. We trust that the Colonists will trounce Mr. THORNTON's team, they are welcome to conquer Warwickshire, and they may beat Surrey with our good will, if only Oxford can, at least, make a good struggle against them. They should not find the Gentlemen at Lord's very difficult customers. Where are our fast bowlers? Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON, apparently, is no longer the CHRISTOPHERSON of 1884, whom Mr. LEFROY appears to celebrate in his excellent sonnet, "The Bowler." In the Gentlemen v. Australians, at the Oval, Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON took, first innings, eight wickets for 78, and second innings, three for 56. We have heard of no new fast amateur bowler to rival this; nor to eclipse Mr. WHITBY's exploit, the same year, at Oxford—eight wickets for 82 runs. An amateur's fast bowling is like the flower of youth, and fleetly passes away; for only the perennial Mr. ROBERTSON seems always useful, if never exactly surprising. The Gentlemen this year cannot hope for the aid of Mr. A. G. STEEL, we presume—Mr. STEEL, who was so safe with his hundred, 'tis five years since. The cares of this world call the amateurs into business of every sort, and we are not aware that any new bowlers have arrived at their culminating season. Eton last year had a fast left-handed bowler of promise, but he would be something over-parted in a struggle with the Colonists. Perhaps Mr. NEPEAN may have been improving, and, if so, he will give much trouble on a suitable wicket. Mr. GRACE, of course, may be as serviceable as ever. Mr. ROLLER's and Mr. W. W. READ's are names full of hope; but Mr. A. P. LUCAS and Mr. RIDLEY are scarcely more likely to aid the Gentlemen than Mr. C. T. STUDD, who was a tower of strength before he exchanged some seasons of Lord's for a cycle of Cathay. On the whole, if the Australians have not forgotten their cunning and their swashing blow, they should be at least a match for the Gentlemen, though England, as the performances of our Eleven in the colonies prove, ought to be their masters. Perhaps not more than three Gentlemen, at least if Mr. STEEL shuns the field, would play this year for England. But with BRIGGS, LOHMANN, ULYETT, and the flower of the Players, FLOWERS himself, and BARNES, England can yet speak, we fancy, to her children in the gate.

There are to be no reforms in cricket this year, apparently. The recommendations of a sub-Committee of M.C.C., formed in February, seemed sensible. They were:—"'(1) That "'the over shall consist of five balls; (2) that a bowler shall "'be allowed to change ends as often as he pleases, provided "'only that he does not bowl two overs consecutively in one "'innings; (3) that on the last day of a match, or if a one-"'day match at any time, the in side shall be empowered to "'declare the innings at an end.' But recognizing the "great difficulties in the way of any extension of the law of "leg-before-wicket, and the fact that the practice it was "sought to prevent was adopted by a very limited number "of cricketers, the Committee abstained, for the present at "all events, from recommending any alteration of the existing Law." Now, of all these proposed reforms, the change of the law in regard to l.-b.-w. is much the most important. We have often discussed the practical unfairness of the present condition of things, in which bowlers, already handicapped by the excellence of the grounds, are deprived of the success due to their best balls. The batsman has only to defend his wicket with his leg, against a break or twist. But it is held that even more discussion of a law forbidding the defence of the wicket by the body is needed. In fact, the moral tone of cricketers appears to want elevating; when everybody sees the iniquity of the conduct which old NYREN (of all people) approved, then it will be possible to pass a stringent law of l.-b.-w. The position is like that of Copyright in America; conscience, the national conscience, needs to be awakened. The awakened section of Americans ask for the aid of the clergy; but we can hardly hope that the British pulpit will ring with denunciation of the coup de botte. The Committee have only arrived at a resolution in the air—"That the practice of deliberately de-"fending the wicket with the person instead of the bat is "contrary to the spirit of the game and inconsistent with "strict fairness, and the M.C.C. will discountenance and "prevent this practice by every means in their power."

The democratic method would be to mob the offending batsman, break his windows, and confiscate his personal property. But cricketers are a law-abiding people. They will not even march out of church in a body when a sinner against bowlers enters the sacred edifice. Can a county be expected not to play a skilled professional who is notorious for putting his leg where his bat should be? This would be a very useful, if also a very stringent, measure. Umpires are to be recommended to report persistent patrons of the coup de botte to the Committee, and probably a good deal of what is called "pressure" in political English will be applied in one way or another.

The other emendations are sagacious, but not very pressing. The rule of five balls an over already exists, in one-day matches, in many districts. Probably few bowlers will find five balls too severe exertion, and the tedious time of crossing at the overs will be considerably shortened. A bowler, too, may be enabled to get the batsman just into the mental condition he wants for the subtlest effects, if he has five balls at him instead of four. A batsman may resist temptation four times, and succumb to a sham half volley on the fifth time of asking. As to the bowler's changing ends as often as he pleases, provided he does not bowl two consecutive overs, we scarcely see what the bowler has to gain by it. One end is certain to suit him better than the other; when he has found it (one experiment will suffice), let him stick to it. However, the rule will prevent such metaphysical puzzles as that which disturbed a recent Rugby and Marlborough match. The bowler had changed more frequently than the law permits without attracting the notice of the umpire or of the opposite side. Every ball he bowled was thus illegal, a "no ball," and the question for philosophers was how could he be stopped. No amount of no balls make an over, and the wretched bowler ought to have trundled on till he fainted, or till the batting side won without loss of another wicket. What did happen was, that the bowler got the one important wicket, and was disqualified at the end of the over. However, he had done what was needful, and the batting side was defeated; rather a hard thing for schoolboys to bear.

As to the recommendation that a side should be allowed to declare its innings ended, so as to win and save a draw by efflux of time, that plan is certainly better than "humbug-"ging" so as to lose wickets, or knocking down wickets with the bat on purpose. The side that declares its innings over will take some risk, as Oxford did when she made 240 for one wicket against Cambridge, whereafter the remaining bats played the fool, and were very nearly throwing the game away. But the question of generalship remains the same, and the method is more dignified than the method of unhallowed slogging, "without a conscience or an aim," except the roof of the Pavilion or the clock on the tennis court. These reforms, meanwhile, are taken ad avizandum, as Scotch lawyers say, and the game for this summer will be played on the old lines—we hope also on dry wickets.

TAXING THE FOREIGNER.

CERTAIN muddle-headed politicians are fond of urging, in support of the delusion known as "Fair-trade," that the foreigner ought to be taxed. The operation is generally impossible, or natives would go scot free. But there is a sense, as the Treasury has discovered, in which the property of the foreigner might be handled with great severity. If he resides in this country for more than six months, he is liable to Income-tax, and the extent of his liability is at present dividing the judges of the Supreme Court of Judicature. Mr. GOSCHEN'S father, as we know on filial authority, was fond of litigation, because he found it intellectually stimulating and commercially instructive. Mr. GOSCHEN himself has doubtless perused, with not impartial interest, the arguments and judgments in the case of COLQUHOUN v. BROOKS. Whether the taxpayers whom Mr. GOSCHEN now holds in the hollow of his hand will be gratified by the announcement, conveyed to them through Mr. BROOKS'S solicitors, that the costs of the suit on both sides are being paid by the Treasury we do not know. Mr. BROOKS is to be congratulated upon the singular generosity which exempts him, at the public charge, from the risk incurred by all other litigants. Mr. BROOKS, it should be said, is not a foreigner, though foreigners are deeply interested in the fate of his appeal. He is an English merchant, and partner in two firms, one in London, the other in Melbourne. He has been in the habit of including in his return of Income-tax under Schedule D whatever he may receive here from the profits of his Australian business. In the year 1884–5 there was a large sum standing to his credit in the books of the firm at Melbourne, and upon this he was assessed to Income-tax. The Commissioners for the City of London struck off the item, but stated a case for the opinion of the Court. The Queen's Bench Division could not agree, Mr. Justice STEPHEN holding that Mr. BROOKS was liable, and Mr. Justice WILLS that he was not. In these circumstances the junior judge withdrew his judgment, and the decision was given in favour of the Crown. Mr. BROOKS went to the Court of Appeal, and was there successful by a majority of two to one, the MASTER of the ROLLS and Lord Justice LOPES having pronounced for him, Lord Justice FRY against him. We presume that the point will now be taken to the House of Lords; but it is to be hoped that the House of Commons will not pay the bill for all this amusement without demur. It may be very important to have legal questions settled by the highest tribunal, and it may be very entertaining to watch their progress. But, if a rich man is not satisfied with the decision of a Court, and chooses to exercise his undoubted right of appeal, there is no reason, so far as we can see, why he should not do so at his own proper cost and charges. It may be said that the Divisional Court practically failed to decide the question at all. But that only shows the wasteful absurdity of putting two judges to sit together at first instance.

The case ought not to present any particular difficulty, for it lies in a very narrow compass. The Income-tax Act of 1853, passed when Mr. GLADSTONE was Chancellor of the Exchequer, imposes duties "for and in respect of the annual "profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing "in the United Kingdom from any kind of property what-"ever, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, "and for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising "or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom, "from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, "whether the same shall be respectively carried on in the "United Kingdom or elsewhere." An ordinary mind would certainly draw from this the inference that all residents in this country must pay Income-tax upon the whole of their incomes. It may or may not be wise and just for Parliament to make such a law. But, if Parliament has chosen to make it, there, so far as English judges are concerned, should be an end of the matter. According to Mr. GLADSTONE, we may not tax French wine for fear of impairing the Treaty of Commerce which has ceased to exist. According to Lord ESHER, we may not tax the stranger within our gates for fear of an "unanswerable remon-"strance." Then what in the world may the Parliament of this still nominally independent country do?

THE STATE OF EUROPE.

THE dreary and disgusting squabbles among the doctors which go on round the bed of the Emperor FREDERICK recur, it would appear, in exact accordance with the state of the patient, if, indeed, they do not, to some extent, condition that state. Putting mere clannishness quite out of the question, it is impossible not to feel that the English doctors have been singularly badly treated by a section of their German brethren and of the German public, as well as (unfortunately) by some persons who have not the excuse of being Germans. But we cannot help wishing that Sir MORELL MACKENZIE, difficult as it may have been, had had the fortitude and resolution to pursue that policy of absolute silence, of doing his duty and letting the dogs bark, which is the only policy of true wisdom, as well as of true dignity, in such a matter. As it is, the case, while it is the last, is, perhaps, also the best illustration of the intolerable nuisance which has been fixed upon modern life by what is pleasantly called newspaper energy. If everything that has been communicated about the EMPEROR had been cut down by nineteen-twentieths, or if the information had been restricted altogether to the official bulletins, it would have been infinitely better. But the world has, as usual, to suffer the penalty of the nuisances it has created, or which it has allowed to create themselves. All that reasonable men want to know or need know is that the EMPEROR is very ill; that his condition, owing to these frequent relapses, is dangerous, if not hopeless; and that political consequences of the greatest importance must follow, not merely from the worst, which we all hope will be averted, but from any very long continuance of this state of suspense, which is too obviously "getting on the nerves" of Germany, and affecting in the most prejudicial fashion the morale of the people, and with that morale the principal guarantee for the peace and well being of the whole continent of Europe.

Meanwhile it is currently reported that Russia has three-quarters of a million of men on her Western frontiers; and all the utterances of Russian newspapers testify to an idea that something good is going to happen for Russia. They have been inspirited or befooled by Prince BISMARCK's recent remarks; they openly say that, with our present GLADSTONE-PARNELL Opposition, nothing is to be feared from England; they despise Austria; they think that France, if not frankly their friend, may be counted on as a kind of makeweight to keep Germany on their side, or not frankly against them. Very likely all this is a mistake; but it hardly needs elaborate instruction in that history of which Mr. GLADSTONE (when its professors are on his side) is never tired of vaunting the merits, to know that delusions of this sort, spread through the mind of a nation, are the constant precursors of serious trouble. It is sometimes thought and oftener said that anticipations of difficulty are the source of difficulty; it would be much more philosophical to say that anticipations of gain are the source of attempts to secure gain. The finances of Russia are known to be in the most perilous condition, and yet she has been spending vast sums on the movements of her armies and on the strengthening of her fleet. It is a long since ascertained fact that Russians, both official and non-official, hold themselves to have obtained far too little for what they are pleased to call the sacrifices of the war of 1877-8; or, in other words, think that their last raid was not a sufficiently profitable raid. With a CZAR of less curious temperament than ALEXANDER III.—a temperament which seems to unite good and bad characteristics in almost equal proportions—these convictions would long ago have broken out into action. It is simply "on the edge of a razor," to use the time-honoured phrase, whether something will happen or not, and there would be much to be said for the assertion that if the CZAR were wise he would either disarm at once and adopt a completely different course of policy, or else strike out at once for Constantinople and Calcutta. He has an immense army in as good training and with as good supplies of material as a Russian army is ever likely to possess. His navy is considerable, though the bolts do sometimes start out of the sides of the ships. His financial position is not likely to improve, while it has not yet grown absolutely dangerous. He can never have a better moment than while a German EMPEROR is hovering between life and death and Germans are looking at each other with suspicion. He knows that Mr. GLADSTONE cannot live for ever, and that with his death many a brigade, or its equivalent, drops off the Russian effective. He is probably aware that the chances of French politics are very precarious, and that it is quite on the cards that some new reigning spirit in Germany might cap Prince BISMARCK's climax by restoring the Rhine frontier or part of it, and indemnifying himself eastwards. It is not impossible that some new French revolution may strike France absolutely out of the list of European Powers which count. Worst of all, the solid front, as of iron welded together, which has for years been presented to Russia on her Western frontier has suddenly been, we shall not say flawed, but suspected of flaw. It may be, of course, that, as some Russophils say, the policy of Russia is a policy of white-handed innocence and lamb-like peace. If so, well. If not so, it is very difficult to see when or in what conjunction of European arrangements Russia can have a better opportunity than she has now. And she has plenty of occasions. She has kept the Bulgarian wound open on purpose, and it is at least rumoured that the sons of the Greeks, with their usual shortsightedness, are going, probably on the strength of M. TRICOUPIS's recently discovered money-bags, to give her a fresh opening. Be this so or not, she can never want one as long as the Government of Bulgaria is permitted by the wisdom or foolishness of Europe to occupy a kind of middle state between a recognized government and a corporation of mutineers, headed by an eletto. Nor are there wanting particular points in the present state of Bulgaria which give occasion at once for alarm to those who desire peace and hope to those who desire that Russia shall make ready for war.

The affairs of Bulgaria have attracted comparatively little attention since that movement of Turkish diplomatic strategy over which the friends of Russia so greatly rejoiced, and which appeared to others (and with reason) not to alter the position in the very slightest degree. A much more important matter is the trial of Major POPOFF, with some at least of its incidents. The statement alleged to have been made by the Major that the Russians had offered him a very large sum of money to betray Sofia into their hands will of course be poohpoohed or passed in silence by those whom the CZAR has retained at perhaps not quite so high a fee. But they will find themselves in this rather awkward dilemma. If—which is the general Russophil theory—Major POPOFF, though guilty of some bad anti-Russian acts in the past, is on the whole an innocent victim of the wicked Ferdinandist Government, every attention is due to what this innocent victim says. If, on the other hand, he is capable of inventing such a statement to save himself or create sympathy for himself, he is obviously capable of the crimes with which the wicked Ferdinandist Government charges him. In any case, the trial or its necessity is, of course, to be deeply regretted. It shows that, though the Bulgarians have made great advances since their acquisition of practical independence, the faults which exist in all such peoples, and which make prudent politicians look with the greatest distrust on the creation of new nationalities, still exist in them. The two most fatal of all political diseases—next to a natural proneness to anarchy, such as seems to be bred in the soil of Ireland and of some South American States—are factiousness, which is ready to become treason to the existing State at any moment, and corruption. Hitherto the Bulgarians have kept themselves clear of anarchy, but this trial seems to show that the other plagues are only too rife amongst them, as they are usually rife in all countries but those in which a settled government for ages has produced a regular governing class with a regular morality of government.

HOW NOT TO CELEBRATE THE ARMADA.

IT is perhaps in keeping with this kind of show, but still it is a pity that the Committee which is to arrange the celebration of the Tercentenary of the Armada should have decided to make the whole thing ridiculous. This, however, is what they have done by asking the Duke of NORFOLK to act as chairman. The absurdity, let us hasten to say, is by no means in the Duke, but in the Committee. The Duke refused until he was assured that there was no intention to glorify Queen ELIZABETH or the triumph of Protestantism. The Committee has accepted these conditions, and thereby made itself ridiculous, and has condemned the celebration to be as nearly meaningless as may be. It may be natural that the descendant of the unfortunate nobleman who let I dare not wait upon I would with so little judgment should not love the memory of the Queen who cut his ancestor's head off. But then why ask him to be chairman when what you propose to do is to celebrate the great victory of her reign? It may not be reasonable to expect that the head of the English Roman Catholics should be disposed to rejoice over the defeat of the Pope's friend; but then why beg him, of all men, to help you to rejoice?

The Committee would have done well to ask itself what the defeat of the Armada was if it was not a glorification of Queen ELIZABETH and a triumph of Protestantism. Of course this last word has been made to cover a good deal which is not very admirable, and which we shall not be accused of loving. You may argue with irresistible force that the Church of England is not Protestant in this sense; but sensible men know very well what the word means when it is used in this connexion. Protestants were all those who fought to break the bonds of Rome, or to keep them from being soldered up again. In that struggle the defeat of the Armada was not only an incident—it was the crowning mercy. The greatness of the occasion and the victory was due to the fact that then, as in later times, England was the leader and defender of a great part of Europe against a common enemy. England was selected for attack because she was the leader of the other side. PHILIP II. had no wish to fight this country until he was driven into war by ELIZABETH's opposition to his Roman Catholic policy. As for the Queen herself, she doubtless at the bottom of her heart did not think any religious question worth the sacrifice of the bones of one of the proper young men she liked to have about her, but she knew she must take one side or another, and she did not take the Pope's. It was her side which won; and if the defeat of the Armada is not to be glorified on that account, we fail to see why anything particular should be said about it. As a mere piece of fighting, it is by no means the best we have to show for ourselves even in ELIZABETH'S own time. There were then and afterwards far more desperate affairs—but we do not hold centenaries over them. They were mere incidents in a local and national struggle. The defeat of the Armada, like the battle of Trafalgar, directly affected the whole of Europe. To decline to celebrate it as "a triumph of Protestantism" is simply to take all the meaning out of it, and is a species of confession that the policy which provoked PHILIP was a mistake, and the victory a misfortune—a very ignominious confession for Englishmen to make. As for the conduct of the Committee, in promising not to glorify the Queen, it is hardly to be described in language less emphatic than her own. There is certainly a kind of prig in these days who thinks fit to be severe on the small errors of Queen BESS, but we hardly expected to meet him on the Tercentenary Committee. The members of that body might have been supposed capable of remembering that whatever her sins were—and she came of a race which acted on LUTHER'S advice and sinned strongly—at least she knew she was the Queen of a great people, and acted her part right royally. She made England great and her enemies tremble. HENRI QUATRE knew a ruler when he met one, and was not without experience of women, and he was not on the side of the prigs. If the Tercentenary celebration is not to be a mere glorification of the Committee and other holiday-makers, we do not well see how silence is to be kept about Queen ELIZABETH, who brought Englishmen to the ring and led them in the dance.

THE IRISH JUDICIARY AND THE IRISH EXECUTIVE.

IT is quite pleasant to meet Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT once again in his original character of newspaper controversialist. He has ceased, of course, to make use of that pseudonym, as malicious opponents insisted on calling it, which used in former days to appear at the foot of letters now no longer signed "Historicus," but modestly presenting themselves to the world over their writer's once honoured name. Yet there is no change, one is glad to see, in the stately attractions of the style. There is the same profundity, the same solemnity, the same impressive insistence on familiar truths, in the lectures of the constitutional lawyer of to-day as there was in those of the civilian of five-and-twenty years ago. The manner in which Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT instructs, and has always instructed, his fellow-citizens on legal subjects has no precise counterpart that we know of in didactic literature. To find a parallel for it we should have to seek the records of oral dissertation. It is the manner of that learned young advocate who informed Lord ELLENBOROUGH that "an estate in fee-simple was the "highest estate known to the law of England"—with this difference, however, that Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT is much too well grounded in the law to allow himself to be frightened, like the jurist to whom we have compared him, into a stammering qualification of the too sweeping generality of his statement by being requested to pause while the Court solemnly took a note of it. In his letter to the Times of last Wednesday, on the question of the increase of sentences on appeal, he was in his most loftily instructive strain. And it was the more admirable in this respect because, as any one who has followed the controversy had probably noticed, the instructor had himself been instructed, on the previous day, by "An English Barrister," who had practically disposed of the whole pretended constitutional question—which is not a constitutional one at all—in a single sentence of his able letter. It revives a host of pleasant memories to run the eye down the column filled by Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT'S letter in the perfect confidence that it will not light upon the words "An English "Barrister." Nor does it. Our doughty, but discreet, disputant is careful to confine himself to Colonel SLADE, Mr. DARLING, and the "Indian ex-Judge." On poor Colonel SLADE, who had undoubtedly mistaken a trial at first instance for an appeal, he tripudiates with all the chivalry of the "verray perfit gentil knight" of controversy that he is. At Mr. DARLING he delivers an irrelevant thrust on the subject of Chief Justices SCROGGS and JEFFREYS, to whom he had gracefully compared the Irish County Court judges, though he does not, by the way, remark upon the interesting little biographical detail to which Mr. DARLING had drawn attention in SCROGGS'S career—to wit, that, from party spirit, ambition, or personal interest, he was "an apostate from principles he had once "strongly advocated." To "the Indian ex-Judge," who had quoted a most striking instance of an increase of sentence on appeal, Sir WILLIAM proudly says—his caution here for the first time deserting him—that, though "we have "degenerated, and seem to be degenerating fast, under a "Unionist régime in our primary conception of justice and "liberty, we have not yet quite reached the point of re-"constructing our English criminal law on Eastern models." From which it would seem that he is unaware that Eastern criminal law has in the case of India not only been itself remodelled by English lawyers on English principles, but so successfully that it would now form, in the opinion of many jurists, the best of models for the reconstruction of our own.

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT would therefore have done well to let the "Indian ex-Judge" as severely alone as he has let the "English Barrister." Of his wisdom in the latter case it is impossible to doubt. The correspondent who was engaged in the controversy under this title has shown, from a concise and clear history of the law on the subject, that "there is no constitutional or legal "principle" opposed to the increase of sentence on appeal, "as the absence of such a power at common law simply "arose from the absence of any power of appeal at all." It is not, of course, without regret that one descends from those heights of abstract principle on which Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT moves with the freedom and majesty of a man who need not be afraid at every moment of breaking his shins against a statute or a "case"; but really, if abstract principle has no concern in the matter—if common law knows nothing of appeal at all, and, therefore, constitutional law never could have had nothing to say to them—what then? Why, nothing, we fear, but that we must leave Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT on his lonely eminence, and grovel with the "English Barrister" in an examination of the 11 & 12 Vic. c. 78, and of a judgment subsequently delivered by Lord CAMPBELL in pursuance of the terms of that Act. From this uninspiring task, however, we shall most of us rise with the pretty clear conviction that, so far as legislation can be said to establish principle, on matters where principle had hitherto been silent, the idea of an increase of sentences following upon appeal is now just as much entitled to rank among the conceptions of highest law and lawyers as the reverse and more common operation. That being so, the main position against Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT and the other noisy assailants of the Irish County Court judges is made good. Mr. HOPWOOD'S highly technical argument from the construction of the Irish Petty Sessions Act, and his elaborate attempts to show that the words of that statute giving power to "vary a sentence" cannot possibly import a power to increase it, may be put aside. It does not matter whether Mr. HOPWOOD'S interpretation of this Act or that of the Irish County Courts is the more plausible one, though we have not the smallest doubt ourselves that the latter is the correct one. The point, we repeat, is practically immaterial to the present controversy, because it has never, in fact, been taken by those who have raised the controversy. The case of the Opposition—the case which they have deliberately chosen to set up as affording them far greater scope for calumnious abuse of the administrators of the law—is not that the County Court judges have merely blundered in the construction of a statute, but that they have subserviently and oppressively defied a recognized principle of the common law to the disadvantage of the subject. That is the position they have chosen, and, whether the Irish County Court judges have read the Petty Sessions Act aright or amiss, that position has now crumbled beneath the Parnellite and Gladstonian feet. It is clear that no "principle" of any kind comes into conflict with the simple and reasonable conclusion of the Appellate Court, that when the Government, at the express and repeated instance of the Irish members, gave, under the Crimes Act, not a mere right to a "case stated," but one to an absolute "rehearing," the Legislature meant what it said, and intended the judge before whom the new trial was held to proceed in precisely the same manner as though he were sitting at first instance with no sentence before him to take into consideration either to the benefit or the damage of the appellant.

A Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Ireland can hardly expect to fare better than an Irish County Court judge, and Colonel KING-HARMAN can reflect, too, that the abuse directed against himself has even less meaning than that poured out upon judicial functionaries who can do something worse than merely irritate Parnellite susceptibilities. If further consolation were needed by him, he would doubtless have found it in the fact that his assailants really do not care twopence one way or the other about his appointment on its merits, and would never have troubled themselves about it for a moment were it not that it has materially diminished their power of annoying Colonel KING-HARMAN'S official chief. This, of course, is not Mr. JOHN MORLEY'S solemn view of the matter. Mr. MORLEY, no doubt, has conscientiously convinced himself of the truth of all the nonsense that has been talked about the Irish tenants' "dismay" at the appointment—nonsense which Mr. T. W. RUSSELL feels bound, we suppose, to repeat, if only to show that an Orange representative of the tenant-farmer can talk it as glibly as a Nationalist. We have no doubt, we say, that Mr. MORLEY accepts all this stuff with perfect seriousness, and has pictured to himself an ideal Irish cottier anxiously looking for the appointment of a sympathetic Under-Secretary, if one had to be appointed at all, and giving himself up to despair on learning that a third landlord has been added to his two other natural enemies, Lord LONDONDERRY and Mr. BALFOUR. But Mr. MORLEY'S innocent adoption of this absurdity is only of a piece with other subjections of his keen intelligence to the impostures of the party with whom he is associated. We wonder that he does not ask himself whether, if Colonel KING-HARMAN had been appointed solely to do desk work in the Irish Office, instead of answering in the House of Commons, we should have heard a word from the Parnellites about unfitness of the appointment? Surely everybody who uses his eyes and common sense must know that their real grievance is the interposition of this sturdy buffer between them and the object of their ceaseless Parliamentary attacks; and that is a grievance with which no Englishman, not professionally allied with the Parnellites, can be expected to sympathize.

THE COLLAPSE OF THE CURFEW BILL.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK'S Early Closing Bill was rejected in the House of Commons last Wednesday by the enormous majority of 278 votes against 95, or very nearly three to one. Nobody supposed that the Bill could pass, for it would have thrown the retail trade, of London at all events, into hopeless confusion. But a defeat so decisive and so emphatic ought to convince Sir JOHN LUBBOCK and Mr. BURT, who seems to have been over-persuaded against his own better judgment into putting his name on the back of an absurd measure, that the English people are not children, and that there are limits to the tolerable interference of Parliament. Neither the debate nor the division could fairly be called a party one. The Government did not take the question up, and issued no whip, although the only Minister who spoke, Mr. STUART WORTLEY, opposed the Bill on behalf of his chief, the HOME SECRETARY, as well as on his own. Mr. BRADLAUGH and Mr. LABOUCHERE condemned quite as strongly as Mr. BLUNDELL MAPLE and Mr. RADCLIFFE COOKE a project which its promoters have never fairly thought out. The discussion was one of the most satisfactory which has been heard in the present House of Commons, being sensible, businesslike, and strictly to the point. The result was that the case for the Bill collapsed, and any other vote would have been discreditable to the intelligence of the House. Of course Sir JOHN LUBBOCK has a good deal to say for himself. Philanthropists always have; and Sir JOHN'S disinterested benevolence is apt to prejudice the public in his favour. His Bank Holidays are undoubtedly popular, though the grumbles of an increasing minority at a cast-iron system of relaxation grow louder every year. The Shop Hours Act of 1886, which applies merely to boys and girls under eighteen, was only passed for a limited time, and its operation is believed to have been more limited still. That, however, was merely the extension of a principle which has been recognized and applied by the Legislature ever since the passing of the Factory Acts. The defunct Bill of this year would have forbidden one grown man to work for another when that other would readily and willingly have employed him, or even to keep open a shop of his own, where there are no assistants, at hours when his customers wished to make their purchases. Sir JOHN LUBBOCK drew a moving picture of the hardships inflicted upon shopmen and shopwomen by unduly prolonged labour. Mr. MAPLE showed that the representation was exaggerated; but we have no doubt that some of it is true. Toil is very unevenly distributed in this world; and, while many people do nothing at all, others do far more than they ought. Nothing would give us greater pleasure than to know that every labourer could realize the ideal of eight hours' work, eight hours' play, eight hours' sleep, and eight shillings a day. But a Bill which would take from small shopkeepers much of their custom, and deprive small purchasers of many of their opportunities, would not really alleviate the lot of any class in the community.

Sir JOHN LUBBOCK and Mr. WINTERBOTHAM argue that shopkeepers are not free agents, because, if some of them keep their shops open, all the others must. But Sir JOHN himself cited the instance of Newcastle, where, according to him, early closing has been adopted by the tradesmen themselves. The argument proves a great deal too much, for part of it is contradicted by very recent experience. We are aware that some miners, especially in Lanarkshire, are agitating for an Eight Hours' Bill. It is only because they have not realized the enormous power of voluntary associations, such as trade-unions, in compelling unreasonable masters to accept reasonable terms. Sir JOHN LUBBOCK was justified in much that he said about the want of consideration shown by many employers of labour. "The "seats," as he very forcibly puts it, "are on the wrong "side of the counter." Does he suppose that he can have them put by law upon the other side? Public opinion in these matters is strong, and combination is stronger. But the law is impotent. If there are a vast number of people in the poorer districts of London and other large towns who wish to shop between eight and ten, or even later, no human power can prevent them. Compulsory closing would, in such circumstances, lead to riot, if not to rebellion. It is a fact, which may perhaps be reasonably lamented, but which cannot be reasonably ignored, that work which does not tax the brain or exhaust the muscles can be continued much longer than hard digging on the one hand, or intricate calculation on the other. If people whose labour is light, mechanical, and unskilled are to have short hours, they will have low wages too. "Men," said Mr. BRADLAUGH, in a speech for once admirable, "men "who have their labour to sell should be left to sell it in "the best fashion they can." Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, indeed, shrinks from carrying out his principles where they come into conflict with really powerful interests. His Bill, which may in that respect without offence be called cowardly, did not touch public-houses or refreshment bars or cigar-shops. Of course Sir JOHN LUBBOCK was actuated by no worse motive than a desire to move upon the line of least resistance. But the conclusive refutation of his theory, which his own practice affords, should teach him that there are more things in the petty traffic of great towns than are dreamt of in the philanthropic philosophy of opulent bankers.

LORD CARNARVON AND MR. PARNELL.

AS a rule, it is a mistake to repeat the contradiction of a calumny. The case as between slandered and slanderer is usually one of comparative personal credibility; and, this relation being in most cases a pre-ascertained and constant quantity, is not affected by any number of assertions or denials on either side. An exception, however, to the rule of letting alone may very fairly be made in such a case as that of Lord CARNARVON and the myth—to use four letters instead of three—of his conversion during his Lord-Lieutenancy to the Parnellite, afterwards to be the Gladstonian, doctrine of Home Rule. Here the original fable has so largely developed itself and has gained so much in circumstantiality since Lord CARNARVON'S first endeavour to demolish it that he can hardly be blamed, especially as this growth has taken place during his absence from England, for once more repeating the attempt. His explanation of the increased particularity with which his pretended deliverances of 1885 in favour of Home Rule are now cited is a simple one. Very emphatic and perfectly definite deliverances were made on this subject at the interview between Lord CARNARVON and Mr. PARNELL, only it was Mr.

PARNELL and not Lord CARNARVON who made them. It was not the Lord-Lieutenant, but the visitor, who "expressed the strongest belief that only by the concession of "an Irish Parliament could the Irish question be settled"; who urged that the Parliament should not only be, but be called, a Parliament, and that it should possess "the "most extensive powers, even going so far as the right "of protecting Irish industries by the imposition of protective tariffs." All, therefore, that Mr. PARNELL has had to do in this matter has been to transpose the names of the two parties to the dialogue; to convert himself into the curious and attentive listener, and to confer the part of the "blessed Glendoveer" on Lord CARNARVON.

What proportion of honest error and what of malicious misrepresentation contributed to this extraordinary perversion of the fact is a question which, fortunately, it is no business of ours to determine. Sufficient attention, however, has not perhaps been called to the exact phrasing of Mr. PARNELL'S last statement on this subject as quoted by Lord CARNARVON. "Lord CARNARVON'S views," he said, "as con"veyed to me, or rather as we exchanged them in our inter"view, were absolutely identical." That "or rather" introduces a somewhat important qualification of the words preceding it; and the reason of its introduction is of course plain enough. Mr. PARNELL is apparently beginning to be conscious of certain primâ facie improbabilities in his original version of the interview which it would be advisable to soften down. It has occurred to him, and he thinks it may occur to other people, that when A invites B to pay him a visit for the purpose of hearing his (B's) views on a particular political question, it is, to say the least of it, singular that the interview should consist wholly of an elaborate indoctrination of B with the views of A. In a word, Mr. PARNELL perceives that the story of Lord CARNARVON having sent for him in order to say to him in the fulness of his heart, "My dear Mr. PARNELL, I am a "Home Ruler, and believe in the policy of establishing an "Irish Parliament with a power to tax English products," is a little too strong even for the digestion of the most robust credulity. Hence the statement that the declarations in favour of Home Rule were "rather" an "exchange "of views" between the two interlocutors than a "convey"ance of Lord CARNARVON'S views to his visitor. We should think they were "rather" the former of those two things than the latter; and we would now only suggest to Mr. PARNELL to go a step further, and admit that the "exchange" which then took place in Dublin Castle was of a thoroughly national character, and that its reciprocity was all on one side. Meanwhile, however, we can only express our entire agreement with the concluding words of Lord CARNARVON'S statement of the other night in the House of Lords. We admit having been of those who expressed the opinion two years ago that there had been an error of judgment on his part in seeking an interview, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, with Mr. PARNELL at all. But we should have no objection to adopt Lord CARNARVON'S suggestion that the error of judgment consisted merely in his "accepting such a meeting without "the presence of witnesses." If he will allow us to add after the word "witnesses" the words "and a sworn short"hand writer," we shall regard the amendment as entirely satisfactory.

MR. GLADSTONE ON THE CHAIR.

THE members of the National Liberal Club who had paid their one guinea had no cause to complain on Wednesday that they had been denied their run for their money. They not only saw and heard Mr. GLADSTONE, but saw him as the believers in his cult prefer to have sight of their idol. Mr. GLADSTONE has proved that he thoroughly appreciates the taste of some of his countrymen for looking at him in positions which most Englishmen would think a trifle ridiculous, and he has habitually executed himself (if there is anything so disagreeable as the word implies in the process) very heartily. At the National Liberal Club and in the Library which is to stand as a "permanent "memorial" of "the services he has rendered to his country," he had an opportunity of supplying his followers with their favourite spectacle. Except in the very queer world of Gladstonian Liberalism, it might be thought a little undignified to hound your revered leader on to a chair with cries of "higher," and to greet his appearance as he wobbled on the seat with cheers and laughter. But Gladstonism is in that healthy state which allows of familiarity towards the object of worship without fear of the usual consequences. The subscribers to the Gladstone Library had met not only to honour but to see their revered leader, and were not to be baulked by the absence of a platform. As he could not be seen on the floor, he was gently constrained to mount the chair—though surely a table would have been preferable—not only as being higher, but as, at least, supplying a compliment to Irish patriot friends. Mr. GLADSTONE offered just the necessary amount of resistance, and then yielded to the playful affection of his admirers. He mounted the chair in obedience to cries of "higher," and spoke up amid cheers and laughter.

Standing on that uneasy elevation, not without the occasional support of Mr. THOROLD ROGERS'S shoulder we hope, he delivered an address, of which it may be said that it fills two columns of the Times, and may be read without harm. That libraries are good things, that they should contain books, that the books should be worth reading, and also should be read, are all propositions to be found in the speech. If they are not to be discovered there in a quotable form, this is only what will be taken for granted by all—for there can by this time be nobody who is not aware of the misty splendour of Mr. GLADSTONE'S style. They were there, and are harmless propositions, and were also enforced by a quotation from MACAULAY (an admirable man to quote to a large meeting when you are about talking of literature), and further strengthened by a useful, though inaccurate, quotation from as much of Lord BACON as the modern essayist has made perfectly familiar. The Gladstonian who prompted his leader at this point in his speech was certainly a little wanting in tact. Mr. GLADSTONE adapted BACON'S saying that "Reading maketh a full man, conference a "ready man"; but he disremembered the rest. The earnest Liberal who shouted "Writing" was probably only anxious to help his revered leader swaying on the chair; but he might have done a less sarcastic thing than remind him of the branch of study which maketh an exact man. Mr. GLADSTONE could have shown him that the saying does not always apply. But the follower had his excuse, for the painfully-poised orator gave a fine example of misplaced irony himself; for he talked of such as, rushing into politics from the study of history, have not shone by their urbanity. "There have been instances," he said, "when gentlemen who have, with immense advantage, "attached themselves to historical study, and have given "forth in the course of their works the most deliberate, "the most sagacious, the most candid judgments, trans"ferring themselves too rapidly from that temperate "climate to the torrid zone of politics, have become re"markable for exceeding all their fellow-creatures in the "vehemence with which they express their opinions. There"fore these constant and rapid changes are not what I am "endeavouring to recommend." Now, of whom can Mr. GLADSTONE have been speaking? To us it seems that, making due allowance for the compliments due to a friend, it must have been of "Historicus," of the author of Six Centuries of Work and Wages, and perhaps a distinguished brother professor of his. They combine the knowledge and the vehemence; but what a cruel subject to select for such an occasion! How ungrateful to the learned gentleman who introduced him to the enthusiastic meeting! It must have been very painful to Mr. THOROLD ROGERS to be made a shocking example of in this fashion. The only advice to be offered under the circumstances is, that learned gentlemen open to Mr. GLADSTONE'S bold rebuke should not only smile and wince, but decide never to merit the castigation again. Then will the National Liberal Club become a school of urbanity, which is a consummation devoutly to be wished, and the Right Honourable W. E. GLADSTONE will have rendered one more service to his country.

STRANGERS IN THE HOUSE.

WE have no particular fault to find with the Report of the Select Committee on the Admission of Strangers to the House of Commons. To admit, however, that the present system would be improved by the adoption of their recommendation is not to make any very large concession. It is, indeed, difficult to conceive anything much more ineffective, relatively at least to its elaboration, than the procedure by which the privilege of admission to the House is supposed to be guarded from abuse. Such a combination of the maximum of formal precaution with the minimum of practical security has seldom been achieved. A system which provides that the letters of applicants for orders should be deposited with an official of the House, with a view to their subsequent comparison with the signatures of the persons actually admitted, and which then permits of the orders themselves being sent out in blank and transferred from hand to hand, is surely a marvel of inept inconsistency. No wonder the Committee report that this system, introduced after the dynamite explosion in 1885, gives very "little protection to the House," and affords "little assistance to the police." No wonder they find it "useless to pretend" that the present system is much safer than the "loose and haphazard" practice which obtained previous to the date in question. As a matter of fact, the new is, in fact, though not in form, as loose and haphazard as the old.

The secret of its failure—of the failure, that is to say, of the nominal, but impracticable, precautions which distinguished it from the method which it superseded—is obvious enough. It began at the wrong end, and it set itself to attempt impossibilities. The idea of having a really trustworthy and effective comparison between the handwriting of letters in the possession of the Speaker's secretary and the signatures of nightly batches of perhaps several hundred strangers in the Gallery Book might from the first have been perceived to be chimerical. Probably Mr. PONSONBY himself was under no illusions as to the possibility of realizing it, though we have no doubt he has done his best to carry it out. But, of course, the cardinal error lay in the assumption that it is possible for the authorities of the House themselves to hold, as it were, some inquiry on their own account into the fitness of persons recommended by members for admission to the House. That, however, is a manifest impossibility. Every member is entitled to give, previous to the sitting, two orders of admission to the Strangers' Gallery for each day of the Parliamentary Session. On nights when any important debate is expected this privilege is very largely made use of, but for any but the very dullest of Parliamentary fixtures—such, for instance, as "Supply," for the first order of the day—there are sure to be a considerable number of these orders issued. It is clearly beyond the power of the officials of the House, assisted by whatever mechanical ingenuities of procedure, to "check" the respectability, so to speak, of the recipients of these orders. The true method is to increase the responsibility of the members who apply for orders—indeed to make that responsibility absolute and undivided. To this object the new rules appear likely to contribute in an important degree, though we should prefer seeing them in operation before expressing any very confident opinion. Every member will, at least, be compelled in future to give the name and address of every stranger for whom he solicits an order of admission; and provision is to be made, or so, at least, we understand the proposals—it is essential, at any rate, that this should be so—for recording the association between the name of the person to whom the order is issued and his Parliamentary sponsor. This will for the future render impossible those dubieties which have perplexed Mr. JOSEPH NOLAN on this subject, and will, at all events, enable the authorities of the House to know with certainty hereafter who is responsible for the admission of whom. When once it is understood by members that they are not entitled to distribute orders light-heartedly and broadcast without caring into whose hands they fall, we may expect that new and salutary rules of conduct will grow up on the subject. Members will expect to receive fuller information as to the identity, position, and character of the persons soliciting orders from them; and if the interposition of such formalities tends to diminish the flow of applications which are received from "constituents" and others for the privilege of admission, most members will feel it a distinct relief.

ANTAGONISM.

THE remarkable generalization which Sir William Grove stated with his accustomed force and clearness in his lecture at the Royal Institution on the 20th ult., which has been published in Nature, may, at no very distant date, find acceptance as universal as that which has been gained by his other great generalization of forty-six years ago—the Correlation of Physical Forces; or, if the term be preferred, the Convertibility of Physical Forces. This is now no more questioned by men of science than the law of gravitation is; but, unfortunately for himself, Sir William Grove has reaped the reward which is sometimes given to those who have been too far ahead of their fellows. When truth can no longer be ignored or disputed, originality is denied. Lamarck spoke before his time, and, living in a sluggish age, was ignored. Sir William Grove was for a while ignored to a certain extent. Living, however, in a period of far greater scientific activity and watchfulness than that of Lamarck, he could not be ignored altogether; but, owing, no doubt, in part to the jealousy of some leaders of science who could not bear the thought that a young man not belonging professionally to their ranks had perceived a mighty truth which had escaped them, he has been spoken of with patronizing condescension as a man who was able to make a new view systematic, but did not originate it. Nothing could be more inaccurate or misleading. A great discovery has frequently been preceded by some faint hint or inkling of the truth. In the lecture we are speaking of Sir William Grove showed that, nearly a century before Newton wrote, Shakspeare had considerably more than a faint idea of gravitation so far as it affected the earth. Of the correlation of forces there had been some suggestions far more vague than that which was given about gravitation in Troilus and Cressida before Sir William Grove delivered his lectures in 1842. To deprive him of the honour of being the first discoverer on this account would be much the same thing as to refuse credit to an Arctic explorer because some one else had perceived for a moment, in the far distance, the ice which he boldly penetrated. No one who candidly examines the history of science can doubt that the author of "The Correlation of Physical Forces" was the first to perceive this great fact in nature. That he was the first to prove it has, we believe, never been disputed.

His views respecting antagonism, which it is to be hoped he will give to the world in an amplified form, as well suited for readers as his lecture was for hearers, will in all probability, when they have been more fully laid before the world, be very generally accepted, and their originality will very possibly be denied. No doubt in this case the originality is not so complete as it was in the other. That it is natural and inevitable for men to combat each other has been said often enough. There is Hobbes's famous dictum, and there are others to the same effect; and Lamarck and Darwin have shown the struggles for existence amongst animate beings and their importance; but what was really striking and, so far as we are aware, quite original in Sir William Grove's lecture was his proof of the broad truth that antagonism pervades all nature, inorganic nature as well as organic; that it is not confined to human creatures who have intelligence enough to desire to rob each other, or to animals who have to eat other animals in order to exist, but that it extends to the inorganic world, where it has its place just as amongst sentient beings. To use his own words, he endeavoured to prove that "'antagonism,' a word generally used to signify something disagreeable, pervades all things; that it is not the baneful thing which many consider it; that it produces at least quite as much good as evil; but that, whatever be its effect, my theory—call it, if you will, speculation—is that it is a necessity of existence, and of the organism of the universe so far as we understand it; that motion and life cannot go on without it; that it is not a mere casual adjunct of Nature, but that without it there would be no Nature, at all events as we conceive it; that it is inevitably associated with unorganized matter, with organized matter, and with sentient beings."

To substantiate this bold generalization he referred first of all to the visible universe, to the suns, planets, comets, and meteorites. These are, one and all, pulling at each other, and resisting the pull by the force of the motion which has been imparted to them. Very often, much more often than is generally supposed, the pulling force is stronger than the other, and the smaller body is torn to the greater one. "The earth," says Sir William Grove, "is daily causing a bombardment of itself by drawing smaller bodies—meteorites—to it: 20,000,000 of which, visible to the naked eye, fall on an average into our atmosphere every twenty-four hours, and of those visible through the telescope, 400,000,000 are computed to fall within the same period." In fact, the earth sucks in all it can get, carrying on war according to the approved fashion by absorbing the weaker. Of course planets and stars are doing the same, and, so to speak, taking what they can grasp, and it is not improbable that many meteorites and much larger bodies owe their independent existence, like the smaller States, to the jealousies of their great neighbours, neither of whom will let the other have its way. There is combat between the two or more, and between them and their victim. It is by no means impossible that planetary bodies are sometimes annexed. We need not remind our readers of the theory which has more than once been propounded that the orbit of the earth round the sun is diminishing, and that in due time the earth will fall into the sun. Such is the antagonism of the heavens. With regard to that which the heavens give us—light—Sir William Grove was able to show that antagonism exists very notably, that there is the usual battle of force against resistance, the resistance in this case being of a most serious character. It need hardly be said that, according to the best received theory, light reaches us by causing undulations in an imponderable body which, for want of a better name, has been called ether, its nature or, if we may use the word, composition being uncertain, or rather, perhaps, utterly unknown. But, whatever the nature of ether may be whether it be an imponderable gas, if such a thing can be, or matter in such a state of extreme tenuity as to be relatively imponderable, there can be no doubt that it resists and necessarily impedes the progress of light. One hundred and ninety thousand miles a second is sufficiently quick for the little world we live in, but for the universe it is decidedly slow going, and light can travel at no greater pace. It is, perhaps, almost superfluous to refer to the remarkable speculations which have been made respecting the time which light takes to reach us from some of the (so-called) fixed stars. In looking at what we suppose to be the star, we are receiving the rays of light from a body which, for aught we know, may have ceased to exist for a long period. The inhabitants of the star, if they have the means to see us, may be gazing at the world of Flodden Field, of the Norman Conquest, or of some far earlier date. The messenger light is so much impeded on his way by the universal ether, that he takes a long time to reach his destination, so that again there is antagonism, which, so far as our limited power of and time for observation go, seems to pervade the universe.

In a very striking manner, then, does it appear that the necessity for combat or for struggle—whichever it may be thought best to call it—which pessimists have thought peculiar to sentient creatures pervades inorganic nature. In dealing with sentient creatures, it is much more easy to show that, in one form or other, antagonism or combat is, to say the least, the rule. There is no need to speak of the struggle for existence, or of the fact that animals, birds, fishes, and reptiles innumerable can only exist by incessantly killing and devouring. When Franklin reconciled himself to animal food by observing that the bigger fishes ate the smaller ones, he recognized a great law of the universe. With regard to man, the necessity for combat has, as we have said above, been observed on again and again; but it should be said that, in dealing with this part of his subject, Sir William Grove showed his habitual force, and was able to adduce some very happy illustrations. Even if actual warfare is less common than it was, the war of competition is perpetually going on. Whether it takes the form of Protection, of the attempt to undersell, or to vanquish by superiority of manufacture, it always remains the same thing—a conflict; and amongst members of a community the same struggle goes on, sometimes almost to the death. At this moment many Englishmen and Englishwomen are complaining, not apparently without good reason, that they are undersold by the cheap labour of foreigners, who can live on wages which for them mean starvation. Even apart, however, from these and the less dire struggles, the operation of antagonism and combat are apparent. When man leaves off work and seeks recreation he must either strive to circumvent and destroy animals or indulge in some form of combat. The best kinds of physical and intellectual games are essentially combative.

It must be added, however, that in dealing with that part of his subject which related to mankind Sir William was not altogether so happy as in the earlier portion of his lecture, and was not quite able to avoid the errors which usually seem to beset a man who quits the dry light of science for the murky atmosphere of human affairs. Severe observation of established facts, and strictly logical and consecutive reasoning from them, are abandoned, and some hazy speculation and declamation appear to be inevitable. Sir William Grove disfigured his admirable lecture by a disquisition on the artificial wants caused by civilization, which was totally irrelevant to his subject, and, moreover, highly disputable. Civilization creates, no doubt, a certain number of artificial wants, but many of the wants which it fosters and gratifies are due to the natural desire of man to make life as comfortable as it can be, and though this desire may by some foolish people be carried too far, and the end made subservient to the means, there can be no doubt that it is a legitimate one, and the power to satisfy it within moderate bounds is one of the best results of civilization. After all, who gets the most enjoyment out of life—the civilized man with his many wants and also his many pleasures, or the Norwegian peasant who had to be restrained by the most severe law known, from brutalizing himself and destroying his race by alcohol, or, to take an infinitely lower type, the savage who is insatiate f.. fire-water, not because he has been trained to want it, but because, with him as with the other, it serves to vary the intolerable monotony of existence?

Sir William Grove's remarks on this point, which we cannot but think irrelevant and hasty, constitute the one blemish in a really admirable discourse, and when the wide nature of the subject treated is considered, it is not a little surprising that there should only be one blemish. The sweeping and powerful generalization by which he has linked together the facts of organic and inorganic nature will, we believe, be thought not unworthy of the man who first really perceived the persistence and convertibility of force; and it is much to be hoped that before long his very remarkable lecture will, with those alterations which are inevitable when a lecture has to be turned into a treatise, be given to the world in permanent form.

THE GREAT CRYPTOGRAM.

WE have noticed, with a very little surprise and more than a little amusement, that not a few of the critics who in the daily press have noticed Mr. Ignatius Donnelly's long-delayed and loudly-heralded The Great Cryptogram (2 vols. London: Sampson Low & Co.) have treated it with a certain gingerliness, as those who cannot quite make out whether it deserves serious and respectful handling or not. Something of this, no doubt, is due to the recent and exceedingly noisome practice of reviewing a book on the day, if possible on the eve, of its appearance, and to the fact that Mr. Donnelly, who is undoubtedly a clever man in a certain way, has wrapped up what he has to say in such an enormous mass of words, and scattered the really important parts of it so deftly about, that "a company of poor men," sitting down at a moment's notice, with another company of printer's devils at their elbows, may well be something flustered by him. For us, we do not plume ourselves too pharisaically on the accidental advantage which weekly publication has over daily in this respect. But we think we can point out with fairness and sufficiency (but not self-sufficiency) that Mr. Donnelly has not qualified himself for being taken seriously. And, as we have done our part in making jokes on the subject before, we shall make this demonstration of non-seriousness in Mr. Donnelly as little jocular as possible. Nor let it seem paradoxical that we enumerate at rather great length the grounds on which in the present instance we do not try the great cryptogram.

We do not try it, in the first place, on the general question of Shakespeare v. Bacon, though we have (as we believe every competent literary judge, without exception, who really knows both authors has) a conviction that by nothing short of a literary miracle could the qualities which went to the production of the work called "Bacon" exist in the man whose other qualities went to the production of the work called "Shakespeare." We can boast, we think, sufficient power of considering evidence separately to waive this if necessary.

Nor do we propose to nonsuit Mr. Donnelly on the ground (interesting and remarkable though this matter is) of his own evident inability to understand evidence. It is true that he seems to misunderstand the Baconian cipher on which he bases his theory, and certain that his reference to one of the late, idle, and utterly unsupported traditions about Shakspere's youth as a "recorded fact" shows this inability once for all, that his whole picture of the man Shakspere (this spelling and that of "Shakespeare" for the dramatist are documents in the case) is purely gratuitous and imaginary. But we do not dwell on this.

Nor yet on the further ground of his strange and, for a person who has undertaken such a task, almost inconceivable ignorance of the actual literature of the period under discussion. Mr. Donnelly quotes plenty of recent and some older books about Shakespeare—Goadby and Halliwell-Phillips, Richard Grant White and "Professor Grant Allen," Dixon and Simpson, yea the more remote and terrible names of Franklin Fiske Heard, and William D. O'Connor. His labours on the cryptogram must have made him in a sense familiar with Shakespeare himself and perhaps with Bacon. But, speaking under correction, we cannot remember a single instance in which he shows a knowledge of the writings of any of Shakespeare's contemporaries or quotes any one of them except at secondhand from his modern informants. Further, he is so grossly ignorant of Old English that he thinks "owed" a "misspelling" for "owned," and when Falstaff says "On, Bacons, on," he writes "if he had called them hogs I could understand it, but to call them by the name of a piece of smoked meat!" evidently unaware that "bacons" is a well-established early term for "bacon-pigs." And yet further, his knowledge of other languages is so deficient, that he quotes triumphantly Ben Jonson's statement that Bacon "filled all numbers" as a proof that Ben knew him as a great poet. Now, not only would an allusion to poetic performance in the particular context be out of place and nonsensical, not only would "filled all numbers" be strange in any case as meaning "proficient in all poetry," but the actual words in the mouth of a Latinist like Ben (who rarely in his prose at least writes two sentences without a classical allusion) are clear to any scholar. The phrase means "attained every sort of perfection"—that is to say, in the legal and public capacity of which Ben has just been speaking. Pliny has in this sense "omnibus numeris absolutus." Cicero has "Perfectus expletusque [Ben's very "filled"] omnibus suis numeris partibusque." Petronius has "omnium numer[or]um esset," in the sense of being perfect. Mr. Donnelly may say that he does not pretend to be a Latinist; in which case we can only reply that he will never understand a single page of Ben Jonson. But we repeat that we do not dwell on this.

Nor, once more, do we dwell on the significant fact that in appendices Mr. Donnelly (either fooled to the top of his own bent or bent on fooling others) openly adopts the great Mrs. Pott's view that Bacon was not only Shakespeare, that he not only wrote or had a hand in the writing of the works attributed to Marston, Massinger, Middleton, Greene, Shirley, Webster, "Ignoto," and others, but that he was Marlowe and Montaigne, and when in France entrusted (be it remembered he was a youth of nineteen when the Essais appeared) the Mayor of Bordeaux with their matter for first publication in French, and further hints his already generally known conviction that Bacon-Shakespeare-Montaigne-Marlowe-Marston-Massinger-Middleton-Shirley-Webster-Ignoto was also Robert Burton. This might of itself be sufficient to give pause; but we pass it by out of our abundance.

Yet, again, we only mention in passing, but do not lay stress on for the present, the fact that the wondrous tale evolved by Mr. Donnelly is a tale of successive cocks and bulls, containing absolutely nothing of any importance, but much silly scandal about Queen Elizabeth and other people, written, despite its Shakespearian words, in a style equally impossible to have come from the pen of Shakespeare and Bacon, and sometimes not Elizabethan at all—a production as damning in its way as the productions which certain Spiritualists have assigned to certain spirits.

Nor yet, again, shall we do more than glance at the certainty that the interpolation by a laborious process of cipher calculation of the words necessary to compose this Tale of a Tub in the greatest works of imagination to be found in any language would be a physical and literary impossibility; that the poet's eye, one moment in a fine frenzy rolling, and the next stopping its roll to calculate and according to that calculation to insert a vulgar jest at an actor, or a wordy account of some unimportant political intrigue, is not a thing found or to be found in rerum natura. This shall go, too, for the present.

338—32 = 306—50 = 256—30 = 226—50 = 176—163 = 13,

Yet we have enough left to show, and that in small compass, that Mr. Donnelly, if his general thesis had been probable, if his learning had been adequate, if his facts had been correct, if the story which he has evolved had been an important contribution to literature and to history, would still be out of court. It is simply this—that he has not complied with the conditions which alone could entitle him to serious consideration. He has himself the acuteness (for he is evidently no fool in one sense) to anticipate the objection that out of a vast mass of words containing great part of the dictionary, it is possible to construct a connected narrative of almost any tenor. But he replies, Yes, but not if you adopt fixed and known principles. Now this is exactly what he does not do. Either by accident or intention, he separates by a considerable distance two different examples of his cipher process. The first, already published long ago, and its faults noted by Mr. Proctor and others, is simple, and to some persons startling. It is this by which he gets the names Nicholas, Francis, Bacon, and so forth, out of the Merry Wives, and it is this which seems to have carried away Mr. Bidder, Q.C., from whom the publishers have received a curious kind of réclame, not, however, by any means unconditional. But the "great cryptogram," the source of the wondrous secret history, is quite different from this, and depends on processes, not only much more complicated, but the system of which is in part avowedly concealed, in part obviously arbitrary. Taking for "the heart of the mystery" the end and beginning of the two parts of Henry IV., Mr. Donnelly starts with what he calls the "Root-numbers" 505, 506, 513, 516, 523. But he "reserves the explanation" of the way in which they are obtained, for fear, he says, that other persons should anticipate him in working out the rest of the story. That puts him out of court, to begin with; for, until he shows how they are obtained (we could give a guess, but no matter) we are entitled to regard them as either arbitrary or selected for convenience only. Again, working on his two pages of text, he produces certain other numbers, which he calls "modifiers," forty-three in number, though some of them are duplicates. But he neither gives nor observes any uniform principle of applying these modifiers; which again puts him out of court. For it is hardly necessary to tell even a moderate arithmetician that, with a considerable number of figures, which you can add or subtract as you please, you may practically arrive at any result which is beforehand desirable. Yet again, not only are his "Root-numbers" chosen on a "reserved" principle, and his modifiers applied, as far as he shows, entirely at discretion, but he assumes two further liberties which absolutely destroy any certainty. In the first place, he moves from page to page backwards and forwards with the most Pelagian freedom, in order to pick out the word he wants; and, in the second, he allows himself to begin counting from the top, the bottom, or the middle, to count backwards or forwards, upwards or downwards, precisely (for aught he shows) as he pleases, or as the necessities of the story (a poor thing, but his own) require.

Now these things, we repeat, disqualify him for serious treatment. Webster's Dictionary is an excellent work, and one that Mr. Donnelly believes in, though, by not containing "bacons," it has put him at fault. We have not the slightest doubt that we or any one else with a tithe of Mr. Donnelly's industry, which is immense, and his head for figures, which is remarkable, could arrange, out of the pages of that work, a story (let us hope a little more interesting than his), and then, by choosing five root-numbers, a score or so of modifiers, a system of addition and subtraction à volonté, and the liberty of beginning where we like, ending where we like, going backwards or forwards, upwards or downwards, could exhibit columns of figures quite as imposing or quite as apparently exact as Mr. Donnelly's. But we should admit, what he does not, that, till we had set before our critics a uniform and rigid formula or key, no matter how intricate, without reserves and variations and go-as-you-pleases, the thing was naught. And naught so far, without even taking in all the other infinite objections to it at which we have glanced, is Mr. Donnelly's cryptogram.

ALPINE FUNERALS.

IN one of the most powerful scenes in Der Grüne Heinrich, Gottfried Keller describes the way in which a funeral used to be celebrated by wealthy Swiss peasants in remote country districts. The mournful hush of the first part of the day, the touching simplicity of the religious service, the sumptuous meal and heavy drinking that follow the return from church, and the wild dance that concludes the day are all depicted with a force and vividness which has rarely been equalled in modern fiction, and the impression is all the greater because the horror which breathes through the whole narrative is never allowed to degenerate into mere disgust. The dance is omitted in Upper Austria, but the other practices are perhaps even more ghastly.

In these districts it may almost be said that the funeral begins before the death. As soon as any man or woman is supposed to be in the last agony, not only all neighbours and friends, but perfect strangers, are informed of the fact and expected to pay a ceremonial visit. The guests simply enter the sick-room, take a long look at the dying man, and go their ways. No prayer is said, hardly a word is spoken; yet even the chance wayfarer who declines to enter the house of death on such occasions is considered strangely heartless. After death the stream of visitors ceases, but only for a short time. As soon as the body has been prepared for burial, a long table is spread in the room where it lies, and covered with wine, spirits, and cold viands of every description, and here open house is held day and night till the funeral starts for the churchyard. Whoever comes, known or unknown, rich or poor, is not only allowed, but urged, to eat and drink as much as he can. Beside the coffin at least two huge wax candles which have been fetched from the church burn dimly, and near them two old women sit or kneel. They are paid for their services and supposed to pass their time in prayer. From time to time they are relieved by others, and they then usually make a somewhat lengthened pause at the table before going home. After the return of the funeral the chief mourner invites every one who has attended it to a hot meal, which is as sumptuous as he can afford, and which usually ends in hard drinking.

Customs of this kind are not prevalent in Carinthia or Upper Carniola; funerals are there conducted with perfect quiet and decency. Yet in some observances one may find either the germ or the relic of much that shocks us in other districts. On the whole, the arrangements seem to be adjusted to the present religious beliefs and requirements of the community, and it is easy to see how they might degenerate into such excesses as have been mentioned. A simple account of a funeral in Carinthia will show this better than any amount of abstract argument.

As soon as the body has been placed in the coffin and the room put in order, the latter is thrown open to all visitors. In a Roman Catholic country it is natural that rich and poor should alike wish to say a few prayers for the soul of one who has been their friend, their companion, or their benefactor. Among the educated classes certain hours are appointed for the purpose; among the poorer it is usual to keep the house open day and night. During the greater part of the time the mourners pray silently, but at certain hours one of them repeats aloud the prayers, in which the others join. On leaving the room, each of the visitors is offered a piece of bread and a glass of wine or spirits, and the poor are apt to be offended if the offer is refused. Among a hospitable population this custom cannot be considered strange, but it must be confessed that, though the refreshments are usually consumed in perfect silence, it is open to abuse. Beggars will come six or seven times in the day for the sake of the dram with which their devotions are rewarded, and as it often happens that no member of the family is present, and as no one would like at such a season to be guilty of an ungracious act, it is very difficult to keep a proper check on such persons.

The native society of the Alps is somewhat peculiar in its character. The better class of the officials have, for the most part, been educated in the same schools, and many of them have there formed lasting friendships with each other. In later years they rarely meet, except at the annual meetings of the Societies of which they may happen to be members; but the old affection still remains unimpaired. When the news of the death of an old forester or priest spreads from valley to valley, it therefore awakens many kind memories of old times, and on the day of the funeral old companions will often come some thirty or forty miles, even when a railway cannot be used, to pay the last tribute of respect and affection to the dead. In the towns these visitors put up at different inns; only those who are very intimate with the family think of entering the house of mourning. At the appointed hour they gather outside the door, accompany the funeral to the churchyard, and on its return speak a few words of sympathy to the family. As a rule, no refreshment is offered them. Only the bearers of the coffin, who are usually either intimate friends or colleagues of the deceased, are invited to a cold repast, which does not last long. In a society at once so closely united and so widely scattered it cannot but happen that many old friends who have long been separated should meet on such occasions, and that, after the ceremony is over, they should gather in groups in the various inns. The very thought of the companion they have lost recalls memories of a less sombre character. Old boyish pranks are remembered and old hunting adventures retold, the wine flows freely; and, though the occasion of their meeting is not forgotten, its mournful character no longer casts a gloom over the whole of the conversation. In fact, when a respected citizen of any small town has been buried, a stranger who entered any of the chief houses of entertainment in the afternoon would fancy that a festival was being celebrated.

Now it requires no sagacity to see how these harmless usages, touching as some of them are, might develop into a lyke wake and a funeral meal. If the members of a family were particularly anxious that prayers should be said constantly beside a dead body until it was removed from the house, they would naturally supply something more than the customary bread and wine, and the delight which all peasants feel in display on great occasions would lead them to follow the bad example. In lonely houses and out-of-the-way places, again, in the days when railroads were unknown, some funeral meal must have been almost a necessity. One could not send strangers, who had come from a distance, empty away from a village in which there was no inn; and as soon as the invitation was given, it must, in the old times, have been almost impossible to prevent excess.

Such is the rationalistic explanation of the origin of usages which seem to most modern persons naturally repulsive. It is self-consistent, but we are far from being certain that it is the true one. The poorer and least educated classes are those in which the provisions for a funeral are most sumptuous; and it is among such that old customs linger longest. The expense of a funeral formerly was greater than at present; on what was the money spent? An examination of the archives of the province would probably supply a trustworthy answer, but who has the time, the knowledge, and the patience to undertake such an investigation? The general history of Carinthia is known. Few provinces of Austria are and have always been more liberal in the best sense of the word. The influence of the clergy is small, and the Protestant communities that are scattered here and there through the country, and have existed since the time of the Reformation, excite no animosity. If their young men and maidens have good voices, they often sing in the Catholic choir, and the priest invites them as readily as his own parishioners to lunch or afternoon tea, or, to be more exact, an afternoon coffee or wine. Now it is perfectly true that at present the clergy everywhere do their best to restrain all funeral excesses; but was it always so? There are facts which may be held to suggest, if not to justify, a doubt.

In the great springtide of the Reformation, Carinthia became almost entirely Protestant, to become Catholic again as soon as the great reaction set in. In Scotland, in Germany, and many other places, the mere wording of a dogma seemed to involve consequences in comparison with which mere life and death were unimportant. In the Alpine districts that border upon Italy and that had already drunk deeply, perhaps too deeply, of the new sweet wine of the Renaissance, the case was different. We have said too deeply, because in many of these Alpine valleys the germs of a truly original school of art seem to have been drowned by an overflow of works, far superior in technical execution to anything the native artist could produce, but still essentially foreign in conception. In such districts it was natural that theological dogma should appear less important than at Augsburg or Geneva. Carinthia was Protestant at one period and Catholic at another, much as an English constituency is Liberal at one election and Conservative at the next. The supreme indifference to dogma, which was universal among the highest minds and in the most highly cultured nations of Europe during the earlier part of the Reformation, is one of the facts which neither Ranke nor Macaulay seems fully to have realized.

But to return to our subject; in such a province as this which had been inundated by the new belief, and in which single congregations of Protestants still remained true to their pastors, it was natural that every effort should be made to avoid offence. Funeral excesses would be repressed, and the simplest forms permitted by the ritual adopted in this as well as other matters. The general tolerance of the eighteenth century would tend to foster such endeavours, and we should find, as in fact we do in Carinthia, a far nearer approach to Protestant forms of worship than is usual in Catholic countries.

According to the one theory, therefore, the simple and decent funeral customs of Carinthia are the germ from which usages neither simple nor decent have sprung; according to the other, they are relics of a past barbarism. We must leave it to the reader to decide which is the more probable.

AT NIGHT.

"ONE half of the world does not know how the other half lives" is as true of the world of the day and the night as of that of the poor and the rich. Most of us have a general idea that "some things—owls and nightingales, for instance—keep awake at night," and that, if one goes downstairs without shoes and stockings at night, one is "sure to come upon a cockroach"; but probably the majority of persons seldom give a thought to that other half of the world which takes up the thread of active life just where they had dropped it; whose doings fill in the interval between the first light in village windows and the first light of golden dawn; when the mushrooms are growing almost as fast as a snail can move, and countless creatures besides tramps and brownies come out from the corners where they had lain in hiding most of the summer day.

A dichotomous test would not meet every case, for the squirrel is probably the only British mammal whose movements are strictly diurnal; for the rest—foxes, otters, badgers, cats, hedgehogs, rabbits, stoats, weasels, rats, mice—all are night-movers more or less.

The movements of animals are largely determined by weather. The doings of the rabbit will show us this, if they are carefully noted, in such places as large garden lawns where rabbits are for the most part secure from attack. If the evening and night are going to be rough, rabbits will be out early in the afternoon feeding hard and keeping strictly to business; but in settled weather they will not venture out till later, and then vary their feeding with the most amusing races, somersaults, and gambols of every kind. On still nights every falling leaf and cracking birch twig serves as a reminder that there is safety in covert and that covert is near; but, a few paces off, when the wind is high such warning sounds are early lost, and so, cut off by the wind from home, they soon forget it, and scamper about with a reckless confidence which too often meets a sudden fall; for these are the nights beloved of rabbit-catchers, who then can fill their snares.

On quiet dewy nights you will find the hedgehog hunting the tennis-lawn for white slugs. They make interesting little pets, and we often bring one in to kill the blackbeetles in the kitchen; but after a day or two he disappears, and how he gets out no one knows.

Otters travel great distances at night, and there is scarcely a stream in the country, if any, which is not visited by them at times; for otters are much more universally distributed than is commonly supposed. A few weeks with the otter hounds make this point clear, and disclose the fact that they are familiar with the most various kinds of retreats. Eyots, old pollards, mill-wheels, outhouses—there is scarcely a spot which will not harbour them, from a town sewer to the thatched roof of a shed. Less perhaps is known about the habits of the otter, even by those who have hunted it for years, than of any wild animal we possess. It is, indeed, a beast that "gangs like a ghaist," that swims in water as though it moved in oil, and one that it takes a carefully practised eye to trace, even in the shallows, as it slips down stream.

Few of our larger night-prowlers are so difficult to follow, because few so strictly nocturnal, as the badger or brock. Indeed, where most abundant he is only seen at the rarest intervals, and then only, as he wends his slow way home in the grey morning light, by those who are up before the sun. He who would see and not be seen must climb a convenient tree some clear night in the breeding season, and must bear in mind that the senses of sight, hearing, and smell are wonderfully perfected in all night-moving animals, and that the badger is especially gifted in the two last named. The trouble will be repaid by a quaint natural drama, without other light than that of the moon, and with no orchestra but the grunts and squeaks of the queer performers. Evolutionally a modern, the badger is historically most interesting as seeming to take us back to days when the wild brown bear was hunted in this land. Systematists, guided chiefly by its dental formula, have placed the badger among the Mustelidæ, or weasels, whom undoubtedly it resembles in some points; but watch it digging about among the roots, scratching up moss and leaves and carrying them to its earth, and, when this is accomplished, moving off down the "ride" with slow, lumbering, plantigrade motion, and we can no longer doubt that its true place is near the bears. Like many of the bears, too, he loves honey. As the writer has reared and kept as pets a pair of badgers (which became so tame that they would sit up and beg, and scramble into his lap for food), he is in a position to assert that a certain unkind, if not invidious, saying is a gross libel on their kind. Most of the carnivora possess peculiar glands which emit a more or less powerful odour, strongly observable in the ferret and fox, but in the badger scarcely to be discerned at all. Meantime our badger is on the prowl, sniffing here, grubbing there, and so the night wears on, till the first streak of dawn finds him safe at home again. Safe! unless, indeed, his evil genius has forestalled him there; in this case, flying from a yapping terrier, he may tumble headlong into an open sack fixed in the mouth of the hole. For on the subject of the badger gamekeepers as a class are quite unteachable. He takes young rabbits as he takes anything else he comes across, but his very omnivorousness minimizes the harm he does; and if the keeper would leave the badger alone and turn his attention to the rats, his master would often have cause to be astonished at the increase of game upon his shoot.

For of your night-prowlers, the cat perhaps excepted, the rat is by far the most destructive to game, and, in that he destroys eggs, he is worse than the cat. He is an accomplished climber, will run about the henroost, carrying off half-grown chickens one by one; will take the eggs from under the sitting hen; will run along the top of the wattle hedge, dropping down ever and anon to plunder a partridge's nest; will draw the young rabbits out of the "stabs," and generally behave like the insatiate pirate that he is. And the cat? The cat—would it were not so!—goes wild for other game than common rats. And the passion grows with what it feeds on, till that day when pussy comes crawling home with a broken leg, if ever she return at all. A cat who has once taken to a wandering life can never be reclaimed.

If cats can fascinate their prey at any time, they surely can at night; for, in common with many other animals, their eyes shine at night with a strange light (produced in the carnivora by a luminous fibrous tissue) which may well hold captive their trembling prey. The eyes of the animals of the Mammoth Cave are either gone altogether, or functionless from disuse, for where no light is received no image can be perceived; but animals which move about much in dim lights (for night is never really dark) have just that power of vision which we day- or [illegible] creatures lack; and the eye of a cat will well repay a careful study, for a wonderful thing it is. In the eyes of owls the contractile iris is seconded by a mobile [illegible] which shades the glare of the sun. The popular idea that these birds cannot see in the daylight is a mistaken one; the tawny owl can fly about as easily in the daytime as in the night; the familiar short-eared owl is almost diurnal, and the hawk owl of North America is quite so. Further, the writer never sees a pair of caged snowy owls without being reminded of a lovely pair which haunted for some days his hunting-camp on the edge of a Canadian lake, and might be seen any time in the day circling round above the stunted oaks; while when night closed in, ever and anon one of these white visitors would flash for a moment into the light of the camp-fire, and then disappear like a ghost in the gloom.

There is something very beautiful in the soft, gliding flight of our English barn-owl as he skims along the hedge-side after mice. In captivity he scorns all friendly overtures, spending much of his time in blinking and swaying from side to side; he is not, in short, a responsive bird. The tawny owl, on the other hand, is easily tamed, and when at perfect liberty may be trained to fly down from his tree and take food from the hand; indeed, we have often called up a perfectly wild individual from the further end of a large wood by a careful imitation of his bold, clear hoot, and have then sustained a conversation for some little time from our hiding-place in the fern. The owl, fortunately for itself, still holds an important place in the superstitions of south-country folk, and it is very unlucky to kill one.

It is most interesting in summer-time to watch the bats as they start off one by one from underneath the tiles; their flight often arranges itself into an apparently set quadrille above the tennis-lawn, though doubtless the figure is ultimately decided by insects of one kind or another. You can distinctly hear the snap of the big noctules' jaws as they catch the cockchafers in the tops of the oak trees. The country people call them "flitter-mice," and a very happy name it is. The smaller bats are very apt to come flying into one's bedroom, attracted by the light; and when this happens it is always best to let things take their course, as any attempt at capture is certain to end in discomfiture and defeat. A naturalist could tell the date of the month within a little by the arrivals in his bedroom, without any other guide. Cockchafers, "old lady" moths (owlets the country folk call them, as opposed to owls), male glowworms, ichneumon flies, they all have their appointed times.

It is a strange impulse which leads Dytiscus, the great water-beetle, and others of his tribe to leave the water and fly about at night. Larval, pupal, and perfect, the early, middle, and later stages of life all have their being in the water; in that element lie all our beetle's seeming interests, his foes, his loves, his food; yet at night he must needs go gadding about in this upper world, blundering often, from the very ardour of his flight, into the most unsympathetic surroundings. Many a new hand at aquarium management has saddened to find his finest "beetles" and "water-boatmen" disappearing one by one, and has solaced himself with the reflection that "something must have eaten them—perhaps the effets!" Only the early housemaid, before "the family" are down, finds their dried forms beneath the mats, and sweeps "them beastly cockroaches" into her dustpan, with supreme disgust.

When does the common moorhen go to sleep? It may be seen feeding any time during the day, and all night long its short sharp call-note may be heard overhead; for the night has an electric effect on the moorhen; it is then that a bird that sustains all day the part of a diver that can scarcely fly pays all its return calls on friends in distant ponds and ditches. This, and a host of kindred sounds, are full of pleasant meaning to those who have learnt the country's lesson well.

THE TWO THOUSAND.

BACKERS who follow public form had not to think twice in choosing their champion for the late Two Thousand. The record of Sir F. Johnstone's Friar's Balsam far surpassed that of any other two-year-old in last year's Racing Calendar. He had won half a dozen races and walked over once, winning 8,666*l.* in stakes, and he had never been beaten, although he had met the best public performers of his year. Probably no two-year-old ever had a more brilliant career. It is true that The Bard, at the same age, won sixteen races worth 9,188*l.* without a single defeat, but all of them had been run in second-rate company. In the same year Minting won five races (including the Middle Park Plate) worth 7,396*l.*, likewise without defeat, and in some respects his two-year-old performances rivalled those of Friar's Balsam more closely than did those of The Bard, as he beat a better class of opponents. Friar's Balsam's appearance had been as much admired as his performances last season. He is a remarkably lengthy chestnut colt, with plenty of bone. His shoulders are powerful and splendidly shaped, and he has the long, muscular thighs which are of such importance in a racehorse. His breeding is exceedingly "fashionable," as racing men are wont to say, for he is by Hermit, out of Flower of Dorset by Breadalbane, out of Imperatrice by Orlando, out of a granddaughter of Emilius. Yet it did not please everybody, for there were those who said—it must be admitted with some truth—that, although the stock of Hermit, like their sire, could do wonderful things, they were not always to be depended upon, and they added that Flower of Dorset inherited a strain of blood that was even less to be trusted than Hermit's. Against this theory, however, was to be placed the fact that no horse had ever been known to run more consistently than Friar's Balsam throughout his two-year-old career. He had lately had a large abscess on the outside of his jaw, but it was said to be of no consequence, and 3 to 1 was laid on him at the start. During the greater part of the spring, the Duke of Portland's Ayrshire had been second favourite. He is a strongly-built, muscular bay colt; but, in the opinion of certain critics, somewhat short in the neck and forehand. So, at least, they said before the race. Last year, greatly as he was admired, many people considered him a little too "set" in his frame for his age, and when he appeared last month at the Craven Meeting it was not generally thought that he had made much improvement. He is by Hampton out of Atalanta by Galopin out of a Thormanby mare, and his granddam was by Stockwell out of a Touchstone mare. He has, therefore, three strains of Birdcatcher, three of Voltaire, and two of Touchstone blood within the sixth degree. Last season he won five races, worth 6,565*l.* He began his career by just missing the Whitsuntide Plate of 4,727*l.* by half a length from Briar Root, and in his second race he ran a bad third to Friar's Balsam and Seabreeze. After that he was never beaten. The Duke of Westminster's Orbit and Ossory, two colts by Bend Or, the latter of the pair being an own brother to Ormonde, were trained in the same stable as Friar's Balsam. Orbit, after a couple of defeats, had won three races at the end of the season; and Ossory had won the Criterion Stakes, the only race for which he ever started. Both of them had given decisive beatings to Johnny Morgan, who distinguished himself this season by winning the Leicestershire Spring Handicap from King Monmouth at something under, and from Kinsky, at something over, weight for age. Johnny Morgan, who belonged to the owner of Ayrshire, was also to run now. We treated at some length of Orbit's race for the Craven Stakes last week. The question was whether he won easily or with difficulty from the little-esteemed but very good-looking Cotillon. Mr. Vyner's Crowberry, a remarkably well-shaped chestnut colt by Rosebery, out of Lizzie Lindsay, although directly descended from Blacklock, had far more Touchstone and Newminster blood in his veins, as he inherited no less than four strains of the former and three of the latter. One of his feet was said by the hypercritical to be a little smaller than the other; but his action pleased everybody. He had won five races as a two-year-old, and against these had to be set four defeats, most of which were anything but to his credit. The morning of the day of the Two Thousand was rendered miserable by wind and dust, the afternoon by wind and torrents of rain. Everything looked dreary as the unusually small field left the Birdcage for one of the least valuable Two Thousands that has been contested for many years; but there was something worse in store. Just as the half-dozen competitors reached the starting-post, Cannon discovered that Friar's Balsam's mouth was in a very bad state. The little field was despatched at the first attempt, and Johnny Morgan went to the front immediately and made strong running for his stable companion, Ayrshire. Ossory was beaten on reaching the T.Y.C. winning-post, where Friar's Balsam was running very indifferently. At the Bushes, the Duke of Portland's pair were leading, and at a clear interval came Friar's Balsam and Orbit.

In going down the hill Orbit and Friar's Balsam were joined by Crowberry, and it soon became evident that the first favourite had not the ghost of a chance, as he did not show the least symptom of an inclination to make an effort to overhaul the leading horses. Just before reaching the Abingdon Bottom Ayrshire passed Johnny Morgan, and on ascending the incline he came away by himself and won, apparently with a great deal in hand, by a couple of lengths. If the Two Thousand was easily won, there was a remarkably pretty race for second, Johnny Morgan, Orbit, and Crowberry being separated by heads only in the above order. Friar's Balsam was a length and a half behind them, and Ossory was tailed off. When we consider that both Ossory and Orbit were many pounds better than Johnny Morgan last season, the position of the last-named horse in the race for the Two Thousand seems almost as great a reversal of public form as that of the favourite himself. Backers had already met with many serious reverses of fortune this spring, including the Lincolnshire Handicap, the Grand National, the Great Northamptonshire Stakes, the Leicestershire Spring Handicap, and the City and Suburban, all of which seemed bad enough at the time; but these minor sorrows sank into oblivion in the presence of the dire disaster of Friar's Balsam's defeat. So much for foregone conclusions on the Turf!

THE NEW INDIAN LOAN.

IN pursuance of what must now be regarded as its settled policy the Indian Government gave notice last year of its intention to purchase the Oude and Rohilkund Railway, and to carry out the purchase it this week invited tenders for a loan of 7 millions sterling, bearing interest at 3 per cent. per annum, the minimum price fixed being 96. The property is a valuable one, and must become more so as the country grows in wealth. The Government, being partner in the concern, has, therefore, acted wisely in deciding upon buying it, especially as just now it can raise money very cheaply. Every year the profits of the investment are likely to become larger, and, furthermore, the Government will be in a position to regard the true economic interests of the whole Empire more than can a private Company. It can also regard the entire railway system of India as one whole, and in so doing benefit the entire community. In raising the money it has decided upon bringing out the loan in London rather than in Calcutta, and, of course, there are special reasons in this case why it should do so. Buying a property from owners most of whom are resident in England London is the natural place in which to raise the money. Still, the loan illustrates very clearly the condition of the market just now, and, therefore, throws some light upon the much-debated question whether it is more advantageous for the Indian Government to borrow in India or in England. As stated above, the amount raised is 7 millions sterling, and the interest is 3 per cent., while the minimum price is 96. The average price at which the allotments were made was a little over the minimum, but even if only the minimum price had been obtained, the actual return upon the money invested would have been barely 3*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, or 3⅛ per cent. per annum. This is a lower rate of interest than is yielded by any of our Colonial stocks; indeed, there are only three Governments in the world—our own, the United States, and the Belgian—which can borrow on terms as favourable. The credit of Russia, if we measure it by the present Stock Exchange prices of its bonds, would enable it to borrow at somewhat over 5 per cent. at par; the Egyptian Government has this week brought out a Four and a half per Cent. loan for a little over 2¼ millions sterling at a price slightly lower than the minimum at which this Indian Three per Cent. loan is offered—namely, 95½ per cent.; and the credit of France enables it to borrow at about 4 per cent. The credit of the Indian Government in the London loan market, therefore, stands above that even of France, and ranks immediately after our own Government and the United States. Only in May 1886, barely two years ago, it brought out a Three per Cent. loan at 86, and the average price but slightly exceeded 87; while now, as we have just seen, it is able to fix the minimum 10*l.* higher than two years ago. Of course the improvement in Indian credit is partly due to the fact that the present loan adds nothing to the liabilities of the Indian Government. It is being raised, as we have been just explaining, for the purpose of buying a property which returns a very handsome profit, and which is likely to improve in the future. Partly, also, it is due to the extraordinary rise in prices consequent on the successful conversion of the National Debt; but mainly it is due to the great scarcity of sound investments and to the agricultural depression, which has lasted so long.

The last loan raised by the Indian Government in Calcutta bore 4 per cent. interest, and the minimum was about 97. Practically, therefore, the Indian Government is able to borrow in London at a rate 1 per cent. cheaper than in Calcutta, and at first sight this seems to prove that it is more advisable to borrow here than in India, for a government, of course, is bound to raise money where it can do so most cheaply. But it is to be recollected that the Government of India raises its revenue in silver; that it pays the interest on the debt borrowed in India likewise in silver, but that it pays the interest on the debt borrowed in London in gold. Now, as our readers are aware, silver measured in gold has fallen roughly about 25 per cent. during the past fourteen or fifteen years, and, therefore, there is not the saving which at first sight appears in borrowing in London. In other words, the loss by exchange in converting rupees into sterling money is so great that most of the advantage acquired by borrowing at a low rate of interest in London is lost. Still, there is some small advantage. And, furthermore, it is not to be lost sight of that, if the rise in the prices of sound investments which has been going on so long continues, it is by no means improbable that the credit of India in the London market will steadily improve. By-and-bye she will be able to convert her Four per Cent. and Three and a Half per Cent. Stocks into Three per Cents, and thereby effect a very considerably saving. But it is not so likely that she will be able to borrow at a much lower rate of interest than now in Calcutta for a considerable time to come. Nor must it be forgotten that the Indian Government is a borrower every year. If it were to draw entirely upon India it would be very likely to raise the rate of interest there against itself. India is a poor country, in the sense that its material resources are undeveloped, and its accumulated wealth small, and consequently it has not as much capital as it requires. If the Government were to meet all its needs by borrowing in India it would withdraw from the requirements of commerce the capital which it so sorely needs. It would, therefore, check the development of the Empire, and at the same time it would be likely to raise the rate of interest against itself. For all these reasons then—firstly, because it can borrow more cheaply in London than in Calcutta; secondly, because the scarcity of sound investments is constantly raising the credit of the Indian Government in London; and, thirdly, because of the need of more capital in India, it would seem better to borrow in London than in Calcutta. But there is another consideration which must be taken into account, and which alters very considerably the aspect of the case. The Indian Government has to pay in London about sixteen millions sterling, or a little more, every year on account of what are called "home charges." Now, every increase in the "home charges" tends to lower the Indian exchanges, and therefore to inflict loss upon the Indian Government. Merchants here in England have to remit very large sums every year to India. If there were no home charges those merchants would either have to send out silver or the worth of silver in the form of goods; but now, instead of sending out silver or the worth of silver in goods, they send out to the extent available bills drawn by the India Council upon the Presidency Treasuries in India. These bills, when presented by the persons to whom the English merchants owe money, are paid in India, and to that extent the export of silver and of goods from this country to India is checked. If the home charges are increased, the check to the exports from this country will be increased likewise. For example, this new loan of seven millions sterling, bearing 3 per cent. interest, involves an annual payment in London of sterling money of 210,000*l.*; and by so much, therefore, it will in the future increase the home charges.

The tendency, then, of borrowing in London is to lower the price of silver, and consequently to increase the loss by exchange from which the Indian Government suffers so much. India is now the one great consumer of silver, and everything which prevents India from buying silver tends to send down the price of the metal. As we have just been pointing out above, an increase in the "home charges" enables merchants to avoid sending silver to India; and therefore borrowing in London, which does increase the "home charges," enables merchants to avoid the expense of sending out silver, and consequently tends to lower the price of the metal. It is often argued by merchants and bankers that, nevertheless, it is better to borrow in London. We find from experience that, whenever the India Council draws a very large amount of bills—as it did, for example, in the last financial year—the exchange value of the rupee falls. Between the beginning and the end of last year the worth of the rupee in gold practically fell one penny, and this was mainly because the drawings of the India Council were so large. But as the India Council has to make the payments on account of the "home charges" every year, it must either draw bills for 16 millions sterling or over, or it must borrow in London, and thus put off drawing the bills. Merchants and bankers, therefore, often contend that it is better to borrow in London every now and then, and lessen thereby the amount of bills that have to be drawn, and so check the continuous fall in the rupee. Undoubtedly such borrowing has the effect of checking the fall in the rupee. In the present year this borrowing of seven millions sterling will probably enable the India Council to reduce considerably its drawing of bills, and if it does, it may be expected that the Indian Exchanges will rise, and with them the price of silver. But it must clearly be borne in mind that this is a temporary result. The permanent result of borrowing in London is to increase the "home charges," to compel the India Council consequently to draw more bills, and thereby to lower the value of the rupee, as compared with gold. The case, then, for borrowing in London rather than in Calcutta may thus be briefly stated. London is the greatest money market in the world, and India can borrow, for that reason, more cheaply in London than anywhere else; by borrowing in London she obtains command of European capital, which is sorely needed by her people, and her Government avoids the necessity of competing with its own subjects for the capital which they require. In addition to this, by borrowing in London the India Council is enabled to lessen every now and then its drawing of bills upon the Presidency Treasuries, and thus to check the continuous fall in the rupee. But, on the other hand, by borrowing in London the amount of the "home charges" is constantly increased. In the long run India must meet those "home charges"; she cannot always keep borrowing to provide for them; and, therefore, the India Council's drawings will, in the end, be all the larger for the increase in the London borrowings. From the point of view, then, of Government finance alone it seems clear that the advantage obtained by borrowing in a large market is dearly paid for when the ultimate result must be a further depreciation of the rupee; but, from the point of view of Indian trade, it may be doubted whether the depreciation of the rupee is not, to some extent at least, counterbalanced by the stimulus given to the exports from India. Every fall in the rupee tells as a sort of bonus upon Indian exports; and, in fact, that it is so we have the evidence in the extraordinary growth, of late years, of the wheat export trade from India. Probably the true conclusion to come to is that the Indian Government acts wisely in now and then borrowing in London, but that it would be rash to come to this market too often and for too large amounts.

THE PICTURE GALLERIES.

(Preliminary Notice.)

WE can give but a slight sketch of the Academy and Grosvenor, one which can hardly be called even general, until the New Gallery is opened. Both galleries are depressing, and the Academy is so on a colossal scale. A certain tendency to retrogression is visible in both; it is as if a last effort were being made to uphold the miserable ideals of painting which prevailed twenty or thirty years ago. In the course of correspondence and discussion in certain prints we have heard of late that foreign example is fatal to students; that the English school is being ruined by men who have learnt their craft abroad; that the English Academy schools are the one chance of salvation for the young. A strong effort has been made to prove these points by the selecting and hanging of these two important exhibitions. Though it can by no means be called a fair trial, since the hangers have been hostile and unsympathetic, we should think that the younger artists will be willing enough to abide by it. If ever proof were wanted that the so-called English school—[illegible] meaning the successful commercial speculators of the profession—had no traditions, no principles of treatment, and no efficient technique, here it is in abundance. It is seriously absurd that a set of men, because they have been well advertised among the vulgar, should call themselves the English school, and should resent the intrusion of French art, by which they mean anything that is worthy of being called art at all. The present Academy has gone back ten years; is it possible, or would it be wise, to confine English art any longer to the ideals which this retrogression favours? The Academy is evidently regarded as a mere market by many well-known artists, but it is a market in which it is very difficult to get a stall. The Academicians would do better if they would put up to auction a part of the line space now at the disposal of some twenty of their members, who cannot paint as well as the commonest student in Antwerp, Paris, or, for the matter of that, London. In reality it is no intrusion of foreign styles that we uphold, but the really sound, good art which has sprung up lately everywhere. Strong and subtle modelling, after all, and true and consistent tone were the material qualities out of which Rembrandt and Velasquez wove their subtle poetry of form and colour. The veritable renaissance which has taken place in this century really consists in the application of time-honoured principles of technical treatment to modern sentiments, modern subjects, and modern observation of nature. That the latest developments of this tendency should have been due, in our country as in every other country, to French influence need cause us no feeling of soreness. Art is a matter of give and take; we have given the French at other epochs as much as they give us now. Nor should we forget that some men—the late Fred Walker, Sir J. Millais, and Mr. Hook—have done pioneer's work before this tide set in, although neither in bulk nor in completeness of technique was their achievement sufficient to form a school. The present exhibition depends on Sir F. Leighton and Sir J. Millais, with Messrs. Hook, Holl, Tadema, Orchardson, and Dicksee, as far as the Academy is concerned. Outside the work of these and a few others we see nothing but the most childish incompetency in elementary technique, and even inside the list there is only too much clumsy fumbling and too much empty repetition of formulas.

There is really so much rubbish on the line that the eye becomes vitiated by the dreadful colour, the hard, stiff, uncomposed aspect of canvases which touch one another in long rows without a relieving break. Sometimes one has a run of bad luck, which goes as far as nine numbers without a decent picture. One is not surprised to find that the Hanging Committee have managed to burke most of the strong new work of the day. The rejection, or emasculation by skying, of anything that is vigorous has been carried out wholesale. The hangers have sought to honour the tamest and sleekest of those works which wear the modern garb detested of Academicians; they have given preference to those that conceal the personality of a pot-boiler beneath the dress of sincere art. Nevertheless, enough exceptionally fine work by foreigners and outsiders may be seen at a first glance to justify our contention that the Royal Academy is no fit school of technique for the young men of the present day. The boldest and most masterly of the large figure-pictures—"Niobe" (712)—comes from Mr. S. J. Solomon. We presume that neither in composition nor in handling would any one dare to say that Mr. Solomon has learnt anything from the Academy, still less that his work is in any way a derogation from their lofty example. We shall have more to say about this picture when speaking, later on, of large works by Sir F. Leighton, Messrs. Tadema, Goodall, Long, and others. Mr. Herkomer has not kept his place among the portrait-painters; he sends only one really fine work—"The Rev. the Master of Trinity College, Cambridge" (127); and Mr. Holl's numerous canvases have a rather mechanical air at first sight. The foremost place in this branch of art must be accorded to Messrs. Carolus-Duran and J. S. Sargent. The former's "Monsieur Pasteur" (153) is the finest example in the gallery of combined breadth and subtlety, delicacy and strength. Is any one really afraid that young men will learn to produce this noble, Velasquez-like style of modelling? Would that the danger were more imminent! But, as Berlioz answered, when Lesueur deprecated the multiplication of works like Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, "Rassurez-vous, on n'en fera pas beaucoup." When we see in so many portraits on the line an absolute incompetence to model, not with this magic of art, but with a common, decent, straightforward sense of reality, we need not trouble ourselves about the supposed ruin of an existing English school. If they cannot see the dignity of his style, the public are at least intelligent enough to perceive the subtle changes of plane which M. Carolus-Duran has indicated with such aërial softness in this head of M. Pasteur. Any one can feel his whereabouts all over it, can realize the exact distance from the eye to the ear, and can make sure of every plane in the delicate structure of the nose and forehead. Let any person spend a minute or so in this exercise, and then let him attempt the like with the works by Messrs. Ouless, Hodgson, Leslie, P. Morris, Long, and Fildes, which are near at hand. We hear, too, a good deal of babble about English colour, and confess that we see nothing special about it except occasionally a violent shock produced by want of tone. If colour be Mr. Pettie's excuse for a sacrifice of unity of tone in "Charles Wyndham as David Garrick," the excuse is worse than the fault. The landscape makes little show this year; though fine work will probably turn up in an examination of corners. The sculpture presents itself well on a first view, and its general arrangement is effective.

The Grosvenor strikes one as unusually dull. Further examination, however, reveals some good pictures and a certain variety of aim and style. The general appearance of the Gallery might have been more striking had the managers disposed to better advantage the pictures at their command. The centres of the two big rooms naturally fall to large figure-pictures, and artists have offered the Grosvenor a choice so limited as to make the present arrangement almost imperative. The places of secondary importance, however, and the line generally, have not always been adjudged to the pictures which present the most satisfactory ensemble, and that is what is chiefly wanted in conspicuous positions. Breadth, richness, unity of aspect, consistent dignity of style are qualities that should not waste themselves in corners, whilst false "chic" and stupid labour flaunt themselves on the line. For instance, three of the finest landscapes—Mr. Lemon's "Breezy Day," Mr. Hennessey's "Spring," and Mr. Leslie Thomson's "Morning"—might easily pass unobserved, and, at any rate, from their positions, are permitted to contribute nothing to the general aspect of the Gallery. Mr. Lemon and Mr. Hennessey send no other pictures; yet several painters who contribute many have received two or three slices of the line. Of course one expects the inevitable semi-official rubbish and the potboilers of renowned industrials to encumber the line; but, outside of these necessary sacrifices to the spirit of advertisement, the managers should have contrived to give their hanging a more serious air of impartiality. It would have been better for the appearance of their gallery had they apportioned the line more intelligently among various schools. Mr. David Murray appears on it with several out of no less than seventeen contributions; he deserves a share, but surely no more. Two or three piebald and stringy works by Mr. W. L. Wyllie might be spared from the line. But, after all, these two are comparatively good men, and the visitor will have no trouble in finding worse painters equally well placed.

It is fortunate that Mr. Clausen's "Ploughboy" (45) has received a good place, for it enables one to apply a right standard of technical accomplishment to other pictures. One often neglects Mr. Clausen's work in galleries, for it belongs to a style which, if not hit off to perfection, becomes intolerably dull. The present work is an almost perfect example of straightforward open-air realism carried out with a thorough mastery of technique. That it resembles Bastien-Lepage counts for little, because in these realistic, unimaginative works—the gymnastics of art, in fact—the difficulties have to be conquered afresh each time. They are like the "slow pull-up" on the horizontal bar—easy enough to understand, but always difficult to do. Any one with an eye may satisfy himself of the truth and unforced naturalness of these subtle reliefs and these delicate gradations of light and air. Here, again, is an example of the much-dreaded modern school, and an examination of any other figure-work in the Grosvenor will make one think it a pity that more ambitious painters have not studied in it to the same purpose as Mr. Clausen. He does not enforce his modelling with the magisterial style of M. Carolus-Duran, but he makes it sincere, realistic, and workmanlike. Some touch of his fine distinction of plane, his subtleties of form, would have done no harm to Mr. Hacker's large "By the Waters of Babylon" (93). This is one of the Grosvenor's trump cards; it fills the chief centre of the great room. Mr. Hacker has found a pleasant scheme of colour and an effective composition, but unhappily he employs the formula of a good style to cover mere emptiness and weakness. The drawing of the limbs is coarse, the interior modelling false. The legs of the near woman seem rudely hewn out as if by a village wheelwright, and the whole construction of the figures suggests bad and flimsy carpentry. We must leave mention of large subject-pictures by Messrs. Jacomb Hood, John Reid, and W. F. Britten to a later occasion. On turning to the following of Fred Walker, which has been so greatly recruited from Scotland, we find it in most cases without the delicate perception of relations and the workmanlike technique which distinguishes Mr. Clausen. Mr. E. J. Gregory's portrait of "Miss Mabel Galloway" (9) has a certain vigour about it and a certain richness of colouring, but its treatment is decidedly stupid in type. It has been conceived and put together piecemeal, and has been handled with a touch laborious and mechanical when not vague and sloppy. Strange to say, most of the firmness, definition, and "preciousness" have been expended on the accessories, so that the picture as a whole conveys little assurance of a human brain exercising the artistic faculty of selection. The school, with all its good qualities, might learn some true sense of style, some feeling for subtlety of modelling, some more artistic ideal than strenuous unthinking labour, by looking at such good examples of French art as may be seen this year.

FAITH IN HUMAN NATURE.

IT is now generally admitted that the great fault of democracy as a form of government is its difficulty. Political questions are usually complicated. Whether a particular line of policy is desirable or the reverse, whether a piece of legislation is expedient or not, are matters the decision of which ought to depend on long and nicely balanced reasoning. To hope for such from an artisan or labourer is absurd. But they are the electors, they have the power, and with them rests the direction of the affairs of State.

Decide they must, if not with the help of reason, then without it. And it is the principal business of professional politicians to assist our rulers in forming political opinions on what are necessarily insufficient grounds. With this object several ways have been devised. The commonest is to construct a short specious phrase which, without having any direct bearing on the matter in hand, has a general tendency to induce the electors to vote in the desired manner. Thus it was that Mr. Gladstone hoped to persuade people to adopt his Home Rule scheme by declaring that it was a question between the classes and the masses. Thus it was that Mr. John Morley attempted to discredit the cause of law and order by describing it as a policy of manacles and Manitoba, and instances from both sides of politics might be multiplied ad nauseam.

Besides these phrases which deal with some immediate political controversy, there is another class of plausible generalizations designed to establish the fundamental tenets of party creeds. Such generalizations are sometimes invented with this as their first and direct object. More often they are used originally to forward a particular measure; they are found efficient, they are employed on subsequent occasions, and gradually become, in the cant phrase of the day, the watchwords of the Liberal or Conservative party. In this way "Peace, Retrenchment, and Reform," on the one side, and "the Integrity of the Empire" on the other, were long the battle-cries of the two great factions. And so, in a lesser degree perhaps, "Trust in the People" and "Faith in Human Nature" are the phrases in which modern Radicalism believes. It must be allowed that our opponents are much more proficient in the art of phrase-making than we are. Their phrases are more numerous than ours; they are more alluring; and, above all, they have a kind of semi-religious twang about them which puts them out of the range of argument. No better instances of what we mean can be found than the two we have quoted. "Trust the People"! How grand it sounds! No suspicious holding back. No rubbish about expediency. Put your whole confidence in your fellow-countrymen. It is sublime, and none the worse for being a trifle vague. An even better phrase is "Faith in Human Nature." What an opening does it give for accusations that your adversary is "wanting in faith," a "cynic at heart"! With a very trifling ingenuity it can be shown that a man who does not believe in his fellow-men cannot really believe in anything; add a few misapplied texts and a good deal of muddy invective, and any aristocratic Tory can be proved to be a Machiavellian schemer, who is using the Democracy for the advancement of his own order. And yet "Faith in Human Nature," if it means belief that men naturally do right, is a doctrine absolutely at variance with the history of the world and the facts of everyday life. Ask a merchant or a lawyer what faith he has in human nature. He will tell you that, in spite of some brilliant exceptions, his experience is that the less you trust men the less you will have to regret.

Why, then, in Heaven's name, should politicians be required to do what lawyers and merchants would regard as the height of folly? The reason is obvious. The foundation of the Radical creed is that the majority is more likely to be right than the minority. Now, if men are on the whole bad and foolish, this proposition is in considerable danger. It is, therefore, very important to induce people to believe as far as possible that men are wise and good; and here the Radical propagandist is in a difficulty. With practice a man can persuade himself into believing anything. The White Queen was able to believe a many as six impossible things before breakfast. But to convince others, when all reason and experience is against you, that is a harder matter. It is, indeed, so hard a matter to persuade men that human nature is not inclined to evil that the most devoted adherent of Radicalism never attempts it. He prefers the easier course of obscuring his true meaning with a cloud of plausible, well-sounding phrases, and of abusing his adversaries if they decline to be his dupes.

We boldly say that we do not "Trust the People" in politics any more than we should in money matters. That is to say, we only trust those whom we know to be honest and intelligent. Nor have we "Faith in the Human Nature" of others any more—perhaps rather less—than we have in our own. Still less do we believe that majorities are always or frequently right. We cannot conceive how any reasonable man should so believe. History absolutely bristles with proofs to the contrary. But it does not, therefore, follow that decisions by majority are necessarily worse than decisions arrived at in some other way. Majorities have, at any rate, as good a chance of being right as minorities. Moreover, since political questions must be decided somehow, and those against whose opinion the decision goes are sure to be discontented, it is generally best that the discontented should be as few as possible. This seems to us the proper defence for the rule of majorities, and not sonorous phrases which are as pernicious as they are misleading.

THE STORY OF THE LONDON POLICE.

I.

SINCE the as good as enforced retirement of Sir Edmund Henderson from the Chief Commissionership—a circumstance esteemed by some a blunder amounting almost to a crime, and by others as a somewhat dubious public advantage—the Metropolitan Police has been, in colloquial phrase, "on its trial," and concurrently with the appointment of Sir Charles Warren to the command of the force came deep and loud complaints that an era of "dragooning" had dawned, not unsuggestive of the semi-military gendarmerie system which strikes the British traveller so forcibly as he promenades the Unter den Linden or the Nevski Prospekt. The turbulent proceedings in Trafalgar Square, fomented by the political party which has most frequently "had its knife into" the police, drew the attention of the whole kingdom upon the London force, and, together with the unfortunate blundering in connexion with the case of the young milliner, provoked a storm of angry criticism in the press and in Parliament; nor can it be said that certain recent isolated acts of the constabulary have been of a nature to restore public confidence in the conduct of the Metropolitan Police Force as a whole. Since 1852—when, speaking broadly, the existing system may be said to have first got into good working order—the population of London has almost doubled, and, although there has been what we must take to be a proportional augmentation of the Metropolitan Police, we fear that the public do not consider their lives safer or their property more secure than they were thirty-five years ago. Everything considered, then, there is reason to believe that some examination both of the protective and detective force, for whose support we pay so large an annual impost, will at least be interesting and possibly not altogether without useful result. We enter upon the subject in no carping spirit, and with every desire to place the whole question of the merits and demerits of the force fairly before the public, who, to a great extent, must be the tribunal to whose good sense and moderation we appeal.

The London police, as we know it to-day, is a body of comparatively recent growth, as a brief sketch—the merest outline—will show. Sixty years ago there was only one organization for police purposes in existence throughout the whole kingdom, the system then in vogue having, with very slight modifications, prevailed—though the fact is hardly credible—from Saxon times, and being the outcome of the original Decennary or Frankpledge. Under the Statute of Winchester (3 Edward I. c. 4) the inhabitants of towns were charged with the duty of keeping watch and ward, aided by a parochial constabulary force wholly and solely controlled by the Justices of the Peace, who performed both executive and judicial functions. With a purely local jurisdiction and gratuitous service, the condition of affairs in town and country alike can be easily pictured. Crime increased at an appalling rate, the better-educated men withdrew from the magistracy in disgust and shame, their places being eagerly filled by persons of a very inferior status or of no position at all, attracted by the considerable pecuniary advantages accruing from the office of justice of the peace; indeed, so gross was the corruption of the Bench that "trading Justices" came to be their general designation. A little short of a century and a half ago, however, things, having reached their worst, began to mend, the historic neighbourhood of Bow Street appropriately witnessing the earliest slight indications of reform. About the middle of last century presiding magistrates, receiving regular and fixed salaries, were appointed to Bow Street. This step was very successful, and soon the fame of the constables attached to that part of London spread far and wide, for they had no rivals in the detection of crime. A notable reform was the outcome of the Middlesex Justices Bill, which secured to the metropolis seven additional police-offices, each one being presided over by magistrates who attended to their duties with gratifying regularity. These officials were paid by Government, and were responsible to the Secretary of State. A remarkable improvement was noticeable in the judicial branch of the London police system; but the executive branch remained as unsatisfactory as before, no attempt even having been made to reform it; and meantime crime so increased by leaps and bounds that between 1772 and 1822 Parliament appointed no fewer than seven Committees of Inquiry. The evidence thus accumulated revealed a truly terrible state of things. Blackmailing (of which an echo reaches us now and again in these days) was generally practised by the headboroughs and beadles, by the petty constables and the watchmen. The rates increased also to such an extent that in some parishes they were "kept down" by the simple expedient of employing aged paupers as watchmen. In Camberwell these guardians of the night were armed with blunderbusses, and naturally spent most of their time in their boxes, out of harm's way. Worst of all as blackmailers were the deputy constables, who waxed fat by extortion, and are credited with all manner of vice. One of these constables was said to have "apprehended a man, to have drawn the brief for his defence, to have been the principal witness for the prosecution, and at the right moment tendered himself as a witness to the excellent character of the prisoner!" The beneficial results of the two first Committees of Inquiry were not very long in showing themselves; and as a first instalment of reform came the establishment of the Bow Street foot patrol, whose "beat" was restricted to about four miles of the roads leading out of London. This plan worked so well that, in 1805, it was extended by the formation of the Bow Street horse patrol, who, by covering from sixteen to twenty miles, checked, if not altogether stopped, the operations of the "knights of the road." The next step was the organization of the river police, on the same principle; and, in the year 1821, the system of street patrols was introduced by Lord Sidmouth. It is amusing to note that, up to 1822, the streets were patrolled only at night-time; in the day they were left to take care of themselves. That year is memorable for the establishment of the Bow Street day patrol—a step which we owe to Sir Robert (then Mr.) Peel, who, in 1828, he being then Home Secretary, procured for London the greatest boon of all—the formation of a department, under the immediate directions of the Secretary of State, which should discharge the police duties for the whole of the metropolis and its environs. The old organization was swept away by the Act 10 Geo. IV. c. 44, which placed the constabulary force of the metropolis under the sole control of two Commissioners appointed by the Crown; though from this wise arrangement the police of the City of London, the constables attached to the police-offices, the horse patrols, and the Thames police were, oddly enough, excepted. This reform was at first opposed with the utmost violence. The supporters of the new system, however, stood their ground. In 1833 the House of Commons appointed three Committees to inquire into the administration of the Metropolitan Police, and each of these courts pronounced in favour of the new system. Then came a cry from the provinces for reform, and in 1834 the Municipal Improvement Act authorized the formation of similarly organized bodies of police in all corporate towns. In 1839 the City of London put itself under the protection of the City Police; and the beginning of the year 1840 saw one authority (the Commissioners) ruling over all the London constabulary.

RECENT MATINÉES.

THAT peculiar form of entertainment, the matinée, which was scarcely known in England a few years ago, has now become a prominent, and even permanent, theatrical institution, and not a week passes but a new play is produced or an old one revived of an afternoon at some theatre or other. It really seems that now the invariable answer of managers to aspiring dramatists is:—"Put your piece up at a matinée, and I'll come and see it; I never read manuscripts." This leaves the "aspiring dramatist" no other alternative than to "put up" his play for an afternoon performance; and, if he vexes the critics by obliging them to pass half the day in a stuffy theatre, he unquestionably puts money in the pockets of members of the profession who might otherwise be out of employment. Of the number of new plays which have been produced within the past month few unfortunately are ever likely to see the footlights again. It really appears that in dramatic composition, as in everything else in this "run and rush age" of ours, folk, in their eagerness after fame and fortune, insist upon perching on the top of the ladder, without taking the trouble to ascend the lower rungs. The result in nine cases out of ten is utter failure, or at best merely ephemeral fame. The fundamental laws of dramatic composition, like those of all other arts, should be carefully studied before the writer begins to compose plays, so that at least symmetry and harmony be attained. Instead of this we see our young dramatists rushing in where, indeed, angels would fear to tread, and, regardless of the rules of dramatic construction and even of good taste, wasting both industry and talent upon what is foredoomed to failure for the want of a little knowledge and forethought. Carried away by their desire for immediate success, and possibly not a little by their vanity, they refuse to criticize their own work as severely as they certainly do that of their rivals. Assuredly were but they to put themselves, in imagination, "in front of their house," to use the technical term, and carefully watch a full rehearsal of their pieces, they would be the first to detect those errors which are so immediately discovered by the professional critics, and above all by the public.

Altogether, the most successful of the many matinée pieces which we have seen lately is Mr. Rutland Barrington's adaptation of the popular novel, Mr. Barnes of New York, which will shortly be revived at the Olympic Theatre. It has an interesting plot, which has been skilfully arranged for stage purposes. A powerful work, too, was Mr. Malcolm Watson's drama, represented for a single performance at the Prince of Wales' Theatre, called Held Asunder. It had the merit of possessing four or five scenes which were really admirably written, not only in a dramatic, but also in a purely literary sense; but Mr. Watson had not taken the trouble to lead up to them properly, and the result was they failed to produce the effect they ought to have done. At the Vaudeville, The Crooked Mile, by Miss C. Lemore, was played last week. The plot is involved and is not strikingly original, turning upon the well-worn theme of the troubles which befall an heir who cannot inherit his property because his mother's marriage certificate is missing. As was to be expected the lost document turns up in the last act, and the heroine who, to use the curious expression of one of the characters, has "mislaid" her reason, for a cause far too intricate to relate here, happily finds it again just at the right moment to enable her to assume a graceful attitude of recognition, with her arms round her husband's neck, and her children picturesquely grouped at her feet as the curtain falls. This piece served no other purpose save that of re-introducing to a London audience that general favourite Miss Bella Pateman, who acted most gracefully and forcibly as the lady with the "mislaid" intellect. An inoffensive little piece called Trespassers Beware, by Mr. Charles Thomas, was also produced last week. It relates how Mr. Orlando Arlington, a middle-aged clerk in the Audit Office, makes love to Miss Theresa Terebene, a lady of whom he has heard but never seen. She is purchasing a house up the river, and Mr. Arlington lands on the lawn by chance when on a holiday excursion. The lady orders him off her premises as a trespasser, but he very soon persuades her that he is "a trespasser of love," and the pair, after a great deal of sentimental talk, eventually become engaged. The dialogue of this trifle is remarkably smart, and it was well acted by Mr. Rutland Barrington and Miss Angela Fenton. As a burlesque of a modern transpontine melodrama nothing could be funnier than Mr. G. W. Reynolds's "drama," entitled Church and Stage, which has occupied the Avenue Theatre during several afternoons this week. Unfortunately, we fear Mr. Reynolds intended it to be very serious, and that he is not the wag some people credited him with being. All we can specially commend him for is the ingenuity with which he has contrived to link together episodes and situations taken from scores of old-fashioned dramas with the very trashiest and silliest dialogue imaginable.

Messrs. R. C. Carton and Cecil Raleigh's three-act farcical comedy, The Treasure, which was produced at the Strand Theatre on Tuesday, is decidedly clever. It is avowedly a skit on the very kind of melodrama of which Mr. Reynolds's Church and Stage is a masterpiece. The scene takes place in a moated grange formerly the property of the late Colonel Poingdestre, whom we are given to understand has come by his death mysteriously, and left a strange will to the effect that none can inherit his property who is not single at the time the will is read. The treasure is known to be hidden in a deserted chamber, and everybody is bent upon stealing it if possible. Unfortunately all the heirs, unknown to each other, are clandestinely married. Captain Poingdestre, the villain of the piece, has just returned from America, in which continent he has left a most undesirable record of his existence, and is, moreover, running away from his beautiful wife, who is a tamer of wild beasts, and known from 'Frisco to Sandy Hook as the "Tiger Lily." Unluckily for him, he has scarcely passed a day in his old home ere a strolling photographer—a burglar in disguise—recognizes him as an old "pal" in many a nefarious proceeding in the United States, and forthwith blackmails him by declaring that if he does not assist him in obtaining the treasure he will expose him to his relatives. The Captain is perforce obliged to assent, and he has barely done so ere the "Tiger Lily" herself puts in an appearance. She has come over to find her recalcitrant husband, and has obtained the position of companion to the niece of the late Colonel. After this the fun grows fast and furious, and when the authors have toned down some incidents which are too forced, their comedy should have a prosperous career.

The Barren Land, by Mr. Henry Byatt and Sir William Magnay, produced last Wednesday at the Olympic, is an interesting play, well written, and replete with telling incidents and smart dialogue. The plot treats of the love of two sisters for the same man, and, although certainly not a new one, the story is elaborated in a novel fashion. The acting was far above the average of ordinary matinée performances, especially to be commended being Mr. Fuller Mellish, who acted with dignity and refinement.

A FEAST OF MEMORIES.

["Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Parnell met on Monday night at the dinner-table of Mr. Armitstead, formerly member for Dundee. The other guests were Mr. John Morley, Mr. J. E. Ellis, and Mr. Herbert Gladstone."]

"O DOTH not a meeting like this make amends?"
(Mr. Arm-tst-d thought, most obliging of hosts)
"If gaoler and prisoner but kiss and be friends,
And will each pledge the other in flattering toasts.

"Ay, surely! a meeting like this might atone
For the mutual wrongs of my excellent guests,
For the blows that were struck and the mud that was thrown,
For the fiercest attacks, the most stern of arrests."

Yes it might—but yet, somehow it didn't, I hear,
For the guests, though they kept their engagements as fixed,
Were aware, with the toasts and the songs drawing near,
That the whole situation was horribly mixed.

And when Gl-dst-ne arose something pretty to say,
Not a compliment came; but, like Balaam reversed,
To his host's and J-hn M-rl-y's unbounded dismay,
Instead of pronouncing a blessing, he cursed.

Some power irresistible mastered his tongue,
Some hand on the present the curtain let fall;
And he stood, once again, London's burghers among,
As he stood seven autumns ago at Guildhall.

Once again civic praises rang sweet in his ears,
And filled him and thrilled him with jubilant pride;
Once again, 'mid a fancied tornado of cheers,
He denounced as a traitor the man at his side.

Once again the piratical march he arraigned
With its highway of rapine and treason its goal;
Once again from his lips with elation unfeigned
Did those boastful, those mem'rable sentences roll—

" Not alone by mere words, I would have you to know,
Do the Government seek to restore to their sway
Civil rights and our law. The inveterate foe
Of that law and those rights was arrested to-day ! "

The illusion, in short, was so strangely complete
That, entirely unconscious of anything wrong,
Mr. Gl-dst-ne proposed, on resuming his seat,
That " his friend Mr. P. should oblige with a song."

But P-rn-ll was by just the same demon abused,
And the devil a stave did the summons procure
But some half recollected, or wholly confused,
Or at least most unsuitable snatches of Moore.

" You'll excuse my rememb'ring the days of old "
(He sang, though it seemed to pain um)
" When my friend of to-night of my collar got hold,
And gave me six months in Kilmainham."

Mr. Gl-dst-ne's response was a dubious cough,
And, hardly approving this choice of a stave,
He vainly attempted his friend to start off
On " Remember the breeks of O'Brien the brave ! "

But no; his own memories pleased him the most;
He remembered so much that they hoped he'd forget,
That at last, in alarm, their obsequious host
Made them join in performing this friendly duet.

BOTH.

" Come, send round the wine and leave questions of creed
To the Unionist prigs whom such crotchets amuse,
Men bent on one object and vowed to succeed
May contrive to get on very well without views."

My / Your } hands may be dirty, and yours / mine { may be red;
But, while each pulls an oar in the Sep'ratist boat,
'Twould be highly absurd, nay, extremely ill-bred,
Such trifles as these too minutely to note.

Shall I / Should you } ask a stout backer what company shy
He has met at the Yankee's convivial board.
Shall I / Should you { fear to hob-nob with a sturdy ally
Because he's rubbed shoulders with Eg-n and F-rd ?

The " brave little woman " ? Well, some would, we know,
Draw the line at the friends of that murderous miss;
But I / you { ? No ! a fig for the fools who'd forego Place, power, and revenge for such scruples as this !

REVIEWS.

CORRESPONDENCE OF HENRY TAYLOR.*

THE Autobiography of Sir Henry Taylor which was published three or four years ago will have caused nearly all its readers to feel an interest in his remarkable and attractive character. The present volume ought, as the editor suggests, to be regarded "as a companion volume to the Autobiography." Mr. Dowden agrees with Sir Henry Taylor in preferring a correspondence or exchange of letters to a collection of letters written by only one of the parties. One of the many merits of Boswell consists in his practical anticipation of Taylor's sound doctrine. The tone and manner in which a man is addressed by his friends are as instructive to a student of his life as his own communications; and where, as in the case of Henry Taylor's friends, the correspondents were themselves for the most part eminent and able, their letters have an independent interest of their own. "Not only," says Henry Taylor in a letter to Lady Minto, who was then writing her admirable Life of Hugh Elliot, "is the interweaving of personal interests to be considered, but also the effect of variety, and, as to the letters, even if those the man has written be better worth reading than any he has received (which will not always happen), still they will be read with more pleasure occurring among others than in a simple sequence." His own preference for a two-sided correspondence was not the result of indifference to the art of letter-writing. He professed to write a letter as deliberately and carefully as if he had been composing a sonnet, and many of his letters were more or less definitely intended for eventual publication. The present collection, and many other letters which have been excluded for want of space, were shortly before his death selected by himself; so that, according to the editor's statement, "nothing in the present volume occurs without Sir Henry Taylor's sanction." He adds that "the selection of letters has been made not from a mass of inferior matter, but from matter in the main like in character to that which now lies before the reader, and of like interest." As the Autobiography shows, Sir Henry Taylor was fortunate in friendships, as in all the other circumstances of his life. His early and surprising accession to a not unimportant office led to a close intimacy with the best of his colleagues and superiors in the Colonial Office. The earliest, and perhaps the nearest, of his friends was Mr. Hyde Villiers, then a clerk in the Office. Through him Taylor became acquainted with other members of the same distinguished family, and one of them, Mr. Edward Villiers, filled in a degree the void which was caused by his brother's early death. Through this connexion Taylor was admitted to the circle of Benthamites, as he called them, including John Mill, Strutt, John Romilly, John and Charles Austin, and some of their contemporaries. Sir George Trevelyan has described with his usual felicity the society of able and zealous young Liberals, including the subject of his own narrative as an occasional and outside member. None of them could be compared in brilliancy with Charles Austin, the only person who seems to have exercised considerable influence over Macaulay. Henry Taylor had one or two opportunities of introducing to his friends no less strange a visitor than Wordsworth, with whom he had from his youth been acquainted. They were all delighted with the conversation of the poet, and, when he left the room after his first visit, Charles Austin said, "That is a man." Taylor himself was not a Benthamite, nor, except in common with his own official duties, was he at any time a politician. His opinions, when they were occasionally formed and expressed, were mildly Conservative, but he was accustomed to guard himself by a statement that he knew little or nothing of politics. Perhaps the ablest of all the friends whom he acquired at the Colonial Office was Sir James Stephen, and his letters, published in the present collection, are only too few in number. His writings, though they have great value, would scarcely suggest the gracefulness of his style as a letter writer. If it were necessary to classify the contributors to the compilation, Sir James Stephen might fairly claim the highest place. The [illegible] to Sir Frederick Elliot, who [illegible] belonged to the Colonial Office and who remained through life a valued friend, introduced Henry Taylor to the Elliot family, with some of whom he formed the closest intimacy. Frederick Elliot's niece, the late Lady Minto, was in her childhood an object of his affectionate interest, and he earnestly defended Admiral Charles Elliot, Sir Frederick's elder brother, when he was attacked for his conduct at the outbreak of the [illegible] China war. None of his colleagues in the Colonial Office ranked higher in his estimation than Sir Frederick Rogers, now Lord Blachford. It was no small part of his good fortune that he was brought into official contact with so many remarkable associates, but his relations with them and their families showed that he had a genius for friendship. His public services and his personal character were appreciated by many of the six-and-twenty Secretaries of State under whom he successively served. Almost the only chief whom he disliked was the late Lord Derby, who seems to have treated, not only Taylor, but Sir James Stephen, with ill-judged neglect. With Lord Grey and Lord John Russell he formed friendly relations which long survived the [illegible] al connexion. Mr. Spring Rice's short [illegible] of the Secretaryship of State produced an acquaintance [illegible] brought Taylor the inestimable advantage, as he deemed [illegible] a happy [illegible] re. From that time his wife's kinsman, Mr [illegible] ey de V[illegible] e the nearest of all his friends. The two [illegible] sincerely [illegible] dially appreciated one another's productions, and [illegible] cussions must have provided them with subjects [illegible] inexh[illegible] interest to both. James Spedding, almost the only other lit[illegible] rrespondent who helps to furnish materials for the present volume, had also served for a time in the Colonial Office. Taylor was perhaps alone among Spedding's friends in approving the sacrifice of his entire life to the vindication of Bacon. It may be conjectured from some of Spedding's letters, which are now published, that he, too, at last, became dimly conscious of a partially wasted life. When his task was accomplished he seems to have persuaded himself that he had not devoted his earlier and later years to the vindication of Bacon's character. "It has been," he says, "my intention throughout to refrain from praise and censure alike, and I wonder how it is that people have come to the conclusion that I am an admirer of Bacon's character at all. I have certainly nowhere in this book professed any such admiration as should preclude the supposition that I disapproved of many of his actions, and even dislike many of his qualities. But my business is to tell the story, not to deliver a moral lecture upon it." The story would have been worth little without the moral lecture, if indeed the summary of the greater work, the Evenings with a Reviewer, were not rather a masterly forensic argument or an elaborate apology for Bacon's career. A historian or biographer scarcely deserves the name if he contents himself with recording facts while he leaves their appreciation to the uninformed reader.

Mr. Dowden has judiciously inserted one of Henry Taylor's letters to Southey which must have covered many sheets of paper. He was then twenty-five years old, and he had but lately emerged from the studious solitude of his Northern home. It is not surprising that the letter exhibits the pedantry, the solemnity, and the presumption of youth. As he assures his correspondent, who was then at the height of his literary reputation, "it is impossible that you can be aware of the irrefragable nature of the proofs whereupon the principles of Political Economy are founded." The charge was not unfounded; but it sounds strangely as a warning from a disciple to his master. In another letter Henry Taylor gravely advises Southey to leave off political writing. Not long afterwards he had shaken himself free of didactic stiffness, and he had probably learned that veteran writers are not easily persuaded of their incompetence to deal with their favourite topics. The letters of his maturity and old age are easy and natural, and those especially which are addressed to women are often agreeably playful. He had little sense or faculty of humour, which indeed would have been less valued by the same class of correspondents. Some of his friends persuaded themselves that the Sicilian Summer, first published as the Virgin Widow, was a light and amusing comedy. It was, in truth, a mere imitation in style and language of the obsolete Elizabethan dialect and manner, and there is no passage in the play which would be likely to produce a smile. Fortunately one great literary achievement more than compensates for many partial failures. Henry Taylor's fame will rest on Philip Van Artevelde, which retains its deserved popularity after the lapse of sixty years. There is an interesting letter in which Macaulay, who was generally ignorant and contemptuous of the poetry of his own time, urges Taylor to select the history of Mary Queen of Scots for his next historical drama. The subject would have been in all respects preferable to Edwin the Fair, but the history would perhaps have been too well known for adaptation to purposes of fiction. Scott, indeed, has reproduced with admirable skill the imprisonment of Loch Leven; but his genius was peculiar to himself. Henry Taylor had little gift of delineating character, and it is difficult to take interest in episodes of English history before the Conquest. He pleased himself with the fancy, that in some of the personages of the drama he had represented the characters of his friends; but few of his readers could readily remember the [illegible] between Earl Athulf and Earl Leolf, who was supposed by the author to be A[illegible] Earl Leolf's garrulous chaplain, Wulfstan the W[illegible], is m[illegible]ly [illegible]ized as a caricature of Coleridge, [illegible] characters were not the happ[illegible] Taylor's g[illegible] Taylor himself had the good taste to p[illegible]er St Clement's [illegible] his [illegible]mas, with the exception of Philip van Artevelde. It seemed that his inspiration flowed more [illegible]ly [illegible] revert[illegible] to [illegible] and [illegible] chronicles [illegible] sense and his equable temperament [illegible] him from [illegible] disappointment of authors who [illegible] occasionally [illegible] When Philip Van Artevelde [illegible] famous, he [illegible] a wholesome pleasure in his triumph, [illegible] the cold rec[illegible] of his later works. He [illegible] the [illegible] of his friends [illegible] independent of his popularity. Ev[illegible] as literary [illegible] they would find in a drama which might be defective as a whole much of the imaginative th[illegible] and gnomic wisdom which had contributed t[illegible] the excellence of Philip Van Artevelde. Inde[illegible] [illegible]lfs and the Athulfs and Philip himself were in their re[illegible] no [illegible]er than Henry Taylor, and [illegible] contrib[illegible] the sententious harangues [illegible]

* Correspondence of Henry Taylor. Edited by Edward Dowden. London: Longmans & Co. 1888.

[illegible] which refer to current po[illegible] the projects of Parliamentary reform [illegible] the govern[illegible] Ireland. There are also [illegible] strictures by [illegible] on the anti-Turkish agitation which preceded and perhaps caused the Russian invasion. On the only public questions of which Sir Henry Taylor professed spec[illegible] knowledge he shared the opinions which were held by nearly all statesmen connected with the colonies fift[illegible] or twenty [illegible] ago. His [illegible] in the Office were, like himself, [illegible] to [illegible] country [illegible] the burden of em[illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] solve the connexion [illegible] popular [illegible] which [illegible] not be [illegible] been an unwor[illegible] whether it could [illegible] the [illegible] Minister who was avowedly disposed to encourage [illegible] Lord Granville; and it was in his administration [illegible] Governor-General of Canada originated the opposite policy. As long as Henry Taylor took official part in colonial affairs, he adhered to the less ambitious doctrine, and it appears from the correspondence that his able colleague Lord Blachford agreed [illegible] theory, though he might have hesitated as to [illegible] application. The controversy, or rather the one-sided d[illegible] is only w[illegible] th notice on the present occasion because [illegible] public affairs are not altogether excluded [illegible] correspondence. It was natural and right th[illegible] personal interests should take pr[illegible]

NOVELS.*

In White and Gold may be described as a woman's novel of the conventional type. The old county family, the old family mansion, the eccentric Sir Fairfax, who dies leaving an enigmatical will and an illegitimate son; the lady who marries a man whom she believes to be a thief under the impression that, as his wife, she will be unable to give evidence against him—all these are familiar to the student of fiction. At the beginning of the story we find Colonel Raymond Earle in possession of his ancestral mansion, whose corridors have "dark-polished floors and panelled walls, half-hidden by a wealth of ancient armour." His daughter, Mrs. Ker, a widow with one child, is the person from whom the book takes its name. The white is her complexion and the gold her hair and eyes. They live together, and are visited by the Colonel's nephew, Captain Anthony Earle. "Mr. Philip," the late Sir Fairfax Earle's illegitimate son, acts as bailiff to the estate. Colonel Earle is mightily disturbed in his mind; for Sir Fairfax has left his estate and fortune to him; but the fortune cannot be found, and for want of it the house is falling into ruin and the owner into bankruptcy. He is convinced that it is hidden somewhere in the house, but fails to find it. One night there is a terrible storm; part of the house is struck by lightning and falls with a crash. Mr. Philip appears and prophesies woe in the manner of Solomon Eagle, and a strange sort of game at hide and seek goes on during most of the night. Next morning a certain Captain Brassington, who is staying in the house, points out that a cavity, disclosed by the fall of the walls, must have been the hiding-place of the treasure; but the treasure is not there, and no one can tell whither it has gone. Suspicion falls on Anthony, Colonel Earle's nephew, and when from a poor man he turns into a comparatively rich one, and pays his debts with bank-notes which have been traced to Sir Fairfax, a strong primâ facie case seems made out against him. As Colonel Earle fails to find his property, he is compelled to let the great house and retire to a cottage in the neighbourhood, where he and his daughter live in a humble fashion. She is proposed to by every marriageable male person in the book; which considerably enlivens existence in the cottage. She thinks, as all women do in their hearts, that tea is the pleasantest meal, and tea-time the pleasantest time in the day; and shows her appreciation thereof by a tea-gown of "loose white velvet," a considerable extravagance, we should think, for one of a family whose united income amounts to 200*l.* a year, especially for "a woman whose heart is withered, and can never again put forth the blossoms of love and joy." When they are reduced to the lowest depths of bankruptcy and the cottage, she walks out, "wrapped from throat to feet in a handsome coat of gold-brown plush, with a small toque of golden-pheasant's feathers surmounting her bright hair." After this, what terrors can poverty have for any woman?

The interstices of the plot are liberally filled up with love-making. It has been observed of Miss Austen's novels that she describes the conversation of women with women, and of men with women, but never that of men with men. Mrs. Williamson is not so discreet; she describes two young men, perfect strangers, meeting on a country road in the dark—one of them escorted by a groom with a lantern, as if he were a girl—and immediately beginning to talk about love affairs. When one of them observes, "We are talking like a couple of schoolgirls," the other stoutly maintains, "I don't see why one should be afraid of sentiment. It is, after all, the one thing which makes life so full of interest. . . . Miss Lilias—oh!" Possibly women talk to one another in this strain; we can assure Mrs. Williamson that men, as far as our experience goes, never do. Nor do gentlemen say to ladies, by way of leading up to proposals of marriage, "I would rather be the slave of a Messalina than be adored by all the colourless saints in history." The utterer of this outrage "eliminates a plot." And we doubt whether a man in the country can telegraph for a special licence one afternoon and be married, not in his own parish church, next morning.

The Devil's Die, by the indefatigable Mr. Grant Allen, strikingly exemplifies several of that writer's good and bad qualities. It is a novel with a purpose—indeed, with more than one purpose—and there comes a page at which the novel ends and only the purpose remains. Even Shakspeare could not make the fifth act of Julius Cæsar as interesting as the third, and the surprising thing about The Devil's Die is, not that it should become flat after the grand climax of horror—Harry Chichele's death—but that there should be so much of the flatness. The first few lines introduce us to a Mohammedan doctor, one Mohammed Ali, M.D., who arrives at a Cornish village with a rattlesnake in a box. We expect great things from that rattlesnake, but nothing ever comes of it, and it is merely dragged in by the head and shoulders in order to introduce the story of the jealous Begum of Lucknow, who immured the slave-girl of whom she was jealous in a vault, and had her own bed placed immediately above it, that she might not miss hearing one of her starving victim's groans. This story is, we believe, perfectly true; but surely no Hindoo scheme of metempsychosis would include a *rattle*snake as a soul's possible lodging, for the simple reason that rattlesnakes are unknown in India. This snake, it seems, is brought by Mohammed Ali as a present to his friend Harry Chichele, a medical man like himself, whose spécialité is poisons and disease germs, bacilli, fungoid sporules, and so forth. They see a most eccentric yacht, flying an entirely novel signal of distress, although we learn that there are plenty of flags on board. The two doctors find that this vessel is plague-stricken with cholera. As the local fishermen put her in strict quarantine, they establish themselves on board. She is wrecked, but they rescue one patient, a young artist, and all three are quartered at the village rectory, where they all simultaneously fall in love with the Rector's daughter, Olwen, and Harry Chichele marries her. Mohammed, from the first, assumes that it is quite out of the question that he should marry a white woman, and complains that while his European education has unfitted him for life in the East, his colour causes him to be treated as an outcast in the West. We think that too much is made of this. Such a man as is here described, a rich, good-looking, highly-cultured Mohammedan gentleman of pure Arab descent—a man after Canon

* In White and Gold. By Mrs. F. H. Williamson. London: Hurst & Blackett.

The Devil's Die. By Grant Allen. London: Chatto & Windus.

Taylor's own heart—would be able, we imagine, to marry whom he would. After Olwen's marriage there appears on the scene one "Seeta" Mayne—what could her godfathers and godmothers have been thinking of?—who is described as a great beauty, a brilliantly successful novelist, and a person who despises the conventionalities of society. Her tirades are somewhat dull, and very long; but she takes entire possession of Harry Chichele, body and soul, and so the final catastrophe is brought about. Harry is the direct descendant of the "Begum," and, by the doctrine of heredity, has inherited her utter absence of conscience and disregard of human life when it stands in the way of his schemes. We shall tell no more of the plot, which really is a thrilling one, though, as is remarked by the writer of the Tramp Abroad, we "would have a speaker (or writer) stop when he is done," and not drag his unhappy example of racial hatreds through a waterless sage-bush desert, another shipwreck, and countless insults and brutalities inflicted by Americans of all sorts and conditions, which, besides being surely more than ever fell to one man's lot, do not get the story the least bit "forrarder." "Seeta" Mayne has a brother, a brainless, gambling, nigger-despising British officer, who alternately insults Mohammed and grovels before him; for he is in debt to Mohammed's father, a native banker, and Mohammed magnanimously pays his debts to save Seeta from being blackmailed by him. Altogether, such an impossible monster of unselfish virtue as Mohammed has seldom been met with, even in a novel; yet, in spite of our difficulty in accepting him as a conceivable person, the book is readable.

BOOKS ON PHILOSOPHY.*

THE temptation to which most critics and annotators of Kant seem ever likely to succumb is that of reading into his philosophy what is not really there. They keep perpetually painting their idol to ensure that its worship shall not cease. If they would only admit it, Kant is useful to them merely as a starting-point. Quite enough reverence and assiduity has been given, both in Germany and in this country, to the work of a man who still requires to be interpreted. It would be unfair to accuse Dr. Kuno Fischer of being a special sinner in this respect; but it would be idle to deny the fact that he, like the rest, is apt to create a Kant of his own, by no means corresponding exactly to the philosopher of Königsberg. The value of his work, however, lies in his acutely critical investigation of those points in Kant's system which have proved the greatest difficulty to students. So we are not surprised to find that, before we have turned over a dozen pages of the present Critique of Kant, we come to the old question of the "given" in experience. Not too successfully Fischer endeavours to support his master's position in this matter. "We must distinguish between phenomena and things in themselves with the utmost precision, regarding every attempt to unite the two as the cause of irremediable confusion. Now, because the objects which relate themselves to the thing-in-itself, or the relations which the latter sustains, are so numerous and so unlike, we see why the thing-in-itself appears in Kant's teaching in so many and different connexions. For it is the supersensible substratum at once of our sensibility and of the whole constitution of our knowing reason; hence it is the hidden ground of all phenomena, the objective as well as the subjective, and therefore the substratum of the entire sense-world" (pp. 27, 28). The more closely we examine such sentences as these, the more clearly does the underlying fallacy show itself. What is this thing-in-itself, and why are we compelled to believe in it? As to the latter part of the question, it would seem as though our belief was necessary only to round off the philosopher's system. At another stage of his work he introduces his transcendental Ego, which is equally outside of, and yet apparently essential to, all experience. And what this Ego is on the side of the subject he wishes to make the thing-in-itself on the side of the object. Then as to the first part of our question—the nature of the thing-in-itself—we get no satisfactory answer. Indeed, we can expect none; for how can we get definition or explanation of that which is ex hypothesi beyond both? True, Kant says that it is "the true correlate of our ideas"; but that scarcely explains anything. If we have to go beyond thought for this "true correlate," how can we know that it exists as a correlate or is true? It is (p. 32) "an object which we by no means know, and of which we can never obtain a notion." In the long run we find that it is nothing more nor less than a dismal and empty abstraction, whose introduction as something important into Kant's work was the cause of the most unfortunate of its difficulties. Fischer seems to hold that the thing-in-itself is somehow a safeguard against subjective idealism, and that without it the sense-world we conceive would be a dream—"a dream common to us all, to be sure, and harmonious in itself, but yet a purely subjective image without actual ground or consistence." Now the longer and the more carefully we examine into the nature of the Kantian thing-in-itself, the more hopelessly baffled must we be in our endeavour to discover what this "actual ground or consistence" means.* Why "actual," unless that word means apart from thought? and what is apart from thought except the inconceivable or the absurd? The primary error of Kant is carried on into his doctrine of the Practical Reason, where its essential dualism is manifestly demonstrated. To a certain extent, it might even be said that it was Kant's desire to give a fictitious importance to the things in themselves which led to his doctrine of freedom and to his theory of the primacy of the practical reason. It has been said with considerable force of truth by many of his critics that his ideal of freedom is a negative one. Fischer seems to make an endeavour to get out of this difficulty by saying that "it becomes clear that the entire sense-world, unobstructed as to its own laws, constitutes a necessary member and an integral part of the moral world; that it is compassed and swayed by the latter; and that the laws of nature are subordinate to the laws of freedom, although they are thereby in no way suspended or annulled." If, however, we read this statement in the light of Kant's own work, it is necessary to remember that the ideal of freedom is only realized when the subordination of the laws of nature is made complete; else why should the philosopher have found it necessary immediately afterwards to introduce his conception of God? That is brought in for the purpose of reconciling from the outside the contradictions which inevitably arise between the two sets of laws. If "the goal of our will is, according to the law of freedom, the purity of volition," does not that show that there is such a contradiction, and that the sensuous element which enters, and is recognized as motive, is somehow wrong and impure? A freedom which is gained merely by negation is scarcely worth the name. The purity of volition, we even find, is with Kant held to be impossible of attainment in a temporal life. (Even Fischer is inclined to desert him here.) Hence comes the doctrine of immortality as a sort of corollary to that of freedom, and the conception of God as the moral ground of the world and the promise of its attaining its moral end. His critic wisely enough points out that the notion of retributory rewards and punishments had too strong a hold upon his mind; but even he does not seem to see that it is exactly upon these that Kant makes his famous moral argument depend. That the philosopher tried to work out his ideas consistently is evident from other parts of his writings, as e.g. when we find him, in what Fischer calls his "Doctrine of Development," still holding on to the primacy of the practical reason:—"The question concerning the thing-in-itself as the ground of being of all phenomena, carries us back to the original ground of things. This, according to Kant, becomes intelligible to us from no phenomenon, of whatever sort it may be, but solely from the final end of the world—i.e. from the end which our reason, by means of its freedom from the world we conceive (sense-world), posits for itself, and realizes through the purification of the will." This is, at any rate, perfectly consistent, while at the same time it retains that negative notion of freedom whose weakness has already been pointed out.

The main objection to Dr. Kuno Fischer's own criticisms on Kant, which take up the latter part of this volume, is that they are stated in too brief and condensed a form. The development of the post-Kantian philosophy reads more like a catalogue than as a piece of historical criticism. On p. 130 the writer seems still to linger among a crowd of misconceptions as to the nature of freedom. On the following pages, however, there are some acute remarks on the contradiction between the doctrines of knowledge and development. "It consists in ascribing the character of phenomenon to development, and at the same time denying its scientific knowableness. The Kantian philosophy teaches the unknowableness of thing-in-itself and the knowableness of phenomenon: this, its foundation doctrine, is shattered as soon as it sees itself obliged to recognize either the knowableness of the former or the unknowableness of the latter. To such a recognition it is brought by its doctrine of development. Without the knowledge of the end, or of the thing-in-itself, which underlies the development of things, this development is an incomprehensible, unknowable phenomenon, and therefore, in strictness, no phenomenon at all. If the immanent end of things is not apparent to us, then certainly there appears to us no development in the nature of things." There is a good examination further on of the differences between the first and second editions of the Critique in the "Refutation of Idealism."

The latest addition to the excellent series known as "Griggs's Philosophical Classics" is Hegel's Philosophy of the State and of History. The work is done by Professor George S. Morris, of Michigan, and is entitled an "exposition." That is to say, it is not a translation, but so far as possible a faithful and complete analysis. The philosophy of history has been sufficiently well translated already in Bohn's series; but, good as that translation is, we think that Professor Morris's work will be found at once more compact and more intelligible. On the other hand, the Philosophie des Rechts has never, so far as we remember, been rendered in English at all. The difficulty about translations is not only that they often fail to catch the exact peculiarities of the author's meaning, but that, by adhering somewhat too closely to the original, they are apt to make—as in the case of both Kant and Hegel—the study of their work a sufficiently perplexing task. The fault, however, is not as a rule that of the translators, but that of the writers themselves. Dr. Morris and his coadjutors have discovered a more excellent way. They endeavour to

* A Critique of Kant. By Kuno Fischer, Professor of Philosophy in the University of Heidelberg. Translated from the German by W. S. Hough. Authorized English edition. London: Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 1888.

Hegel's Philosophy of the State and of History. An Exposition by George S. Morris, Professor of Philosophy in the University of Michigan. London: Trübner & Co.

Ethical Forecasts. Essays by William F. Revell. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.

From Within. By George Harwood, M.A. London: Macmillan & Co.

state in intelligible language the meaning and line of argument of the books which they take up more fully than that task is accomplished in an ordinary history of philosophy, and yet without going into unnecessary detail. The second part of this small volume is that which is the more familiar to English students of Hegel, but will be none the less prized, since not only is it clear and succinct, but also because it takes up every important point in the original work. The first part of the volume contains the Philosophy of the State, which is not less valuable although not so well known. Here we have Hegel as the political philsopher of Germany; and, notwithstanding a slight protest from Professor Morris, it is in this light that we are bound to look at him. The work is practically an apologia; and there are traces of the author's intention all through it. That, however, does not lessen its worth, which is greater than that of any similar treatise we know. It deals, as might be expected, heavy enough blows at Materialism, and the abstract Individualism with which that is generally connected in politics. As that Individualism, however, generally runs into the opposite extreme (as e.g. in the current Socialism of England), Hegel is not less severe in his condemnation of that side of the question. Theories which make the State supreme, to the exclusion of personal freedom, are quite as hardly treated as those which base all social relations—as those of the Family and the State—on contract. Neither point of view is sufficient of itself. It is the old story of the universal and the particular. Either of them taken by itself remains in abstract isolation, and the full truth of each is only found when we have also taken into consideration the other. To put it in a more familiar form, it is the story of Imperium et Libertas worked fully out. The duties of the members towards the State are measured by the rights they enjoy in it. In accomplishing his duty, Hegel insists, the individual must find his own personal satisfaction; yet, although that is the case, he elsewhere points out that the former and not the latter should be his immediate aim. His doctrine is the very converse of that held by many Utilitarians, who make the first end of the individual a particular one for himself, and then explain this away by saying that he will never attain it save by making for the common end. Hegel, on the other hand, begins with the Universal, which, from a philosophic point of view, is the truer and higher way. The most remarkable thing about his political philosophy is the thorough and complete fashion in which it sweeps away the absurd and fantastic theories of modern "philosophical Radicalism"—whether in the guise of extreme individual (self-willed) liberty or in that of State Socialism. Not only students of philosophy, but many others who consider themselves more practical, have reason to thank Professor Morris for his excellent and painstaking work.

The four rather clever, and certainly not uninteresting essays published by Mr. William F. Revell under the title of Ethical Forecasts might be taken as significant of the direction in which a great deal of modern speculation is going. That they should display some looseness of thought as well as some inaccuracies was perhaps to be expected; but that, considering both their starting-point and their conclusion, they should show so much apparent reverence will be to many readers a matter of some surprise. The first essay is occupied with a search for a criterion of truth—the truth of religion. And here occurs the author's initial mistake. He holds that what is a criterion of scientific truth—truth about matter—should be used in the other and higher sphere; and he states the result of his search simply enough. "Our thoughts about anything are true when they correspond to that thing; our statements about it are true when they accurately describe it." He does not seem to see that it is thought itself which gives reality to "that thing," and that, in order to decide whether there is the correspondence he desires, there should be some external arbiter. The distinction he makes is not only arbitrary but apt to become delusive. "Truth in religion," he tells us, "is the same thing as truth in science"—a statement which, as expressing what is plainly the author's opinion that the higher is to be explained by the lower, may be immediately dismissed. To set up "our thoughts and beliefs on the one hand, and objective realities on the other," is to repeat the most grievous error into which would-be philosophers have fallen. It is to begin with an impassable gulf and then to ask for a bridge—to make a process impossible and then ask how it is to be accomplished. We are ready enough to admit that Mr. Revell's criticisms on Professor Drummond's book are in the main right enough; but they really go upon the very ground which a reviewer of the critic himself might take up—namely, that the book contains the application of impossible categories to spiritual things. It is fair enough to rebuke Mr. Drummond's high-handed treatment of the Agnostics; but it is going much too far to tell us that Agnosticism is "the expression of intellectual and spiritual sanity." Logically, Agnosticism needs no gospel and certainly no defenders of its want of faith. When it becomes more than an individual attitude it ceases to deserve its name. In his second essay the author speaks of the "Prospective Readjustment of Religion." Starting with Mr. Herbert Spencer's half-truth that life is the continuous adjustment of internal to external relations, he endeavours to show that "Christianity must re-arrange itself and accommodate itself to the modes of thought and ideas of the age"; here, again, ignoring an important fact—that Christianity has done more to create and foster these modes of thought and ideas than any other factor in the world's history that can be mentioned. At a further stage we are informed that evolution "is a fairly probable hypothesis, while creation . . . cannot be said to be a probable hypothesis." Once more the author has gone too far and too fast. We will not discuss his statement, but we may surely say that neither theologians nor scientific men are likely to call in Mr. Revell to say the final or conclusive word on questions long disputed and certainly never yet settled. A little further on we read that "Pantheism is only nature touched with imagination and emotion." Whose Pantheism, please? Certainly not that of Spinoza, to whom the finite world was nothing, and the Infinite all in all. The lower form of it—what might be called the false Pantheism—is much nearer to those supporters of the theory of evolution, whose follower Mr. Revell seems proud to be. And how does he "re-adjust" religion? By leaving out God, and recognizing "the tendency of the laws of human evolution to be in the direction of increasing perfectness of life." It seems we are consequently "becoming inspired by a larger spirit of humanity and broader and deeper social feelings to devote our energies to the realization of those lofty human ideals towards which mankind is slowly moving. Perhaps such an intellectual and moral attitude as this may not unfitly be described as religious, since it is a genuine continuation of the old religious life of mankind," and so on. Will those who represent the old religious life of mankind be satisfied with this genuine continuation or readjustment? And, if mankind is slowly moving in the proper direction, how can we possibly interfere? Has not one of the prophets of evolution told us that we are each and all the result of "incalculable antecedent force"? Mr. Revell answers in his next essay, which is the best of the four, because it practically destroys the rest. What we cannot understand is how a man who can tell us on p. 128 that "matter and motion must be interpreted in terms of consciousness, and not consciousness in terms of matter and motion," should have written as he has done not only about the criterion of truth, but about religion generally. But we really can follow Mr. Revell no further. The last essay in the volume is a very mediocre one. All through the author's fault has been to ride his evolution hobby wherever it seemed to be even likely to go. At the same time, we are ready to admit that, with all its inaccuracies and transparent contradictions, his little book is rather an interesting one.

An author who looks upon the doctrine of evolution in quite another way is Mr. George Harwood, M.A., whose From Within is a suggestive and thoroughly readable book, although its philosophy is somewhat defective. It is a curious experience to pass from an author who practically banishes God and deities human evolution to another who carefully proceeds from the "person within" to a great Personality without. Looked at generally, Mr. Harwood's argument may be described as that of Paley in another form. It is open to the same objections as the latter—the principal one being that the "Person without" which it gives us is not fully adequate to the idea of God. Some of Mr. Harwood's arguments are not very conclusive. For instance, we read that, if Life "had existed from all eternity, it would long ago have worked out all its developments; for these would only require a certain amount of that time of which eternity is the endless duration. But, since these developments are still proceeding, we are compelled to believe that there must have been a Life-Appearing epoch; and this belief involves the intervention of a new Cause; and such an intervention involves a new act of Will." There is here a false idea of Eternity—only too common in popular writers. Besides this, there is something like an assumption as to the time required for, and the nature of, development. There is also the difficulty, already noticed, that a new Cause and a new act of Will do not really give the God whom such writers as Mr. Harwood expect and profess to find. We have also an objection to the author's psychology, which proceeds in the old fashion to map out Force, Memory, Will, Intellect, and Soul as "concurrent phenomena" within ourselves. The kind of process implied here is that of the ordinary consciousness, which is scarcely a safe guide in philosophical matters. One other remark may be made. Mr. Harwood finds his way too easily from his primary conception of the "Person without" to the doctrines of the Incarnation and of the Trinity. Really, however, the book ought not to be looked upon as a philosophical treatise. Rather it is an honest man's attempt to analyse the process by which he has come to his present standpoint of belief; an endeavour to explain the steps—not always consciously taken—by which he has reached his spiritual position. Read in this light, the book will be found to contain much good thought and feeling.

WASHINGTON AND HIS COUNTRY.*

READERS with a feeling for literature do not like abridgments, and there is something they like even less. It is the intrusion of new matter into an old text. As Washington and his Country is an abridgment of Irving's well-known Life, and as Mr. Fiske has "interwoven" additions of his own, his book must be condemned on general principles. Still it is entitled to extenuating circumstances. The publishers intend it to be used in American schools only, and for the wholesome purpose of improving the study of history in those abodes of learning. They hold the sound faith that early familiarity with literature "will tend to the cultivation of a taste for good reading and a ready use of the mother-tongue." We were not aware that young America wanted any help to readiness in the use of his mother-tongue, but Messrs. Ginn & Co. doubtless secretly meant that he needed help to use it better. In this respect the reading of Washington Irving will undoubtedly serve him, and if he proceeds from the study of parts of that elegant writer at school to the study of all of him, out of it, the publishers and their editor will not have toiled in vain. Of Mr. Fiske's own share in the volume we can speak well. Here and there traces are to be found of old platitudes—such, for instance, as the application to James I. of the adjectives "obstinate and tyrannical," and certain little glorifications over the naval victories of 1812. This, however, is right and proper, though it is silly in Mr. Fiske to say that the sinking of the Alabama which "was British built and manned by British seamen and gunners . . . seemed to teach a similar lesson to those" of the earlier war. In a sense it does, for it shows that the stronger, more heavily armed, and better manned vessel can beat the weaker; but then that rather takes the gilt off the glories of 1812. Again, there are a few repetitions of old mistakes. The story of Coligny's colony in Florida, and the vengeance of Gourgues, is told as if Mr. Parkman had never written, or Mr. Justin Winsor had never edited. Still, on the whole, Mr. Fiske's outline of United States history before and after Washington is sound and well written. He is a strong Free-trader, with which we find no fault, and makes some excellent observations on the illustrations of Socialism afforded by the early history of Virginia. Mr. Fiske is a strong Federal and Anti-slavery man, but he tells the history of the years before the Civil War without rancour, and he arranges his facts clearly. His estimates of his countrymen are properly patriotic. The only egregious absurdity we have noted is in the statement that Daniel Webster was "probably the greatest orator that ever lived, after Demosthenes and Chatham; and as a master of the English language he was superior to Chatham." Has Mr. Fiske got a copy of Chatham's speeches? When Messrs. Ginn & Co. have had their way with the young generation there will, we devoutly hope, be less windy tall talk in America.

* Washington and his Country; being Irving's Life of Washington. Abridged for the use of Schools. With Introduction and Continuation, giving a Brief Outline of United States History from the Discovery of America to the End of the Civil War. By John Fiske. Boston: Ginn & Co. London: Trübner & Co.

OUR SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY.*

THIS amusing volume is written with two special aims—the first that of emulation of Sterne, the second that of reproof of Mr. Ruskin. The two themes—the bright and the dark, the Sterne and the Ruskin—constantly reappear as in the progress of a piece of concerted music. Sterne, as is generally known, journeyed sentimentally through France from north to south, and left a unique little record of his travels, infinitely delightful to the wise, infinitely annoying to prigs and to the whole race of Smelfungus. Mr. Ruskin, in one of the funniest of his tilts against the windmills of modern life, has stated, "I not only object, but am quite prepared to spend all my best bad language in reprobation of bi-tri-and-4-5-6 or 7 cycles, and every other contrivance and invention for superseding human feet on God's ground." Mr. and Mrs. Pennell crossed France almost in the very track of Sterne, with the light of his sentimental presence on them, and endeavouring, with the most respectful humility, to live up to his experience. They travelled, for speed and cheapness, on a tricycle, which they were sure that Sterne would have preferred for the purpose to a railway carriage. But they could not forget those cruel words of Mr. Ruskin, and in a very pretty dedication to Sterne they invoke his genial shade to shield them from Ruskinian arrows. So that the whole book has the air of describing how they played in the French sunshine with the Sentimentalist, their pleasure being only damped by a vision of the Sage of Coniston with a birch behind every doorway.

It is Mrs. Pennell who supplies the letterpress, Mr. Pennell being occupied with the drawings. Enough will have been said to show that Mrs. Pennell belongs, in this book at least, to that small class of writers who have devoted themselves to a conscious study of the style of Sterne. She does not reflect it quite as completely as Mlle. de l'Espinasse did in her fragments of a new Tristram Shandy, but the effort has been sufficient to strengthen her hand and give delicacy as well as definition to her writing. What the adventures of the happy couple on their machine were must not be told here, for the book has no plot, and is a mere chain of episodes. There is a great deal of humour, and neither author nor illustrator shrinks from telling a story against themselves. Mrs. Pennell, as readers of her earlier works may remember, is a student of Romany, and prides herself on her gipsy conversation. But pride may have a fall. This is what happened at Pont-de-Brique:—

> I saw, under the shade of a clump of trees, a green cart with windows and chimney, a horse grazing near by, and a man and woman sitting in front of a fire kindled on the grass. I walked towards the cart—
>
> "Kushto divvus, Pal te Pen" ("Good day, brother and sister"), said I.
>
> "What?" asked the woman, without looking up from the tin-pan she was mending.
>
> "Kushto divvus," said I louder, adding "Me stom une Romany chi" ("I'm a gipsy").
>
> "Comment?" she repeated peevishly. "I do not understand you."
>
> I chaffed them in my best Romany, but they took no further heed. I tried French. I said I was a gipsy, come from over the seas with news of their brothers in America.
>
> "But we're not gipsies," said they; "we live in Boulogne, and we're busy."
>
> I declare I never was so snubbed in my life.

It was, indeed, enough to take the Romany out of any one for life.

English artists not of the very latest growth, and especially those whose training was at Barbizon, will read with regret the pages in which Mrs. Pennell describes their visit to that Mecca of landscape-painting. They found the peasants, or thought they found them, posing in pathetic hopelessness in a carefully selected middle distance, and at the mere sight of a sketch-book an old woman, in proper Millet costume, stopped short on her homeward way to strike a weary attitude on a heap of stones. But in the village itself they were struck by the air of artistic decline. Not only its great masters, but even the secondary lights of Barbizon, have deserted it. The Exhibition, as Mrs. Pennell says, with a sarcasm which is a little too emphatic, "was a shade worse than the Royal Academy, and at a first glance appeared to be a collection of fireworks." Altogether, they formed the impression that the extraordinary and unique charm which fostered artistic life in Barbizon has evaporated, and that it is already a piece of artistic history. Mrs. Pennell says:—

> From what we saw in Barbizon, I do not think it improbable that in another generation there will not be an artist in the village, and that Millet will have been forgotten by the villagers. Though his family still live there, the children of the place seem to know nothing of his greatness. The first boys of whom we asked the way to the house pointed vaguely down the long winding street, and thought, but were not quite sure, we should find it if we kept straight on. After we left the Exhibition, other boys whom we questioned declared they had never heard the name of Millet; and, when we refused to let them off so easily, told us we must go back in the very direction from which we had come. No, we insisted, it was not there.
>
> "Ah!" they thought, "Monsieur must mean Monsieur Millet le charbonnier!"
>
> Such is fame at home!

They found the Maison Millet at last—a grey cottage, roofed with brown moss, not other than its neighbours. They heard a clatter of plates and voices, and with good taste refrained from asking to see the interior. They hurried on rather to Siron's, where the first object that shocked them was a waiter in a dress-coat, which was not what they had gone to Barbizon to see. They next ordered groseille, for which they had to pay double the ordinary price. They moralized over the contrast between Millet's long-drawn poverty and the wealth his name has brought to the ungrateful village, and they were glad to hurry out of Barbizon into what Evelyn calls the "horrid and solitary" Forest of Fontainebleau.

Of course in every town and village the tricycle was an object of extreme curiosity. The peasants were pretty well accustomed to the old bone-shaking velocipedes, but the neat, swift, and perilous-looking tricycle filled them with amazement. It is evident that there was a dark side to the journey, and one which was not wholly sentimental. Mrs. Pennell must possess good muscles and an excellent constitution; but there are signs to show that she found her necessary share of the work of progress not a little tiring, and sometimes even distressing. The plate on p. 174 shows the couple gaily careering away on a level road in the morning freshness, and nothing could be merrier; but the vignette at the bottom of p. 183 is the reverse of the medal. This is really agonizing: seventy kilomètres under a blazing sun and against the wind on the road from Neuvy to Cosne was no joke, and on this occasion Mrs. Pennell admits that "every turn of the pedals I felt must be my last." She had been preceded, however:—

> In Montargis we heard for the first time the story of the lady tricycler, afterwards repeated at almost every stage of our journey. The landlady served it to us with the dessert. Only a few days before, it seemed, two gentlemen arrived, each riding a velocipede, and each wearing long stockings and short pantaloons, like Monsieur.
>
> "Show these gentlemen to No. 14," she said to the chambermaid. "Take these towels up to ces messieurs in No. 14," she said to the same chambermaid a few minutes later. When the dinner-bell rang there came down from No. 14 not two gentlemen, but a gentleman and a lady: and, if we would believe it, the lady had on a black silk dress. And the next morning, by my faith, two gentlemen rode away!

We shall, however, we are sure, do Mrs. Pennell no injustice when we confess that the main charm of this volume lies in its profuse and beautiful illustrations, lavished almost upon every page. Mr. Pennell's work in black and white is well known, his faculty of rendering the salient features of architecture seen in a bright light, his picturesque grouping of buildings against the sky. There are some very characteristic examples here of this his old and familiar manner, such as the street in Calais, with the great steepled church at the end, opposite p. 6; the grey cluster of the walls and turrets of Nemours, on p. 162; and the winding street and steep roofs of La Charité, opposite p. 200. But Mr. Pennell is opening out new fields. His figures used to be grotesquely bad, as bad as Turner's; but it is not so now. Nothing could be happier than the proud commis-voyageur opposite p. 179, or than the vintagers working in the hot sunlight. Towards the end of the book are some humorous parodies of other people's illustrations. On p. 225 is a drawing dedicated "to the shade of Vierge," whose genius had something kindred to that of Mr. Pennell, although it would be absurd to pretend that the American artist yet approaches the quality of his unfortunate predecessor's work. No less amusing to those who know the original is the sentimental picture of Maria, after Louis Deschamps, on p. 207.

* Our Sentimental Journey through France and Italy. By Joseph and Elizabeth Robins Pennell. London: Longmans & Co. 1888.

These illustrations, especially the landscapes, have the air of being diminished by some mechanical process from much larger drawings. This is probably the reason why some of them seem spotty and ineffectual; it being certain that the mechanical dwarfing of a work in black and white destroys in some degree, and in a manner for which it would be difficult to account, the exact value of the lines and masses. This cannot be avoided, we suppose; but it is one of the reasons which keep us from being entirely delighted with the various artistic processes which are now in fashion.

KEY'S LATIN DICTIONARY.*

PROFESSOR KEY died at the end of 1875, having devoted his last twenty years to what he intended to be the great work of his life—a dictionary of the Latin language which would satisfy the requirements of mature scholars. Unfortunately, he did not complete more than one-third of the enormous task which he had undertaken, but it was most properly decided that his unfinished researches should be revised and completed " by another hand." Again, unfortunately, that " other hand " was occupied with keeping a good many other classical irons in the fire; and, " after a lapse of time, which is greatly to be regretted," it has been decided to print Professor Key's MS. " as nearly as possible " in the state in which he left it. It is difficult to find fault with the pious wish to construct a solid memorial of a life honestly and successfully devoted to the service of Latinity. It is from this point of view that we must regard the present publication; we must not estimate its value as if it were intended to displace, or even partially to supersede, the most imperfect of our existing dictionaries. The writer of the Preface goes too far when he declares that this instalment of Professor Key's work, in spite of its incompleteness, is almost as valuable as if he had lived to finish it himself. There is a touch of pathos in the prudent resolution, conceived by Professor Key as soon as he foresaw the improbability of carrying his task out to the end, to apply himself in the first instance to " those words throughout the Alphabet which he considered to require novel or special treatment." Writing in the year before his death, he said that he had already included " nearly all those words in which he thought himself able to make some improvement."

Having left the unimportant parts to be supplied after his death, and having trusted that the completed parts would receive a final revision, he cannot have anticipated that after twelve years of regretted but unexplained delay his work would be published in anything like its present form. Externally the book is handsome to sumptuousness; that was the concern of the Cambridge University Press. Nor have we any wish to disparage the labours of those who undertook to pass such a book through the press; the " peculiar difficulties " may be at once admitted; but there is no excuse for some of " the imperfections which might have been, but have not been, removed." It is a small matter in itself, but it is indicative of a perfunctory performance, that the Greek words quoted in the various articles have been consistently printed without their accents and generally without their breathings. The list of the authors quoted in the book does not even profess to be complete; this would not have been a very difficult matter to rectify, and such value as the list might have possessed for students is greatly impaired by the omission of the ascertained or generally assigned dates. The maker of a dictionary is not to be pinned down to give a positive opinion on the not quite settled date of a writer like Avianus; and the succession of all the more important authors ought to be as well known to an ordinary scholar as the list of Roman emperors to a numismatist; but a man may be a tolerably mature Latinist, and yet confess to feeling some uncertainty as to the periods in which some of the legal, medical, and other specialist authorities wrote and flourished. We do not pretend to have examined more than a small proportion of the articles on words; but we have come upon several cases of palpable oversight in the part which professes to be complete—as, for instance, s.v. avocamentum.

Consistently with his self-denying ordinance, Professor Key left among his omitted words many of those which are most disputed or most settled. We look in vain for exul, for instar, for provincia, and for titulus. So far as we can trace any but a subjective plan of inclusion or omission, Professor Key seems to have contented himself with discussing one of several cognate words; thus he takes fabulor and leaves fabula, fabularis, fabulatio, fabulator, fabulositas, and fabulosus, as well as fābŭlis and făbŭlus. The letter A is said to be " filled in "; but we find many omissions, not of common and important words, that is true; but it is for the sake of the uncommon and unimportant words that most mature students have recourse to a dictionary. Nor does Aborigines fall under either of these heads. Absurditas, again, is just one of those words which ought to be included in a dictionary or omitted only because it never existed. Under barbarus it seems that Professor Key has been misunderstood or too literally understood—two things which are not seldom identical. He is made to say that the word is borrowed from the Egyptian language, and, in support of this untenable view, to quote (without accents) the familiar passage from Herodotus:—βαρβαρους οἱ Αιγυπτιοι καλεουσι τους μη σφισι ὁμογλωσσους. Many of Professor Key's derivations are more novel than plausible; some of them are as antiquated as they are plainly ridiculous. It is possible that the fantastic etymology which disfigures many of Professor Key's otherwise valuable articles may have helped to prevent his work from being completed by any other scholar. The corrections and omissions would have had to be carried out on a grand scale; and in this respect Professor Key's work would have been altered beyond his own recognition. Venus is conjectured to have been a neuter substantive from ven-, come, " with notion of union, and so love, kindly fitness, whence grace and good luck." The change of gender is explained by the analogy of Cupido; and the transition of meanings is compared with our comely and becoming. Under locuples it is hinted that the original form may have been locuplex; " locus and pol for multus plus " is suggested as a derivation; Cicero and other guessing etymologists are quoted, without disapproval, in support of locus and pleo, because in Ovid's words,

> Aut pecus aut latam dives habebat humum;
> Hinc etiam locuples, hinc ipsa pecunia dicta est.

Vellus is connected with vellere on the authority of Varro:—" Pastores Palatini ex ovibus ante tonsuram inventam vellere lanam sunt soliti: ex quo vellera dicuntur." The original meaning of elementa is defined as the A B C, or Alpha-beta, in order to support the fanciful derivation from L M N; but Professor Key hints dissent in the parenthetic question, " Why these selected ? " Under extemplo, while he records the older form ex-tempulo, he explains and appears to approve " Serv. ad. A. I. 92." Here templum is defined as " locus manu auguris designatus in aere [probably also in terra] post quem factum illico captantur auguria." That is to say, in some cases the augur would have to consult his libri, in others he might report ex-templo. Varro and others are again followed, without much hesitation, in connecting concilio with cilia, and the word is made to denote the weaving of fibres together; thus " vestimentum apud fullonem quum cogitur conciliari [al. consiliari] dicitur." The familiar derivation is not mentioned. So, again, ærumna is connected with μεριμνα (sic) in the sense of an allotted task. It may be admitted that the alternative derivations offered in other dictionaries are not much better; either the one from ægrimonia (like jumentum from jugum) or the other which associates it with ærumnula, the stick which supports a traveller's bundle.

Apart from the etymology (which is often ingenious without being unsound, though it belongs to an unscientific era), most of the articles which have been tested show the signs of patient, and sometimes of original, research. Professor Key was no copyist of other men's work, and his Dictionary will be found by those who use it with discretion to throw much new light on many old words, particularly on the usages among the earlier Latin writers. The citations are full; and the references, so far as they have been put to the proof, are correct. It is a pity that the convenience of the eye has not been consulted by variation of the types. Beautifully as the book is printed, it is fatiguing to use it for a prolonged course of references. Otherwise the articles are unusually readable, and it would not be an unpleasant amusement to a scholar to open this Dictionary at hazard and study a few pages at a time. Professor Key is not afraid of throwing out suggestive and almost chatty remarks. On caballus he argues for an originally dignified connotation as accounting for the derivatives " cavalry," " cavalier," and " chivalry." If caballus properly signified " a sorry nag," the usages of Juvenal and Seneca must be regarded as ironical; but " a word is oftener degraded than promoted." Under abolla, quoting facinus majoris abollæ, Professor Key quietly remarks, " a phrase but ill explained." Abdomen is derived from abdo, and defined as " a place for stowing things away," and support is supposed to be given by " the slang use of bread-basket." The familiar identification of adolesco (to grow) with adolesco (to burn) is mentioned without comment, but Professor Key implies his own opinion by separating his two articles. Æstumo, the old form of æstimo, implies in his opinion a substantive æstumus (analogous to æditumus, a temple-warden), meaning a money-warden, whose business would include valuing or assaying coins. (Perhaps Professor Key would see a similar idea of wardenship in the termination of words like finitumus and maritumus.) Autumo seems to him to imply a superlative adjective autumus, " perhaps a variety of extimus or rather a lost ectimus." For the transition of meanings Professor Key compares the English out and utter as well as the Latin juridical use of intimare. The theory is not convincing, but it deserves consideration in default of any better explanation than the common one (autumo for aitumo, a lengthened form of aio, like negumo for nego). The fairest way to give an idea of Professor Key's work is to analyse at length one of his more important articles, preferably from the letter A, because that professes to be nearly complete, as e.g. on ærarius. First, he gives the original signification " made of copper or connected with copper "; next, " of or pertaining to money "; then he mentions tribunus ærarius, for which he gives the reference " See tribunus " (an article not inserted); then he passes to the substantival use, " a worker in copper and (afterwards) in other metals." The legal use of ærarius is by implication restricted to a Roman who had been degraded from all his rights as a citizen. The claims of ræraria to be regarded as a feminine substantive are not admitted without hesitation; and ærarium is settled in seven lines as " the place in which the public treasure was kept." There is no mention of the familiar distinction between ærarium and fiscus; none of the ærarium militare; none of quæstores ærarii; none of the public documents which were stored in the ærarium. All of these are matters which would more properly be discussed in a "dictionary of antiquities," but in a dictionary of language it is misleading not to refer to them. The article on heres is in most respects adequate, but it contains no reference to the final syllable having been shortened by a late Latin writer. Professor Key's articles on the letters of the alphabet are written in a very interesting and skilful manner, especially in the letter C. He traces it from its original sound, equivalent at first to g, and sometimes interchangeable with it, as also with qu, q and u cons. He describes the dropping of c at the beginnings of words, as in (c)acumen and (c)ubi, and in the middles, as in viretum for virectum, and (so far as pronunciation goes) in lacruma, &c., and from the end of the stem in words like ensi- as compared with ensiculus. Then he traces the correspondence between Latin c and Greek π, as well as the rustic Italian p, as in ἵππος, equus, ecus, and in columba, palumbes. Finally, he works out the transformation which the Latin c has undergone in various modern languages. It will be seen that no reference is made to the late and provincial pronunciation of c as equivalent to sh as in words like conducticius. But Professor Key's work must not be judged by omissions, which would have been supplied, or by mistakes, which would have been corrected, if he had been spared to complete the work which he so courageously undertook. Even as it stands it will have a life of its own; but its more permanent existence will be found in the improved Latinity of those scholars who will assimilate, reproduce, and develop the better parts of its teaching.

---

* A Latin-English Dictionary. Printed from the Unfinished MS. of the late Thomas Hewitt Key, M.A., F.R.S., Professor of Comparative Grammar, and formerly of Latin, in University College, London. Cambridge: University Press. 1888.

LETTERS OF RADCLIFFE AND JAMES.*

ALTHOUGH this volume is neither so interesting nor so instructive as most of the other publications of the Oxford Historical Society, it contains some illustrations of Oxford life that justify its appearance, and it is carefully and elaborately edited. It consists of letters, written for the most part by singularly uninteresting people, between 1755 and 1783, and the notices it gives of the state of the University during that period relate only to Queen's College. The letters are all written either by or to a certain Cumberland clergyman named James, or his son John, both members of Queen's, and the letters of the younger James, the editor's great-grandfather on the maternal side, are specially worth preserving, because they present some picture of an undergraduate's life and studies in the latter part of the eighteenth century. Richard Radcliffe, who wrote the first sixteen letters in the volume, was a taberdar and Fellow of Queen's; he held a living in Lincolnshire, and, though he became bursar of his college, did not come into residence. "I would," he writes, "almost as soon be confined to Solway Moss as within the walls of a college." He complains bitterly of the slowness of promotion, and indeed seems to have been specially unlucky; for he was nineteen years before he arrived at his fellowship, and "thirty years without having had the offer of any preferment from the college"; he was much aggravated by the unreasonable age to which his seniors lived, and speaks despairingly of the "old dons" as "immortal." There is nothing of any value in his letters, except a curious account of his inoculation, and of the treatment he underwent before and after the operation. Another of the elder James's friends was John Boucher, a less commonplace man, who had kept a school and held some livings in the American colonies, and had been forced to return to England by the rebellion. A curious story is given by the editor from some extracts that appeared in Notes and Queries from Boucher's Autobiography. He was hindered from preaching by a party of armed men, and when at his pulpit steps collared their leader, and threatened to blow his brains out with a pistol he carried ready cocked in his hand. He became Curate of Paddington, and kept a school there. His letters are dull enough, and only serve as connecting links between the letters of his friends Dr. James and his son John. Dr. James also kept a school, first at St. Bees, and then at his Cumberland living, and his son became Boucher's usher and succeeded to his father's rectory. This son, whose letters written during his undergraduate days take up most of the volume, was a good and clever lad, and a most amazing prig. His letters are ludicrously affected. He visits his brother in London when on his way from Cumberland to enter at Queen's, and writes to his father—"Hail! But a truce to all soliloquy. I have neither time nor inclination to describe, nor you to hear, my sentiments, or rather feelings, at the sight of this huge, overgrown, dropsical city. On pen to something more interesting! See! my brother!" Of another undergraduate from Cumberland who had shown him some civility he says that he cannot "see anything in his company worth courting; his knowledge extends little farther than grammar and syntax," adding "he is a lad of good morals as far as I know."

After reading many pages of this young prig's letters, we were refreshed by finding that his father and his friend and admirer Boucher at last came to the conclusion that it was advisable to warn him against conceit. Of course he has nothing to say about the amusements, or anything worth reading about the social life, of men of his own standing at Oxford, and his letters are generally filled with accounts of his studies. Queen's seems to have been in a bad state. Little help was given to an undergraduate who wished to read; "no mode [of study] —no plan—not even a book beside a logic or ethic compend was recommended"; the resident Fellows "spent half their time in poring over newspapers and smoking tobacco." Dr. James speaks indignantly of the "vile impositions practised by these people under the liberal pretence of educating youth," and young James is sorry to find "the injunctions of his tutor Nicolson disregarded and ridiculed," and Nicolson himself browbeaten by his pupils. James's father tried to get him elected to a studentship at Christ Church; and he and the young man himself worked hard, though in vain, to curry favour with the electors. Indeed they and their friend Boucher never lost anything through neglect of their own interests. Boucher unblushingly declares that he set young James "to watch the death of his patron," or rector, as "a crow near a piece of carrion," in order that he might apply for the living as soon as it fell vacant, and Dr. James, when his son was about to try for the Latin verse prize, writes:—"I had the Professor of Poetry (the prize-master) to dine with me—as Proctor —and hope John will not fare the worse for my attention to him." In spite of lack of help from his college, John James spent his time at Oxford to good purpose; he obtained the verse prize with a poem which, while good enough to justify the decision of the Professor of Poetry, was certainly not worth reprinting here, and learnt to compose Greek hexameters respectably, though, considering that he was pronounced by Radcliffe to be the "best scholar of his time," it is noteworthy that he always wrote his Greek without accents. Besides his classical work, he learnt French, took music-lessons, attended lectures on chemistry, and read some Hebrew. Being the sort of creature he was, he naturally "did not like Aristophanes' wit," and condemned Herodotus for telling "many tales without meaning or moral, many narrations of fact without use, a fault which no select history can be guilty of." The present Provost of Queen's contributes a prefatory note on Dr. Fothergill, Provost during most of the period covered by these letters, and on some one or two other Queen's dons, and has supplied many of the foot notes, which may therefore safely be accepted as accurate, and a series of appendixes. One of these appendixes is devoted to the subject of the fire of 1778, which destroyed nearly all the west wing of the front quadrangle of the College, an event recorded by young James in his usual stilted and affected style.

WHAT MR. KARL PEARSON THINKS.*

THE words "freethought" and "freethinker" have been used by many people with many different meanings. Mr. Karl Pearson uses them with a meaning which nobody else has ever made them bear before. It will be desirable, in order to enable the earnest reader to peruse the pages of The Ethic of Freethought as profitably as possible, to explain clearly, in so many words, what that meaning is; but before doing so it will be useful to indicate generally the scope of the volume in which the ethic of freethought is enounced. (A man of vast learning once objected to the use by another man of vast learning of the word ethic, that you might as well talk about a tong; but, after all, we do not say logics or musics, and the English language is nothing if not free.) Like all Gaul, Mr. Pearson's volume is divided into three parts. Each part is further divided into five chapters, each of which is either an essay or a lecture, and most of which have been already published in one way or another. The first part indicates in some detail what you think if you are a freethinker. The second part is literary and historical, and treats of certain people and events from the point of view of a freethinker. The third part is sociological, or Socialistic, and explains why the freethinker is a Socialist, and what sort of Socialist he is, and, in particular, what he considers ought to be done in respect of the existence of women. Mr. Pearson is of opinion that "the last section of this book is the one which is most likely to meet with severe criticism and disapproval." Here, on the contrary, it shall meet with generous criticism and enthusiastic approval, for it is much the most exciting.

The general plan of the work having been thus indicated, it is time to enter upon the explanation of the sense in which Mr. Pearson uses the words "freethinker" and "freethought." This can be ascertained from a conscientious perusal of the first part, and in particular of the first chapter, "The Ethic of Freethought." Now this chapter was originally a lecture delivered on a Tuesday in March 1883, at South Place Institute. After a preliminary exordium, to which further reference will be made, Mr. Pearson proceeded to say that he thought he might assume that the majority of his audience were freethinkers. The assumption [illegible] his readers, but it leads to the melancholy inference that the Institute was not largely attended on that occasion. For we shall presently see that freethinkers, in Mr. Pearson's sense, cannot at that date have been numerous. In the first place, freethinkers put on one side all the religions that actually exist or ever have existed. They do not think it worth while to prove their falseness, because that has been done so often and so conclusively that to do it again would be a waste of time. "Freethought," says Mr. Pearson, "is the rejection of all myth explanation, the reception of all ascertained truths with regard to the relation of the finite to the infinite." The qualification is redundant, because all truths have regard to the relation of the finite to the infinite. It is of no importance, and it would make no difference if they had not, for either they all have or the expression means nothing. "The freethinker is not one who thinks things as he will, but one who thinks them as they must be." Mr. Pearson then goes on to explain that things "must be" as freethinkers think them. To take a simple instance: some people suppose or have suggested "that all things happen by chance, that there is no invariable relation between one finite thing and another finite thing," "that everywhere huge chance upheavals are eternally starting, eternally ceasing without co-ordination, and as the mocking playwork of chaos," and so forth. Now "it is absolutely impossible" that this "should be the case; and for the very simple reason that no man can conceive it." We may digress for a moment to mention that "this definite relation, this finite order is what we [the freethinker] term Law," which shows that the freethinker does not know what law is. Mr. Pearson then supposes somebody to "grant" him "the truth of the principle of gravitation," and says he would be able therefrom to deduce substantially correct information as to how the planets would go. The steps of his deduction would follow one another, not "from chance, but of absolute necessity. I can think the succession in one way only, and that one way is what? Why, the very method in which the facts appear to me to be occurring in so-called Nature!" It is because things can only be thought of as happening as they do that they do happen as they do. This point is further elaborated in the third chapter of the first part, which is a lecture called "Matter and Soul," of which the Sunday Lecture Society were, in 1885, the happy recipients. It proves that matter and soul are the same thing, and you may call them which you please. In it Mr. Pearson asserts, with the aid of italics, that "The laws of the physical universe follow the logical processes of the human mind." Thus we are led on to an important point:—"Any physical fact which is opposed to a physical law is opposed to a mental law; we cannot think it—it is impossible. That is all the man of science means when he says that for a dead man to arise out of his tomb and talk is nonsense; he would have to cease thinking were such things possible." The application of this reasoning which the Sunday Lecture Society were to make, and doubtless made, is obvious. It would be interesting to know whether it occurred to any Sunday Lecturer, sympathizing with Mr. Pearson's contentions as far as concerns their practical result, that the freethinker must be a person of remarkably limited powers of imagination. It will be seen that a satisfactory definition of freethinking has not yet been arrived at, though some light has been thrown on its manner of reasoning. The freethinker rejects "myth explanation," and accepts—or, to use his own word, receives—"ascertained truths." But who is to say which explanations are myth and what truths are ascertained? That we are not told in so many words; but Mr. Pearson's essays leave the matter in no sort of doubt. That important personage is Mr. Karl Pearson, and he performs his high office, whenever occasion requires, with much and arbitrary dignity. The true explanation, then, of a freethinker is that he agrees with Mr. Karl Pearson, and of freethought that it is what Mr. Karl Pearson thinks. As we have seen, he does not, because he cannot, think very much.

* Letters of Richard Radcliffe and John James of Queen's College, Oxford, 1755-1783. Edited by Margaret Evans. Oxford: printed for the Oxford Historical Society at the Clarendon Press. 1888.

* The Ethic of Freethought: a Selection of Essays and Lectures. By Karl Pearson, M.A., formerly Fellow of King's College, Cambridge. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 1888.

When you have got freethought how will you behave? This important question is dealt with in a remarkable lecture entitled "The Enthusiasm of the Market-place and of the Study," also delivered to the favoured South Place Institute. It is to the following general effect. You cannot induce people to carry on their affairs in the way you like unless you are enthusiastic. There are two sorts of enthusiasts. One sort goes, figuratively, into the market-place, and makes appeals to human emotions. The other sort sits in the study and appeals to reason. Occasionally the study enthusiasts make some headway, and their appeals seem in a fair way to be listened to. Then the market-place people make a disturbance, undo all the good that has been done, and retard human progress by centuries. Study enthusiasts are such men as Erasmus, Spinoza, and Mr. Karl Pearson. Market-place enthusiasts are such as Martin Luther and Mr. William Gladstone. But the flowing tide, on the whole, is with them of the study, and eventually they will gain the day. Of course it will be a long while first. Now the enthusiasts of the study, being for the most part freethinkers, have to find out what people ought to do. Their market-place rivals utter "cries of justice and morality and human right and Divine retribution," whereas they ought to know that these qualities are not absolute, but are only clumsy ways of expressing what is "social" or "anti-social." In Mr. Pearson's opinion "social" conduct is conduct which promotes the progress of society towards whatever it is, in fact, progressing towards. "Anti-social" conduct is the opposite. He says—and he ought to know—that the freethinker thinks that it is everybody's duty to be social, "not from fear of hell, not from hope of heaven, from no love of a tortured man-god, but solely for the sake of the society of which I am a member, and the welfare of which is my welfare—for the sake of my fellow-men—I act morally—that is, socially." Of course for any one who shares the freethinker's taste, and wants "solely for the sake of" society to hasten its career in the direction in which it is careering, this is all very well. It may be a little difficult—unless you are a good freethinker, in which case gracefully making enormous assumptions about facts is one of your highest accomplishments—to be quite sure in what sort of direction society is careering; but that will only add the interest of unexpectedness to the results of your moral scheme. But it is still desirable, Mr. Pearson frankly acknowledges, to do something or other to make this sublime prospect sufficiently attractive to the general, for the contemplation of it effectively to replace the theories of Christianity and other religions as a basis of morals. The something is that they are to be animated by the enthusiasm of the study. That enthusiasm is "the steady persistency which arises when knowledge of truth, social and physical, has become a part of man's intellectual nature." Mr. Pearson has found that "the desire of knowledge" may sometimes become "an absolute passion." Therefore all persons are to cultivate the desire of knowledge. Also, they are to be persuaded by reason of its inherent truthfulness to adopt freethought. This will be in itself almost enough to make anybody behave socially, because, as will be remembered, the reason of everything being as it is is that that is the only way in which the freethinker can think it. Therefore "freethought in making him [the freethinker] master of his own reason renders him lord of the world. That seems to me the endless joy of the freethinker's faith. It is a real and a living faith, which, creative, sympathetic, and, above all, enthusiastic, is destined to be the creed of the future." Let the reader substitute, as it has been explained to him that he fairly may, "What Mr. Karl Pearson thinks" for "freethought" and "the freethinker's faith" in the above extract. Then let him picture to himself the passionate joy of reflecting that nothing ever happens anywhere except in so far as he and Mr. Karl Pearson think, and say candidly whether the basis of morals is not good enough. Only, by what possible confusion of thought—if his thought can be confused, which would lead to rather serious consequences—can Mr. Karl Pearson describe himself as one of "those who have thrown aside all appeal to the emotions as the motive force in conduct"? It should reconcile many a non-freethinker to freethought to discover that freethought is not free from that amiable and immemorial weakness of the human mind which makes one call other people's emotions emotions, and one's own emotions reason.

Enough has already been stated to show that Mr. Pearson is a Socialist, which is another way of saying that freethought is Socialistic. It also follows that Socialism is not only right, but will shortly prevail. It will present the following features. Everybody will be obliged to labour. The State will pay everybody for his labour. It will not pay everybody equally, but everybody as much as he deserves. Except what the State pays him, nobody will have anything of his own. The most serious offence known to the law—if it is known—will be cutting the linings of railway carriages. This is because railway carriages belong to the public, and to injure public property will be (and, indeed, is now) unpardonable sin. Mr. Pearson is kind enough to allow that what he calls labour of the head is not less necessary to human welfare than labour of the hand. But he "might conceive the labourers with the hand to attain such a degree of education that workers of both kinds might be fused together. The same man might labour with his pen in the morning and with his shovel after midday. That, I think, would be the ideal existence in which society, as an entire body, would progress at the greatest possible rate." This ideal conception has been referred to a poet—not Mr. William Morris—who immediately embalmed it in the following lines:—

> No doubt he might be the most happy of men
> If he lived in the manner suggested, but then
> He might write with his shovel and dig with his pen.

We cannot but think this a danger against which freethought would do well to provide.

The last three papers deal with the problem of sex. Its solution is clear enough. From the fact that everybody will be bound to labour it follows that women will be bound to labour. But the mother of a family cannot labour well, or always. Therefore women will not be allowed to be mothers of families, except in certain cases. Therefore marriage will become unsuitable to the necessities of the time. Therefore it will be abolished. Then the unmarried women will become as strong as men, and labour as well as men, and get paid equally well by the State. This female capacity of physical development is an article of freethought. But in order to preserve the race of men from extinction some families will be desirable. Therefore some ladies will be privileged to become mothers. This will take up a good deal of their time, and the State will make them an allowance as if they were doing ordinary work with shovels or pens. Each mother would be allowed a certain number of children, say three on an average. "Some women would doubtless have more, others less or none; in such cases there might well be a communal balance, a sanctioned addition to the local average; but for each sanctioned birth it would be the duty of the commune or State to contribute a certain annual sum for the maintenance of the mother while child-bearing and rearing incapacitated her for other social labour." The only thing about this noble device which freethought has not deigned to make quite clear is what would be done to a baby which had the temerity to make its appearance without its birth having been "sanctioned." The giving of sanctions would agreeably and usefully occupy that part of Sir Charles Warren's successor's mornings—he would be shovelling in the afternoon—which he did not devote to looking after the unpardonably anti-social rogues who cut the linings of railway carriages. This picture is the last that can be alluded to here in justification of Mr. Pearson's boast that "We [freethinkers] are full of new emotions, new passions, new thoughts; our age is not one of pettiness and lust, but replete with clearer and nobler ideas than the past, ideas that its sons will generate and its daughters bring to birth [with the permission, we presume, of the Commissioner of Police]." They are marching on to "freedom of thought, and freedom of labour [both with shovel and pen], and freedom of sex," though not to freedom of multiplication. Mr. Pearson begins his first lecture by remarking that "There are periods of a man's life when it is better for him to be silent—to listen to others rather than to preach himself." There are, and in some men's lives they are long periods.

NATURAL RESOURCES OF THE UNITED STATES.*

PROFESSOR PATTON has written a concise account of the natural resources of the United States, and as his aim has been to instruct his fellow-countrymen at large as to the means of progress with which nature has provided them, he has avoided details that only concern those engaged in trade or industry, and has compiled a volume of general interest. His work is well arranged, and, though many of his sentences are, to say the least, badly put together, he expresses his meaning clearly enough. As his statements are, he tells us, based on ninety-four volumes of Reports sent him by thirty-one Governors of States and Territories, some of the volumes being over a thousand pages long, his book must have cost him an immense deal of trouble, and may, we suppose, be accepted as trustworthy. He begins with the coal-fields of the United States; points out the extent and character of each, and devotes a chapter to exhibiting the contrast that exists between the coal supplies of Europe and of America. Each of the natural resources of the country is treated in turn; and in many cases the leading incidents in the history of the operations that have been applied to them are briefly related. Most people will like to read of the various methods of obtaining gold—by beach-mining, placer-mining, the hydraulic process, and quartz-mining—which are described here. Professor Patton writes in a complacently religious spirit; he reminds his readers that the providential care that has stored the States with such ample resources is to be praised in that it has, "under peculiar circumstances, called a Christian people—lovers of liberty, civil and religious—to occupy this goodly land," and refers them to a History of his own for the circumstances. We are not acquainted with this doubtless valuable work, and are not aware that the earliest settlers in America were conspicuous for their love of religious liberty. A dweller in a Goshen which has "an oil territory of 150,000 square miles" is perhaps naturally inclined to have pleasing thoughts concerning the virtues of his own people, but we believe that others less highly blest are not necessarily greater sinners; and, when we are told that "in the Old World diamonds and other jewels are used only for show and ostentation, and valued as such by royal families and heads of empire" (sic), we cannot but ask what use is made of them and why they are valued by those members of the specially favoured nation who have "struck ile"?

THE OLD BAMBOO-HEWER'S STORY.†

THIS work consists of (1) a translation of the Old Bamboo-hewer's Story; (2) a transliteration of the original text into Roman letters; (3) a sketch of Japanese grammar; (4) analytical notes on the text; and (5) a vocabulary of the text. Although it is, therefore, singularly complete, it lacks one thing—the text in the original character. It is obvious, however, that this is not omitted by an oversight; but that the translator desires to demonstrate how completely the transliteration can be made to serve the part of the original text.

In the deluge of new ideas which have of late years swept over Japan, it need not surprise us to find that the wisdom of maintaining the current syllabic writing has been called in question. When old faiths and ancient customs are thrown to the winds, it is difficult to find arguments in support of a system of writing which is both cumbrous and equivocal. When first the Japanese learned from the Chinese the use of letters they, with characteristic ingenuity, adopted contracted forms of forty-seven Chinese characters to represent the syllables of their language, and at the same time with curious unwisdom adopted cursive forms of other characters to represent the same sounds. But, further, to make confusion worse confounded, they paid their instructors the compliment of taking over bodily their writing and their literature. There are thus three ways of writing Japanese—(1) with the forty-seven contracted Chinese, or Katagana, characters; (2) with the cursive forms of other Chinese, or Hiragana, characters; and (3) with the Chinese characters pure and simple. Every schoolboy has to learn these three systems, and his studies are complicated by the fact that, while the first two systems are phonetic, the third is mainly ideographic.

But we have not yet reached the end of the difficulties which surround Japanese writing. For although, as has just been said, the Chinese characters are mainly used ideographically, they may at the discretion of the writer be made to represent either the mere sounds of the Chinese words which they signify or the mere sounds of the Japanese words which they signify. To give an example—the Chinese character meaning "heaven," and pronounced T'ien, when occurring in a Japanese text may either be read according to an old Chinese pronunciation, Ten, "heaven," or as the Japanese word for the same meaning, Ame, or as simply representing the sounds of Ten or Ame, apart from their meaning. This is much as if our letters consisted of signs such, for instance, as &, which, let us suppose, might either be read "and" or "et," or as the syllables "a n d" or "e t," and so be used in such combinations as h& = hand, or &iam = etiam.

Surely no greater benefit could be conferred on a people bound in such philological chains than to strike off their fetters, and set them free in the simple path of an alphabetic system. This is what Mr. Dickins and those who are acting with him are striving to do, and we rejoice to see that the seed they have sown has fallen upon good ground, and that already a promising literature, of which the present work is a specimen, is springing up freed from the complications hitherto inherent in everything written in Japanese.

But in making these remarks we have violated the order in which the contents of the work before us are arranged. In strict sequence we should first have spoken of the English version of the Story of the Bamboo-hewer, which is one of those Japonicized Chinese tales with which students of Japanese folklore are familiar. It is worthy of special note, however, from the facts that it is the earliest work of the kind which is known to be extant, and that it possesses a charm and an interest beyond those which characterize most Japanese stories. In the course of his labours the woodman of the tale finds in a bamboo-stem a heavenly infant, whom he takes home, and who fills his cottage with beauty and light. In process of time the infant grows into a most lovely damsel, whose beauty attracts the homage of high and low, rich and poor. But to none does the maiden vouchsafe any encouragement, and on those who persist in their pleadings she imposes propitiatory tasks which it is beyond the power of man to accomplish. Even the Mikado is smitten by the charms of the "sphere-descended maid," and, though he throws his handkerchief to her, she remains resolute in her determination not to ally herself with any being of mortal mould. At length a change comes over her—and here the story is faulty. There is no reason given why at this time more than at any other she should desire to return to her home in the capital of the moon. But such is her wish, and, though every effort is made to tempt her to remain on earth, she returns to her abode beyond the sky, escorted by "the minions of the moon."

In translating this story Mr. Dickins has very happily rendered the spirit of the original, and has added two coloured plates which are excellent specimens of native art. But from a student's point of view the most valuable chapter in the work is that which contains a sketch of Japanese grammar. Of late years much has been written about Japanese grammar, but unfortunately its exponents have hitherto approached it through the medium of the works of native grammarians who know as much about the science of grammar as a Zoroastrian does of the science of religion. It is gratifying, therefore, to find in Mr. Dickins's pages a clear and concise sketch of the grammar as it really is. Being destitute of inflexion, Japanese grammar may be said to consist mainly of syntax. The so-called conjugations of the verb, about which so much has been made, "are nothing more than systems of locution, more or less agglutinated, having modal and temporal functions." A peculiarity which characterizes Japanese, in common with the Dravidian languages, is the existence of the negative form of the verb, and it is interesting to observe that the same negative suffix is used in Tamil and Telugu as in Japanese.

A vocabulary of the text brings this valuable little work to a close. It is not to be supposed that it will command the attention of a wide public; but it is eminently a volume which is fitted for the hands of those who are interested in the study of the folklore and language of Japan.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF THOMAS BETTERTON.*

THANKS to the brilliant pictures left us by a series of critics beginning with Pepys, including Colley Cibber and Southerne, and ending with Pope, Betterton presents to the present generation a physiognomy more lifelike and recognizable than that of any actor previous to Garrick. It is a part of the dangerous and seductive birthright of the actor that men of judgment and capacity shall, in chronicling his doings, exhibit an over-ruling affection not wholly unlike that which mothers evince in describing their infant offspring. To poet or painter we dole out our praise with more regard to our reputation for sanity of judgment than to his advantage. We scrutinize his passport for any flaw in description or visa, and once even we have admitted him into the Walhalla we watch his proceedings and comment his present with his past, as though we should be thankful to find that we had been mistaken. No such churlishly-accorded reception is given the actor. Half a dozen or more biographies of him are written during his lifetime, and if he has not in the homage he receives a foretaste of immortality the fault is not ours. Unwise and even culpable as are these proceedings, the world is probably the gainer in the end. Remove the figure of Garrick as it is seen in the records of others, and not, it must be remembered, except to a limited extent, in his own doings, from the circle comprising Johnson, Goldsmith, Reynolds, and Burke, and a very perceptible darkening of its brilliancy would be the result. More than one of the men named is, moreover, at his best when he is praising, or even when he is goodnaturedly blaming, his histrionic associate. Without the warm-hearted expression of contemporary approval, moreover, what could we know of the men who were the delight of our ancestors? Without Lamb's rhapsody to whom would Dicky Suett be more than a name? Without the analyses of Steele, the tribute of Pepys, and the worship of Cibber, Betterton would be scarcely more of a recognizable entity than Burbadge.

* Natural Resources of the United States. By Jacob Harris Patton, M.A., Ph.D. New York and London: Appleton & Co. 1888.

† The Old Bamboo-Hewer's Story: the Earliest of the Japanese Romances, written in the Tenth Century. Translated, with Observations and Notes, by F. Victor Dickins. London: Trübner & Co. 1888.

* The Life and Times of Thomas Betterton. By the Author and Editor of the Lives of Mrs. Abington, James Quin, &c. &c. London: Reeder.

As things stand, however, we have reason to be thankful. We know as much of the life of Betterton as we do of that of any contemporary, including that most expansive of chroniclers, Pepys. His character stands forth worthy of admiration, and his defects and shortcomings are open to our censure. Those facts concerning Betterton which the muse of Cibber was too fine a lady to pick up, that of Tony Aston, a graceless but clever hussy, has preserved for us. We have thus Cibber's marvellous criticism beginning, "Betterton was an actor as Shakspeare was an author, both without competitors." This bold assertion is followed by many consecutive pages of analysis and eulogy. Side by side with this must be read the running comment of Aston, who, owning Betterton to be "a superlative good actor," dwells upon his "ill figure," with "a great head, a short, thick neck, stooped in the shoulders, and . . . fat, short arms which he rarely lifted higher than his stomach." Add to these things "little eyes and a broad face a little pock-fretten, a corpulent body and thick legs, with large feet," and we have a good idea of the physiognomy of the man and of the difficulties he had to overcome in order to be the greatest tragedian of his time. The centuries, moreover, are bridged for us, and Dibdin gives us the opinion of Steed, a prompter who lived to be eighty, and saw both Betterton and Garrick, and, in spite of the inclination to admire the things known in the impressionable period of youth, said that Betterton, taking everything into account, was not the equal of Garrick. The eulogies of Pepys, of Addison, and of Steele add to the blaze of light in which Betterton stands before us.

Is, then, a new Life requisite? The compiler of the latest Life of Betterton answers the question in the affirmative. To the reader new lives of actors, as of authors, of soldiers, or of any men of eminence, are welcome if they do either of two things—if they supply new information, or if they arrange in a pleasant shape materials already in existence, and make the hero the centre of a more or less brilliant and attractive presentation of the life of his epoch. The latter has been the aim of the writer now under notice. There is no temptation to be severe upon a man who has done his best, even when the best is somewhat less than indifferent. One qualification for a task is, however, indispensable. The volume before us is a mere compilation from Cibber, Malone, Downes, Genest, the Biographia Britannica, and other sources, with no more pretence to shapeliness than to knowledge or accuracy. At some pains to disparage his predecessors, our author has added nothing to them, even when the materials were to be had for the taking. "No Life, properly so called, of that great actor, Thomas Betterton, has yet been published." This is the opening statement of his preface, and may pass. Following it comes the assertion that "In 1710 was published a small book by one Gildon, called a Life of Betterton," which is declared to be a "sort of rhapsody." Poor enough is this so-called Life of Betterton. It is, however, a little hard upon its unavowed author, who is also the author of many other Lives, serious or satirical, of essays and poems without number, and the compiler of a Complete Art of Poetry, to speak of him as one Gildon. A man who has been crystallized into infamy by Pope and Fielding acquires a sort of reputation. Men become memorable by their sufferings or their crimes. Almost as well might we say one Bavius, or even one Judas. The "History of the English Stage," announced by Curll as written by Betterton, is said to be similar in size to the Life of Betterton "and not only as deficient in biographical material, but almost as impossible in some of the few particulars attempted of such a nature." Here, however, the criticism is not very happy. Curll, with characteristic audacity, assigned to Betterton a work in which the actor had no direct hand, and which supplies some preposterous assertions with regard to Betterton himself. Still the book is not without value, and is believed to be compiled from the papers of Betterton by Oldys the antiquary.

Now this fact, had our author known it, should surely have been mentioned. It is precisely the absence of this sort of information that disqualifies him for the task he essays. He can copy documents from Malone or Gildon, or casts from Downes or Genest, but the result is without interest. Reference to books immediately accessible would have supplied abundant particulars concerning Betterton which a biographer must on no account omit from a life. Thus it seems that Betterton was not only apprentice to a bookseller, Holden or Rhodes, as is variously stated, but was assumably in business as a bookseller himself, and that at a period, 1660-1661, after he was a recognized actor. Of Betterton's marriage with Mary Saunderson, the licence for which, it has recently been discovered, was taken out the 24th of December, 1662, only the slightest mention is made. After saying that the received tradition is that Mrs. Saunderson was the great English actress, the writer adds, "This Mrs. Saunderson was the lady whom Betterton subsequently married," and he then diverges to supply the information that "Mistress was the title given to unmarried ladies before the Revolution (?); Miss was understood in olden times to mean a woman of pleasure; many mistakes have been made about this, and much confusion caused." All mention is spared of the visit paid by Betterton at royal command—assumably about 1662—to Paris for the purpose of seeing what portion of the French mise en scène could be conveniently adapted to English use. In the course of this visit Betterton must have seen the performances of Molière's company and of Molière himself, and the result of his trip is distinctly visible in his dramatic compositions. That Mrs. Betterton was, according to the judgment of Colley Cibber, in some respects better in Lady Macbeth than Mrs. Barry, that she taught Queen Anne when Princess the rôle of Semandra in Mithridates, and that she gave lessons to the Princess Mary and to Sarah Jennings, afterwards Duchess of Marlborough, with other similar matter of the sort, is surely worthy of mention. That Betterton, after the loss of his fortune through his friend Sir Francis Watson, adopted the daughter of the man to whom he owed his ruin, is so characteristic a trait one can scarcely understand its omission. Prudery or respect for the memory of Betterton is perhaps the reason why the fact is not chronicled that in 1698 he and Mrs. Bracegirdle were fined for using indecent and profane expressions. Too much must not be built upon this business. After the publication of Collier's famous Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage 1698, a desperate effort was made to cleanse the Augean stable. Betterton and Mrs. Bracegirdle were thus proceeded against, not as the chief offenders, but as the most representative. Punishment inflicted upon them would not fail to be deterrent as regards others. The one grave accusation laid against Betterton is that, in bringing about in 1682 the fusion of the two great companies, which was due to royal influence, and was doubtless suggested by the establishment two years earlier of the Comédie Française, he performed an act that was mean and almost dishonest. In regard to no other action has his conduct been seriously impugned. A portrait of Betterton by Pope the poet is still at Caen Wood, the seat at Highgate of Lord Mansfield. Instead of stating facts such as these, the writer supplies pages of highly coloured and inaccurate matter from Dr. Doran. In one case this authority betrays him into a complete error when he speaks of Betterton's remains as "being interred with much pomp and ceremony." "Decency," or "a decent manner," is the expression used by contemporary or early writers, such as Gildon or Whincop.

The compiler has, in fact, attempted a task beyond his knowledge or his strength. His book is a useful compendium of stage documents, and we have much information not easily accessible elsewhere. For general purposes it may serve, and it is at least as correct and trustworthy as many of the biographies of actors with which it is intended to range.

BOOK-PRICES CURRENT.*

IN this volume Mr. Elliot Stock has reprinted a selection from the priced catalogues of books sold by auction between the 1st of December, 1886, and the 26th of November, 1887—that is to say, for a period of twelve months. As far as our experience goes the idea is a novel one, and Mr. Stock has increased its usefulness by adding an alphabetical index. Having gone so far, it is a pity he did not go further, and prefix a few pages of introduction upon the comparative values of different books and editions as revealed by their latest prices in the market. And we think also—although this is perhaps a debatable point—that it would have been better to make these lists more rigidly eclectic. To the book collector it is of considerable interest to know what is the current value of (say) Herrick's Hesperides and Noble Numbers, eds. 1647-8, particularly if they be enriched by the autograph of Tom Warton, and bound tastefully by Lewis in imitation of beer-bibbing Roger Payne. Nor is he incurious respecting the famous Lyons (1538) issue of Les simulachres & Historiées Faces de la Mort, avtant elegammēt pourtraictes, que artificiellement imaginées, in extra gilt morocco, by Thibaron-Echaubard, whose "highly respectable name" is new to us; nor even as regards Mr. Thomas Chippendale his "exceedingly scarce" Gentleman and Cabinet-makers' Director, in its folio of 1762. But the prices of the English Cyclopædia, or the Complete Works of Ouida, or even the second edition of Chatto's Treatise on Wood Engraving, are certainly matters which need but faintly stir his enthusiasm. Intrusions of this kind, it is true, are by no means frequent. The cardinal rule of a book of this description, as it seems to us, is that it shall be confined to works which, from some reason, internal, external, or accidental, are, as far as it is possible to judge, likely to increase in value. The first, or 1839, edition of Mr. Chatto's excellent book will always command a respectable price; but, unless it is annotated in MS. by Mr. Ruskin or Mr. W. J. Linton, or bound in some extravagant fashion by Riviere or Bedford, it is impossible to see why the second edition should be a whit more desirable than the third, which is a reprint of it in every respect. Again, by its very nature, an Encyclopædia is foredoomed to the butterman from the day of its birth; and its progress can only be retarded, if at all, by the merit of special contributions. And really meritorious contributions to Encyclopædias are usually reprinted in more convenient form. For the third or fourth-rate novelist who courts the immortality of a record here there is but one receipt. Get yourself, my dear sir or madam, illustrated by Du Maurier or Sambourne, and you will be saved, as Pope says of Quarles, "by Beauties not your own." Without pictures would Rookwood, or St. James's, or Old St. Paul's attract the connoisseur nowadays? We trow not. As it is, so long as there are Cruikshank collectors, the value of Mr. Ainsworth's romances must steadily increase.

* Book-Prices Current: a Record of the Prices at which Books have been sold at Auction from December, 1886, to November, 1887. London: Elliot Stock. 1888.

With few exceptions, the "prices current" here recorded, it should be observed, are the prices paid for books at sales by booksellers intending to retail them at a profit. They do not in all probability represent anything like the prices which would be asked for the same books over the counter—prices in which "taste and fancy" must naturally have their place. But, on the whole, they afford a fair criterion of the sums which those in the trade think may safely be ventured in order to secure a reasonable percentage of gain, and they enable the book-collector to average the contents of his library with approximate accuracy. For example, one may gauge pretty nearly the net value of first editions of the eighteenth-century classics. Richardson, it is true, is absent in this form from Mr. Stock's chronicle. But Fielding's Tom Jones is quoted at 5*l.*, and Amelia at from 1*l.* to 1*l.* 8*s.* A solitary copy of the latter book at 4*l.* 4*s.* is mentioned; but in this case there must have been refinements of condition. Joseph Andrews, which is rather rare, has no record; and there is nothing of Smollett's. Sterne's Sentimental Journey is priced at 2*l.* 2*s.*, Tristram Shandy at 3*l.* 15*s.* Of Goldsmith there are only a specially decorated copy of the Beauties of English Poesy, "with landscape-paintings on the fore edges"—a feature which doubtless justified the exceptional outlay of 13*l.*—and the dubious Tract on the Cock Lane Ghost (The Mystery Revealed), which for some occult reason found bidders enthusiastic enough to run it up to 2*l.* and 2*l.* 4*s.* A very nice example of this was, to our knowledge, purchased quite recently at 4*s.* 6*d.* A special Gulliver's Travels, bound by Bedford, brought 12*l.* 18*s.*; but good ordinary copies were to be procured from 3*l.* to 3*l.* 5*s.* Gay and Addison make no show, and Pope is represented only by editions with MS. notes which afford no trustworthy evidence of the market price.

It would be easy to make a long article out of these considerations. But we have no intention of writing a "Postscript by Way of Preface" to Mr. Stock's very suggestive volume. We shall conclude by comparing a few of the current prices of French eighteenth-century illustrated books, as here disclosed, with those given in M. Henry Cohen's excellent Guide de l'Amateur de Livres à Vignettes. The Ovid of the Abbé Banier, 1767-71, with plates after Boucher, Eisen, Gravelot, Moreau, and the rest, and clad "in old morocco," M. Cohen prices at from 800 to 1,000 francs. Mr. Quaritch appears to have bought a copy, "in old russia," for 20*l.*, which is considerably less. The Kehl edition of Voltaire by Beaumarchais, 1784-9, with proof portraits, &c. by Moreau, Cohen values at from 2,500 to 3,000 francs. Mr. Toovey acquired the whole seventy volumes in large paper at Sotheby's in December 1886, bound by Bisiaux in red morocco with silk linings, for 23*l.* 10*s.* The Heptaméron français, with the title-page of 1792, and Freudenberg's designs, M. Cohen quotes "at 500 or 600, and more in morocco." Mr. Parsons of Brompton Row, nevertheless, became the possessor of a copy for 8*l.* 8*s.* Dorat's Baisers, by Eisen and Marillier, 1770, an eighteenth-century chef-d'œuvre, fine impressions of which, "en papier de Hollande," fetch from 1,200 to 1,300 francs, is here valued at 2*l.* 15*s.*; while for the "Farmer-General" edition of the Contes et Nouvelles de La Fontaine, 1762, of which the average cost in morocco is 800 to 1,200 francs, Mr. Quaritch paid 31*l.* 10*s.* and another London bookseller 34*l.* 10*s.* We close the list with the Decameron. M. Cohen puts the Italian edition of 1757, with its engravings after Eisen, Boucher, and Gravelot, at from 300 to 400 francs; and the French (Le Maçon's translation), with the same engravings and date, at from 500 to 600 francs. Copies of the former were sold in London in 1886-7 at 5*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* and 8*l.* 10*s.*, of the latter at 9*l.* and 21*l.* The obvious moral of all this is, either that M. Cohen's prices are no longer accurate or that it is, generally, cheaper to buy these books in England than in France.

A BOOK ABOUT DUMAS.*

THE life of Alexander Maximus has yet to be written as a whole. Numbers of men have told what they knew of one or other part of it; Alexander himself has enriched us with some ten or a dozen volumes of Mémoires which take rank with the brightest, the most charming, the most artistic of his works; but to produce a full-length portrait of the "Titan débraillé," as some one has called him, is, so far, a task which none has been able to accomplish. M. Philibert Audebrand's new volume, Alexandre Dumas à la Maison d'Or, is yet another partial contribution to the literature of the subject. More than that, it is one of the best which have appeared. M. Audebrand, whose feeling for Dumas is everything that could be desired, writes with ease, vivacity, and point; he has a great deal to say that is worth hearing; he deals with a certain passage in the master's life which, so far as we know, has not before been fully illustrated; and in descanting on the sun he tells of a crowd of minor lights, from Gérard de Nerval and Roger de Beauvoir to swindlers like Max de Goritz and Bohemians of the type of the lamented Privat d'Anglemont. He was, in brief, a contributor to Le Mousquetaire, the journal founded by Dumas on his return from exile in 1853; and it is of the band of writers who were gathered in the offices of the paper, Rue Laffitte, some five-and-thirty years ago, that he discourses to us to-day.

Le Mousquetaire was not a journal like the Figaro or the Temps; it was a literary daily, and the idea that it was possible, even in Paris—the centre of wit, the lantern of the world, the navel of the universe—to get copy enough to furnish it forth was, to the great man's enemies, who were neither few nor silent, mere midsummer madness. M. Audebrand thinks, however, that the scheme was a good one, and that, if the founder of Le Mousquetaire had so willed, Le Mousquetaire would have been living still, and therewithal "le journal le plus aimé de notre époque." Dumas himself was of the same opinion. The thing would live, he said, "précisément parceque c'est un journal impossible." The moment was well chosen. It was in the early days of the Empire; Hugo, Michelet, Proud'hon, Edgar Quinet, had been stricken voiceless; some thirty journals had been suppressed; such prints as lived were subject to an examining Committee, "qui les menaçait sans cesse de mort"; it was expected that Dumas, who had never been found wanting in courage, and whose very title was a promise and a challenge, would break the solemn silence which had been secured by the massacres of the Second December and the tremendous proscriptions of the next days. The prospectus of the journal, a part of which M. Audebrand is careful to quote, was something of a disappointment. Dumas announced in it that he proposed to continue his Mémoires, which would get more personal and more compromising as they went on; he promised to criticize the critics, to look to the true interests of literature and art, to keep authority in the right way, to make order out of chaos and light out of darkness; and he professed himself willing and ready, in the event of reprisals from the other side, to accept the responsibility of his words, and to carry on the combat to the end. That, it was felt, was not enough; but Dumas was still Dumas—was still, that is to say, the dramatist of Antony and Térésa and Richard Darlington, and the novelist of Bragelonne and La Dame de Monsoreau, and half a score more—and the day after the issue of his prospectus there were five hundred subscriptions on the books of the journal, while in less than two months he had achieved a circulation of six thousand and a subscription list four thousand strong. He had looked to four or five times as great a result; and as his theory of Le Mousquetaire was that it was to be, above all, amusing, it is probable enough that, had he been able to manage the purely commercial part of the enterprise as well as he supplied its literary needs, he would not have been disappointed. But of management, man of action as he was, he never knew so much as the beginning of the alphabet. His idea of editing a journal was to sit in a garret, and write for ten or a dozen hours a day, while the rest of his contributors smoked cigarettes, and babbled of things in general in the offices below. The first of his cashiers, a certain Martinet, was an incapable of the first water. M. Audebrand declares that he had absolutely no knowledge of book-keeping, and that his accounts were kept on slips of paper stuck together with pins. Of course there was never any money in the house, and Martinet, who was about as competent to nurse the enterprise into health and vigour as his master was to take an interest in any but its literary elements, was neither the man to get it, nor the man to handle it if it could have been got. In two months or so he retired from his post, and then, says M. Audebrand, "c'était le chaos régularisé, l'anarchie de P.-J. Proud'hon mise en pratique dans un coin de Paris." Nothing like it, he opines, has ever been seen "depuis le monde est monde." How and when did Le Mousquetaire start into daily life? What was the secret of its appearance every evening, well and legibly printed on excellent paper, in all the completeness of its dozen columns and its seventy thousand letters? The door stood always open, but none ever saw a soul go in or come out; there was never a brass farthing in the cash-box; the means of distribution were as mysterious as the wages of the staff were fantastic and illusory; to this hour M. Audebrand, though he has pondered the problem with all the strength of his mind, has never been able to arrive at a satisfactory solution. The staff, to do them justice, were not greatly exercised by the question of the want of funds. The master promised them glory and gold, and never paid them a halfpenny-piece; but "vingt volontaires se pressaient pour tirer de leurs poches une abondance d'articles, et d'articles souvent très-bons." Banville, Gérard de Nerval, Méry, Octave Feuillet, Paul Bocage, Hector de Saint-Maur, Aurélien Scholl, Jules de Saint-Félix, Adolphe Dupeuty, "Marie Michon" (the Comtesse Dash)—to name but these—all followed the great man's lead, all worked their best for him, took what they could get (which was not much), and waited cheerfully for better times. They never came, these better times. Dumas who seems to have looked back upon the first night of Henri Trois et sa Cour as the only possible type of life for him, got tired of "filling his painful reams" in the garret of the Maison d'Or. He went shooting, or he made a play, or he went to see a friend in the country; and the journal had to do as best it could without him. Presently it subsided, and there was an end of the whole concern. The Mousquetaire, its staff, its public, its reputation, its circulation, went off like a puff of smoke, and Dumas was left to travel that downward way, among the last trouvailles of which are Les Mohicans de Paris and Isaac Laquedem, La Terreur Prussienne, and the drama called Les Blancs et les Bleus. By this time he had done his best; and what he was afterwards to do, while now and then quite worthy of him, is, on the whole, a bad second to such stuff as Antony and Bragelonne. But he seems to have had to the end the admiration of his staff and the adoration of his henchmen. Paul Bocage, the nephew of the great actor—his collaborator in Le Marbrier and Les Mohicans de Paris and Romulus and L'Invitation à la Valse—could never speak to or write of him except as the maestro; while, as for the Jew Hirschler, who was his financier-in-ordinary, and had helped him out of a dozen difficult, not to say impossible, passes, he was wont, says M. Audebrand, to discourse of the author of the Mousquetaires in terms that were nothing less than lyrical. "Il y a plus d'or dans sa tête," quoth Hirschler, "que dans tous les sables de Californie. Son cœur? Un bureau de bienfaisance, ouvert à deux battants à tous ceux qui souffrent." Hirschler was right, and Paul Bocage was right. If genius and goodness combined would have sufficed—as a number of intelligent people supposed they might—to make Le Mousquetaire a success, then Le Mousquetaire would have been, as M. Audebrand has said, the most popular and one of the oldest of French journals.

* Alexandre Dumas à la Maison d'Or. Par Philibert Audebrand. London: Nutt; Paris: Calmann Lévy. 1888.

But the sense of conduct was wanting. At fifty Dumas appears to have had but two sources of amusement in life. The one was work—the ten or twelve hours of daily toil in a wretched room, with the dun at the door, and the printer's devil on the stairs, from which he derived those "âcres voluptés" of which this idlest of men (as he was to the champions of the new school—the school of Flaubert and the brothers Goncourt) appears to have made a speciality. The other was woman; and of this the best is to say nothing. Between the two, Le Mousquetaire—brilliantly written, but impossibly conducted—was fated, from the first, to come to a speedy end. It lived longer than the master's enemies had hoped; and it stirred up and discussed many more ideas than even his friends perhaps had believed it would. But it came at last to a last number; and M. Audebrand, who must have suffered (with many others) in its collapse, has no worse word for the prime author of its failure than "ce grand enfant." At the Salon of this year of grace, 1888, there are three or four portraits of "le père Dumas"; M. Audebrand is only one of several who delight to do him honour; it would seem that the reaction in his favour has set in—though this would be, we admit, difficult—with a severity against which there must presently be an appeal.

When Martinet departed this life as the cashier of Le Mousquetaire, his place was taken—by an inspiration of the editor's—by that Michel of whom we read so much in that most charming of the merely Dumasistic cycle of Dumasisms, L'Histoire de mes Bêtes. Michel could neither read nor write; of Monte Cristo he had been the Caleb Balderstone—the sworn foe of all bearers of printed paper; the poacher who could now and then play keeper and carry the second gun of a master devoted to "la chasse"; the servant "high of heart, bloody of hand," who on all desperate occasions was still found on a level with the facts of the case. That he should have become the cashier and accountant-in-chief of Le Mousquetaire is merely significant—he was a collaborator of Dumas; and could any one who thus collaborated present himself before posterity in other than a joyous light? The inexhaustible good humour, the naïve and generous charity of the Prodigal Son of Romanticism, is enough to make us think something of even the wretched Max de Goritz—the "translator-in-chief" (as he was described in the prospectus of Le Mousquetaire) of the writer whom Mr. Stevenson has qualified, with singular infelicity, as "the great French thief." Max de Goritz introduced himself to Dumas, at Brussels, as a persecuted Hungarian; he was taken on as a paid translator; he followed his chief to Paris, and helped him to (among other things) a good selection from the admirable wit and journalist, Saphir; his wife—a blue-eyed and delightful blonde—contrived to inflict on M. Audebrand himself (for an instant) a belief in her claim to be considered a daughter of that Duc de Richemont who was perhaps the most plausible of the many Dauphins who escaped from Simon and the Temple to the bewilderment of posterity; and he turned out to be a forger, a thief, a person who, at a pinch, would not stick at murder itself. M. Audebrand tells us some queer things of some queer folk; but he tells us of nothing more queer than the "translator-in-chief" of the immortal founder and editor of Le Mousquetaire.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE new volume (1) of those collected essays which M. Barbey d'Aurevilly has been publishing at intervals for more than twenty years justifies, like most of the others, both the engouement which divers good judges have expressed for the author during his sixty-five years of literary work, and also the failure of that work as yet to make much mark on the general. Whether, like De Quincey, whom in more respects than one he resembles, M. Barbey d'Aurevilly will make up after death the sum of honour refused to him during his life, we cannot say. But, if he does, there is not a little in this volume which will help him to do so. The paper on Carlyle is (granting the point of view) notable, and in many of the others there are flashes of happy phrase and just criticism—not to mention the constant presence of the author's curious and artificial, but very distinct and remarkable, style.

It does not appear that M. Maurice Talmeyr has had any unworthy motive in adapting Restif's (he spelt it so himself, and so do we) novel or novels (2). Of all the odd relationships of origin or suggestion between this work, the Paysan parvenu of Marivaux, and the similarly related work of Richardson and Fielding, M. Talmeyr says nothing at all, and his adaptation does not strike us as altogether happy. One loses something, no doubt, of Restif's intolerable prolixity; but, somehow, much that is characteristic goes too. Nor do we think that in any case the author's handling of his imaginatively caricatured experiences in the Paysan and the Paysanne is equal to the later rehandling of the same at still greater length in Monsieur Nicolas, while as a novel the book is absurd. It is, however, very moral in its own crack-brained way, though it is hardly necessary to say that, being Restif's, its details are not "gauzed," but very much the reverse.

It is not necessary to do much more than mention the fact that the first volume of a new and cheap edition of M. Legouvé's plays (3) has appeared. It contains three dramas, of which one at least has assured itself of remembrance, or has been assured thereof by the genius of its performers. Louise de Lignerolles and Par droit de conquête are estimable pieces enough in their way, no doubt; but who knows not Adrienne Lecouvreur?

The ingenious and indefatigable M. Alfred Franklin has added two more volumes (4) to his collections on what may be called in the widest sense the "furniture" of life in the France of old time. Here you may read and see—for there are illustrations—how "a shepherd interrogated the sky" (probably to find out whether the shepherd's hour had come) in the fifteenth century. The instrument looks better fitted to interrogate the bottom of a river, being a cord with a weight attached. Here is a really beautiful Renaissance clock for an ordinary room, and some of those eighteenth-century devices for making a watch look as if it were something else—a cross, a snuff-box, or what not—which have been with dubious wisdom imitated in the present day. Here, too, are lists of famous watchmakers of old. Cookery lends itself less to illustration, but quite as well to the collection of "divers facts," and even better to the assembling of words capable of deceiving the very elect. There can, of course, be no doubt that "hutaudeux" was the original of the Scotch "howtowdie," though in migrating the bird seems to have changed its sex. But who knows offhand what a "musel de bœuf" is in the kitchen-battery sense? How do you "george" a thing ("brouet georgié de char")? Let us give all honour to M. Franklin for having actually tried some of the appalling receipts to which he refers. The "gallimaufry," however, which he tried seems as if it ought to have made a fair dish of minced mutton.

With the thoroughgoing Balzacien it is matter of breviary, of course, that Balzac knew all about womankind and mankind too. There be who doubt, supporting their abominable infidelity by certain naïf confessions in his letters as well as by the Comédie. However, both classes may be grateful to M. Gabriel Deville (5) for making a careful selection of passages on the subject, rather ingeniously classified.

We have before us two small volumes of verse which complete each other pleasantly enough. M. Manuel's (6) selection of his own verse is very far from being either a mere school book or a book of mere poetry for children, but it is of a domestic and amiable character, which does not prevent it from being often admirable as verse. M. Grandmougin (7) prefers the mountain-tops to the valleys, the trump of Hugo to the flute of Lamartine, and he sounds his instrument with undoubting spirit.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

MISS EMILY BOWLES, in Mme. de Maintenon (London: Kegan Paul), has set to work to represent her heroine "as she really was," and in this way to give her an opportunity "to vindicate herself from the slanders principally perpetuated by Saint-Simon and the Duchess of Orleans." To this end she has consulted the Famille d'Aubigné and the Histoire de la Maison Royale de Saint-Cyr of Lavallée, the Histoire of the Duc de Noailles, and Geffroy's Mme. de Maintenon, and she has set forth the knowledge thus obtained with conviction and without enthusiasm, in a style that is neither persuasive nor rebarbative, and, as we think, to so

(1) Les œuvres et les hommes. Les historiens. Par J. Barbey d'Aurevilly. Paris: Quantin.

(2) Le paysan et la paysanne pervertis. Par Rétif de la Bretonne. Adaptation par M. Talmeyr. Paris: Dupret.

(3) Théâtre complet d'Ernest Legouvé. Tome I. Paris: Ollendorff.

(4) La vie privée d'autrefois. La mesure du temps. La cuisine. Par A. Franklin. Paris: Plon.

(5) La femme et l'amour d'après H. de Balzac. Par G. Deville. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(6) Poèmes du foyer et de l'école. Par E. Manuel. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(7) A pleines voiles. Par Ch. Grandmougin. Paris: Lemerre.

little purpose that her book is practically non-existent. She makes no attempt at formal portraiture; but her attitude throughout is that of the believer and the eulogist, and her frame of mind is that of one who can see no wrong where it is believed that no wrong should be. As she has quoted freely from the correspondence of her heroine, her work is not exactly valueless; but that she has contributed any argument of any sort in support of Dr. Döllinger's theory of Maintenon—that she was "the most influential woman in French history"—is a proposition that cannot for one moment be allowed. Her book, in a word, is the book of an amateur; and the amateur in history is perhaps less tolerable than any other where.

Mr. John Freeman's Lights and Shadows of Melbourne Life (London: Sampson Low) is only journalism; but it is not difficult to read, and it contains a good deal of interesting material. Its purpose is decidedly picturesque and "reportorial," but it sets forth some genuine experience, and puts us in touch with a good number of the facts of low-class Melbourne life. Of course the book would have been all the better for a closer likeness to the London Labour and the London Poor of the brothers Mayhew; but, as that was not to be, we must take it for what it is, and make the most of it we can. Among the best chapters in it are those entitled severally "What We Have in Our Midst," "Padding Kens," "Publicans and Sinners," and "The Police Courts." All these are full of information, and may be read with interest and a certain profit. They seem to show that, certain differences of environment apart, the blackguard in Melbourne is substantially the same as his London brother. Mr. Freeman, it is to be noted, is by no means an enthusiast on the difficult subject of colonial beauty. "As a rule," says he of the maidens of Victoria, "they may not be as pretty as their English sisters"; and in his chapter on the Melbourne theatres (which, by the way, is prefaced with a most superfluous dissertation on the origin of the drama) he writes of their complexions in terms which do not permit a doubt as to the popularity among them of all sorts of cosmetics. His notes on the Chinese in Melbourne are neither worthless nor uninteresting; and the same may be said of his excursions into low life in general—of his remarks on oystermen, sweeps, costermongers, flying-stationers, news-runners, saveloy-mongers, and so forth.

In A Fight with Distances (London: Kegan Paul) Mr. J. J. Aubertin tells, with ease to himself and entertainment to his readers, the story of how he went from Liverpool to Quebec, from Quebec to Niagara, and from Niagara, per the Northern Pacific, to Chicago, Minneapolis, Dacota, James Town, Yellowstone Park, Livingston, and Mount Tacoma; of how he traversed British Columbia, got to San Francisco, saw the Yo Semite Valley, and sailed for the Hawaiian Islands; of what he saw and did there, and of how, returning to Frisco, he proceeded, viâ Utah and Albany, to Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Washington; of how he next "did" Florida; and, lastly, of how he sailed for Cuba, and made himself comfortable at Havana and Matanzas, saw Nassau, and came home by way of New York. He appears to have thoroughly enjoyed himself, and his reader enjoys with him. C'est tout dire.

Mrs. Molesworth, in Little Miss Peggy (London: Macmillan), has produced a book for the young which the young, if they at all resemble the old, will scarce regard with enthusiasm. Mr. Frederick Langbridge, in What to Read at Entertainments (London; The Religious Tract Society), departing boldly from the beaten track, has given a number of excerpts from a number of authors—"O. Goldsmith, H. Stretton, Mark Guy Pearse, Charles Dickens, Sir W. Scott, J. B. Gough, J. H. Ewing, and many others," to quote the cover—which may or may not be found entertaining by an audience gathered together to be entertained, but which will certainly tax the reader's power of reading to the utmost. In Sheykh Hassan the Spiritualist (London: Allen) Mr. S. A. Hillam relates some startling experiences, which some will regard as rather poor fiction, while to others they will present themselves as evidence that there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamed of in the philosophy of Herr Paulus and Mr. Sludge. Of the April part of Art and Letters (London and Paris: Boussod & Valadon), it is only necessary to note that it contains, with a "Canzonet" by Mr. Oscar Wilde and a not unpleasing note on Mme. Baretta-Worms (with a portrait) by M. Sarcey, a fairly readable account of the last exhibition at the Mirlitons (with illustrations after MM. Doucet, Detaille, Aimé Morot, Gérôme, Stewart, and others), and a translation of Mme. Bernhardt's The Confession, which is as clever an imitation of a real play as the lady's After the Storm is of real sculpture, and her various water-colours, &c. are of real painting.

We have also received the new volume (October 1887 to March 1888) of Cassell's Saturday Journal (London: Cassell), with serial stories by Mr. Geo. Manville Fenn and Mr. Julian Hawthorne; the tenth issue of The Century Guild Hobby Horse (London: Kegan Paul), with a charming lyric by Miss Christina Rossetti, a discussion of a certain theory of Mr. Pater's by Mr. J. A. Symonds, a good reproduction (in red) of Mr. Sandys's "Miranda," and a couple of notable title-pages in illustration of an interesting note by Mr. A. Pollard; the "Centennial Number" of the Illustrated Sydney News (Sydney: Gibbs), which is crammed with pictures, and appears to be by no means unworthy of the London original; a new edition, being the third, of Mr. W. Gordon's excellent Hints to Young Soldiers (Chatham: Gale & Polden); reprints of Artemus Ward, His Book, in the "Pocket Library" series, and Kenelm Chillingly in the "Pocket Volume" edition (London: Routledge); a reprint in "The Antient and Modern Library of Theological Literature" (London: Griffith) of The Orations of Saint Athanasius; the Descriptive Catalogue of the Collections of Embroidery and Tapestry in the South Kensington Museum (London: Eyre & Spottiswoode), compiled for the Science and Art Department by Mr. A. S. Cole; the first volume of Outline Addresses and Readings (London: Church of England Temperance Publication Depôt) for the Juvenile Union of the Church of England Temperance Society; Religion and Unbelief in Ireland (London: Remington), by the Hon. Leopold Agar-Ellis; a new part, being the thirty-eighth, of Mr. Protāp Chandra Roy's translation of the Mahabharata (Calcutta: Bhārata Press); the Log of the Ladybird (London: Dunthorne), which includes a catalogue of certain water-colours exhibited, or still exhibiting, at the sign of the Rembrandt Head; a new edition (at two shillings) of Mrs. Oliphant's Hester (London: Macmillan); and a new edition of the Life of P. T. Barnum, written by Himself (Buffalo: The Courier Company), which is "Dedicated to the Whole Civilized World in General and the Universal Yankee Nation in Particular," has been so much extended as to be practically a new book, and is illustrated by some of the vilest woodcuts ever seen of mortal eye.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

NOTICE TO ADVERTISERS.

The ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT has been REMOVED from 38 to 33 Southampton Street. All communications respecting ADVERTISEMENTS should therefore be addressed to Mr. JOHN HART, 33 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

THE UNITED STATES.

The Annual Subscription to the SATURDAY REVIEW, including postage to any part of the United States, is £1 10s. 4d., or $7 39, and may be forwarded direct to the Publisher, Mr. WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, or to Mr. B. F. STEVENS, American Agency, 4 Trafalgar Square, London. International Money Orders can be sent from any office in the United States, and Subscriptions, payable in advance, may commence at any time.

The SATURDAY REVIEW is duly registered for transmission abroad.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF NO. 1,697, MAY 5, 1888:

London: Published at 36 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LYCEUM.—Sole Lessee and Manager, Mr. HENRY IRVING.
FAUST To-night, at Eight.
Mephistopheles, Mr. HENRY IRVING; Margaret, Miss ELLEN TERRY.
Box Office (Mr. J. Hurst), 10 to 5. Seats can be booked by letter or telegram.—LYCEUM.

NIAGARA IN LONDON. COLOSSAL PICTURE of the GREAT FALLS. Original Effects, by Philippoteaux. Pleasant Lounge, Music, American Museum, Electric Light. Admission, 1s. No Fees. Ten A.M. to Eleven P.M. WEDNESDAY, 2s. 6d. Ten to Six; 1s. Six to Eleven. Praised by entire Press.—YORK STREET, Westminster. St. James's Park Station.
4,000 Visitors Daily.

FRENCH GALLERY, 120 Pall Mall.—The THIRTY-FIFTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION of PICTURES by ARTISTS of the CONTINENTAL SCHOOLS is NOW OPEN. Admission, 1s.

ROYAL ACADEMY of ARTS.—The EXHIBITION will OPEN on Monday, May 7. Admission (from 8 A.M. to 7 P.M., except on the first day, when it Opens at 10 A.M.), 1s. Catalogues, 1s. and 1s. 6d. Season Tickets, 5s.

THE NEW GALLERY.—The SUMMER EXHIBITION will be OPEN to the Public on WEDNESDAY, May 9.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY.
Admission free.
74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.
(About Twenty Doors West of Mudie's Library.)

On View from Ten to Six daily.

The GREAT MASTERS. Reproduced in Autotype Permanent Photography from the grand Works in the Louvre, Hermitage, Uffizi, Madrid, Sistine Chapel, National Gallery, London, the Royal Collections at Windsor and Buckingham Palace.

The various Galleries have separate Albums, easily looked over, and of great interest to lovers of Art. Visitors are quite welcome to come and study them, and they will not be solicited to make purchases.

For further particulars send for the New Pamphlet, forty pages and four Illustrations, entitled "AUTOTYPE: a Decorative and Educational Art." Free per post to any address.

Just published.

IDYLLS of the NORFOLK BROADS. By P. H. EMERSON, B.A., M.B. 12 Plates in Autogravure, in handsome Portfolio with descriptive letter-press.

Proofs on India paper (limited to 150 Copies)	£1 11 6
Prints on plate paper	1 1 0

Prospectus and all particulars, on application to
THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY, 74 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

PICCADILLY HALL, 34 Piccadilly. Daily Ten till Six. FREE EXHIBITION of rare antique OAK CARVINGS, &c. The famous old carved Oak Choir Stalls and Doorway, from the Carthusian Monastery of Buxheim, Bavaria, date 1600 to 1651; and other most interesting objects. Admission free on presentation of visiting card. Exhibited by J. ICHENHAUSER, of 68 New Bond Street, Specialist in Carved Oak, Sculptured Panellings, &c. &c.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION,
West Brompton, Earl's Court, and West Kensington.

OPENING DAY, SATURDAY, MAY 12th, at 3 P.M.

PATRON.
HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF ITALY.
HON. PRESIDENT.
H.R.H. THE CROWN PRINCE OF ITALY.
DIRECTOR-GENERAL.
JOHN R. WHITLEY, Esq.
PRESIDENT OF THE ENGLISH RECEPTION COMMITTEE.
COL. J. T. NORTH.
PRESIDENT OF THE ITALIAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.
CAV. L. BONACINA.

The First Exclusively ITALIAN EXHIBITION held beyond the boundaries of the Peninsula.

The most valuable and varied Collection of ITALIAN SCULPTURE and PAINTINGS ever exhibited.

Magnificent and unique Display of ITALIAN INDUSTRIES.

THE HUNTING TENT, &c., OF THE LATE KING OF ITALY.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
SCENES FROM ITALY.

ROME IN LONDON.
Roman Market Place. Roman Forum.
Colosseum and Palace of the Cæsars.
Vesuvius, Bay of Naples, and Italian Fleet.
Borghese Gardens. Tuscan Farmhouse.
Capri Blue Grotto. Temple of Vesta.
Italian Government Naval Exhibits.
Venetian Lace Makers. Faenza Pottery Makers.
Venetian Glass Manufactory.
Alpine Switchback Railway.
Venetian Illuminations.
Italian Restaurant and National Dishes.

The Scots Guards Band.
Italian Concerts.
Neapolitan Mandolinists and Singers.
The Celebrated Italian Marionettes.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
Open 11 A.M. to 11 P.M.
Admission to the Exhibition—Opening Day, 5s.; all other days, 1s. No Half-Crown days.
Season Ticket Holders are entitled to admission to the Exhibition on the Opening Day.
Applications for Season Tickets to be made to
VINCENT A. APPLIN, Esq., Secretary.
Single Season Tickets, £1.
Double Season Tickets, admitting Gentleman and Lady, 30s.
Season Tickets for Children (under 10), 10s.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.

ARTISTS' GENERAL BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION for the RELIEF of DISTRESSED ARTISTS, their WIDOWS and ORPHANS.
The ANNIVERSARY DINNER will take place at the "Whitehall Rooms," the Hôtel Métropole, on Wednesday, May 16, at Six o'clock.
The Right Honourable DAVID PLUNKET, Q.C., M.P., in the Chair.
Dinner Tickets, including Wines, One Guinea.
Donations will be received and thankfully acknowledged by
Sir JOHN EVERETT MILLAIS, Bart., R.A., Honorary Secretary.
PHILIP CHARLES HARDWICK, Treasurer.
DOUGLAS H. GORDON, Secretary, 19 St. James's Street, S.W.

TO PARENTS and GUARDIANS.—A GENTLEMAN'S SON, of good education and intelligence, could be received as ARTICLED PUPIL in the Office of a Chartered ACCOUNTANT, in good practice. Premium required.—Apply to A. E. BASTON, F.C.A., 65 Cornmarket Street, Oxford.

MISSION TO DEEP-SEA FISHERMEN.

BRIDGE HOUSE, BLACKFRIARS BRIDGE, E.C.

THE

ANNUAL MEETING

Will be held at EXETER HALL, on WEDNESDAY, MAY 16.

At 2.30 There will be a Recital on the Great Organ by Mr. CHURCHILL SIBLEY, interspersed by Solo Singing.

At 3 The Chair will be taken by Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Bart., K.C.M.G., G.C.S.I., C.I.E., Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs. About 300 SMACKSMEN are expected on the Platform. Admission to the Afternoon Meeting will be by Tickets only, the prices being 10s. 6d., 2s. 6d., 1s., and 6d.

The EVENING MEETING will be

At 7 Under the Presidency of THOMAS GRAY, Esq., C.B., when there will be some new and beautifully painted Dissolving Views—Illustrations of Life in the Trawling Fleets—accompanied by personal testimony of the Smacksmen, with Solo and Chorus Singing. Tickets, 1s. and 6d. each.

DO NOT PINCH THE NOSE BUT GO TO L. K. LEON & CO. OPTICIANS, 167 PICCADILLY, W. BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

and purchase a pair of their Patent Self-Adjustable Eye-Glasses, fitted with cork nose-pieces, which can be worn by any one with comfort. The most difficult faces fitted. All our lenses are carefully adapted to the sight, and being made periscopic, of best axis cut pebbles, are guaranteed to give perfect comfort.

We have no Agents. 20,000 Sold at the Colonial Exhibition.

STRUVE'S
BRIGHTON SELTZER WATER.
PREPARED FROM THE WORLD-RENOWNED SPRING OF THE
ROYAL GERMAN SPA, BRIGHTON,
And supplied uninterruptedly to Royalty by Royal Warrant of His late Majesty King William IV. and H.M. the Queen-Empress Victoria.
OF ALL CHEMISTS AND WINE MERCHANTS THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY.
Carriage Paid on Six Dozen and upwards.
ROYAL GERMAN SPA, BRIGHTON.

SOAP SOAP

PEARS'

SOAP SOAP

Mr. C. B. HARNESS, Consulting Medical Electrician and Inventor of the world-famed Electropathic Belt, may be consulted daily free of charge, personally or by letter, at the ELECTROPATHIC ESTABLISHMENT of the Medical Battery Company, Limited, 52 OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W. (corner of Rathbone Place). All in search of health should call to-day, if possible, or write at once. Thousands of testimonials. Note only address, as above.

"SECURUS JUDICAT ORBIS TERRARUM."

APOLLINARIS.

"THE QUEEN OF TABLE WATERS."

The filling at the Apollinaris Spring during the year 1887 amounted to 11,894,000 bottles.

CHURCH of ENGLAND CENTRAL SOCIETY for PROVIDING HOMES for WAIFS and STRAYS.

OFFICES: 32 CHARING CROSS, S.W.

The object of this Society is to rescue from vicious surroundings the Orphans and Destitute Children met with in every parish, and especially in large towns.

The Committee make a point of not accepting any case which could more properly be dealt with by the Legislature such as the Poor Law and School Boards. They are also most careful to avoid relieving unworthy parents of their responsibility, and therefore invariably give the preference to children who have neither parents nor relations able to provide for them.

Our great need is additional support to the General Fund, which supports the homes and the boarded-out children.

Prospectuses, and collecting cards and boxes, will be gladly supplied by the Hon. Secretary, Mr. E. DE M. RUDOLPH, 32 Charing Cross, S.W., who will thankfully receive contributions; or they may be paid to the account of the Society at Messrs. DIMSDALE & Co.'s, 50 Cornhill, E.C.

Forms of application for the admission of children can be had from the HON. SECRETARY.

ILFRACOMBE.—The ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn Tennis Courts, large Swimming Bath. Private Bath. Descriptive tariff of Manager.

A LUXURY HITHERTO UNKNOWN IN ENGLAND.

BARBER & COMPANY'S FRENCH COFFEE.
(See that you have none other.) As used in Paris in its highest perfection, 10d. per lb. This is the choicest and most carefully selected Coffee "roasted on the French principle," and mixed with the finest Bruges Chicory. 2 lbs. sample in tins sent free for 2s. 4d. by parcels post to any post town in the United Kingdom and Channel Islands; 5 lbs. in tins for 5s. 6d.; 8 lbs. in tins for 8s. 10d.

BARBER & COMPANY, 274 REGENT CIRCUS, OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.

61 Bishopsgate Street, E.C.	Brighton—147 North Street.	Manchester—93 Market St.
102 Westbourne Grove, W.	Birmingham—Quadrt. New St.	Bristol—38 Corn Street.
King's Cross, N.	Liverpool—1 Church Street and Minster Buildings and London Road.	Preston—Fishergate.
42 Great Titchfield Street, W.		Hastings—Robertson St. & Havelock Road.
The Borough, London Bridge.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
For Improved and Economic Cookery.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
The only sort ever guaranteed GENUINE by Justus von Liebig.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
The finest Meat-Flavouring Stock. USE it for Soups, Made Dishes, Fish, Game, and other Sauces.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
Efficient TONIC in all cases of Weakness and Digestive Disorders.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
Highly recommended as a Nightcap instead of alcoholic drinks.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
GENUINE ONLY with facsimile of JUSTUS VON LIEBIG'S SIGNATURE in BLUE INK across label.

ASK FOR
LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
With BLUE SIGNATURE.

BOOKS, &c.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly, London. All the New and Standard Books. Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c. Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates per annum, paid in advance:

	£	s.	d.
Any part of the United Kingdom	£1	8	2
India and China	1	12	6
Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America	1	10	6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW.—The following NUMBERS of THE SATURDAY REVIEW are required for which 1s. each will be given, viz.: 1, 2, 15, 25, 56, 59, 74, 75, 138, 171, 191, 452, 763, 775, and 1100 (clean copies)—at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York; and 27 KING WILLIAM STREET, STRAND, LONDON, desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICATIONS, and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS.—CATALOGUES sent on application.

AUTOGRAPH LETTERS and HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS. NEW ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE, post free Six Stamps. Comprising interesting Specimens of Members of the Stuart Family, Richard Devereux, Earl of Essex (Holograph MSS.), Oliver Cromwell, Richard Cromwell, James I. (Holograph MSS.), Charles I., Samuel Pepys, Admiral Blake, Nelson, Addison, Pope, Bentley, David Hume, Charlotte Brontë, George Eliot, Charles Dickens, Randolph Caldecott (Holograph and Original Sketches), Sir Walter Scott (Original MSS.), S. T. Coleridge (MS. Poem), Carlyle (MSS. "French Revolution"), Thomas Hood (MS. Poem), Hartley Coleridge (Unpublished Sonnet), Thomas De Quincey (MSS. Unpublished), Mrs. Hemans (MS. Poem, Unpublished); and several hundred Autograph Letters, Manuscripts, &c. of Literary and Antiquarian interest.
S. J. DAVEY, St. Thomas's Buildings, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.
Rare Autograph Letters purchased.

Now ready, at all Libraries, 3 vols. 31s. 6d.

PEARL STUTTON'S LOVE. A Novel. By J. G. HOLMES, Author of "Sir Richard's Revenge."
WYMAN & SONS, 74, 76 Great Queen Street. And all Booksellers.

NEW NOVEL BY MISS R. MACKENZIE KETTLE.

THE LAST MACKENZIE of REDCASTLE.
Now ready, 1 vol. post 8vo. 5s.—JAMES WEIR, 26 Prince's Street, Cavendish Square, W.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE

For MAY. Price 1s.

CONTENTS:

1. CHRIS. By W. E. NORRIS. Chapters 16-18. (Concluded.)
2. SYDNEY SMITH. By GEORGE SAINTSBURY.
3. GENTLEMEN EMIGRANTS.
4. THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY. By STEPHEN WHEELER.
5. IN THE DALES SIXTY YEARS SINCE. By Lady VERNEY.
6. THE REVERBERATOR. By HENRY JAMES. VIII.—X.
7. PURITANISM. By Rev. J. FRASER.

MACMILLAN & CO., LONDON.

SOME RECOLLECTIONS of KAISER WILHELM I.
By G. M. RHODES. See

THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE

For MAY. Profusely Illustrated, price 6d.; by post, 8d. CONTAINS:

1. KAISER WILHELM I. Engraved by E. SCHLADITZ.
2. SOME RECOLLECTIONS OF KAISER WILHELM I. By G. M. RHODES. Illustrated.
3. THE MEDIATION OF RALPH HARDELOT. Chaps. 27-30. (Continued.) By Prof. W. MINTO.
4. A SONG OF SPRING. By CLEMENT SCOTT.
5. GLIMPSES OF OLD ENGLISH HOMES—III. HINCHINGBROOKE. By ELIZABETH BALCH. Illustrated.
6. COACHING DAYS AND COACHING WAYS. "The Dover Road." Part II. By W. OUTRAM TRISTRAM. With Illustrations by Herbert Railton and Hugh Thomson.
7. LIZ: A LIVERPOOL CHILD. By AGNES C. MAITLAND. (To be continued.)
8. ET CETERA. By H. D. TRAILL.

MACMILLAN & CO., LONDON.

HURST & BLACKETT'S NEW NOVELS.

ALL ELSE of NO AVAIL. By BEN HAYWARD. 3 vols.

THE WEB of FATE: a Dramatic Story. By W. J. WILDING. 2 vols.

IN WHITE and GOLD: a Story. By Mrs. F. H. WILLIAMSON. 3 vols.

JOY COMETH in the MORNING: a Country Tale. By ALGERNON GISSING. 2 vols.

BERNARD and MARCIA: a Story of Middle Age. By ELIZABETH GLAISTER. 3 vols.

A WILY WIDOW. By HENRY CRESSWELL, Author of "A Modern Greek Heroine" &c. 3 vols.

LONDON: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 871. MAY, 1888. 2s. 6d.

CONTENTS:

A STIFF-NECKED GENERATION. Chaps. VI.—IX.
HYMNS AND HYMNALS. By J. B. SELKIRK.
LADY HAMILTON AND MR. JOHN CORDY JEAFFRESON. By JOHN PAGET.
WANDERINGS AND WILD SPORT BEYOND THE HIMALAYAS.
MARY STUART IN SCOTLAND.—THE CONSPIRACIES OF THE NOBLES: RIZZIO. By JOHN SKELTON, C.B.
THE PSYCHOLOGY OF GOLF.
ENGLISH SLANG AND FRENCH ARGOT: FASHIONABLE AND UNFASHIONABLE. By CHARLES MACKAY.
THE EVENING OF LIFE. By the EARL OF ROSSLYN.
THE ENGLISH GENTRY.
THE PROGRESS OF THE SESSION.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

MAY. 2s. 6d.

THE DEFENCELESSNESS OF LONDON. By General Sir EDWARD HAMLEY, M.P.
THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL. By the Right Hon. LORD THRING.
THE DISENCHANTMENT OF FRANCE. By F. W. H. MYERS.
IN THE BAHAMAS. By Mrs. BLAKE.
BEN JONSON. (Concluded.) By ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE.
THE CLERGY AND THE LAND. By R. E. PROTHERO.
NIEDERBRONN. By the Right Hon. HUGH CHILDERS, M.P.
TINKERING THE HOUSE OF LORDS. By LORD LYMINGTON, M.P.
MAX MÜLLER'S "SCIENCE OF THOUGHT." (Concluded.) By the Hon. Mr. Justice STEPHEN.
THE ADMIRALTY CONFUSION AND ITS CURE. By Captain LORD CHARLES BERESFORD, M.P.
"ROBERT ELSMERE" AND THE BATTLE OF BELIEF. By the Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE, M.P.

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.

MATTHEW ARNOLD'S LAST ARTICLE.

See THE CENTURY for MAY. Also, "SIBERIA AND THE EXILE SYSTEM," by GEORGE KENNAN, with Map and 16 Illustrations; "THE PERSONALITY OF LEO XIII.," with Portraits and Autograph; "A LOCOMOTIVE CHASE," Illustrated; &c. &c.
The time to Subscribe, being No. 1 of a New Volume, Monthly, 1s. 4d.

NEW NOVEL AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

A CLOUD on ST. ANGELO. By CYRIL BENNETT, Author of "The Massage Case." 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth. [Ready.

LONDON: T. FISHER UNWIN, 26 PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

SECOND EDITION OF
THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW for MAY 1888 now ready, price 2s. 6d.
London: TRÜBNER & Co., 57 Ludgate Hill.

Ready this month, 1s.

LINGUA: an International Language for Purposes of Commerce and Science. General Outlines. By GEORGE J. HENDERSON.
Practical parents are continually grumbling at the amount of time spent by their sons in learning Latin at school. If the proposal made in "Lingua" were adopted, the knowledge so acquired could be converted into a valuable medium for international correspondence when they enter their business career.
The method can be thoroughly acquired by any English, French, German, Spanish, Italian, Portuguese, or American boy, with the average schoolboy knowledge of Latin, in a few hours. Persons of any of these nations, though unacquainted with the Latin tongue, can acquire Lingua in the course of a few weeks.
London: TRÜBNER & Co., Ludgate Hill.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW EDITION OF ROBERT BROWNING'S WORKS.

Just published, price 5s.

Vol. I., containing "PAULINE" and "SORDELLO," of

A NEW AND UNIFORM EDITION

OF THE

COMPLETE WORKS of ROBERT BROWNING.

This Edition will consist of 16 Volumes, small crown 8vo

A Volume will be published Monthly. It will contain more than one Portrait of Mr. Browning, at different periods of life, and a few Illustrations.

The price will be 5s. per volume.

There will also be a Large-Paper Edition of 250 Copies, printed on hand-made paper. This Edition will be supplied only through Booksellers.

New Volumes of Smith, Elder, & Co.'s Popular 2s. Series.

Now ready, Cheap Edition, fcp 8vo. boards, pictorial cover, 2s.

THE HEIR of the AGES. By JAMES PAYN, Author of "Lost Sir Massingberd," "By Proxy," "The Canon's Ward," &c.

On May 26, Cheap Edition, fcp 8vo. boards, pictorial cover, 2s.

DEMOS. By GEORGE GISSING, Author of "Thyrza," "A Life's Morning," &c.

Now ready (Sixpence), New Series, No. 59.

THE CORNHILL MAGAZINE

For MAY.

Containing, among other Articles of interest, THE EAVESDROPPER Part I—THE GRAND TOUR—Mr. SANDFORD, IV–VII—WITH THE DUKE—A LIFE'S MORNING, by the Author of "Demos," "Thyrza," &c. Chaps. 9 and 10, &c. &c.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S NEW NOVEL.

NOTICE—The FOURTH EDITION of "ROBERT ELSMERE," 3 vols., by Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD, is now ready at all the Libraries.

MR. GLADSTONE writes of this novel in the new number of the "Nineteenth Century".

"The strength of the book seems to lie in an extraordinary wealth of diction, never separated from thought; in a close and searching faculty of social observation, in generous appreciation of what is morally good, impartially exhibited in all directions; above all, in the sense of mission with which the writer is evidently possessed and in the earnestness and persistency of purpose with which through every page and line it is pursued. The book is eminently an offspring of the time, and will probably make a deep or at least a very sensible, impression, not however, among mere novel-readers, but among those who share, in whatever sense, the deeper thought of the period."

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE.

INTERNATIONAL SCIENTIFIC SERIES.

The New Volume in the above Series, entitled "The ORIGIN of FLORAL STRUCTURES through INSECT and other AGENCIES," by the Rev. GEORGE HENSLOW, M.A., F.L.S., F.G.S., Professor of Botany at Queen's College, will be published next week, crown 8vo. with 88 Illustrations, 5s.

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.

MRS. E. M. FIELD'S NEW WORK.

NOTICE.—The Second Edition of "ETHNE" is now ready, and to be had at all the Libraries, crown 8vo. cloth boards, 6s., with Etched Title and Frontispiece.

"Without exaggeration one of the most beautiful tales of ancient Irish life that has ever come under our notice. The character of Ethne is a masterpiece."—Public Opinion.

"A very attractive and interesting book........Delightfully fresh and picturesque."—Guardian.

LONDON: GARDNER, DARTON, & CO., PATERNOSTER BUILDINGS.

Price 1s. post free.

COLD CATCHING, COLD PREVENTING, COLD CURING.
By JOHN H. CLARKE, M.D.
London: JAMES EPPS & Co. 48 Threadneedle Street, and 170 Piccadilly.

CHAPMAN & HALL'S NEW BOOKS.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW

For MAY.

Edited by FRANK HARRIS.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS AND THE COUNTY COUNCILS. By Professor E. A. FREEMAN
THE BRITISH ARMY.—VII. By the AUTHOR OF "GREATER BRITAIN."
TROUT-FISHING By Sir HENRY POTTINGER, Bart
PIERRE LOTI. By HENRY JAMES.
THE REVIVAL OF ARCHITECTURE By WILLIAM MORRIS.
SUNDAY AT CONCORD By GRANT ALLEN
THE EAST AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE By W. M TORRENS.
NOTES FROM A PROSPEROUS AGRICULTURAL COUNTRY. By FRANCES MARY DE BORRING
MATTHEW ARNOLD. By FREDERIC W H MYERS
CORRESPONDENCE—CONSULAR PROTECTION IN MOROCCO. By ION PERDICARIS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GREATER BRITAIN"

THE BRITISH ARMY.

By the AUTHOR of "The PRESENT POSITION of EUROPEAN POLITICS."

Demy 8vo. [This day.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "CONSTRUCTIVE ETHICS."

STUDIES NEW AND OLD.

By W. L. COURTNEY, M.A., LL.D.

Crown 8vo 6s. [This day.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MONARCHS I HAVE MET."

A WANDERER'S NOTES. By W. BEATTY-KINGSTON, Author of "Music and Manners" &c. 2 vols. demy 8vo. 24s.

BY FREDERICK HAWKINS

The FRENCH STAGE in the EIGHTEENTH CENTURY By FREDERICK HAWKINS. 2 vols. demy 8vo. with Portraits, price 30s.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL LIBRARIES.

BY JOHN DALBY.

The MAYROYD of MYTHOLM: a Romance of the Fells. By JOHN DALBY. 3 vols crown 8vo.

BY LADY WATKIN WILLIAMS

EVEN SUCH is LIFE. By Lady WATKIN WILLIAMS. 3 vols crown 8vo.

BY HAWLEY SMART

SADDLE and SABRE: a Novel. By HAWLEY SMART, Author of "A False Start" &c A New Edition, in 1 vol. crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. [This day.

CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED, 11 HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS:

FROM ONE GUINEA PER ANNUM.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS

FROM TWO GUINEAS PER ANNUM.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY:

For Books exchangeable by the Library Messengers,

FROM TWO GUINEAS PER ANNUM.

ALL THE BEST AND MOST POPULAR BOOKS OF THE SEASON ARE IN CIRCULATION AT MUDIE'S LIBRARY.

MUDIE'S CLEARANCE LIST contains many thousand Volumes of Standard and other Works withdrawn from circulation, and now offered for Sale at Greatly Reduced Prices.

Prospectuses and Clearance Lists sent postage free on application.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LIMITED,

30 TO 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.

BRANCH OFFICES:

281 REGENT STREET, AND 2 KING STREET, CHEAPSIDE.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY,

56 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

NATURAL LAWS and GOSPEL TEACHINGS. By HERBERT MORRIS, D.D. Crown 8vo. cloth boards, 1s.

A clear and convincing sketch of the correspondence between Science and the Word of God on such great questions as Natural Laws and Miracles, Natural Laws and Answers to Prayer, the Resurrection of the Dead, &c.

WHAT to READ at ENTERTAINMENTS. Part I. Verse. Part II. Prose. Edited and Arranged by Rev. FREDERICK LANGBRIDGE, M.A., Author of "Sent back by the Angels," "Poor Folks' Lives," &c. Crown 8vo. cloth boards, each vol. 1s. 6d.

BIBLE SKETCHES and their TEACHINGS. For Young People. Vol. I. OLD TESTAMENT. Vol. II. NEW TESTAMENT, including the Apostolic History. By S. G. GREEN, D.D., Author of "Christian Ministry to the Young" &c. Revised and Enlarged Edition, with Maps. 2 vols. crown 8vo. each vol. in cloth boards, 3s.

A HUNDRED HYMNS. Selected by the Readers of "The Sunday at Home" as the best in the English Language. With some account of their Writers, and 10 Portraits. Imperial 8vo. in cover, 2d.

PRESENT DAY TRACT VOLUMES.

UNITY of FAITH. A Proof of the Divine Origin and Preservation of Christianity. By the Rev. JOHN STOUGHTON, D.D., Author of "Historical Theology," "The Doctrine of the Atonement, Historically and Scripturally Examined," &c. &c. Present Day Tract, No. 57. In cover, 4d.

THE HIGHER CRITICISM. Special Volume of Present Day Tracts, containing Six Tracts by the DEAN of CANTERBURY, the late DEAN HOWSON, Principal WACE, and Professors A. B. BRUCE and F. GODET. Cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

NON-CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHIES of the AGE. Special Volume of the Present Day Tracts, containing Eight Tracts—Nos. 7, 8, 17, 29, 34, 40, 47, 48—by Professors BLAIKIE, RADFORD, THOMSON, PORTER, IVERACH, and the late Rev. W. F. WILKINSON. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

NON-CHRISTIAN RELIGIONS of the WORLD. Special Volume of Present Day Tracts, containing the Six Tracts, Nos. 14, 18, 25, 33, 46, 51. By Sir W. MUIR, Drs. LEGGE, MURRAY, MITCHELL, and H. B. REYNOLDS. 2s. 6d.

COLOURED SCRIPTURE CARTOONS.

A NEW SERIES of LARGE BIBLE PICTURES, drawn in a very bold and vigorous style by W. J. MORGAN. Well printed by Chromo-lithography, and on stout paper. Size, 45 inches by 35 inches.

1. THE GOOD SHEPHERD. 2. THE SOWER.
3. THE CALL OF ANDREW AND PETER.
4. CHRIST BLESSING CHILDREN.

Admirably suited for the Walls of Schools, Mission Rooms, &c. May be had in the following styles: 1s. 4d. each on stout paper; 2s. mounted on linen; 2s. 6d. on linen, eyletted and varnished; 4s. on linen, varnished, and with roller top and bottom (map style).

LONDON: 56 PATERNOSTER ROW, 65 ST. PAUL'S CHURCHYARD, 164 PICCADILLY.

E. STANFORD'S EDUCATIONAL LIST.

Just published, Third Edition, fcp. folio, cloth, 12s. 6d.

AN ATLAS of ANATOMY; or, Pictures of the Human Body. In 24 large Coloured Plates, comprising 100 separate Figures, with Descriptive Letterpress. By Mrs. FENWICK MILLER, late Member of the London School Board.

CONTENTS:—Preliminary Observations—The Skeleton—Skull—Joints and Ligaments—Muscles—W[illegible] of Bones and Muscles—Heart—Blood Vessels—Circulation of the Blood—Blood—Lungs—Respiration—The Mechanism of Breathing—Digestion—The Pancreas—The Liver—The Excretory Organs—The Kidneys—Ductless Glands—The Skin—The Nervous System—The Brain—The Cerebellum—The Spinal Cord—Functions of the Nervous System—The Organs of Sense—The Organ of Smell—The Organ of Taste—The Organ of Hearing—The Organ of Sight.

"Mrs. Miller has made a most successful endeavour to encourage the general study of anatomy in a precise, and not in what would be termed a popular, form. This atlas is a really systematic work on anatomy, and will, we believe, play no mean part in the diffusion of true, pure, scientific knowledge."—Athenæum.

Now ready, Fourth and Cheaper Edition, crown 8vo. with 30 Plates, cloth, 2s. 6d.

HENSLOW'S BOTANY for BEGINNERS. A Short Course of Elementary Instruction in Practical Botany for Junior Classes and Children. By the Rev. Prof. G. HENSLOW, M.A., F.L.S., F.G.S., Author of "Floral Dissections," Lecturer on Botany at St. Bartholomew's Hospital Medical School, Examiner in Natural Science for the College of Preceptors.

STANDARD CLASS-BOOKS.

GEOGRAPHY.—PHYSICAL, HISTORICAL, POLITICAL, and DESCRIPTIVE GEOGRAPHY. By KEITH JOHNSTON, F.R.G.S. Third Edition. Revised by E. G. RAVENSTEIN, F.R.G.S. Large post 8vo. with Illustrations and 21 Maps, cloth, 12s.

GEOGRAPHY.—A SCHOOL PHYSICAL and DESCRIPTIVE GEOGRAPHY. By KEITH JOHNSTON, F.R.G.S. Fourth Edition. Revised by E. G. RAVENSTEIN, F.R.G.S. With Maps and Illustrations. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

GEOGRAPHY.—An INTERMEDIATE PHYSICAL and DESCRIPTIVE GEOGRAPHY. Abridged from the Physical, Historical, and Descriptive Geography by the late KEITH JOHNSTON, F.R.G.S. Crown 8vo. with several Illustrations, cloth, 3s. Revised and Corrected to date, and intended for Use in Schools where the two larger Works by the same Author are not found suitable.

GEOGRAPHY.—GEOGRAPHICAL READERS for Elementary and Middle-Class Schools. By CHARLOTTE M. MASON. Post 8vo. Illustrated, cloth. Book I. ELEMENTARY GEOGRAPHY, 124 pp. 1s. Book II. GREAT DIVISIONS of the GLOBE, 200 pp. 1s. 6d. Book III. The COUNTIES of ENGLAND, 315 pp. 2s. 3d. Book IV. The COUNTRIES of EUROPE, Maps and Illustrations, 308 pp. 2s. 3d. Book V. ASIA, AFRICA, AMERICA, and AUSTRALIA, 336 pp. 2s. 6d.

GEOLOGY.—OUTLINES of GEOLOGY: an Introduction to the Science for Junior Students and General Readers. By JAMES GEIKIE, LL.D., F.R.S., Murchison Professor of Geology and Mineralogy in the University of Edinburgh. Large post 8vo. with 400 Illustrations, cloth, 12s.

GEOLOGY.—ROCK HISTORY: a Concise Note-Book of Geology, having Special Reference to the English and Welsh Formations. By C. L. BARNES, M.A., Science Master at Bromsgrove School. With Coloured Maps of Strata, and Illustrations of Fossils. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

BOTANY.—FLORAL DISSECTIONS, illustrative of Typical Genera of the British Natural Orders. Lithographed. By the Rev. GEORGE HENSLOW, F.L.S. 8 Plates, containing many hundred Illustrations. Third Edition. Demy 4to. with Descriptive Letterpress, boards, 4s.

BOTANY.—BOTANICAL TABLES for the Use of Junior Students. Table of Common Terms used in Describing Plants, comprising those usually required in the Cambridge Local Examinations for Juniors. Also a Table of the Chief Natural Orders of British Plants, arranged according to BENTHAM and OLIVER. By ARABELLA B. BUCKLEY. New and Revised Edition. Folded in cloth cover, 1s. 6d.

LONDON: EDWARD STANFORD, 55 CHARING CROSS, S.W.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S LIST.

Now ready, 1s.

THE TEMPLE BAR MAGAZINE

For MAY contains the continuation of FROM MOOR ISLES, by JESSIE FOTHERGILL, Author of "The First Violin"; and THE ROGUE, by W. E. NORRIS, Author of "Major and Minor"; DICKENS'S CHARACTERS and their PROTOTYPES; PRINCE BISMARCK and the GERMAN REICHSTAG; FORGET ME NOT (Conclusion); GLUCK, &c. &c.

NOW READY, THE FOURTH EDITION OF

MR. AND MRS. BANCROFT ON AND OFF THE STAGE.

2 vols. demy 8vo. 30s.

"We do not know when there have been published a series of reminiscences more varied in interest, more sincere and straightforward in style, more genial in tone, and, in fact, more thoroughly readable, than the two solid volumes with which Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft have just achieved the latest of their many joint successes. 'Mr. and Mrs Bancroft On and Off the Stage,' to give the autobiography its pleasantly comprehensive title, at once takes rank as the book of the season; the book that every one will mean to read and be expected to have read; the book that is sure to be discussed in every drawing-room."—Observer.

NEW WORKS OF FICTION.

NARKA. By KATHLEEN O'MEARA, Author of "The Old House in Picardy" &c. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

"A decidedly good novel .....some of the most fascinating of recent works of fiction have been the stories of Russian life......The book is a thoroughly interesting, well-constructed, and well-told story."—Spectator.

LOYALTY GEORGE. By Mrs. PARR, Author of "Adam and Eve" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"An interesting story from beginning to end, told in a natural and simple way. ....Glimpses of green, peaceful coast scenery are everywhere interwoven in this delightful book, which has throughout a freshness as of the breezy air on the coast of Devonshire."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE PARTING of the WAYS. By Miss M. BETHAM-EDWARDS, Author of "Kitty" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"The very laudable object of this novel is to amuse the reader......The writing is lively, the conversations are clever, and there is a sparkle of good spirits as well as originality throughout." Murray's Magazine.

JOAN VELLACOT. By ESMÉ STUART, Author of "Muriel's Marriage" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.
PUBLISHERS IN ORDINARY TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

ACTS OF PARLIAMENT, PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS,

AND

OFFICIAL PUBLICATIONS

ARE OBTAINABLE FROM

EYRE & SPOTTISWOODE,

EAST HARDING STREET.

"He must have been an enemy to entertaining knowledge who first spread the report that Blue Books are dry reading. A more misleading idea could hardly be conceived."—Daily Telegraph.

"People who complain that Blue Books are dull ought to dive into some of the collections of Consular Reports lately published by the Foreign Office, and they would find good reason for changing their opinion."—Morning Post.

"Every political club should have these books......I think the people of the country ought certainly to read them.... If I could get these works taken by every political club, and read, I am certain the people of this country would make a most tremendous movement in favour of economy."—LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.

If you want to purchase an Act of Parliament, a Bill under discussion in either House of Parliament, a Return compiled for the use of Members, or a Report made by the Members of a Royal Commission or a Select Committee; or if you require any Naval or Military Book, or any Publication issued by the Government,

APPLY TO

EYRE & SPOTTISWOODE,

Sole Agents for Official Publications,

EAST HARDING STREET, LONDON, E.C.

NOW READY, Part I., price 2s. 6d., of PICTURESQUE AMERICA.

A Pictorial Delineation of the Mountains, Rivers, Lakes, Forests, Waterfalls, Shores, Cañons, Valleys, Cities, and other Picturesque Features of the North American Continent. With FORTY-EIGHT EXQUISITELY ENGRAVED STEEL PLATES, and Several Hundred Engravings on Wood, from Original Drawings specially made for the Work.

"'Picturesque America' is characterised by the same beauty and wealth of illustration as its charming predecessor, 'Picturesque Europe.'"—Christian World.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, LUDGATE HILL, LONDON.

SWAN SONNENSCHEIN & CO.'S NEW LIST.

STEPNIAK'S GREAT WORK.

THE RUSSIAN PEASANTRY; their Agrarian Condition, Social Life, and Religion.
2 vols. 8vo. 25s. [Ready this day.

This Work, together with TIKHOMIROV'S "RUSSIA: Political and Social" (2 vols. 8vo. 21s.), forms a COMPLETE ACCOUNT of MODERN RUSSIA, entirely superseding all previous Works on the subject.

A NEW WORK ON CANAL AND BARGE LIFE.

LIFE in the CUT. By AMOS READE. 6s.
Dedicated, by permission, to George Smith, of Coalville.

"A piece of first-rate character sketching. Every leaf is instinct with the spirit of the people in whose interests the book is conceived."—Aberdeen Journal.

THREE NEW NOVELS. In 3 vols.

1. ANNIE THOMAS'S LOVE'S a TYRANT.
2. JEAN MIDDLEMASS' VAIA'S LORD.
3. EMILY OSBORN'S PECCAVI.

SECOND EDITION OF GEORGE MOORE'S

CONFESSIONS of a YOUNG MAN.
With Etched Portrait of Author by WM. STRANG. Price 6s.

Academy says:—"It is a brilliant sketch; much the best thing that Mr. Moore has done; the production of a man of wide culture, and containing scarcely a single page void of something suggestive, amusing, daring......In point of mere cleverness, these 'Confessions' seem to me without a rival in recent English fiction."
WM. SHARP.

TWO CHORUS GIRLS. By J. HAMILTON CLARKE, Mus. Bac. Oxon.
Price 3s. 6d.

A MORE EXCELLENT WAY. By CONSTANCE HOWELL.
1 vol. 6s.

THE STRANGE ADVENTURES of LUCY SMITH.
By F. C. PHILIPS, Author of "As in a Looking-Glass," "The Dean and his Daughter," &c. Cheap Edition, picture boards, 2s.

"A wild romance told in a direct business-like fashion."—Spectator.

"Originality of design, artistic neatness of construction, and perfect style."
Illustrated London News.

DOCTORS AND DOCTORS: some Curious Chapters in Medical History and Quackery.
With Coloured Frontispiece after Gillray. By GRAHAM EVERITT, Author of "English Caricaturists of the Nineteenth Century." Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s. [This day.

IRELAND in '98: Sketches of the Lives of Principal Characters of the Time.
Edited from the MSS. &c. of Dr. R. R. MADDEN by Dr. J. BOWLES DALY. With engraved Portraits and Facsimile Contemporary Prints. 8vo. 9s.

THE DEMON of DYSPEPSIA; or, Digestion Perfect and Imperfect.
By A. E. BRIDGER, M.D., &c. 4s. 6d.

A popular treatise on the disastrous consequences which result from an opposition to the laws which regulate the human food-supply.

"Will take a prominent place among popular medical handbooks."—Scotsman.

The CONTEMPORARY PULPIT LIBRARY—Vol. I.

CANON LIDDON.—SERMONS (15).
Imp. 16mo. cloth extra, gilt top, 2s. 6d.

The Disobedient Prophet—Adoration—Jerusalem—Premature Judgments of Men—The Beginning and the End—Place where the Lord Lay—Holding by the Feet—Shadows of Light—Pharisee and Publican—Messiah—Stewardship—Foreign Missions—"Behold! I come quickly"—The Incarnation—The Dignity of Service.

"For splendour of exposition, for fervour of feeling, for delicacy of insight, and for strength of reason, this volume might claim comparison with the greatest English sermons of any age."—Spectator.

The next Two Volumes will be by Canon FARRAR and the BISHOP of PETERBOROUGH (Dr. MAGEE).

CHANTS of LABOUR: a Song-Book of the People.
With the Music. Edited by EDWARD CARPENTER. With Frontispiece and Title-page by Walter Crane. Paper wrapper, 1s.; cloth extra, 2s.

NEW VOLS. of "IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT SERIES."
EDITED BY S. BUXTON, M.P.

1. CHURCH REFORM. By ALBERT GREY, Canon FREMANTLE, Rev. S. A. BARNETT, and Others. 212 pp. red cloth, 1s.
2. LOCAL GOVERNMENT. By W. RATHBONE, M.P., ALBERT PELL, and F. C. MONTAGUE, Barrister-at-Law. Red cloth, 1s.
3. LOCAL OPTION. By W. S. CAINE, M.P., WILLIAM HOYLE, and Rev. DAWSON BURNS, D.D. Red cloth, 1s.

TIME. For MAY. Edited by WALTER SICHEL, M.A.
Pp. 128, 1s.

MRS. SCHWABE'S FROEBEL INSTITUTE (WORK AND WORKERS, No 5.)
THE OLD EMPEROR AND THE NEW. KARL BLIND.
ALTISSIMA PETO: ADDRESS TO HIGH-SCHOOL GIRLS. Mrs. HENRY FAWCETT.
LORD BEACONSFIELD AS A LANDSCAPE PAINTER. EDITOR.
[illegible] COLONISATION. The EARL OF MEATH.
[illegible] WOMEN READ. Mrs. HUMPHRY.
"[illegible] WICKET." Hon. RANDOLPH STEWART (late of Harrow XI.)
[illegible] J. M. BARRIE.
THE CASE [illegible] CREMATION. J. W. ROBERTSON-SCOTT.
[illegible] EIGHTEENTH. JULIAN CORBETT.
THE [illegible] CREED OF ZOLA; SHORT STORIES; TIME'S FOOTSTEPS, [illegible], CRITICAL NOTES, &c. &c.

SWAN SONNENSCHEIN & CO., PATERNOSTER SQUARE, LONDON.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.

DIOCESAN HISTORIES.

HEREFORD. By the Rev. Canon PHILLOTT.
Fcp. 8vo. with Map, cloth boards, 2s.

ST. DAVID'S. By the Rev. Canon BEVAN.
Fcp. 8vo. with Map, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

 Twelve other Volumes of this Series have already appeared.

A COMMENTARY on the REVISED VERSION of the NEW TESTAMENT.
By the late W. G. HUMPHRY, B.D., Vicar of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, Prebendary of St. Paul's Cathedral, and one of the Company of Revisers of the New Testament. New Edition, Revised. Crown 8vo. cloth boards, 4s.

MARTYRS and SAINTS of the FIRST TWELVE CENTURIES.
Studies from the Lives of the Black-letter Saints of the English Calendar. By the Author of "The Chronicles of the Schönberg-Cotta Family" &c. Crown 8vo. cloth boards, 5s.

"BY the COMING of the HOLY GHOST."
Thoughts for Whitsuntide. By the Author of "Chronicles of the Schönberg-Cotta Family." Printed in red and black. Post 8vo. cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

OF the IMITATION of CHRIST. Fcp. 8vo.
printed in red and black, half bound, 2s. 6d.

A New Edition based on the best Text, and without curtailment or modification.

FIVE MINUTES STORIES. By Mrs. MOLESWORTH.
With several Illustrations printed in Colours. Small 4to. cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

IN TOUCH with NATURE: Tales and Sketches from the Life.
By GORDON STABLES, M.D., R.N. With several Illustrations. Crown 8vo. cloth boards, 2s.

THE LIKENESS of CHRIST; being an Inquiry into the Verisimilitude of the Received Likeness of our Blessed Lord.
By the late THOMAS HEAPHY. Edited by WYKE BAYLISS, F.S.A. With several Illustrations printed in Gold and Colours. Small 4to. cloth boards, price 6s.

PARABLES of OUR LORD and SAVIOUR JESUS CHRIST (The).
With Pictures by Sir JOHN EVERETT MILLAIS, R.A. Letter-press printed in black and red on fine paper. 4to. cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

A POPULAR HISTORY of the ANCIENT BRITISH CHURCH.
With Special Reference to the Church in Wales. By E. J. NEWELL, M.A. Fcp. 8vo. with Map, cloth boards, 2s 6d.

(A lucid Book on a department of history hitherto much neglected.)

DOMESDAY BOOK: a Popular Account of the Exchequer Manuscript so called, with Notices of the principal Points of general Interest which it contains. By WALTER DE GRAY BIRCH, F.S.A. Fcp. 8vo. cloth boards, 3s.

"A handy volume of an introductory character which will be found useful by all persons who wish to obtain some knowledge of the subject."—Guardian.

CHINA. By Professor R. K. DOUGLAS.
A New and Revised Edition. Post 8vo. with Map and several Illustrations, cloth boards, 5s.

PICTORIAL GEOGRAPHY of the BRITISH ISLES.
By MARY E. PALGRAVE. Oblong 4to. with numerous Engravings, cloth boards, 5s.

PICTORIAL ARCHITECTURE of GREECE and ITALY.
By the Rev. H. H. BISHOP. Oblong 4to. with numerous Engravings, cloth boards, 5s.

DANDELION CLOCKS; and other Tales.
By the late Mrs. EWING. Illustrated by Gordon Browne and other Artists. Small 4to. paper boards, 1s.

THE PEACE-EGG, and a CHRISTMAS MUMMING PLAY.
By the late Mrs. EWING. With Illustrations by Gordon Browne. Small 4to. paper boards, 1s.

LIFE of HER MAJESTY the QUEEN.
With Sketches of the Royal Family. A Jubilee Memoir. Fcp. 4to. copiously Illustrated, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

PEOPLE'S LIBRARY: FACTORS in LIFE.
Three Lectures on Health—Food—Education. By Professor SEELEY, F.R.S. Fcp. 8vo. cloth boards, 1s.

 Ten other Volumes of this Series have already appeared.

Demy 8vo. paper boards, 3s.; cloth boards, red edges, 4s.

THE OFFICIAL YEAR-BOOK
OF THE
CHURCH OF ENGLAND
FOR 1888.

Furnishes a trustworthy account of the condition of the Church of England, and of all bodies in communion with her, throughout the world.

"It is not too much to say that year after year it has steadily improved upon the original form, and that this year's volume, in point of matter, style, arrangement, accuracy, and all those other qualities which go to make up excellence in a work of reference, is by far the best of the series."—Times.

LONDON: NORTHUMBERLAND AVENUE, W.C.;
43 QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C.; [illegible]

MESSRS. WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS' PUBLICATIONS.

This day is published, 3 vols. post 8vo. 25s. 6d.

THE FAT OF THE LAND.

A Novel.

By MARY LESTER (Maria Soltera),

Author of "A Lady's Ride across Spanish Honduras."

Next week, a THIRD and CHEAPER EDITION, 8vo. 7s. 6d.

ON SOME OF SHAKESPEARE'S FEMALE CHARACTERS.

In a Series of Letters.

By HELENA FAUCIT (Lady MARTIN).

Dedicated by Permission to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen.

This day is published, a NEW EDITION, crown 8vo. 5s.

GOSSIPS WITH GIRLS AND MAIDENS,

Betrothed and Free.

By Lady BELLAIRS.

THE LAND BEYOND THE FOREST.

Facts, Figures, and Fancies from Transylvania.

By E. GERARD,

Author of "Reata," "Beggar my Neighbour," &c.

2 vols. with Map and Illustrations, 25s.

"She has given a delightfully varied and interesting, and, for general information, sufficiently complete, account of the 'Land beyond the Forest.' The book is more readable than most fiction."—Scotsman.

"She is able to lend a certain charm to the strange and interesting facts which she has to tell of the 'Land beyond the Forest.'"—Athenæum.

"The book is as noticeable for its brightness and sense as for the value it possesses in describing almost unknown places and peoples."—Daily Telegraph.

"One of the brightest and most enjoyable books of its kind that has come our way for a good many years........There is not indeed a dull page to be found between the covers of the two volumes, the interest of which is indefinitely increased by a large number of admirable illustrations."—Manchester Examiner.

THE BLACKSMITH OF VOE.

A Novel.

By PAUL CUSHING,

Author of "Misogyny and the Maiden," "A Woman with a Secret," &c.

3 vols. post 8vo. 25s 6d.

"It is an idyl in prose, in which we are given the finest idiom, the keenest humour, the most picturesque eloquence, and dramatic force of no mean order. The workmanship of the book is delightful from first to last, and the character of Abel Boden is a masterpiece after its kind. The story itself takes the most powerful hold on the reader's sympathies."

Whitehall Review.

"The story increases in interest as it proceeds, and the author gives ample evidence of strong descriptive and dramatic powers."—Pictorial World.

"Is a powerful and interesting novel which should increase the reputation of its talented author."—Scotsman.

THE

BALANCE OF MILITARY POWER IN EUROPE.

An Examination of the War Resources of Great Britain and the Continental States.

By Colonel MAURICE, R.A.

Professor of Military Art and History at the Royal Staff College.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

"The power we can exert in our own defence, not only in these islands, but throughout the empire, will depend upon the solution of this military question........That important truth is cogently demonstrated by Colonel Maurice, and may be said to form the very kernel of his excellent book........It is also full of information.........The book has this great additional advantage, that the author, an accomplished scholar, has written it with a single eye to the common weal."—Spectator.

"The book is written with all Colonel Maurice's well-known clearness and animation of style, and it derives additional piquancy from its controversial tone........An admirable survey of the military situation in Europe."—Daily News.

TIMAR'S TWO WORLDS.

By MAURUS JOKAI.

Authorized Translation

By Mrs. HEGAN KENNARD.

3 vols. post 8vo. 25s. 6d.

"It is long since we met with a story so vigorous—so full of human sympathy, of strength and pathos.........We regretfully close this delightful book."—Saturday Review.

"It is strong in incident, graphic and picturesque in descriptions of scenery and events, intensely dramatic in construction."—Scotsman.

"Throughout marked by poetical imagination and true dramatic instinct."—Morning Post.

"Not only as its author's masterpiece, but as a masterpiece of European literature, pervaded by a primeval freshness of style that should titillate the palate of the most jaded novel-reader."—Athenæum.

"A novel of bright originality, of shrewd conception—a really delightful story."

Daily Telegraph.

"A fine story—powerful, pathetic, and dramatic."—St. James's Gazette.

This day is published, a NEW EDITION.

A HANDBOOK OF THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

By JAMES RANKIN, D.D.

Author of "Character Studies in the Old Testament" &c.

Fourth Edition, Revised and greatly Enlarged, crown 8vo. with Maps, 7s. 6d.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

RE-ISSUE OF THE GREVILLE MEMOIRS IN EIGHT MONTHLY VOLUMES.

A JOURNAL of the REIGNS of KING

GEORGE IV., KING WILLIAM IV., and QUEEN VICTORIA. By the late Charles C. F. Greville, Esq. Clerk of the Council to those Sovereigns. Edited by Henry Reeve, C.B. D.C.L., Corresponding Member of the Institute of France. (8 vols.) Vols. I.—V. Crown 8vo. 6s. each.

RESEARCHES on DIAMAGNETISM and MAGNE-CRYSTALLIC ACTION, including the Question of Diamagnetic Polarity. With Frontispiece, 7 Plates, and numerous Illustrations. By John Tyndall, D.C.L., LL.D., F.R.S. New Edition. Crown 8vo. 12s.

The FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES of CHEMISTRY PRACTICALLY TAUGHT, by a New Method. By Robert Galloway, M.R.I.A. F.C.S., Honorary Member of the Chemical Society of the Lehigh University, U.S. With 71 Woodcuts and numerous Exercises and Answers. Crown 8vo. 6s. 6d.

 The principles are taught by experimental and arithmetical exercises, and examination questions; and the language of the science by a series of progressive exercises.

REMINISCENCES of FOREIGN TRAVEL.

By Robert Crawford, M.A., lately Professor of Civil Engineering in the University of Dublin, Author of "Across the Pampas and the Andes." Crown 8vo. 5s.

"For those whose delight is in tales of sport and adventure there is good entertainment in this book......There are twenty-eight chapters and not one of them but is worth reading."—Saturday Review.

POSITIONS, wherein those Primitive Circumstances be examined, which are necessarie for the Training up of Children, either for Skill in their Booke, or Health in their Bodie. By Richard Mulcaster, First Headmaster of Merchant Taylors' School (1561-1586). With an Appendix, containing some account of his Life and Writings, by Robert Hebert Quick, Author of "Essays on Educational Reformers." 8vo. 10s. 6d.

"Mr. Quick has done a good service to educational literature in reprinting this unfairly neglected work."—Scotsman.

MARAHUNA. By H. B. Marriott Watson.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

"A very clever story and one deserving to be read by the judicious........The conclusion is picturesque, not to say tragic, and the mystery of Marahuna's origin and nature is not solved any more than a reader of taste would wish it to be solved."—Saturday Review.

EPOCHS OF CHURCH HISTORY.

Edited by the Rev. Canon CREIGHTON, M.A. Fcp. 8vo. 2s. 6d. each.

"Among the series of class-books and educational manuals now so numerous, there are few that offer such sound preparative material for honest study as the 'Epochs of Church History.'"—Saturday Review.

HILDEBRAND and HIS TIMES. By W. R. W. Stephens, M.A. Prebendary of Chichester, and Rector of Woolbeding, Sussex. [Just published.

The ENGLISH CHURCH in other LANDS. By the Rev. H. W. Tucker M.A.

The HISTORY of the REFORMATION in ENGLAND. By the Rev. George G. Perry, M.A.

The CHURCH of the EARLY FATHERS. By Alfred Plummer, D.D.

The EVANGELICAL REVIVAL in the EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By the Rev. John Henry Overton, M.A.

The HISTORY of the UNIVERSITY of OXFORD. By the Hon. G. C. Brodrick, D.C.L.

The CHURCH and the ROMAN EMPIRE. By the Rev. A. Carr.

The CHURCH and the PURITANS, 1570-1660. By Henry Offley Wakeman, M.A.

The CHURCH and the EASTERN EMPIRE. By the Rev. H. F. Tozer, M.A.

HISTORIC TOWNS.

Edited by E. A. FREEMAN, D.C.L. and the Rev. WILLIAM HUNT, M.A. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. each.

"The names of the writers are a pledge for the efficiency of their work; while the books carry their own evidence that they are not too long or too expensive."

Guardian.

COLCHESTER. By the Rev. Edward L. Cutts, B.A. With 4 Maps. [Just published.

LONDON. By the Rev. W. J. Loftie. With 3 Maps.

EXETER. By E. A. Freeman. With 4 Maps.

BRISTOL. By Rev. W. Hunt. With 4 Maps.

OXFORD. By the Rev. C. W. Boase. With 2 Maps.

Now ready, price Sixpence.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE, No. 67—MAY.

Contents:

EVE. By the Author of "John Herring," "Mehalah," &c. Chaps. 37-41.

FOODS FOR MAN—ANIMAL AND VEGETABLE: a Comparison. By Dr. B. W. Richardson.

THE PYTCHLEY HUNT, PAST AND PRESENT. By G. B.

THE SONG OF A SPRING SILENCE. By Miss Kate Carter.

WOMEN'S WORK AND WAGES. By David F. Schloss.

THE ARCHBISHOP'S STATUE. By A. K. H. B.

UNCLE PIERCE. By Charles Blatherwick. Chapters 10-12.

AT THE SIGN OF THE SHIP. By Andrew Lang.

Now ready, price Sixpence.

KNOWLEDGE. Conducted by R. A. Proctor.

No. 31, New Series, MAY 1888.

Contents:

THE STAR STORY OF THE FLOOD.

HUNTING ALLIGATORS.

CANALS OR RIVERS ON MARS?

WEIGHING THE EARTH.

ELECTRIC LAMPS FOR COAL MINES. By Wm Lant Carpenter.

FAIRIES, ELVES, AND DWARFS. By Stella Occidens (Mary Proctor).

NEVADA'S WALTZING GIANTS.

THE STARS OF OTHER TIMES.

A NEW LOTTERY SWINDLE.

THE RELIGION OF THE ANCIENT BRITONS. &c. &c.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NOW READY AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

THE GREAT CRYPTOGRAM:

Francis Bacon's Cipher in the So-called Shakspere Plays.

By IGNATIUS DONNELLY,

Author of "Atlantis, the Antediluvian World," and "Ragnarok, the Age of Fire and Gravel."

2 vols. royal 8vo. 30s.

The Times says:—"Mr. Donnelly, by dint of perseverance, ingenuity, and a fancy not unworthy of the philosopher-poet, has succeeded in deciphering a sub-history of English events running capriciously beneath the surface of certain of the plays with curious personal passages in the biography of William Shakespeare, and a demonstration, backed up by the opinion of Cecil, that he was altogether incapable of writing the works that were popularly attributed to him."

The Daily Telegraph says:—"Mr. Donnelly divides his matter into two parts—an argument and a demonstration. The cipher, as set out in the second portion of the work, will be convincing in itself he suggests; but that which goes before it contains many curious and interesting facts brought together with much toil and research in support of his contention."

THE LAND of the PINK PEARL; or,

Recollections of Life in the Bahamas. By L. D. POWLES, late Circuit Justice in the Bahama Islands. 1 vol. demy 8vo. with Map, cloth, 10s. 6d.

"Mr. Powles deserves thanks for a pleasant book on an insufficiently appreciated corner of the world."—Daily Telegraph.

EXPLORATIONS and ADVENTURES in

NEW GUINEA. By Capt. J. STRACHAN, F.R.G.S. of Sydney. Crown 8vo. cloth, about 300 pp., with numerous Illustrations, 12s. [Very shortly.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE:—"In presenting the result of my explorations and adventures in New Guinea to the public, I have been actuated mainly by a desire to create an interest in the great but little known islands comprising the Papuan Group. There are recorded some hair-breadth escapes, and claim is laid to a certain amount of energy and patient perseverance under many difficulties and disadvantages. Many phases of native life are presented, also an impartial and unbiassed account of the work performed by the London Missionary Society in Southern New Guinea."

NEAR and FAR: an Angler's Sketches of Home

Sport and Colonial Life. By WM. SENIOR ("Red Spinner"), Angling Editor of the "Field," Author of "Waterside Sketches" &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

"Both for young and old these pages are good reading..........Mr. Senior's book will be welcomed by all good anglers."—Daily Telegraph.

INCWADI YAMI; or, Twenty Years' Personal

Experience in South Africa. By J. W. MATTHEWS, M.D., late Vice-President of the Legislative Council of South Africa. Royal 8vo. with numerous Illustrations, cloth, 14s.

"The most exhaustive account of the diamond mining at Kimberley which has yet appeared........The book is well written, and contains numerous excellent illustrations. It is in many respects the most complete book of the kind that has appeared for some time."

Scotsman.

SECOND EDITION IN THE PRESS.

THROUGH the YANG-TSE GORGES; or,

Trade and Travel in Western China. By ARCHIBALD J. LITTLE, F.R.G.S., of Ichang. With Map, 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.

"The volume is never dull, and is well worth the attention of those who wish to be instructed and entertained on the subject of an important stretch of China and the qualities of her governors and people."—Spectator.

ANTIPODEAN NOTES. Collected on a Nine

Months' Tour Round the World. By "WANDERER," Author of "Fair Diana," "Dinner and Dishes," &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 7s. 6d.

LIGHTS and SHADOWS of MELBOURNE

LIFE. By JOHN FREEMAN. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

HISTORY of the CIVIL WAR in AMERICA.

By the COMTE DE PARIS. Vol. IV. Demy 8vo. cloth, 16s. [Now ready.

THE LAND of RUBENS: a Companion for Visitors to Belgium. By CONRAD BUSKEN HUET. Translated from the Dutch and Edited by ALBERT D. VAN DAM, Author of "Famous Bohemians," "Genius en Négligé," &c. Crown 8vo. cloth.

SECOND EDITION.

THE PYTCHLEY HUNT, PAST and

PRESENT: its History, from its Foundation to the Present Day. With Personal Anecdotes and Memoirs of the Masters and principal Members. By H. O. NETHERCOTE, Esq., fifty years a Member of this famous Hunt. Illustrated by authorised Portraits, including Portrait of the Author. Crown 8vo. cloth extra, 8s. 6d.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

THOMSON (J.) and HARRIS-SMITH.—

ULU: an African Romance. By JOSEPH THOMSON, Author of "Through Masai-Land" &c.; and Miss HARRIS-SMITH. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

CABLE (G. W.)—BONAVENTURE: a Prose

Pastoral of Acadian Louisiana. Crown 8vo. 5s. (New Volume of Low's "Standard Novels.")

GIBBON (C.)—BEYOND COMPARE: a

Story. By CHARLES GIBBON, Author of "Queen of the Meadow," "Clare of Claresmede," &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo. cloth.

HOEY (F. C.)—A STERN CHASE. By

Mrs. HOEY. Cheaper Edition, crown 8vo. cloth, 6s. (New Addition to Low's "Standard Novels.")

RUSSELL (W. C.)—The FROZEN PIRATE.

By W. CLARK RUSSELL. Cheaper Edition, crown 8vo. with Illustrations, cloth, 6s.

STOCKTON (F. R.)—The CASTING AWAY

of MRS. LECKS and MRS. ALESHINE: and THE DUSANTES. TWO VOLS. in ONE, crown 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

NEW BOOK OF POEMS by DR. OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, entitled

BEFORE the CURFEW; and other Poems, chiefly Occasional. By O. W. HOLMES, Author of "Our Hundred Days in Europe" &c. Crown 8vo. cloth, 5s.

NOW READY.

COMPANION WORK TO "THE CRUISE OF 'THE CHALLENGER.'"

THREE CRUISES OF THE "BLAKE."

By ALEXANDER AGASSIZ,

Director of the Museum of Comparative Zoology at Cambridge. Mass.

2 vols. 8vo. fully Illustrated, 42s.

The Times says:—"Professor Agassiz has to sustain the burden of a great and honoured name. Hitherto he has been little known beyond the select circles of science, where, however, he has gained for himself a reputation worthy of the name he bears. Solid evidence of the good work Professor Agassiz has been doing is now before the public.......It is impossible to speak too highly of the results of the three cruises with which Professor Agassiz deals..... The volumes are illustrated by about 550 illustrations, besides coloured maps and diagrams, admirably executed, and add greatly to the utility of a work which is creditable alike to the industry of the United States Government, and to the industry and scientific training of Professor Agassiz."

TURBANS and TAILS; or, Sketches in the Unromantic East. By A. J. BAMFORD, M.A. Crown 8vo. cloth, 7s. 6d.

"I pity the man who can travel from Dan to Beersheba and cry, ''Tis all barren.'"

STERNE.

MAURY (Commander M. F.), LIFE of. Compiled by his Daughter, D. F. MAURY-CORBIN. Edited by Mr. CLEMENTS MARKHAM, C.B. Demy 8vo. cloth, 12s. 6d.

⁂ Commander Maury's name is well known as the author of "The Physical Geography of the Sea and its Meteorology," which work has passed through over twenty editions in this country alone.

THE FIGHTING VERES: an Historical

Biography of Sir Francis Vere and Lord Vere, his Brother, leading Generals in the Netherlands when England was aiding the Dutch. By CLEMENTS R. MARKHAM, C.B. Demy 8vo. cloth extra, 18s.

"Well-told story........Mr. Markham has brought together in a very readable form a large body of information, which he has taken pains to collect from authentic sources; and his effort, not to revive the memory of the Veres their name is a household word but to show us the men as they were, and describe what they and their compeers did, is one for which the student as well as the general reader should be thankful."

Spectator, March 31, 1888.

AUTHENTIC BIOGRAPHY of Rev. HENRY

WARD BEECHER. Authorized by his Family, largely Autobiographic. Now being Written by his Son, WILLIAM C. BEECHER, and his Son-in-Law, Rev. SAMUEL SCOVILLE, assisted by Mrs. HENRY WARD BEECHER. Elegantly and profusely illustrated. The Daily Diary kept by Mr. Beecher, no part of which has been made public, will appear in this Work. 22 other fine Illustrations. Large 8vo. [Very shortly.

NEW WORK BY THE AUTHOR OF "NEAR AND HEAVENLY HORIZONS."

SUNNY FIELDS and SHADY WOODS. By the Countess A. DE GASPARIN. Translated from the French. Crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE SONGS of the BIRDS; or, Analogies of Animal and Spiritual Life. By the late Rev. W. E. EVANS, M.A., formerly of Burton Court, Herefordshire, and Canon of Hereford Cathedral. New Edition, with numerous Illustrations, small crown 8vo. cloth extra, 6s.

HANDBOOK of SURGERY. By Dr. F.

ESMARCH. An entirely New Translation from the Third German Edition, by H. FARQUHAR CURTIS, M.D. Demy 8vo. with 647 Illustrations, leather binding, 24s.

Published under the direct sanction of Her Majesty the Queen.

LOW'S HANDBOOK to the CHARITIES of LONDON, 1888. Enlarged Edition. Giving the Objects, Date of Formation, Office, Income, Expenditure, Invested Funds, Bankers, Treasurers, and Secretaries of over a Thousand Charitable Institutions. Fifty-first Year. Revised according to the latest Reports. Small post 8vo. sewed, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

Now ready, 1s.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

MAY NUMBER.

CONTENTS:

ALEXANDER WILLIAM KINGLAKE. From a Photograph by Elliott & Fry, London. Frontispiece.

LONDON AS A LITERARY CENTRE. First Paper by R. R. BOWKER. Illustrated with 27 Portraits from Photographs by Barraud, Cameron Studio, Mayall & Co., London Stereoscopic Company, Elliott & Fry, &c.

MATTHEW ARNOLD—Martin Farquhar Tupper—Philip James Bailey—William Morris—Lewis Morris—Earl Lytton—Jean Ingelow—Christina G. Rossetti—Leslie Stephen—Walter Pater—John Addington Symonds—Frederick Max Müller—Sidney Colvin—Philip Gilbert Hamerton—Herbert Spencer—John Tyndall—Thomas Henry Huxley—Sir John Lubbock—Cardinal Newman—Cardinal Manning—Archdeacon Farrar—Rev. H. R. Haweis—James Anthony Froude—W. E. H. Lecky—Samuel Smiles—W. H. Mallock—Dr. William Smith.

Part V. of WM. BLACK'S NEW NOVEL,

IN FAR LOCHABER. (Commenced in January Number.)

RUSSIAN CONVICTS IN THE SALT-MINES OF ILETSK. By Dr. H. LANSDELL, F.R.G.S. With 15 Illustrations.

&c. &c.

Early in May will be published, No. I. of

ARTISTIC JAPAN: a Monthly Illustrated

Journal of Arts and Industries. Conducted by S. BING.

The Collaboration of several of the best English Authorities on Japanese Art, including Dr. WM. ANDERSON, Mr. HUISH, Editor of the "Art Journal" &c., has been secured.

Each Part will be issued in a most attractive Coloured Wrapper (the Illustration to be varied monthly), and, in addition to Illustrated Text, will contain 10 royal 4to. Coloured Plates, being Reproductions of Work by the best Japanese Artists.

The Price of each Part will be 2s.

LONDON: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, SEARLE & RIVINGTON, LIMITED,
ST. DUNSTAN'S HOUSE, FETTER LANE, FLEET STREET, E.C.

Printed by SPOTTISWOODE & CO., at No. 5 New-street Square, in the Parish of St. Bride, in the City of London; and Published by [illegible] at the Office, No. 38 Southampton Street, Strand, in the Parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, in the County of Middlesex.—Saturday, May 5, 1888.

THE

SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,698, Vol. 65. May 12, 1888. [Registered for Transmission abroad.] Price 6*d*.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

MR. STANHOPE'S Bill "to make better provision "respecting National Defence" has the merit of providing for doing by statute and in a normal way what the Crown had already the recognized right to do. It has never been denied that the Crown could compel the service of all its subjects for the defence of the country. Humbly as we may rate the courage of modern politicians, it can hardly be believed that any body of men at the head of the Government would fail to use the reserve power of the State which must act, law or no law, at the moment of need, or that they could feel seriously afraid of obtaining any Act of indemnity they thought fit to demand. The courage and patriotism of Englishmen and Scotchmen must have sunk low, indeed, if there is any doubt on the subject. Still, it is well that the power of the State should have an operation which is not violent or casual. It has hitherto been too much the custom to hamper the Crown by decreeing that this or the other part of its forces can only be called out under varying restrictions. Different rules prevail for the mobilization of Yeomanry, Militia, and Volunteers. The right of the State to use railways and other material resources is tied down by paper limitations. That all this packthread would hold against the strain of a great need is doubtful—if, indeed, it is not shameful for all of us to suppose that it would not be burst in an instant. But, as it is quite useless, it may as well go. Its disappearance will deprive any possible Parliamentary pedant of an excuse for pottering when he ought to act. In so far Mr. STANHOPE'S Bill is a good little Bill. The Reserves—Yeomanry, Militia, and Volunteers—will all be liable to be called out at once, and used together in a recognized way, without any fear that members of Parliament who are playing to the gallery will have an excuse for getting on their legs and chopping logic. Railways will be taken possession of and used for the good of the country with less risk that secretaries and station-masters will feel entitled to waste the time and try the temper of the staff by inquiring by what law it is acting and whether complicated regulations as to compensation have been duly complied with. Altogether, it is a nice little Bill for guarding the Secretary for War on the side of Parliament and allowing him to attend with a tranquil mind to his theoretically primary, but practically secondary, duties as an administrator. It is also a welcome sign that light is slowly breaking on the Parliamentary mind that even Secretaries of State for War are beginning to understand that the armed forces of this country ought really to be used together for its defence, and are not a set of Turks' heads set up in order that politicians may cut them down in the name of economy.

It may be allowed then, that we have advanced so far that Mr. STANHOPE and his successors are to be provided with a better spell wherewith to summon their spirits from the vasty deep. The spirits will come, unquestionably; but—and this is really the practical question—of what order will they be? When our 600,000 men or so are on foot, will they be an army? Until that is settled nothing has been effected, except a slight increase in the Secretary of State's power to collect a mob of men with rifles. A belief seems to prevail in some quarters that when once we have called out our motley 600,000 the regular army and its Reserves will be instantly available for foreign service, and the country will be in a position to bid defiance to the invader. On what theory of the thing called an army this opinion is based we do not know. It would be interesting to learn what any person who holds this faith thinks would be left in the country when the regular army and its Reserves were gone. We are quite prepared to tell him—just to give him something to contradict, if he can. Let it be granted, then, that the regular army is away on service to reinforce India and the colonial garrisons, and to supply two army corps in the field somewhere. This is the utmost it could do, and even that only with immense hurry and scurry, after frantically knocking up makeshifts at the last moment. The army has gone out rather short of officers, thanks to our beautiful retirement system. It has taken all the cavalry, or very nearly all, all the Field Artillery, all that is left of the Horse Artillery. Of transport, and the organization required to move an army in the field, it has left not a wrack behind. And now, the country, trusting in its glorious traditions, as Lord RANDOLPH advises, awaits the invader with the following resources. There is something handsome in hundreds of thousands of tall fellows and good men of their hands in uniform with rifles. They are full of fight and zeal, but they are very short of officers. They have for Field Artillery the battery of the Honourable Artillery Company (with horses), a number of guns of position (with no certain supply of horses), a few field guns just served out (with no horses at all and no riders). For cavalry they will have a few troops of regulars, including a handful of Guardsmen (not the best; for they will have been drafted into the corps on service), and the recruits of the depôts. For the rest, there is the Yeomanry, of which the ranks are formed of the best military raw material in the country, and the officers come largely of a class which has always made good officers. In time they will make an excellent force; but for the present they are painfully short of the long and thorough drilling required to form a cavalry soldier, and their horses are no better off than themselves. As for transport where is it? With the salary the author of Don Quixote asked for from the Emperor of China. It does not so much as exist in thought. They have frequently no greatcoats, many have no knapsacks. These are some of their material wants, and more might be added—ammunition, for instance, and reserve of weapons. But these are enough, and we proceed to their spiritual wants, to what makes the soul of an army. They have no general staff or organization, no habit of acting together, no experience in performing the complicated manœuvres of an army in the field. We might go on easily, but enough has been said, which no honest man who knows what he is talking about can deny, to show that the Militia and Volunteers would not by themselves form an army on which it would be other than insanity to rely for the defence of the country. By calling them out we should only collect a mass of half-trained men without the material means or knowledge required to enable them to move, insufficiently officered, ill supplied with weapons, worse supplied with ammunition, and often short even of clothes. It is mere midsummer madness, or, in the case of official people who have the means of knowing, something much baser, to speak of such a force as a defence for the country, or as anything but the material out of which, with time and honest management, a good army might be made.

This is the condition to which we have attained by trusting to that responsibility of Ministers held up in the House the other night by Mr. SMITH as his defence against Admiral FIELD. It is a convenient kind of responsibility, which is enforced by no serious penalty, and is useful as an excuse for shirking facts. The country will be indifferently consoled when disaster has happened by reflecting that it was covered by the responsibility of Mr. W. H. SMITH. But it is useless to argue with Parliamentary politicians for doing after their kind. When their places are in danger they will act, and when not, then not. Nothing effectual will be done till the country is frightened, and the great object at present is to create the fright by means of dep[illegible]NHOPE on the defences of London, by meetin[illegible]cers in the City, or by encouraging the Duk[illegible]BRIDGE to talk. It will be better still if the pressure could be brought to bear by united action—if all who are interested and understand the question would combine to act together. The necessity for national action and for driving the politicians on is the capital fact of the situation, and however often it has been said before, it must be said again until it is realized. Mr. STANHOPE'S "important statement" to the deputation on Wednesday is, like his Bill, a sign that the War Office is waking up, and that Ministers are becoming alarmed. This also is well, as far as it goes; but it does not go far. When the official platitudes are deducted—such as the comparison between the defensive power of our coaling stations and those of foreigners (who have none), for instance—what is left is a bundle of promises that a little will be done here, a detail filled up there. No guarantee is given that a serious attempt is to be made to weld our various forces into a coherent thoroughly equipped whole; and as good as nothing is done while that remains to do.

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE NONCONFORMISTS.

READERS of the true history of the Chevalier, afterwards Marshal, D'ARTAGNAN will remember that that orderly person used to keep all his cast-off uniforms disposed in a wardrobe, and could put his hand on that of any particular year at a moment's notice. The singular document in which, towards the end of last week, Mr. GLADSTONE enumerated, in answer to a correspondent, the years, and almost the days, in which he successively cast off this and that garment of Toryism, may have reminded some of these readers of D'ARTAGNAN'S practice. But it is more to the present purpose to note that the ecclesiastical variety of Tory fashion in garments was that which, by Mr. GLADSTONE'S own confession, he wore the longest and cast off the last, though he does not think he wore even that very long. In the general opinion, of course, Mr. GLADSTONE continued to wear it a great deal longer, and never cast it off till the University of Oxford, kindly or unkindly, removed the muzzle which, by his own account, he had worn likewise, in the year 1865. Certainly Mr. GLADSTONE did not much or oft delight to season his general utterances with flattery of the Nonconformists before that time, and the admirer who raised the song of "Auld Lang Syne" on Wednesday was a thought maladroit. They were not Dissenting gowans that Mr. GLADSTONE pu'd in auld lang syne. It has been, we very freely own, different of late years, and especially since his first premiership, into which he may be said to have been carried by the political Nonconformists as much as by any single section or body of men. He has not been ungrateful. Few years have passed since without his addressing some elaborate compliment to a body or bodies of those persons who do not find the Church of England established and provided for them by law satisfactory, and until quite recently the Nonconformists have repaid him by ever-increasing devotion. It was one of the most curious problems necessarily following on the apostacy of Christmas two years, what line these faithful sectaries would take, and whether they would justify or bely the insinuation of their adversaries that political Nonconformists are Nonconformists first and Christians afterwards. To bely it they had only to declare as sorrowfully as they liked that, Mr. GLADSTONE or no Mr. GLADSTONE, they could not join any movement conducted on the principles of the Irish Home Rule movement. To justify it they had only to do what, with honourable exceptions both of bodies and individuals, they have done. The world has been edified at the same moment by the spectacle of a POPE of Rome risking the alienation of one of his most faithful flocks in order to proclaim the eternal and immutable doctrines of Christian morality, and by that of several thousand Nonconformist Protestants declaring that, Decalogue or no Decalogue, they and their house will follow Mr. GLADSTONE through any impolicy and through any immorality he pleases.

Such conduct deserved and received its reward. The speech which Mr. GLADSTONE delivered on Wednesday in the Memorial Hall, when compared with the address presented to him on that occasion, displays mutual flattery of the most interesting kind, both in the direct form and in that indirect, but, it is said, most sincere, form called imitation. While the Nonconformist ministers are convinced of the "heroic magnanimity" which Mr. GLADSTONE has shown in dining with Mr. PARNELL after imprisoning and denouncing him, of the "dauntless courage" with which he has eaten his words, of the "self-sacrificing zeal" with which he has resolved to recover office at any cost to his country and his conscience, Mr. GLADSTONE is equally convinced of the "courageous manner" in which these ministers of a "holy religion" have endorsed Boycotting and the Plan of Campaign, and describes the successive reforms of English history, with possibly unconscious blasphemy or in corrupt remembrance of SUWARROW'S despatch as to the capture of ISMAIL, as brought about "thanks to Almighty "GOD, and by the efforts of British Nonconformists." But flattery to his audience from Mr. GLADSTONE is an invariable thing, and now little surprising. By this art the wandering HERCULES of political tergiversation has always accomplished his labours and attained the fiery citadels of Downing Street. The flattery of imitation is more noteworthy. Unkind critics have declared that the exemption by privilege of pulpit from the possibility of reply to their usual form of utterance not infrequently breeds in ministers of all religions a habit of begging the question. And the result of this habit is very prominent in the Nonconformist Address, which declares that the Government "treated their political opponents as "felons," refers to the "aspirations of the Irish people" as "legitimate," and so forth. But Mr. GLADSTONE was not an inch behind his Memorialists in the goodly task of petitio principii. It might have been thought that the peculiarity of the occasion would have suggested some novel and fresh treatment to an orator to whom his worst enemies have never denied the gift of a most versatile political fancy. But, whether it be that age, of which Mr. GLADSTONE is never tired of talking, has dried his vein and seared the springs of his imagination, or whether it be that his present case is so bad that even he can find nothing but stereotyped fallacies there was not a vestige of novelty, even novelty of presentment, in the speech of Wednesday. The old questions were begged in the old way. The Nonconformists had it once more, on the sole authority of Mr. GLADSTONE as judge of first instance, confirmed by Mr. GLADSTONE sitting divisionally, reconfirmed by Mr. GLADSTONE as court of final appeal, that the proceedings of the police at Mitchelstown were "illegal." That is the point to be proved; but it is the point which Mr. GLADSTONE starts from. They heard once more that the Opposition were trying to expedite (humour is not a common Nonconformist failing, or some one must have muttered "Yes! to despatch it") the business of Government, and that legislation is stopped, not by Mr. GLADSTONE'S wholly ultroneous introduction of the Home Rule question, but by the determination of the Unionists that it shall not be introduced. This and much more—stale, dry, a thousand times refuted, never accepted by any man of brains except the extremest and most interested partisans—was the food set before the simple RINGLETUBS of Farringdon Street.

Nevertheless there were some remarkable things said and not said in the speech. Remarkable enough was the unconsciousness of the speaker, and perhaps of his hearers, of the deadly reality, in quite a different sense from that which he intended, of his declaration that the Unionist party—that is to say, more than half the numerical strength, and about nine-tenths of the intelligence of the United Kingdom—has determined to set above all other earthly objects, first, the preservation of the Union; and, secondly, in order to the preservation of the Union, the keeping of Mr. GLADSTONE himself out of power. Remarkable, again, very remarkable, was the almost greater unconsciousness of the description of Colonel KING-HARMAN as "a man who happened to have the "misfortune of having been a Home Ruler a few years ago, "and of having abandoned the cause of his country." Is there no one, greater than Colonel KING-HARMAN, who has the misfortune of having been an anti-Home Ruler, a pursuer and persecutor of Home Rulers, much less than a few years ago, and of having abandoned the cause of his country? And yet neither of these things, both noteworthy enough in their way, was so noteworthy as what Mr. GLADSTONE did not say. Once more he has spoken on Ireland, once more he has bewailed the fate of those who mobbed and tried to murder, or foolishly mixed with those who mobbed and tried to murder, the constabulary at Mitchelstown. And once more we search his speech in vain for one single reference to those crimes which, as he once said, stand behind Boycotting—which have, thanks to the vigorous policy of the present Government, been brought home in two cases to their perpetrators within the last few days, and a fresh example of which was committed a few hours before he spoke. Not a word of condemnation of the murders that enforce the policy of the National League came from Mr. GLADSTONE, not a word of sympathy with the victims or the victims' families. He is "glad to perceive that Mr. PARNELL "is devoted to the maintenance of law and order"; we are left to judge for ourselves whether he is glad of or sorry for the fashion in which Mr. PARNELL's followers carry out the principle of their leader's devotion to these objects. But what is the blood of hapless farmers, what are the tears of their daughters, to Mr. GLADSTONE or to the Nonconformist ministers? We are unable to answer the question; for both parties are silent on such an inconsiderable subject.

OUR RAILWAYS.

THE debate on Mr. WATT's modest proposal to buy up, on the possible recommendation of a Committee, all the railways in the country, was only interesting as it showed that a delusion which was once widely spread is becoming obsolete. It would, indeed, have been at any time impossible to consider seriously a resolution moved by a private and unknown member in favour of a gigantic financial and political operation; but twenty or thirty years ago a few prominent members might have taken the opportunity of recommending the principle of State purchase. Mr. GLADSTONE, who was principally responsible for the Act of 1844, reminded the House that the existing power of the Government to buy up some of the railways was granted at a time when the system was almost in its infancy. The early railways, including some of the great trunk lines, are unaffected by the Act. Lines which have since been sanctioned by Parliament, containing much the largest portion of the present mileage, may be compulsorily bought as soon as the ordinary shares have returned for a certain time a dividend of ten per cent. on the capital expended. The enactment is therefore wholly inapplicable to existing circumstances. It would not be worth the while of the Government to establish a railway department for the administration of the two or three short lines which have the good fortune of earning ten per cent. The average dividend paid by all the railway Companies on lines constructed since 1844 is less than half the prescribed rate. Mr. WATT gravely, though inaccurately, suggested, as a reason for appointing a Committee or Commission to investigate the subject, that even in 1844 Parliament had accepted the principle of purchase. If the statement had been well founded, subsequent experience might well have justified a change of opinion. The capital, the mileage, and the earnings have in forty-four years increased tenfold, and all questions relating to the working of railways are now incomparably better understood. Mr. GLADSTONE agreed with Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH that the Act of 1844 was intended not as a recognition of the expediency of State purchase, but as a reservation of a right which it might or might not be convenient to assert at some future time.

Both Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH and Mr. GLADSTONE rendered a just tribute to the excellence of railway communication in Great Britain. It is worth paying a considerable sum for exemption from the discomforts of Continental lines, and especially from the petty tyranny of officials. The practice of shutting up passengers for a quarter of an hour in a pen and then causing a race or a scramble for places is an abuse which would not be tolerated in England. The object of the arrangement is to restrict the supply of carriages to the smallest number, so that, as a general rule, every compartment is full. The study of the convenience of travellers in England is promoted by the healthy competition of different Companies at almost all important towns. In France and Germany the system of monopoly is universal. There was a popular cant phrase, which may perhaps still be occasionally repeated, that where combination was possible competition was impossible. It is, of course, true that the same rates must be charged by all Companies conducting traffic between the same termini; but competition in excellence of service is incessantly practised. The same results occur in the carriage of goods. If the French goods expresses were as fast as the English, the saving of time between Yorkshire or Lancashire and Paris would be greater than that which Sir EDWARD WATKIN proposes to effect by his Channel Tunnel. If the State had undertaken the construction and management of the railways, the commercial loss which would have been caused by delay in filling up the country would have exceeded any profit which might have been produced by the investment of public money. Except in extraordinary cases, no Government would have made more than one line between any two points. Shareholders have often complained that their money was wasted on unprofitable extensions and on lines intended to compete with their neighbours. Merchants, tradesmen, and manufacturers, having sometimes an opposite interest, almost invariably favour the introduction of competing lines into their respective districts. Under a system of State ownership such questions would have been decided by Parliamentary and political influence. The same objections might be raised, though with diminished force, to a Government purchase of canals. It is difficult to understand the grounds of Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH's contention that such an undertaking would tend to the public benefit. When railways and canals compete it would be an anomalous proceeding to pit the resources of the State against private enterprise.

The interest of the inquiry whether the State ought to have constructed the necessary railways is purely theoretical. It is too late to try the experiment, since the practical object has been attained by another method. The purchase of the existing lines would raise wholly different questions. It must be assumed that Parliament would not confiscate, in whole or in part, the property of the actual owners. It would therefore be necessary to secure to debenture creditors and to shareholders the income which they now receive, with an allowance in many cases for probable increase. There is no financial gain in the purchase of a revenue or of any other commodity at its proper price; nor would the Government, if it took the place of the proprietors, have any opportunity of increasing receipts or diminishing expenses. Whatever may be the case in Ireland, the English and Scotch railways make no superfluous payments to directors. The chairmen, the general managers, and the staff must be paid as highly as at present, and the same persons would in the majority of cases be necessarily employed. The Government would incur great unpopularity by resisting the claims which would be constantly preferred to increase of accommodation and to lowering of rates. No one except the helpless taxpayer would have any motive for applying pressure in the opposite direction; but the Minister in charge of the railways might perhaps find it necessary to maintain an habitual policy of refusal. It is, of course, assumed by both sides in the imaginary controversy that the purchase must be effected by compulsion. The system would not work unless all present and future lines were included; and it is certain that some of the Companies would only yield to coercion. It is satisfactory to find that, in dealing with a question which has no party bearing, Mr. GLADSTONE can still understand and defend the public interest. He properly treated the proposal of an inquiry by a Committee of the House of Commons as equivalent to a Parliamentary declaration in favour of purchase. Perhaps Mr. WATT may have done some small and unconscious service to the country by eliciting from both parties a distinct repudiation of a mischievous theory.

When the more serious measure of the Railway and Canal Traffic Bill is brought forward the House of Commons may, with advantage, remember the admissions which were made in the course of the short debate on Mr. WATT's proposed resolution. The admirable railway service which is conducted by the Companies through their officers, is conducted in accordance with calculations based on the tariffs to which they are legally entitled. It is by no means to be assumed that, if they are subjected to arbitrary and vexatious restrictions, they will be able to supply the same accommodation which has hitherto been provided. The most plausible charge against the railways is founded on their supposed preference of foreign to domestic produce. If they are compelled to abandon a special branch of their trade, they will suffer a greater or less loss of revenue, varying according to the geographical position of the respective lines. A heavier penalty will be levied on the traders, who are their customers, by a prohibition which is indistinguishable from a protective duty. It must not be forgotten that the Companies are already prevented by a law of many years' standing from allowing any undue preference. It may therefore be assumed either that they give no preference to foreign goods, or that the preference, if any, is not legally undue. The Railway Commissioners, who have uniformly inclined in doubtful cases against the Companies, have taken good care that they conform in that and in all other respects to the letter and spirit of the law. There are still agitators who seek to impose on the Companies the iniquitous uniformity of mileage rates. If they succeed, they will have enacted a monopoly in favour of the sources of traffic or the markets which happen to be in the immediate neighbourhood of railways. Vexatious interference with the lawful discretion of the Companies will be immediately punished by the withdrawal of existing facilities. The general managers run trains for the accommodation of passengers and freighters, but not without regard to the remunerative nature of the traffic. If Parliament discourages their present mode of conducting business, they will have to reconsider all the details of their policy. Even railway reformers will scarcely propose that the Companies should be compelled to run unprofitable trains for the benefit of special classes of traders. If so vicious a principle were admitted, the result would be that Parliament or the Government would practically undertake the whole working of railways. It would be much more advisable to adopt the crude contrivance of purchase. The most disinterested of observers might be irritated by the perverse and suicidal encouragement of confiscation on the part of wealthy peers and respectable landed proprietors. Themselves the intended victims of plunder, some of them are passionately bent on the forcible abolition of a kind of property which is held under the most definite Parliamentary title. They are not even ashamed to rely on the ridiculous quibble that a common form of clause in Railway Acts has reserved the right of general legislation; the elaborate tariffs which are in all cases scheduled to the Acts are, therefore, virtually reduced to the level of practical jokes. If the precedent of spoliation is established with the aid of the country gentlemen, it will be speedily and effectually followed at their own cost.

THE NATIONAL PORTRAITS.

It is time we had some information as to the destination of the national collection of portraits. Some three years have elapsed since the greater part was removed to Bethnal Green, where it is practically inaccessible to students. An alarm of fire, but too well justified by what happened in the stores adjoining the old Gallery at South Kensington, caused the removal, which, as everybody was assured at the time, was only to be for a few months, until a suitable site had been found and a fire-proof building erected. Then the matter dropped. Several excellent sites have been proposed; some, as that near the India Office, are Government property. Others, as that adjoining the National Gallery, would have to be bought. But nothing has been done, and after spending a large sum on buying some of the pictures, and much blandishment in acquiring others, the trustees have had to acquiesce in the virtual banishment of the whole collection to a place so remote from the centres of cultivation that it is useless, and, as a writer in the current number of the Quarterly Review well says, "affords no attraction "whatever to the surrounding population." It might, in fact, as well have "been transferred to Kamtschatka."

Meanwhile, we hear nothing of any scheme for a new building. There was great inconvenience in the South Kensington site, to say nothing of the danger. As the late Mr. Beresford Hope, himself a trustee, humorously remarked, everything, even a furnace, had been arranged there ready to make a bonfire of the portraits. We do not want to see them back in a building so ill suited to them. The National Portraits should be housed either in Bloomsbury, where the contiguity of the British Museum and its print-room would add much to its usefulness; or else near Westminster, where its contents could be studied with the greater interest since so many of the pictures represent men who now sleep in the Abbey church. The site chosen should be of an elastic character; for the collection grew apace, even at South Kensington; and, though of course it has been out of sight and out of mind to a considerable degree since it was banished to Bethnal Green, yet certain very fine and valuable works have lately been added, and are in the offices of the trustees in Great George Street, waiting exhibition.

The removal to Bethnal Green seems to have benefited nobody. The East-Enders do not care for portraiture; and, though the danger from fire is comparatively slight, the building is by no means weatherproof, and some of the more delicate works, such as pastel and crayon drawings, are suffering. The fiery heat of last summer, coming between two exceptionally hard winters, has not been good for the pictures; yet, so far as can be seen at present, nothing is being done to provide better lodgings for them. It would take at least two seasons more, another summer and another winter, even if the building had been begun, to house them properly. It is very far from unreasonable to urge the necessity of some action in the matter on the attention of the Government. There is no doubt, or very little, that some proposal would be favourably received by both parties in the House of Commons. There are plenty of vacant sites. If it came to the worst a new gallery might be built where the old Ordnance Stores stood till lately, in the Tower of London, a very appropriate place for a collection which comprises portraits of Queen Anne Boleyn, Lady Jane Grey, Sir Thomas More, the Earl of Essex, the Earl of Surrey, Algernon Sydney, Sir Harry Vane, Lord Russell, General Monk, and many other men and women who, for one reason or another, lived for a time, or died, within the ancient ramparts.

MACEDONIA.

The renewed reports of disturbances in Macedonia; the following up of the condemnation of Major Popoff by the deposition of the notorious Metropolitan Clement of Tirnovo, who openly abetted the kidnapping of Prince Alexander; the beginning of a tariff war between Bulgaria and Turkey; and the plans for fortifying Constantinople on a new and large scale, are all, no doubt, pieces of intelligence which may be treated from the optimist side. It may be said that they are only the usual coffee-house babble, coming in part, if not wholly, from the chief home of coffee-house babble—Vienna—and traceable pretty clearly to the fresh impulse given by the illness of the German Emperor to the uncomfortable rumours of the last twelve or eighteen months. There may be something in this; but there is more in the solid fact of a concentration of Russian troops on the German and Austrian frontiers, which is simply unintelligible except on the supposition that menace is intended, if action is not. We may, for the present, fortunately afford to be comparatively indifferent to the further rumours of intended new movements in Central Asia and Persia. A very good look-out is being kept by the present Indian authorities in those quarters, and, though perhaps there may not be a universal determination in the Home Government to support them through thick and thin, there is no fear of a repetition of Penjdeh. The unexhausted Russian claims on Persia and the perpetual Russian intrigues there are indeed things that must not be allowed to slip from the memory, but they do not require any very immediate attention till the time comes. And when the time does come it will probably be found, as even that latest disciple of despair Sir Charles Dilke seems to acknowledge, that whatever unreadiness there is in the defences of the Empire is not to be found on the Indian side.

European matters are more disquieting. The very name of Macedonia has something of evil omen in it; for it is, in fact, an invention or re-invention of those who would like further to pull to pieces the Sultan's dominions. Even in ancient times there was not any very clear idea what a Macedonian was, the nearest approach to such an idea being that he was a kind of parcel-Greek, parcel-Barbarian, who dwelt anywhere between Thessaly, Thrace, and Illyria. Nor was the famous doctrine of the soldat heureux ever better illustrated than in the crystallization of this vague entity by the genius of Philip and Alexander. For some two thousand years Macedonia has been nothing, or next to nothing; and the revival of its name would never have been thought of, except as a question-begging device, to hint the rights or claims of modern Greece over the territories designated by it. As a useful statistical summary published in the Standard of Tuesday has reminded Englishmen, this insinuation is very badly founded, though perhaps not worse than others which have before now availed to separate provinces and kingdoms from the rule of the Porte. The honest maniacs and the dishonest tools who abuse the name of Christianity to further the designs of Russia have three courses, one of which must needs suit the case of any Turkish province. Either the Christians are the more numerous, in which case the sacred rights of the majority come in; or the two parties are about equal, in which case the rule ought to follow the worthier religion, like the arrangement of grammar, not that of logic; or else the Christians are in the minority, in which case it is more evident than ever that they ought to be the rulers, lest the followers of the Prophet should oppress them. One claw or other of this universal engine is sure to fit. Unluckily in Macedonia, or, to speak more accurately, in the provinces of Salonica and Monastir, while the Moslems slightly fall below the Christians in number, the Christians themselves are divided (not evenly, but with no great excess on either side) between what may be called Greeks and what may be called Bulgarians. And the numbers of each of these bodies are considerably smaller than the total Islamite census. This gives a very pretty problem indeed to the fanatics of religion, race, language, and all the rest of it. If—which in the interests both of the peace of Europe and of the internal tranquillity and prosperity of the regions themselves would no doubt be best—all the Balkan Peninsula and its sub-peninsula, the Morea, from the Danube to Cape Matapan, could be made to belong to one central authority, there would of course be no difficulty in the matter. But the policy of Europe for some sixty years and more has been not merely to weaken and edge out the only central authority that existed, but to strengthen, foster, and develop minor and departmental authorities more irreconcilably opposed to each other than they are to their old master. The sons, or, to be certain of accuracy, let us say the successors, of the Greeks denounce the claims of the successors of the blessed DUSHAN and the blessed SAMUEL; while we have been expecting for years that somebody would evoke the memory of PYRRHUS or of some unheard-of successor of PYRRHUS at 1200 A.D. or thereabouts, and in thrilling language protest against the idea of the Epirotes, who all but conquered Rome, the Illyrians, who fought under BARGULUS, that strong pirate, being subject to anything or anybody except the successors of PYRRHUS and BARGULUS. Meanwhile, the absurdity of claiming Macedonia either for Greece, which in its Greek days used to scout the idea of Macedonian Hellenism, or for Bulgaria, which was not, nor was thought of, when Macedonia was Macedonia, is clear enough. But, unfortunately, this absurdity does not prevent disturbances in the strath of the Strymon and the hills bounding it from being a very convenient instrument in the hands of the evil-disposed.

With the fortifying of Constantinople few will find fault, for there is probably no capital in the world where fortifications could be of so much use, or which is more naturally fitted to be furnished with them. There may be room for more difference of opinion as to the decidedly active, not to say aggressive, course of policy which the Bulgarian Government appears to be pursuing. No doubt it may be made a pretext for violence; but if violence is intended, such a pretext will never be far to seek. And it may be very plausibly contended that it was time for Bulgaria to abandon the attitude of passive victim which she has maintained so long, to purge herself of traitors within, and at least to hint that she can resort to reprisals for disobliging proceedings without. Although, for fear of offending Russia, Europe has not taken the obviously proper course of recognizing Prince FERDINAND, or some other Prince, and declaring that the Russian veto on the recognition has been forfeited by the refusal of the CZAR either to approve or to nominate a suitable candidate, no step in the other sense has been taken. And the sequel of the declaratory document sent to the Bulgarian Ministry justifies that Ministry in taking no further notice of it, and in continuing to govern the country under all disadvantages as steadily and resolutely as possible. Steady and resolute government is clearly impossible if such conduct as that attributed to the Metropolitan CLEMENT is to be tolerated. The war of imports between Bulgaria and her Suzerain is less capable of summary judgment. On the whole, it seems best calculated to promote on both sides a great increase of land smuggling. This is already believed to be carried on in that part of the world to a considerable extent, and as it naturally allies itself with brigandage, and through brigandage lends itself to the attempts of persons like those who organized the Bourgas raid, it is likely to be an unmixed evil both to Turkey and to Bulgaria. But it must be remembered that the SULTAN has probably been driven to impose the new duty by the expenses of national defence, and that that national defence has been imposed upon him, as upon half the other Powers of Europe, by the menacing and enigmatic armaments of Russia, which have been by no means confined to European frontiers. In short, these armaments are at the bottom of almost the whole present disquiet, in whatever quarter we look, and so long as they continue that disquiet will beyond question continue likewise.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

THE preparations for the Presidential election in the United States appear to be conducted with less than the usual display of excitement; yet only a few weeks will pass before the formal beginning of the contest. The nominating Conventions will assemble in June—the Republicans at Chicago, and the Democrats at St. Louis; but in one case the result is already certain. Mr. CLEVELAND will receive the certain, and probably the unanimous, support of the Democratic party. His steady advance in the confidence of his adherents and in the respect of the general community indicates the possession of remarkable qualities. Ten or twelve years ago Mr. CLEVELAND, as mayor of a provincial town, distinguished himself by his active discouragement of political appointments to office. The better class of Republicans were at that time greatly dissatisfied with the corruption which had been encouraged by some of the leaders of their party. A section of them consequently coalesced with the Democrats for the purpose of electing Mr. CLEVELAND to the high office of Governor of New York. At the Presidential election of 1884 he became the nominee of the same combination as the representative of Civil Service Reform. During his term of office he has fulfilled the expectations of his original supporters, and he has taken an active and creditable part in the general policy of the Union. His recent approval of the Fisheries Convention may perhaps cost him a certain number of votes, and he has voluntarily defied a widespread prejudice by a Message in which he recommended a moderate reduction of the tariff. His success will depend, not only on his own merits, but on the character of the nominee who may be selected by the Republicans. At the last election Mr. CLEVELAND profited largely by the contrast between his political character and Mr. BLAINE'S. It is not yet certain whether he will on this occasion encounter the same opponent. Mr. BLAINE is the most popular public speaker in the United States, and he also enjoys the reputation of being the ablest practitioner of the art of electoral management. It is supposed that he has succeeded in detaching a section of Irish voters from their habitual connexion with the Democratic party. For this purpose, and perhaps on other grounds, he professes dislike for England, and there can be no doubt that he will oppose the policy of his rival in the matter of the Canadian Fisheries. The result will show whether the American people prefer an able party politician or a prudent and moderate statesman.

The Republican choice of a Presidential candidate is still open. Mr. BLAINE, who has been travelling abroad, announced some months ago that he would not be disposed to accept a nomination. His refusal has not since been withdrawn, but it seems likely to be overruled. His friends and his adversaries agree in disbelieving the sincerity, or at least the serious character, of his resignation. Perhaps he has not yet made up his mind on the question; but his family, which may be supposed to know his real wishes, has taken pains to assure his supporters that his excuse of delicate health has now not the smallest foundation. If his partisans find themselves in a majority at Chicago they will use gentle violence to overcome their candidate's hesitation. The principal objection which will be made to the nomination of Mr. BLAINE is founded on the personal dissatisfaction with his conduct and character which conduced largely to the defeat of the Republican party at the last election. There are several competitors in the field, including Mr. SHERMAN, who is perhaps the most formidable rival of Mr. BLAINE. At a time when Mr. HAYES, then President, had filled, as his critics declared, every public department with citizens of Ohio, Mr. SHERMAN, who belongs to that State, held the high office of Secretary of the Treasury. He was accused by his opponents of using his official opportunities to promote his personal interests as a candidate for the Presidency. Whether or not the charge was true it would now be difficult to ascertain, and there is a division of opinion in the United States as to the culpability of such transactions. Mr. SHERMAN is probably, after Mr. BLAINE, the principal leader of the party, and he has already secured the Republican votes of the powerful State of Ohio. There are several other probable or possible candidates, of whom the best known to Englishmen is perhaps Mr. Chauncy Depew. It is not known that any of the competitors excite great enthusiasm, and the Convention will have no difficulty in conforming to the customary practice of making the nomination unanimous, when successive experiments with the ballot-box have designated the winning candidate. It has often happened that a President has been elected because he was comparatively obscure. Party leaders have too many enemies; and Mr. Blaine and Mr. Sherman may perhaps suffer by the accident that they are somewhat better known than the bulk of the candidates. As soon as a choice is made, the whole party will forget its internal divisions. The Democrats have, as has been said, already determined on their nominee.

The platforms or political programmes of the contending parties have probably not yet been finally settled; but the Republicans have at their local and State Conventions given prominence to their favourite doctrine of Protection. On this point they have an advantage, as their creed is definite, positive, and complete. The manufacturers and mine-owners, who inspire their policy and subsidize their efforts, take little trouble to conceal their motives; but, as a tribute to decency, they conventionally profess to support monopoly in the interest of the working-men. The Democrats, on the other hand, are in questions of economic policy hopelessly disunited, and a large section of the party, under the lead of Mr. Randall, is on these points opposed to the President. If the schism should be allowed to affect the Presidential Election, the victory of the Republicans will become nearly certain. It will be remembered that Mr. Cleveland himself thought it prudent to make reservations in favour of domestic industry. He professed to recommend the reduction of Customs-duties, principally on the special ground of the inconvenient accumulation of money in the Treasury. Some attempts have been made in Congress and elsewhere to remove the difficulty by handing over the surplus in certain proportions to the several States; but as none of the plans proposed have been found satisfactory, it will not be necessary to enter into details on the platforms to be adopted at St. Louis and Chicago; and probably the differences which exist among the Democrats will be disguised in vague and indefinite phrases. The Republicans, finding that their doctrines are not publicly contradicted, will argue with some plausibility that as their theories are admitted their candidate ought to have a preference over a half-hearted Free-trader. The chances of Mr. Cleveland's success would be small if he relied on the strength of his party in the Northern States. The vote of New York is doubtful, but Pennsylvania may always be trusted to reject any approximation to Free-trade. It would seem that Ohio and Indiana are also favourable to monopoly; but on the other side is, according to the common phrase, "a solid South." The States in which slavery once existed have after prolonged struggles appropriated all political power to the white population. On the whole it is possible that the result may have been expedient, as it was undoubtedly natural. The Republicans lately made a desperate attempt to recover Louisiana; but their failure convinced them of the impossibility of disturbing the unity of the Southern States. It is probable that the coloured race would still prefer the party to which it owes its liberation; but by some imperfectly known process the negro electors are always outvoted.

Knowing that they had not exclusive possession of the profitable doctrine of Protection, some of the Republican managers lately proposed to raise the question of injustice to the South; but after their defeat in Louisiana they abandoned the attempt as hopeless. The only mode of correcting the irregularities which undoubtedly exist would be that the Federal Government should assume the control of the Southern elections. The arrangement could not be effected without an Amendment to the Constitution, which, again, it would be impossible to pass. General Grant, indeed, in the height of his power, employed the Federal troops to protect the coloured voters in Southern elections; but his proceedings were regarded as unconstitutional, and since that time opinion has greatly changed. The coloured population is in course of improvement. In some of the Western States negroes hold official positions, and their inequality is more social than political; but they will never be allowed again, as in the days of the carpet-baggers, to rule their former masters. The Republicans have now deliberately resolved to exclude the grievances of the South from their platform. It is probable that they will pass resolutions in favour of the fishermen of New England who object to Canadian competition, and the seal-catchers, who in Alaska maintain exactly the opposite doctrines to those which are asserted on the Eastern Coast, but the essential part of the platform will be devoted to declarations against Free-trade. Perhaps no long time will elapse before a Presidential election may turn on economic issues. There is no doubt that some progress has been made in the direction of commercial orthodoxy. Even if Mr. Cleveland is defeated it will still be a significant fact that a candidate for the Presidency can have ventured to propose a reduction of duties. Republican orators, if they are not ashamed to repeat the obsolete nonsense of the promotion of Free-trade by the use of "British gold," will loudly complain of the audacity of English politicians in daring to find fault with the national policy of the United States. The truth is that the interest of England in rational legislation on the part of America is not entirely one-sided. When the States at last recognize the advantage of buying in the cheapest market and selling in the dearest, then competition with England in neutral markets will be sensibly facilitated. In the meantime the United States have a perfect right to consult only their own advantage in their legislation. They try the experiment of monopoly with comparatively little inconvenience, because they enjoy absolute freedom of intercourse with a world of their own.

ART CRITICS AT PLAY.

THIS year the art critics hardly exhibit the usual masterly balance of totally diverse opinions. But even this year they differ so much among themselves that we may still in moments of despondency, doubt whether art criticism is quite an exact science. The art critics, also, are as full of their learning as ever. While some resort manifestly "to Smith or less fastidious Lemprière," the Daily News hastens to Ælius Lampridius for information about Elagabalus, whom it obviously dislikes calling Heliogabalus. The Telegraph, too, is erudite about Hector and his conquest of "Sicilian Thebæ." Perhaps we may learn more about this unfamiliar siege from Mr. Charles Dudley Warner's History of Sicily when he brings out that work. In the meantime the compositor may be suspected of having had a hand in discovering a Thebes in Sicily and a Sicilian Expedition from Troy.

Sir Frederick Leighton's "Captive Andromache" excites the amateur of the Standard. He is not only enthusiastic himself, but he says all must be enthusiastic. "This "work must be spoken of with enthusiasm if it is to be "spoken of with truth." In that case the Times does not speak of it with truth, for the Times speaks wholly without enthusiasm. If cold praise could damn, then the condition of "Andromache" would be little better than that of the wicked. "One asks," says the heartless observer from Printing House Square, "what it all comes to, what sen-"timent it is meant" ("meant" goes ill with "sentiment") "to excite? how we are to be affected by it?" Well, the Standard's man is as affected as ever he can be, which is not saying a little. The Daily Telegraph, on the other hand, could relish a stronger and more exciting topic. "Sir Frederick could obviously have made a great "deal more of his heroine if" (instead of merely fulfilling Hector's prophecy) "she could only have stabbed herself "before the assembled Greeks." But it is clearly not Sir Frederick's fault that she did not. However, the Telegraph concludes that it is "a palatial work," which borders on enthusiasm. His remarks about "the Lesche of the "Coridians," like what he has to say of the Sicilian Thebæ, demand either a scholiast or an emendation. The Standard would, perhaps, have been more enthusiastic still if "An-"dromache" had been a finer figure of a woman. He calls her "a slight but lovely person," and clearly, like Mr. Bailey, Junior, prefers a "crummy" type of female beauty. By way of adding to the charms of Sir Frederick's landscapes the Daily News, in a spirit of generosity, throws in "the gloomy keep of Argos," though, in point of fact, that monument "is not in sight," unless we take Argos in a wide geographical sense.

Mr. Tadema's "Roses of Heliogabalus" naturally beget much learning. The Times knows all about Varius Avitus Bassianus, but is not happy about the "[illegible]." The Standard is strong on "the shower, the torrent, the "cascade of roses," leaving others to quote "a rain and ruin "of roses," which certainly comes in very nicely. "As for "the roses" (and here is learning for you) "VAN HUYSUM "never painted them with quite that freedom and fresh- "ness." The Telegraph calls ELAGABALUS "an imperial "GAVROCHE," and doubts whether he really invented champagne rose. That discovery might be allowed to him, as even THACKERAY admits that GEORGE IV. struck out the idea of a new shoe-buckle "in the primo vigour of his "invention." On the whole, Mr. TADEMA's work is "mag- "nificent, but slightly obscure." The Telegraph has read "the scholiasts" on HELIOGABALUS. Which scholiasts? on what book? The scholiast on ÆLI LAMPRIDIUS must be a most valuable authority.

Mr. ORCHARDSON is a cause of dissension. The Standard enthusiastically descries "marvellous little outbreaks of "illumination" in the "tea-service of fine white and gold." Mr. Punch brings a new interpretation; this is another of Mr. ORCHARDSON's ill-assorted unions, and the young lady singing is the wife of the old gentleman with the evening paper. He does not agree with the Standard that the young man turning the leaves of the music-book is "a pleasant "young man." The Daily News, less emotional, talks in a vein of democratic mockery about the "domestic affections "of the affluent who dwell in marble hal's with a pre- "ference for yellows and deep reds in the decorations." The interest of the Times, on the other hand, is "aroused with "complete success." Baffled by the obscure sentiment of Sir FREDERICK's "Andromache," the Times' man is quite at home with that of "Her Mother's Voice." The Telegraph, as is not unnatural in a critic familiar with scholiasts, thinks Mr. ORCHARDSON's topic "painfully trite." He does not add, as in Sir FREDERICK's case, that Mr. ORCHARDSON might have made more of his heroine if she had locked her father up in the piano-case and fled with her admirer. Yet this incident certainly would have appealed powerfully to the popular imagination. Many other examples of critical unanimity and accuracy might be given. For example, it was not Truthful JAMES, as the Daily Telegraph says in criticizing Mr. BURNE-JONES, but BILL NYE, who "went "for that Heathen Chinee." This, at least, is the version of BRETTIUS HARTIUS; but the scholiast on that author may, of course, have recorded a different legend. There are differences as to the place where the monster was annihilated. The Telegraph thinks it was not Joppa in Palestine, and nobody puts in a claim for Joppa, near Musselburgh. The Daily News thinks the scene was in the Soudan—perhaps at Suakim, for all we know. LIDDELL and SCOTT have plenty to learn from the Daily Telegraph. The Times' man actually knows that PERSEUS had "wings on his feet," which pleasantly reminds one of the horses whose "shoes "were on their feet." The Daily News has met Mr. STRUDWICK's "Acrasia" in the Ethics, where LIDDELL and SCOTT do recognize her as "the temperament of the ἀκρατής." But the Telegraph has "heard" of "Akrasis," which in Greek signifies every kind of intemperance, but which is entirely unknown to LIDDELL and SCOTT, unless it is in the last edition. Perhaps the printer is at his old tricks, and it may be he who has discovered for another critic the hitherto unknown painter TINTORETTI.

LEONE LEVI.

IT seems a strange thing that English Chambers of Commerce should have lost their father only this week, and that he should have been an Italian. Such, however, are the facts, and they ought to ensure for Mr. LEONE LEVI a niche in the fabric of industrial history. Mr. LEVI was a man of immense diligence, transparent integrity, and conspicuous public spirit. But his labours were not of the class which brings popular applause to the labourer, and it must be admitted that he had not the gift of making dry subjects attractive. His solid achievements in commercial and international law are recognized and admired by all competent critics. Work of this sort, however, is peculiarly impersonal; and the very people who profit most by it care little who did it, so long as it is done. LEONE LEVI was born in 1821 at Ancona, then in the Papal States, just forty years before the town and province of that name became part of the kingdom of Italy. Like Mr. GALLENGA and Sir JAMES LACAITA, he was a naturalized British subject, though he did not, like Sir JAMES, continue to be also an Italian senator. He left Italy for England when he was twenty-three years old, and made this country his home for the remainder of his life. For some time he resided in Liverpool, and in 1849 the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce was established at his suggestion. It is needless to say that almost every important town in England now contains a body of this description, even London having condescended a few years ago to follow the universal practice. The kindred project which Mr. LEVI advocated at the same time has not been equally successful. Chambers of Commerce are thoroughly useful and practical institutions. Tribunals of commerce have, speaking generally, failed. Merchants prefer, as a rule, a court of law, or an arbitration conducted under the supervision of the court. It was formerly stated that the best commercial tribunal was a strong judge sitting with a special jury of the City of London. Perhaps neither special juries nor puisne judges are what they were, since Parliament lowered the qualification for the one, and the Court of Appeal skimmed the cream of the other. But men of business still prefer the administration of the ordinary law to those boards of mercantile specialists with which the late Serjeant Cox wanted to fill Serjeants' Inn. Mr. LEVI became himself secretary of the Liverpool Chamber, and in that character was enabled to procure information with regard to the working of similar institutions abroad. This led him to publish in 1850 his Commercial Law of the World, or, as it was called in the second edition of 1873, International Commercial Law. This book made Mr. LEVI's reputation as an authority in those pursuits for which his countrymen have always been famous, and obtained for him various prizes and medals. The International Commercial Code, for which he pleaded with such vigorous earnestness, is still a thing of the future. But there can be no doubt that the greater similarity of usage which now prevails in business relations throughout the civilized world is largely due to his untiring exertions, and to the lucid reasoning by which he supported his ideas.

LEONE LEVI, who died on Tuesday last in his sixty-seventh year, was appointed in 1852 Professor of Commercial Law at King's College, London. In 1859 he was called to the Bar at Lincoln's Inn, and his cheerful, bustling little figure was familiar to all members of the Inn who were in the habit of dining in Hall. He had been out of health for some time before his death, and he might probably have lived longer if he had worked less hard. Mr. GLADSTONE said of Bishop WILBERFORCE that he had only one fault—he could not rest. Professor LEONE LEVI was almost always engaged on some task which would have been too stiff and uninviting for ordinary minds. Apart from his knowledge of law and commerce, which he combined after the fashion, though not of course with the genius, of Lord MANSFIELD, Professor LEVI was a sound and accomplished economist. A Free-trader by conviction, he did not content himself with arguing against Protection on abstract grounds, but collected a vast mass of statistics to show that his logic was based on truth. With the exception of Mr. ROBERT GIFFEN, he was probably the greatest statistician in the United Kingdom, and at most meetings of the British Association he had valuable calculations to communicate. His numerous letters to the Times on financial and commercial subjects were apt to repel the ordinary reader by the columns of figures with which they were loaded. But, though he had little or no literary faculty, and never acquired a mastery of the English language like Mr. MAX MÜLLER, his meaning was clear, and the ciphers had a definite purpose of their own. His History of British Commerce and of the Economic Progress of the British Nation from 1863 to 1878 is a standard work of acknowledged value, and the University of Tübingen conferred on him the high honour of a doctor's degree in Economic Science. The important legislation of 1856, which did much to assimilate the mercantile law of the three kingdoms, was sketched out and initiated by him. He proposed the summoning of a Conference on the subject, at which the late Lord HARROWBY and the first Lord BROUGHAM presided. Among the results of this meeting were two Acts of Parliament, one to alter the commercial law of Scotland, the other to modify the Scotch law of marriage. The latter, however, still continues to vex the soul of the scientific legislator and to provide material for the pen of the imaginative novelist. It is characteristic of Professor LEVI that he should have founded a lectureship in his native town of Ancona, and that he should have chosen as its subject "the laws of commerce in re- "lation to science and moral and international laws." He believed devoutly in the scientific nature of law, even of international law, which he was appropriately selected to treat in the "International Scientific Series." Mr. WHITMORE rather wittily said of Professor STUART the other day that his whole life was one long public meeting.

Professor LEVI's life was a series of lectures, diversified by treatises, or of treatises diversified by lectures. Such a career does not invite the effusive eloquence of the enthusiastic encomiast. But it would be a great mistake to underrate the labours of men like LEONE LEVI, who not only add much to the sum of positive knowledge, but also mitigate the disputes and jealousies of nations.

THE PAUSE IN FRANCE.

THE comparative quiet which has followed the exciting events of a few weeks ago in France seems to have produced an impression that General BOULANGER is not so formidable as he looked. It is certainly exceptionally unsafe to predict the course of events in France, and it may be that there is not vigour enough left in the country even to establish a dictatorship as a less evil alternative to feeble Parliamentary intrigue. The reaction in favour of strong government, which is sooner or later inevitable, may be postponed, and France may be left for some time yet in the hands of successive cliques composed each of a wirepuller and puppets, or even wholly of puppets, with the wirepuller outside. On the other hand, it is equally possible that the General's friends and enemies are in an undue hurry. At the bottom of their hearts they seem to have hoped or feared that when he came to take his seat he would then and there send the Chamber about its business, put the key in his pocket, and carry off that bauble, the President's bell, to summon his own family to dinner. Possibly the General would have greatly enjoyed saying "Come, come, we have had enough "of this. I will put an end to your prating." But for this sort of work it is absolutely necessary to have your HARRISON's regiment of musketeers or your grenadiers of the army of Italy ready at hand. General BOULANGER has no such resource, and the garrison of Paris is under the command of an officer who is not, and has no reason to be, his friend. The General can only appeal to the votes of the country, and must wait till they have been given. The almost spluttering fury of his Parliamentary enemies, and the horrified amazement of some foreign observers at the success he has already obtained is quite natural and intensely comic. It is only one proof more of the delightful immortal incapacity of the natural man to use one pair of scales, one set of measures, for himself and for the other side. To M. FLOQUET, M. CLÉMENCEAU, and others it is absolutely right that the country should vote for them; but that it should vote for somebody who proposes to send them about their business—horrible! atrocious! clean against all reason!

The General's last move in his campaign, the publication of a manifesto in the form of a preface to his history of the war of 1870, has been greeted with the usual chorus of derision. He stands convicted of uttering platitudes, and of using sonorous phrases which mean nothing. No doubt he is guilty of these weaknesses, but if they are to disqualify a gentleman from getting to the head of affairs in France, which of the honourable body of French politicians will be safe? In the meantime there are two propositions in his preface which his critics would do well to treat with a little serious attention. The first is, that since the army has become the nation in arms, it will have its say in politics. The second is, that the army, which knows that it will be called upon to do the fighting and bear the brunt, will not stand by while any modern equivalents to the "bigots and lackeys and panders" of the old monarchy are undoing the fortunes of France. This may amount to an appeal to the army, and a threat of a pronunciamiento. But the facts will not be altered by calling them and the General bad names. The Republicans would do well to ask themselves whether the preface does not tell the truth. If the army is to be coterminous with the nation, and every man is entitled to his share of voting power, then it will act in politics, and by the nature of things and force of habit it will act together. As for the second proposition, there is good reason to believe that it expresses at least a very widely spread feeling in the French army. The older generals are known to be opposed to any interference in politics; but the younger men and the soldiers are said to be by no means minded to face a great war with no better administration over them than could be formed out of such an hysterical and incapable body as the Chamber. Indeed, why should they? It is no longer held to be any man's duty to get up the ladder and be hanged to please the laird. Really it is not so pleasant to be shot, or starved, or taken prisoner because of somebody else's bungling. Now that they are at the head of affairs the Republicans preach passive obedience to the soldier, but they were glad enough of the forty thousand army votes given against NAPOLEON III. in the last plébiscite. There is no proof that the army is actually prepared for a pronunciamiento, but there is nothing improbable in the supposition that it may be provoked or tempted or wearied or frightened into helping on a coup d'état at some not very distant date. It will not be the first time by many that the French army has done so. The "blessed word" pronunciamiento, too, is not an argument. People who use it might inquire more closely than they appear to do whether the interference of the Spanish army in politics was the cause or the consequence of the feeble anarchy of the Government.

MR. PARNELL AT THE EIGHTY CLUB.

MR. PARNELL'S speech at the Eighty Club dinner appears to have disappointed some reasonable and some unreasonable expectations. To deal first with an expectation of the latter kind, it was not a "statesman-like "utterance," and, to say the truth, it was a good deal duller than might have been with a fair amount of reason anticipated even by those well accustomed to Mr. PARNELL's unexciting style of oratory. To criticize it seriously, however, on such grounds would be to miss the point of the occasion. We may be quite sure that the active organizers of the feast were not disappointed, and that whatever might have been the demerits of their guest's after-dinner performance it would have satisfied them. It was with the ceremony of entertaining Mr. PARNELL, and not with its accompaniment of oratory, that they were really concerned; and the complimentary banquet was merely intended to set the seal to the policy which has triumphed in this curiously fortuned Club. Having purged themselves of their element of independent Liberalism, and accepted the status of an association of Gladstonian "items," it only remained for the wirepullers of the party to commit the Club finally and irretrievably to its new position by opening its doors of hospitality to the former captive and present bosom friend of their patron. Mr. HALDANE, who presided at the dinner, and whose speech was a marvel of North British naïveté throughout, observed at the commencement of his remarks that "this occasion was one which ought to have occurred "in the history of this Club long ago." How long ago? we are compelled to ask. As long ago as 1881-82, when Mr. GLADSTONE was playing the part of gaoler to their distinguished guest? Or as long ago as 1882-85, when their distinguished guest's newspaper was ransacking the vocabulary of Billingsgate for abuse of Mr. GLADSTONE, and aiming the foulest insinuations against Mr. GLADSTONE's colleagues in Ireland? It is clear that "the occasion" could not possibly have occurred longer ago than 1886—a date which we perceive, by the way, that Mr. HALDANE described in his next sentence as "some years since." No doubt it does seem a long time to Mr. HALDANE. We measure years by heart-beats, and the Club has "lived fast." It has had a succession of "crowded hours of glorious life," though it can hardly perhaps afford to say much in disdain of "an age without a name." For the name must be rather a sore point with the Club, especially on an occasion of this kind. So far as regards associations, sympathetic or unsympathetic with the views of their guest, the eponymous year of the Club might just as well be 1801, or, for that matter, 1798 itself. For in 1880 Mr. PARNELL's hosts were for the "blackguardism" of the Union to a man, and there must be many a man among them who "fears to speak of "Eighty-two," a year in which they applauded an Irish policy as sternly repressive in spirit as that of PITT and CORNWALLIS. The Eighty-six Club is, of course, a title which would fit it well enough in present circumstances, but, at the same time, we do not wonder at the hesitation of the Club to rechristen itself by a name which might very likely become again an anachronism in 1890. If it is to assume a new style it should borrow from Mr. GLADSTONE himself the only thing about him which he is never likely to change.

The members of the Eighty, as we suppose we must still call them, assembled in considerable strength last Tuesday, and sought to give further éclat to the occasion by inviting a certain number of distinguished outsiders, some of them by no means in sympathy with the views of the Club. Most of these latter, and perhaps not a few of the less keen politicians in the Club itself, were no doubt rather solicitous of the oratorical entertainment to be provided for them than interested in the political import of the festivity; and these, we imagine, must have been slightly disappointed at the result. The CARNARVON-PARNELL incident has been discussed to something more than satiety; and there is no one probably with a mind to make up who has not made it up already on that matter. Mr. PARNELL's lengthy disquisition upon it was the more unnecessary and tedious because he had really no material contradiction to offer to Lord CARNARVON's statement. Indeed, as admitting for the first time a fact which Mr. PARNELL's previous "ways of putting the matter" have uniformly tended to conceal, his latest account of it supplies an indirect confirmation of Lord CARNARVON's. The famous "conversation" has now at last assumed its true form of a Parnellian monologue, to which the Lord-Lieutenant, we are told, played the part of chorus. It is now admitted by Mr. PARNELL that it was he, and not his interlocutor, who made the declarations in favour of an Irish Parliament in Dublin, which was to be "called a Par-"liament" as well as to "be one," and which was to have power to pass fiscal laws for the protection of Irish industries. Lord CARNARVON's share in the conversation consisted, it seems, in repeating after each political proposition of his visitor's the words "I quite agree with you"—a phrase which he may or may not have used, but of which the deep and solemn import when employed colloquially must be evident to every one. The utmost, in short, which Mr. PARNELL can be supposed to have accomplished in the last explanation is to make it credible that he in good faith, but on singularly insufficient grounds, believed Lord CARNARVON to have had leanings towards what afterwards became the Gladstonian policy of Home Rule. How very slight these leanings were and are the person to whom they are attributed has within the last day or two fully explained. And how Mr. PARNELL could ever have persuaded himself that, if they existed at all, they were anything more than personal to Lord CARNARVON; how he could have arrived at the conclusion that they were shared by, or that they in the slightest degree committed, the Government to which Lord CARNARVON belonged, remains, we must confess, as much of a mystery to us as ever.

There was nothing of any real interest in Mr. PARNELL's speech—for the "tyrannical administration" of the Crimes Act is a subject which has been much more effectively, because more inventively, handled by Mr. O'BRIEN and others—except his references to the Plan of Campaign and the Papal rescript. On the former of these matters it is impossible not to suspect Mr. PARNELL's remarkable frankness of an ulterior object. He was known to have had no share in the origination of the Plan of Campaign, and every one had observed his persistent reticence on the subject in the House of Commons. But, though deductions from these facts were clear enough, we doubt whether many carried inference so far as to conclude that Mr. PARNELL had actually called the authors of the Plan over the coals, and had formally imposed conditions upon them in limitation of its operation. Certainly it is news to all Englishmen, and, to judge from its reception by the Freeman's Journal, to most Irishmen, that Mr. PARNELL had been for some time past engaged in "maturing a "method of agrarian organization which would have been "free from the political defects of the Plan of Campaign, "and which would have absolutely corresponded in every "respect with the system of organization known as trades-"unionism in this country." As to the possibility of devising any substitute for the Plan of Campaign which would really answer this description we may have our doubts. Considering that to secure the "absolute correspondence" of such a scheme with the principle of trades-unionism all tenants who desired to strike against a particular rent would have to begin by vacating their farms, we think it scarcely probable that Mr. PARNELL's new method of agrarian organization would so admirably combine innocence with efficiency, though we think it very likely that, by a sufficiently liberal definition of the former of these qualities, the presence of the latter might be ensured. But the significance of the statement itself, as well as of the slightly contemptuous tone in which Mr. PARNELL spoke of the mistake made by the authors of the Plan—"my friends "Mr. DILLON and Mr. O'BRIEN"—is undiminished by any considerations as to the feasibility of the policy which it announces. It is of a piece with the disdainful brevity of his reference to the Papal rescript and to the line which "Mr. DILLON and Mr. O'BRIEN and the other "Catholics who have been engaged in this matter may "think it right to take as a vindication of their poli-"tical freedom." There is an undertone of "You see "what comes of acting independently of me" about all his language on the subject which must be rather galling to "my friends Mr. DILLON and Mr. O'BRIEN." He tells them, in fact, under polite disguise, that they have got themselves into a mess by neglecting his advice, and that he must leave them to get out of it as best they can, subject always to the condition that, whatever happens to the Plan of Campaign, the National League must not be further involved. And as this clearly means that the Plan is to be dropped, and that its authors will subside into comparative obscurity, we may be sure—indeed there are already signs—that harmony will not be promoted among the Parnellite party by the latest utterance of their leader.

MRS. BURNETT'S VICTORY.

THE judgment of Mr. Justice STIRLING in the case of WARNE v. SEEBOHM will gladden the heart of the novelist, and help to diminish the discredit into which the law of literary property had been falling. The argument on the plaintiff's side was a very bold one, and bore some resemblance to the ingenious quibble by which PORTIA got the better of SHYLOCK. But no reasonable person can complain of the use of paradox for the purpose of defeating a moral wrong. The facts are very simple, and only too common. Mrs. HODGSON BURNETT, the well-known author of That Lass o' Lowrie's, Through One Administration, and other excellent novels, some English, some American, wrote a story for children which she called by the rather unpleasantly suggestive title of Little Lord Fauntleroy. It was very successful, like her other works; and among other, we trust more agreeable, fruits of its success she received a letter from a gentleman named SEEBOHM, who informed her, with many effusive compliments, that he had founded a comedy upon it, which would shortly be represented on the stage. It was stated by Mr. SEEBOHM's counsel at the trial that Mr. SEEBOHM had asked Mrs. BURNETT's leave before taking this course, and it is true that the phrase "with your "sanction" occurs in the letter. But the whole tenour of the document imports an announcement rather than a request, and so Mr. SEEBOHM's subsequent conduct shows that he wished to be understood. For Mrs. BURNETT first telegraphed, and then sent more fully by post, an unqualified refusal. She mildly suggested that she would prefer to dramatize the book herself, and she not unnaturally supposed that the law would protect her in doing so. There, however, Mrs. BURNETT was in error. Whatever copyright may be in the land of her adoption, it is not what it ought to be in the land of her birth. The law of England is still as it was in the days of Sir EDWARD COKE, "a "very particular thing." The wisdom of Parliament has provided that literary copyright shall be one pair of sleeves and dramatic copyright another. These are not the precise words of any Act, but they sufficiently describe the state of the law. Between the two copyrights there is a great gulf fixed, as the late Mr. CHARLES READE found to his cost. He was practically told that anybody might turn his novels into plays if he had not already done so himself, and he commented freely upon the ruling in the full-flavoured style of which he was a master. The logical result of READE v. CONQUEST, and other cases, seems to be that, if A dramatizes B's novel, and duly registers his dramatic version, he can afterwards restrain B from dramatizing his own book. To an ordinary mind, acquainted with the current of litigation upon the subject, it would have appeared plain that Mrs. BURNETT could only, as Mr. FRANK HAWLEY says in Middlemarch, "break her nose "against some damned judge's decision." Happily she was very well advised, and the acuteness of her legal friends has obtained for her a remarkable triumph.

Mr. SEEBOHM's adaptation of Little Lord Fauntleroy was brought out at the Prince of Wales' Theatre in full reliance upon READE v. CONQUEST. But it is impossible, or at least very difficult, to produce a play without making printed or written copies of it. Now, the Copyright Act of 1842, which is the principal statute on the subject, provides that "the word copyright shall be construed to mean the sole and "exclusive right of multiplying copies" of, among other things, a "tragedy, comedy, play, opera, farce, or other "scenic, musical, or dramatic entertainment." It is said that three copies of Mr. Seebohm's adaptation were given to the actors, and one to the Lord Chamberlain. Mr. Graham Hastings accordingly argued that the copyright had been infringed by the multiplication of copies, and Mr. Justice Stirling has adopted his argument. The Court has accordingly given judgment for Messrs. Warne, the publishers and plaintiffs, and granted an injunction "to restrain Mr. "Seebohm from printing or otherwise multiplying copies "of his play containing any passages copied, taken, or "colourably altered from Mrs. Burnett's book." Mr. Seebohm has also been directed "to state upon oath what copies "of the work exist, and to extract from these copies in his "power or possession and deliver up to the plaintiff for "cancellation all passages copied, taken, or colourably "imitated from the plaintiff's book," and to pay the costs. It is said that Mr. Seebohm will appeal, and he would be a bold man who should venture to predict what the opinion of the Lords Justices may be. But the words of the Act are very strong, and it will be observed that the judge does not pretend to interfere with the right of purely dramatic representation. He says in effect to the defendant:—"Act Mrs. Burnett's story as much as you like. I can-"not prevent you from repeating her words and repre-"senting her scenes. The law has not made them her "property, and you may get what profit out of them you "can. But you must go no further. Produce a single "copy of the play, which I hold to be practically the same "as the book, and I restrain you at once from infringing "a right expressly secured by statute." It is impossible not to be reminded of the famous "take thou thy "pound of flesh; but, in the cutting it, if thou dost shed "one drop of Christian blood," &c. &c. We have not dealt with the question whether Mr. Seebohm has so far appropriated the plot and the dialogue of Little Lord Fauntleroy as to bring him within the law of literary copyright. That is a matter of fact, and as Mr. Justice Stirling reserved judgment in order to compare the play with the book, we must assume that it has been rightly decided. The point of public interest and importance is that, if Mr. Justice Stirling's law be sound (and there is no better lawyer on the Bench), then at last, without the intervention of Parliament, writers of fiction have acquired a recognized property in the dramatic quality of their works. For the obstacles in the way of performing a piece, without any assistance from printing or writing, must be so great as to be practically prohibitive, even if a copy were not required for the Lord Chamberlain.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT AT CROYDON.

It must have been noticed with regret by the well-wishers of Sir William Harcourt that of late he has displayed something less than his former dexterity in doubling the parts of humourist and political philosopher. Formerly he used to be didactic before those audiences who knew the least, and jocular before those with whom a little facetiousness goes the longest way; whereby, of course, his reputation alike for wit and profundity was rendered fairly secure. Latterly, however, he has been less liberal of his "epigrams" in an assembly which, from its apparently regarding Sir Wilfrid Lawson as a sort of Sheridan, need not condemn the poorest jester to despair; while, on the other hand, he has been rash enough to display his gravity in the wrong place—to wit, in the columns of the Times, and in a controversy with opponents who really do know something about the criminal law. His speech to the Croydon Liberal and Radical Association indicates, however, a reversion to older and sounder traditions. He has left the newspaper arena to "English "Barristers" and "Indian ex-Judges," and other troublesome people, who are always wanting to trace constitutional principles further back than their fount in Sir William Harcourt's breast, and who are impertinent enough to remind him that certain "Eastern models" of law which he despises were fashioned by administrators and jurists so worthy even of his once learned consideration as Macaulay, Maine, and Stephen. Quitting the aforesaid "loathed stage" of controversy, Sir William Harcourt has wisely betaken himself to Croydon, and has called upon the Liberal and Radical Association of that town, and on Mr. James Judd, its President, to decide on the questions whether there is a legal power of increasing sentences on appeal, and to overrule the opinion of the Solicitor-General that the publican has a right to compensation for the capricious extinction of his licence. In the course of his remarks he disposed of Sir Edward Clarke's advice as "absurd," and spoke of the Irish County Court judges as being "some of "them notorious for their political partisanship." The advocate here shows that he understands and is worthy of the tribunal to which he appeals. It is infinitely easier to tell a suburban political Club that a particular opinion is absurd or a particular judge unjust, than it is to prove the statement or to justify the slander to the expert public whom Sir William Harcourt had been previously addressing.

The larger part of what remains of his speech at Croydon was devoted to a laborious attempt to justify the Gladstonian alliance with the Parnellites by a reference to Lord Carnarvon's interview with Mr. Parnell. As to the discretion of that proceeding on the part of the then Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland we long ago expressed our opinion; but, as Lord Carnarvon has again and again, and even once more since Mr. Parnell's speech at the Eighty Club, explained the entire independence of his action in that matter, we may leave Sir William Harcourt to make what capital he can out of a comparison between the conduct of a single statesman and the mass of a great political party. But on its own merits the institution of the comparison itself was surely disrespectful to the intelligence of Croydon. Let it be granted that the antecedents and entourage of Mr. Parnell were such as to make it unadvisable for the Minister of an English Government to hold such communication with him as was held by Lord Carnarvon; but what then? What sort of analogy can there be, even in the most muddle-headed member of the Croydon Liberal and Radical Association, between that step on Lord Carnarvon's part and the position occupied by Mr. Gladstone, Sir William Harcourt, and their associates towards Mr. Parnell and the Irish-American conspiracy at his back? We suppose that even the stupidest and most prejudiced Englishman would see a considerable distinction between holding converse with any eminent organizer of a national Plan of Campaign and taking service with the gang of which he is a leader. Sir William Harcourt is evidently to this hour under a misconception as to the exact light in which the Gladstonian alliance with Parnellism—an alliance concluded for the revolutionary purposes for which Parnellism exists, and relying on the lawless weapons with which Parnellism has always fought—is regarded by the intelligence and conscience of the country.

RELIEF FOR THE POLICE.

We have heard, not as much as we should, but somewhat, of the monstrous waste of the police by the necessity of supplying Mr. Cunninghame Graham with a guard of honour whenever he requires it. Always when this statesman and prose-poet feels constrained to take a turn in Trafalgar Square, several hundred men of the force which is supposed to exist to protect our lives and property are told off to look after him. They are taken from other duty and marched to the scene of action. There they wait. After a space Mr. Cunninghame Graham drives up in a hansom. He gets out, takes a gentle constitutional, and gets in again. Meanwhile the police look on solemnly. Perhaps a thinker from the National Liberal Club scrambles on to the monument and has to be pulled off by the heels. Perhaps nothing happens; but in any case the police are on duty for hours, and in the interval their place elsewhere is too probably vacant. At last they walk gravely away, very tired and very little fit for any more work that night. This sort of thing seems to be accepted as quite a matter of course, and few appear to think it at all absurd that a Scotch gentleman with a fiery vocabulary should be able to put the Metropolitan Police to all this troublesome waste of time. And yet we are still to learn why Mr. Cunninghame Graham is so privileged. When he will persist in claiming the right to do what he has no right to do, why should he be allowed to make himself a pest by silly make-believes? There is no reason; but the nuisance is accepted as part of the scheme of things, and the police are duly drawn off to the general danger of the whole community.

This use of the force is, to be sure, only part of a general system. Now that the season is in full swing the police are being regularly used by hundreds at a time for work which is not the protection of life and property. It is certainly work which ought to be done, but by other men. A great fuss is made now and then about the growing military character of the police, but nobody finds fault when they are employed to replace and displace HER MAJESTY'S Guards. The public likes to see these latter, and only complains that it does not see enough of them. What man does not rejoice at the sight of that long frockcoat with the closely-ranked frogs on it which so obviously confers on the wearer a placid sense of ownership of the universe. The red coat, too, is good, and as for the splendour of the gentlemen of all ranks in the Life Guard and the Royal Horse Guards it is a joy to see. But we never see enough of it. Only aged men can remember the old Waterloo review; and since that was given up, to please an ally who scared us into fits and brought about the Volunteer movement a few years later, there have been no proper solemn functions in which the Guards appear in all their magnificence to delight HER MAJESTY'S lieges. One may live years in London and never catch sight of the Household at all, except as represented by a few long-leggit callants in very tight breeks doing sentry-go. Now and then we have the luck to see a handful of resplendent creatures riding slowly through St. James's Street, and lighting the whole place up. Sometimes the doubt arises whether, in fact, there are any Household cavalry except those long-leggit callants on sentry-go and perhaps a half troop or so who appear alternately in red or blue coats. The British army is such an extraordinary force that this may be the case; but still it does appear from the Army List that there are nine hundred of them, all over six feet high. Why are we not allowed to see more of them? When the road has to be kept clear on a proper occasion they ought to be trotting up and down, or sitting solemnly on big horses, at due distances. Instead of this, we have the useful but tame policeman, whom even a horse cannot make brilliant. Besides, they have taken away the sabres of the mounted men. Mr. STANHOPE might think of it—if he has not decided to turn the Household Brigade into a field telegraph corps, or waggoners, or something really useful and military, as he has done with the Royal Horse Artillery. We are not afraid of a military despotism. There are some who even think it would be preferable to the Caucus; and, whether or no, nobody fears that our ancient Constitution will be upset because a few hundred big young men are set to trot about the streets in gorgeous uniform. If they were employed, London would be pleasantly brightened up—which would do it no harm—and the police might be spared for needful duties.

THE RAILWAY RATES BILL.

THE reception in the Lower House of the Railway Rates Bill, just sent down from the Lords, must have been encouraging to the Government. Mr. MUNDELLA was, indeed, justified in his somewhat rueful contrast of the "calm "and peaceful atmosphere" in which the measure now enters the House of Commons with his own tempestuous experiences in his attempt to deal with the same question. Of course, however, the contest on the Railway Rates Bill is to come, and the Grand Committee to whom the Bill is to be referred will not have quite so smooth a time of it as the House on Friday night. Yet even there the controversy, if acute, ought not to be prolonged; for, in truth, it is no exaggeration to say that the field of contention is confined almost within the limits of a single clause. It is true, no doubt, that traders and the public have other grievances against the railway Companies than that of preferential rates; but we question whether, but for this particular grievance, the attempt to legislate afresh on the subject of railway rates would have been taken up session after session by successive Governments. Probably the abuse of monopolized and neglected canals and other matters dealt with in the Bill might have been allowed to sleep for years to come if the pinch of the depression in English trade and agriculture had not been aggravated by a system of transport which appears to the sufferers directly calculated, if not expressly designed, to place them at still greater disadvantage in their unequal struggle with the foreign competitor.

This grievance it is which the Government hope to remove by what we have indicated as essentially the contentious clause of the Bill—the 25th—and their efforts, it may be remembered, were seconded by the "gentle "violence" of their party in the Upper House, who compelled them to accept an amendment expressly enacting that no difference is to be made in the treatment of British and foreign merchandise under similar conditions of transport. If this is, as Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH now maintains it to be, merely declaratory of the existing law, so much the better; it will certainly strengthen the hands of the Commissioners for the performance of an extremely difficult and delicate task. How difficult and delicate it is the PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE very forcibly pointed out, in his remarks on the absolute impossibility of preserving a rigid equality of charges. Without special rates, as he pointed out, it would be impossible for London to obtain her coal supply from the Midlands, or get fresh milk, fish, and vegetables from anywhere but the home counties; while without special rates the manufacturers of Lancashire would have to depend solely on the Lancashire coal-fields. These necessities, however, are covered by the words of the 25th clause, which provides that the Railway Commissioners, in deciding whether a particular charge does or does not amount to undue preference, may take into consideration whether such difference of treatment is necessary for the purpose of securing "in the interests of the "public," the traffic in respect of which it is made. If the words "in the interest of the public" can only be interpreted so as to save the English trader from being sacrificed to anybody or anything short of the English community of consumers at large, the purpose of the proviso will be fulfilled. But here, of course, is the difficulty. Is it not, the railway Companies will ask, "to the interest "of the public" to foster an infant trade with a foreign producer, and thereby to increase the amount, cheapen the price, and probably also improve the quality of the product as supplied to the English consumers? In many cases, no doubt, the Commission would dispose of such a contention at once as based on two remotely prospective advantages; but every one can imagine cases—indeed, some of us must know of actual cases—in which such a contention would be, to say the least of it, plausible. And so long as such cases exist we are afraid that there will be a certain proportion of English producers disappointed by the result of this legislation.

KEWAIWONA.

WHERE is Kewaiwona? Kewaiwona is in the north-east corner of Michigan, bending over Lake Superior, as the eagle stretches its neck from a rock over its quarry below. As late as 1614 Kewaiwona belonged to a people to whom the metals of the earth, like the mystical tints of its trees and the tender blue of its sky, were objects of divine worship. In 1615 the Jesuit Fathers made their appearance, and thence afterwards the Upper Peninsula, as it is called, became a scene of business activity. Kewaiwona lost its name, and is now never heard of in speech or seen in writing. It is called in maps and scientific reports Keweenaw Point. Its ancient inhabitants have gone the way of all flesh, and the only accounts of their manners and customs, their arts, language, and worship, are to be found in letters of the Fathers of the Company of Jesus. The Fathers themselves have suffered a change, their names being used to denote now a forsaken mine and now a small lake in the woods, or a mining community in the "swim" of a great commercial success like Marquette, for example. Father Marquette also discovered the Northern Mississippi; but his name is never heard on that well-known stream or elsewhere in any part of the early or later scenes of his labours. "The meek, gentle, single-hearted, unpretending, illustrious Marquette," the "man who was delighted at the happy necessity of exposing his life to bring the 'Word of God' within reach of half a continent," has, like his Indians, passed away like a shadow. The "Indians," it may be said in passing, do reappear now and then in their handiworks coming unexpectedly to light, and so far they keep up a connexion with their former life. When the ship-canal was cut through Portage Lake to connect it with Lake Superior, fifteen or sixteen years ago, some of the most precious relics of the aboriginal races were discovered at a depth of thirty feet below the level of the "Great Laughing Water," buried in sand. They consisted of two copper short swords, exquisitely wrought with double edges, and fluted blades, several small daggers, discs, sharp-edged, and engraved with much taste, a delicately modelled vase, and what seemed to the illiterate a handful of tenpenny nails, but of copper, some of which had become heavily oxidized, the vase being eaten through in several places with rust; but the swords were intact, carrying only a thin film of green oxide. This naturally led to an investigation which has proved of great interest. The vase was made of pure copper, the discs and swords of a natural alloy, or, in other words, of copper impregnated with certain impurities. Father Allouez had found in the possession of "the savages" pieces of bright shining copper which resembled gold, and were held sacred; and descriptions of which were published in Paris as early as 1636 by one La Garde. Little or no notice was taken of the discovery then or since, and it is only quite lately that its importance has been demonstrated. Copper in various forms continued to press itself on the notice of the Fathers; they found it in large round boulders on the lake-shore, weighing from 15 lbs. to 50 lbs. and 60 lbs., and they shipped some of these "floats" to France, when they fetched a good price. At length the "Indians," whose confidence had been gained by the Fathers, made known some of the "caves" where the precious shiny metal hid itself. From that time the Indian was doomed. "It is accepted as the truth by many," says the serious history of to-day, "that the only good Indian is the dead Indian." It is true that the Indian did not tamely submit to being driven off his native soil and robbed of his copper deities, as the long and bloody wars with the Ojibbeways, the Wyandots, and Makoueones testify; nor was it until less than fifty years ago that modern commercial enterprise found in ancient Kewaiwona one of its most famous fields. Between the years 1840 and 1881 Keweenaw Point sent to market more than three hundred and thirty thousand tons of bright and shining copper. Many new mines were speedily opened up with much profit to some and great loss to others. One of these mines, the Calumet and Hecla, has done for nearly all the others what Aaron's rod did for the rods of the magicians; it has swallowed them up. This is the biggest copper mine in Michigan, perhaps in the world. There never has been a mine like unto it either for the quantity of copper it yields or the purity of its metal. The cost of produce is about twopence per pound; it gives employment to more than two thousand men, and supports two flourishing townships of some seven thousand inhabitants. The next great industry of Keweenaw is the lumber business, which yields 4,919,500 feet of timber a year. Its flora comprises no less than 850 different species; the representatives of the forest being held in the greatest esteem, chiefly for their commercial value. These include the white oak, burr oak, post oak, and the red oak, the latter being exceedingly beautiful in October, when its great mass of leaves is changed into a flaming fire; but it is useless for timber, and only used for fuel. There are some half-dozen kinds of maple. It is in the same month that the maples vie with the red oaks in colour. Elm and cherry, plum and walnut, ash and hickory, beech, sycamore, and cedar, birch and pine, aspen and hazel are in amazing abundance and of great value in the market-place; but of their value, when all these become dancing flames to glad the eyes of poets and give the aristocracy of the palette pause, who may tell? It is this untold and untellable richness of colour which gives to the climate of Kewaiwona its indescribable charm. All suddenly there comes a frost, and the earth with its gaiety is covered in deep snow, which lies on the ground for nearly six months. This time also has its charm, especially to the sportsman; the Tetraonidæ family is large, and includes the ruffed grouse, commonly called partridge, the quail, and prairie chicken; vast flocks of wild turkey sometimes show themselves; deer is also abundant, and wolves and bears; a lynx now and then is seen to open his wondrous eyes, and a porcupine has been known to turn up unexpectedly, making it unpleasant for the dogs. But not to the sportsman and artist only is this region full of attractions; here a wayfarer weary of wandering or sighing for quiet may find a peace "man did not make, and cannot mar."

THE CONFESSIONS OF A SINNER.

JAMES HOGG, the Ettrick Shepherd, gives an excellent subject to any one who likes to practise the old and favourite pastime of Robinson Crusoe, that of setting down the lucky and unlucky circumstances of a man's life in parallel columns. In his exaltation from almost the very lowest rank, without education, patronage, or anything of the kind, to a tolerably familiar association with some of the best literary society of his day, in the almost unceasing enjoyment of life which he seems to have had, in his domestic affairs (other than pecuniary ones, which last weighed on him very little), in the amount of fame, certainly rather excessive for at least his poetical deserts, which he attained, he was an extraordinarily lucky man during his life, and as far exceeded Burns in good fortune as he came short of him in poetical genius. Nor should we, at least, say that he was unlucky in that counterfeit presentment of him which annoyed himself not a little during his lifetime, and which his injudicious encomiasts and representatives have protested against since his death. The "Shepherd of the Noctes" is not a perfect character, and some part of his "boozing buffoonery" has come, probably for a time only, to grate not a little on the nerves of this sensitive generation. It is quite possible that, as Hogg's admirers indignantly protest, he is not Hogg. But in that case he is a much wiser, more eloquent, more accomplished, better bred, better gifted person than Hogg usually was. On the other hand, the Shepherd—the real Shepherd—had, not by any fault, except a certain heedlessness of his own, the most extraordinary ill luck with money matters. Again and again, when some book of his had made a fair hit and money ought to have been coming in, did his publishers go bankrupt, just as if they did it on purpose. More than once he got together what for a person in his station were considerable sums of money, and always lost them, not by gambling or debauchery, but by ill luck or injudicious, and not more than injudicious, business investment. Also he had a piece of bad fortune which, from the literary point of view, is the greatest of all. His very best piece of work—the only piece perhaps which is of really artistic excellence as a whole—was not only a complete failure at the time of its publication, but has never attracted any general attention, and, though included under an altered and much less happy title in cumbrous editions of his whole works, has never, so far as we know, been reprinted separately since his death.

Yet the Confessions of a Justified Sinner, to give its full and original title (most injudiciously altered, in order to conciliate pious misunderstanding, to the Confessions of a Fanatic), is, we repeat, very much his best piece of work. The general fault of Hogg, both in prose and verse, is exactly what might be expected in a man of no education, of extreme facility and unbounded self-confidence, but of very intermittent originality and of, apparently, no critical faculty whatever. Much, if not the larger part, of his more ambitious verse is only Scott, or Byron, or Southey, or what not; and bad Scott, Byron, Southey, or what not, "at that." The very goodness of the professed imitations in the "Poetic Mirror" is a tell-tale and dangerous goodness. Even in the flights where he is surest he could not keep himself up for any length of time. "Kilmeny," his most famous and certainly best poem, begins, if not far above singing, at any rate at a high and rare flight of song, only to become very ordinary verse before long. In the midst of his best and most spirited ballads, such as the partly capital "May of the Moril Glen," he will put in such an excruciating stanza as—

> Come rank your master up behind,
> This serpent to belay;
> I'll let you hear me put her down
> In grand polemic way.

In his most ambitious couplet verse there occurs such balderdash as:—

> They found each clime with mental joys replete,
> And all for which its 'habitants were meet.

His songs, though only excelled by those of Burns in parts, are seldom or never good as wholes. As for his still more voluminous prose, he says of it himself that "he never in his life rewrote a page" of it, but "dashed on in a state of desperation," mingling good with bad, never exercising the slightest criticism, and sometimes, it may be added, plagiarizing wholesale. To this there is the one exception of which he thus speaks himself, showing that he had little, if any, suspicion how good it was, while he thought mountains and marvels of mosaics and pastiches like The Queen's Wake and Queen Hynde. "The next year, 1824, I published the Confessions of a Fanatic [Sinner], but, it being a story replete with horrors, after I had written it I durst not venture to put my name to it; so it was published anonymously, and of course did not sell very well. So, at least, I believe, for I do not remember ever receiving anything for it, and I am sure if there had been a reversion, I should have had a moiety. However, I never asked anything, so on that point there was no misunderstanding." To this we need only add that so superior, for all its "horrors," is the general conception and conduct of the story to anything else of Hogg's, and so contrary to his rather vainglorious nature is this anonymous publication, that some not altogether inexperienced critics have suspected that it may have been not wholly his. There is much in it that recalls Lockhart's Adam Blair, published two years earlier, and his Matthew Wald, published the same year. Lockhart (as Hogg frequently acknowledges, though the same injudicious defenders have quarrelled with the account of the Shepherd in the Life of Scott) was a constant and very kind friend to Hogg. That admirable critic as to whom (probably because he was a gentleman among English gentlemen of the press) Mr. Louis Stevenson has played upon his American readers the characteristic practical joke of describing him as a "cad," is actually brought into the framework of the Confessions as Mr. L——t of C——d [Chiefswood]. Moreover, his critical and constructive faculty was exactly what was wanting to Hogg, just as Lockhart wanted Hogg's imagination.

Of imagination and construction both, there is no lack in the Confessions of a Sinner, and, extravagant as is its general donnée (it is a story of pure devilry), the whole arrangement is as congruous and coherent in its incongruity and incoherency as if it were Hoffmann's own—perhaps a little more so. Its more important and "title" part is supposed to be a manuscript found in the grave of a suicide in a lonely place of the Border district, the finding and circumstances being described very well in the elaborate manner recommended by the faculty (whether rightly or wrongly we give no opinion) for such occasions. Further, there is a narrative preface of considerable length, in which the general outline of the story is recounted, so to say, ab extra. A jovial laird late in the seventeenth century marries a precisian, with whom he is very unhappy, but who is not at all unhappy with her minister, the Rev. Robert Wringhim. Notwithstanding their quarrels, the laird and his wife have two children, George and Robert, the younger of whom is the mother's favourite, though the father goes near to disown him. Both brothers mix after their fashion in Edinburgh society, and George, a placable person, is willing to be friends with his brother; but Robert refuses, and divers singular events happen, including a tavern- and street-riot, and a mysterious affair on Arthur's Seat, in which it is made to appear that George has attacked and tried to murder Robert. But the end is that George himself is found murdered in the streets of Edinburgh. An innocent person is convicted, in his absence, of the murder; but Arabella Logan, an old friend, if not something warmer, of George's father, determines to find out the truth. Just as the murder is about to be brought home to Robert, he disappears. Then the "Confessions" proper, written by him, take up the story.

He has been brought up by his mother and Mr. Wringhim (whom he calls his father, though of course only spiritually) in the strictest tenets of Calvinism, and though regarded by every one else as something much like a limb of the Devil, is early convinced of his election. Having been solemnly welcomed among the saved by his mother and Wringhim, he goes out for a walk, and meets "a young man of mysterious appearance," singularly like himself. This person, accosting him, assures him that he is "his brother, not according to the flesh, but according to his belief in the same truths." This person he constantly meets; and, as the stranger declines to give his real name, and calls himself "Gil Martin" only, a wild idea strikes Robert that he is the Czar Peter, who was known to be at the time actually wandering about Europe, and frequently disguised. The two spend their time in alternately discussing the highest supralapsarian mysteries and planning or executing the most atrocious crimes, which Gil Martin represents as pious acts of duty. They kill a saintly minister of the moderate or "cold morality" school to prevent him, as Gil Martin ("my illustrious friend") argues, from corrupting the world with his doctrines. They are concerned between them—Gil Martin's strange faculty of altering his appearance assisting—in all the mysterious affairs which seem to point to George as a murderer, and which end in his being murdered. Succeeding on the old laird's death to his property, Robert finds himself by degrees accused of all sorts of misdoings (of most of which he is quite unconscious), such as seduction, oppression of tenants, forgery, and at last matricide, and the murder of his mistress. At this point the mysterious protection or interference which has hitherto kept him safe from the law changes into an equally mysterious persecution. He is driven to fly, to change his name, to hide himself; and now his illustrious friend alters his tone completely, urges Robert to despair, and afflicts him with ghostly visitations, which drive him from human society and at last force him to take his own life.

The bare outline of such a story may seem beggarly enough. Yet not only is it the best way in which to deal with it in a small space, but it will not in any degree detract from the interest of reading it. For that interest arises chiefly from the extraordinary skill with which the extravagant incidents are co-ordinated, the remarkable adjustment of conversation and minor detail to the general course of the story, the strict and ingenious architecture of the fable. Fantastic and horrible as this fable is, the reader can never say that a man of such antecedents, such a temper, and such an education as Robert Colwan might not have perpetrated such actions and suffered such hallucination. Even the apparently preposterous delusion of the identity of the fiend with Peter is kept up with wonderful ingenuity. This craftsmanship, so different from Hogg's usual disorderly fertility, certainly suggests some "more potent spirit" at least as reviser; but that is only a point of interest to the critic. The merits of the story, ghastly as it is, ought to appeal even to the most uncritical.

THE NEW GALLERY.

UNLESS one is severely, we may say stupidly, unimpressionable, one cannot avoid taking a very friendly and favourable view of the pictures at the New Gallery. By their principles of hanging, no less than by the beauty of their rooms, the directors have made the most of the work entrusted to them. We cannot always agree with their choice of pictures from the point of view of artistic accomplishment, but we must admit that it has been governed by an ideal of a consistent and harmonious general effect. They have proved that they know how to make use of the class of picture they want, and that with all its one-sidedness their arrangement of the Grosvenor in the past was no haphazard achievement solely due to chance good work supplied by the painters. There has been so much division and uncertainty this year that every exhibition has suffered, and, after looking at the pictures in the New Gallery one by one, it would be absurd to deny that many seem lacking in robustness of conception and in technical thoroughness. A general harmony, however, has been secured, and, though some good artists may consider themselves neglected, the public at least must feel that it has been catered for with rare taste and intelligence. The Gallery itself is certainly the cheeriest and most agreeable in London, and it may well give a lesson to all concerned in the business of showing pictures. The first glimpse of the large, cool entrance-hall puts one in a favourable disposition for looking easily and without hurry at pictures and sculpture. Paved with marble, enlivened with green plants and a fountain, it is a place to refresh the eye and change the current of thought of the visitor tired out by continual assaults of colour. Sculpture looks well here, and good work is to be seen, such as Mr. Legros's gracefully and naturally posed "Young Satyr" (310), Mr. Thornycroft's statuette "The Mower" (334), A. Boucher's "Au Champ" (315), a design for a fountain (336) by Mr. J. W. Swynnerton, and various busts, medals, statues, &c.

On entering the west gallery—a room on the same level as the marble hall—one is struck by the good use which has been made of Mr. Burne-Jones's three pictures. Together they make a richly coloured centrepiece to the wall, which the eye naturally seeks when dissatisfied with anything else. By his aims Mr. Burne-Jones must necessarily be at a disadvantage in an age when people generally respect colour according as it assists illusion, paints atmosphere, and lures them right on into the depths of a picture by the fascinations of tone. Mr. Burne-Jones's colour is without significance, without a touch of the poetry that is based on reality; it must be taken purely and simply for itself as so much decorative beauty. If crude, it is without excuse; if employed meanly or in disadvantageous quantities, unlike realistic colour, it must be wholly condemned. The less a work by Mr. Burne-Jones makes one think about nature the better it pleases. "The Rock of Doom" (53), "The Tower of Brass" (54), "The Doom Fulfilled" (55), are therefore superior to "The Garden of Pan" and "The Depths of the Sea," and must be counted as ornamental designs of a very high order. Facing these pictures hangs "Femmes en prière" (8), a piece of stern and sober colour, by Mr. Legros. What we admire in this picture is that the heads show human complexions, that they are well wrapt in air, and that they hold their relative distances rightly. Too many of the heads in the Gallery look dirty in a strong, searching light. Measure and a sense of proportion are qualities but little esteemed anywhere, and painters in England are very unwilling to regard flesh, compared to other objects, as a soft, luminous spread of even tint and even texture. With the idea of being strong, they exaggerate every little difference of local colour and caricature the effect of cold light upon a warm substance. One sees blues and violets like fish scales put under the eyes, dabs of crude sienna and even cadmium in the half light, pure white in the high light, and hot, bituminous slush in the shadows. These tones cannot go together, cannot render our impression of the creamy unity of flesh; they were never employed by the Old Masters, and are never employed by those who come nearest to their example in technique. The Academy is the place to see dirty colour in flesh, but we cannot quite exonerate Mrs. A. L. Swynnerton, Sir J. E. Millais, and Messrs. Herkomer, Richmond, and Lorimer from an occasional suspicion of this fault in some of their work in the New Gallery. It is quite a mistake to suppose that power is gained by dwelling on local tints and violating the natural conviction that flesh is something pure, even, and limpid. Whether a head be modelled in the high key of Mr. Carolus-Duran or in the dark rich colour of Rembrandt, it quite ruins any dirty portrait in its neighbourhood. Returning to Mr. Legros, we must avow that his "Dead Christ" (64) beats his "Femmes en prière" out of the field. It is a solemn poem conceived from an Old Master's point of view, and in its execution a superbly scholastic style of drawing and modelling, a sober, stately harmony of tone, and a romantic feeling for landscape have been displayed. Mr. G. F. Watts's "Angel of Death" (30) is so full of sentiment that one regrets a certain mildewed appearance in the colour and an unpleasantly ropy sort of handling. Mr. Strudwick, in "Acrasia" (9), gives us what would be a beautiful design for tapestry, but cannot compare in colour or workmanship with his exquisite picture of last year.

On turning to figure work of more realistic aim we find two praiseworthy efforts at large pictures—Mr. C. N. Kennedy's "A Fair-haired Slave who made Himself a King" (107) and Mr. Weguelin's "Bacchus and the Choir of Nymphs" (148). The expressions of Mr. Kennedy's figures are well felt, and his colour is tender and sympathetic in quality. Mr. Weguelin might improve his picture by shaving off certain impastos which give an air of false value, especially in the sea, and by getting a somewhat less chalky colour in the flesh of his nymphs. Mr. La Thangue's "Gaslight Study" (5) hardly convinces one that it is logical throughout; yet it is both amusing and decorative in appearance. A curious feature in it is the reproduction, under the effect of gaslight, of his picture "The Yeoman" (59), exhibited on the opposite wall. This last is certainly an excellent piece of work, and the stretch of country behind the man's head is full of character and light. Amongst other small works of merit and no great size we may mention Mr. F. Millet's "Quiet Hour" (150), a careful picture worked in his usual scheme of whites; Miss E. Armstrong's quiet and well-drawn figures of girls in "Apprentices" (45), and Mr. J. H. Lorimer's charming effect of white dresses in a dark canvas, "Sweet Roses" (249). Mr. Clausen's "A Toiler still" (37) has merit; but, owing to the way in which he has shut in his figure, it is intolerably dull. Mr. Alma Tadema sends three or four small pictures, the best of which is "Venus and Mars" (134), a little girl with a statuette in her hand, standing on a marble terrace, with the sea behind her. In "Sketch for Heliogabalus" (132) Mr. Tadema shows how he might have given a comprehensible and effective composition to the hopeless confusion of his Academy picture if he had thought such matters worthy of consideration. Having been lately reminded of what Sir John Millais can do by the exhibition of a truly magnificent portrait of an old lady at the Rennie sale, we feel no hesitation in condemning his "Forlorn" (99) as vulgar, careless, and altogether unworthy of his genius.

Even Mr. Herkomer's life-like "F. C. Burnand, Esq." (105), one of the strongest of the portraits, is not altogether free from a sort of cold dirtiness of colour. Some of Mr. Richmond's canvases suffer in the same way, and perhaps his best is a very low-toned "Portrait of Miss Gladstone" (98). Mr. F. Holl gets a mellower quality of colour in his "Robert R. Symon, Esq." (33), and Mr. Herkomer great strength of effect in his "Julia, Marchioness of Tweeddale" (113). For straightforward truth of tone and brightness of colour we prefer Mr. John Collier's tall upright portrait of "Miss Ethel Huxley" (154) in a white dress to any of them. Mr. Sargent's head, "Portrait of Claude Monet" (211), expresses character with great breadth and freedom. Mr. Tadema's "Lady Thompson" (130) and his "Rev. A. D. Adama van Scheltema" (133) are refined work of modern French character; and with them we must class Mr. J. J. Shannon's "Mrs. Williamson" (94) and Mr. S. J. Solomon's "Phillis" (158).

In landscape especially we can note a growing dissatisfaction with scientific realism. Men, when they can paint what they can see with art, begin to desire to paint what they would wish to see with a poetical style and with a suitable treatment of surroundings. To ensure success they must long have held a firm grip upon reality. This Mr. Arthur Lemon has done, and we think that his pictures, "A Struggle" (48), and more especially "A Vendetta" (19), fully justify his present excursion into regions of fantasy. He has just hit the amount of realization in his torn sunset sky, his weird trees, his threatening group of figures, and his mysterious foreground of reeds, which one can tolerate in a subject containing so fantastic a creature as a centaur. Mr. T. H. McLachlan, in "Nearing Twilight" (41), Mr. Costa, in "The First Smile of Morn" (77), and even Mr. Corbett in his much more robust picture, "The Orange Light of Widening Morn" (114), prove that they do not know enough of nature or of broad, realistic treatments of it to be able to impose their views of poetry upon any given scene. There is a far finer, far truer poetry in Mr. Mark Fisher's magnificent, though perhaps rather overcrowded, rendering of real facts, "Winter Pasture" (27); in Mr. Clausen's rich and beautiful treatment of the passage from cool to hot colour caused by a low sun at evening, "The Cottage Gate" (42); and in Mr. Hennessey's exquisitely aërial scheme of silver tones, "An April Day" (149). Mr. Peppercorn's work savours too much of a parti pris to be always affecting. "The Willow Stream" (47), a scheme in fat greens, is his best; his "Winter Evening" (39) really expires in faintness for want of a firm touch or two in the tree-stems to give value to all this atmosphere. Mr. Maurice Pollock is in the tether of realism; hence a certain tightness in his tree-forms; but he promises work of excellent sentiment if he will stay there a little longer. His skies in "The Bracken Harvest" (174) and "Bank in the New Forest" (265) are entirely free from the muddiness of certain showy landscapes in the Gallery, and the admirable luminousness of the first is due in a measure to truth in the large relation between the sky and the ground. Mr. C. Napier Hemy's "Trawler's Punt" (144) is brilliant and true, and Mr. Colin Hunter gets great force, if not finesse, in his impression of boats, sea, figures, and pier, "Caller Herrin'" (125). Mr. D. Murray overruns all the line-space in London, and, as his notion of finish generally consists in elaborating a mass till it disappears, he would produce absolutely no effect anywhere else. It is right to say, however, that his "Early October in Picardy" (80) is a great improvement in composition. He should never do anything larger than this picture, as, having no notion of style, he cannot suit his workmanship to his canvas and his subject. Mr. Boughton's "Harvest of the Dawn" (81), good as it is, will not compare with his noble-looking picture in the Academy, either in freshness of colour or in dignity of composition. Mr. Henry Moore sends nothing very particular; Mr. A. Goodwin gives more body to the "Enchanted Lake" (26) than to most of his dreams; Mr. S. R. Cadogan gets a fine quality in the distant hills and sky of his "Gulf of Ajaccio, Corsica" (20). Work of various sorts comes from Sir J. D. Linton, and Messrs. David Carr, Fairfax Murray, H. Schmalz, W. Padgett, A. W. Hunt, Philip Burne-Jones, Alfred East, Rupert Stevens, E. A. Ward, R. W. Allan, J. M'Whirter, E. A. Waterlow, A. Lucas, A. Helcke, H. Macallum, and several others.

No one should overlook a collection of etchings and chalk and silver point drawings, &c., in the balcony. Coming from Mr. Burne-Jones, Mr. Legros, and Mr. Tadema, they are by no means the least interesting part of the show. Amongst them are a dark Rembrandt-like etching of a head (305), six or seven exquisitely delicate silver point studies, a dry point of superb simplicity "Head of a Child" (274), and several etchings of landscape by Mr. Legros; a charming "Study of a Head" (295) in chalk, "Study for Andromeda" (279), far better than the figure in the picture by the way, and "A Study" (297) of braided hair by Mr. Burne-Jones.

THE VALIDITY OF BLANK TRANSFERS.

THE decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of Williams v. The Colonial Bank is exciting much interest in the City, for it strikes at the validity of blank transfers, upon which so much current business is based. Blank transfers are most customary in dealing with American railroad shares. Properly, an American share ought to be transferred in accordance with the form laid down by the Company, and the new owner's name ought to be registered in the books of the Company. Few American railroad Companies have registration offices in London, and consequently it is necessary for the purchaser, if he would have himself registered as the owner of the shares which he has bought, in most cases to send out the shares to the United States, at the risk of loss, or at the cost of carriage, commission, and insurance. Worse still, in sending the shares out a considerable loss of time is involved. The majority of the American railroad shares held in this country, unfortunately, are of the class of non-dividend-paying securities. They are bought most usually, not for investment, but by speculators who, for some reason or other, are of opinion that the shares will rise, and, therefore, that they will be able to sell them before long at a better price than they have given for them. They are unwilling for that reason, if for no other, to send away the shares for a month or six weeks, which might possibly prevent them from taking advantage of a favourable turn in the market. Hence the custom has grown up of dealing in shares by means of blank transfers; of transfers, that is, only signed by the owner of the share without any of the other blanks being filled up. And thus the shares pass from hand to hand as if they were negotiable securities. On the strength of such blank transfers millions of sales take place every year, and immense sums are lent, both in the Stock Exchange and directly by bankers. So general, indeed, had the custom become that it had almost grown to be the opinion of the City that the custom would be upheld by the Law Courts. Of late, however, the expectation has received some rude shocks. We commented last year upon a decision unfavourable to blank transfers, and now the judgment of the Court of Appeal is even still more unfavourable. The facts of the particular case are simple, and admit of being shortly stated.

In 1880 a Mr. Williams died, possessing 1,210 shares in the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company, represented by 121 certificates of 10 shares each. The certificates stated that the shares were transferable, either in person or by proxy, at the office of the Company, and in the form and manner required by the transfer regulations of the Company. In the following year Mr. Williams's executors handed the certificates to Thomas & Co., who had usually acted as the deceased gentleman's brokers with instructions to send them out to New York and have the shares registered in the names of the executors. Thomas & Co. represented that, to carry out the instructions, it would be necessary for the executors to sign the certificates in blank, and this was accordingly done. Thomas & Co. reported subsequently that the shares had been duly sent out to New York for registration; but that they would be retained there subject to the orders of the executors, in case those gentlemen should at any time wish to sell them, when the risk of a double journey would be avoided by the precautions thus taken. As a matter of fact, however, Thomas & Co. did not send the certificates to New York for registration, but took them along with the blank transfers to the Colonial Bank, and lodged them with that institution as security for a balance due from Thomas & Co. to the bank. About three years later Thomas & Co. failed, and then the executors of Mr. Williams discovered how the certificates had been treated. They immediately began proceedings against the Colonial Bank and against the trustee in liquidation of Thomas & Co., demanding delivery of the certificates. The bank, on the other hand, asserted that it was entitled to a charge upon the shares for the amount due to them from Thomas & Co., alleging that they had accepted the certificates as a security in full belief that they belonged to Thomas & Co.; that the usage of bankers and others was to pass the property in shares by delivery of endorsed certificates, which by American law were negotiable securities, and that the plaintiffs, the executors of Mr. Williams, had impliedly given Thomas & Co. power to pledge the shares and fill up the blanks. At the trial before Mr. Justice Kekewich much evidence was taken to show the custom both in New York and in London, and to elucidate the American law upon the subject. Mr. Justice Kekewich decided that the case must be governed by the American law; that according to the American law blank transfers did, in fact, make the shares negotiable instruments, and that, therefore, the claim set up by the Colonial Bank was good. Mr. Williams's executors appealed, and last week the Court of Appeal unanimously overruled Mr. Justice Kekewich's decision. Lords Justices Cotton, Lindley, and Bowen all agreed that the case must be decided not according to American, but according to English law; that by the law of this country a person could not give a better title than he had himself; that Thomas & Co. had in fact no title to the shares, and that consequently the Colonial Bank acquired no title. As for the allegation that the executors of Mr. Williams had impliedly given power to Thomas & Co. to pledge the shares and were estopped from denying that power, the three Lords Justices were also agreed that the argument could not hold. The executors gave authority to Thomas & Co. only to have the shares registered in their names, never intending, or indeed contemplating, that Thomas & Co. would fraudulently pledge them in London, and, consequently, that the pledge was fraudulent and gave no title to the bank. The decision is consonant with equity and common sense; but it remains to be seen whether it will be upheld by the House of Lords. The Courts below had already given conflicting decisions. One judge, as we have already seen, had decided that shares passed by blank transfer really became negotiable instruments, while another decided that they did not. So far, therefore, there is the decision of four judges against one against the validity of blank transfers.

but until the ruling of the House of Lords has been obtained uncertainty will, of course, continue.

The matter is of very great importance to bankers and brokers and all who deal in American railroad securities. As we have said above, the number of shares that pass every year by blank transfer is immense, and the sums that are advanced in one form or another are very large. The decision of the Court of Appeal has come, therefore, as a very uncomfortable reminder to bankers and others of the danger of these blank-transfer transactions, and has certainly helped to depress the market for American railroad securities in London. But it is evident that the whole blank-transfer system is not only dangerous in the extreme, but from other points of view is highly objectionable. It was devised, in the first place, for the convenience of speculators. Clearly it was not worth the while of a speculator who intended to sell on the first favourable opportunity to be at the cost and trouble of sending out shares to the United States for registration. Indeed, if frequent registrations became imperatively necessary, dealing in such shares would be considerably hampered. But while freely admitting this, it is evident that the blank-transfer system opens the door to abuses of all kinds. For example, if an ingenious person forged large numbers of shares of an American railroad Company and sold them in London, there would be little risk of discovery if the shares were passed by blank transfer. They would not for a long time come into the office of the Company for registration, and in all probability, therefore, might continue to pass from hand to hand for years without any suspicion being aroused of their real nature. So, again, shares might be stolen and sold in London, and the means by which the shares were abducted from the rightful owner might not be discovered for a long time. For every reason, then, the system is objectionable, and it is to be hoped that some means may early be found to do away with it altogether. The most satisfactory way would be for the American railroad Companies themselves to open offices in London where shares could be registered. A few of the Companies have done so, but they are very few, and many are not likely to follow the example because of the expense of keeping up a London office. A private Association has been started in the hope that it would supply the need of investors and speculators; but it has not commanded the confidence of the City, and it is hardly likely, therefore, to be a success. There appears, then, only one way in which the convenience of the market can be fully met without risk, and without opening the door to the abuses to which we have been referring, and that would be for the Stock Exchange to undertake to register all shares of American railroad Companies sent into it for registration, itself retaining the shares and giving to the person who sent them in for registration a certificate which would freely pass from hand to hand without delay or trouble. The Stock Exchange would inspire confidence in all parties if it acted in its corporate capacity, and it would be powerful enough to defy the hostility of the arbitrage dealers, who much prefer the present system. A great dealer in American railroad securities, whether he be a member of the Stock Exchange or a large capitalist, has a decided advantage in the present system, were it only because the larger the number of shares registered in his name, and passed afterwards from hand to hand by blank transfer, the greater is his voting power in the Company whose shares he has imported and sold, and consequently the greater his influence with the management. Very often this influence on the part of private persons is most injurious; it is one of the ways, indeed, in which railroad "kings" have managed to control American railroads. There would not be the same objection to the Stock Exchange exercising the influence; on the contrary, such influence might be used to very great advantage. If the Stock Exchange Committee, in its representative character, had a great voting power in the leading American railroad Companies, it would be able to use the influence for the better management of the Companies, and therefore for the interest of all investors in them. Indeed, it would be able to insist upon the compliance on the part of the American railroad Companies with many of the regulations to which English railway Companies are now subject. If, then, the decision of the Court of Appeal should so greatly hamper dealings in American railroad shares that the Stock Exchange Committee should be obliged to take action in the matter it would be a decided advantage to all concerned.

RACING AT NEWMARKET.

THE opening day of the Newmarket First Spring Meeting was one of more than average interest, although the stakes would have been considered insignificant at many provincial meetings. Among the starters for the Trial Plate was Isobar, who had run second to Melton for the St. Leger. Last year he only won one race out of fourteen, and now, after raising the hopes of his backers as he came into the Abingdon Bottom, he disgusted them by giving way to Mr. Benzon's Propriety as he came out of it, losing the race by three-quarters of a length. Rosy Morn, a horse that began life by winning a couple of two-year-old races worth nearly as many thousands, and then degenerated into a selling-plater, was made favourite for a Selling Plate; but he showed temper at the post, and the race was won by Panga, who had already won two races this season. Rosy Morn undoubtedly has his faults, but it is only fair to point out, to the credit of his sire, Rosicrucian, that he has trained on into his seventh year, that he has run in some forty-seven races, and that he won fourteen of them. For the Prince of Wales's Plate, Sir R. Jardine's three-year-old colt, Wise Man, was made first favourite. He had won one race this season and two last year, when he had also been placed in tolerable company. He ran now very badly, and the race was won by The Rejected, who had disappointed his backers terribly the previous week at Derby. The winner, who was purchased for 1,450 guineas last year, is a big but not particularly evenly-made four-year-old, by King of Trumps. Of the nine starters for the Hastings Plate, four—namely, Galore, Hazlehatch, Anarch, and Caerlaverock—had won 7,318*l.* in stakes last season. Galore, who has been heavily backed for the Derby, was made first favourite. He had started second favourite for the City and Suburban, and had been beaten soon after crossing the road, although he had carried less weight than had Speculum when he won that race at the same age. Galore now won very easily from Hazlehatch, who improved but little on his form in the Craven Stakes. Anarch and Caerlaverock ran very badly, the common opinion being that the former is not to be trusted and that the latter has not regained his two-year-old form. Galore is a good-looking colt, and the only fault we have heard found with him is that he is a little light in his fore-ribs. He is by Galopin out of Lady Maura; and if Lollypop, from whom his dam is descended, was by Voltaire, which is probable, he inherits four strains of Blacklock blood. A colt named Dornoch, by Sterling out of Golspie, and belonging to the Duke of Westminster, ran in public for the first time in this race. He finished fourth, and some critics objected to the appearance of his hocks. With regard to his performance, due allowance must be made for this having been his first race. The winner of the race that followed the Hastings Plate was also by Galopin. This was a two-year-old filly called Galloping Queen, out of Queen of Diamonds, and she was purchased at auction after the race for 700 guineas by Mr. L. de Rothschild, so that, as the stakes were only worth 100 guineas, and her selling price was 250, her owner apparently lost 350 by the transaction. Her present price was a substantial advance on the 165 guineas which she had cost as a yearling. Lord Calthorpe's Toscano was made favourite for the Visitors' Plate. At Derby he had run very badly for the Welbeck Cup; but on the following day he had won the Chaddesden Cup, for which he started at 12 to 1. On the strength of the latter performance he now became a strong favourite; but, instead of winning, he ran fifth, leaving Maiden Belle, Bismarck, and April Fool to fight out a beautiful race, in which they were divided by heads only at the finish.

As is usually the case, the racing on the Wednesday of the First Spring Meeting was not very interesting, with the exception of the Two Thousand, which we noticed at some length last week. Mr. Abington won the first and the second races with two horses for which he is said to have given 1,250 and 2,000 guineas. In the second case the stakes were only worth 100 guineas; yet eleven two-year-olds competed for them. The expensive winner had already won a race at Croydon. The four races which followed the Two Thousand were, at any rate, well contested. The first was won by a head; the second by the same distance, with only half a length between second and third; the next race was won by a neck, while, half a length off, two horses ran a dead-heat for third place; and in the last race the first, second, and third were only separated by heads. Those who like fine finishes would thoroughly have enjoyed themselves if it had not been for the wind and the rain in which these close contests came off.

On the Thursday, betting-men exactly "placed" Otterburn and Agneta for a Handicap Plate, by making them first and second favourites, as the former beat the latter by a neck; but, unfortunately for their calculations, Lord Cadogan's Franciscan, a three-year-old colt by Hermit, beat the pair by a couple of lengths. They showed still greater discrimination in making P. & O. and Devonian equal favourites for the second race, as it was a very fine point between them, and P. & O. barely won by a head. The Stud Produce Stakes brought out some good-looking two-year-olds, especially Carmine, a very well-shaped chestnut filly with a great deal of bone and power; the race, however, was won by a colt that was generally considered the worst looking of the ten starters. This was a light and rather narrow animal named Duo, belonging to Prince Soltykoff. He was admirably ridden by Cannon, and won by half a length from Carmine. Cohort, who is now eight years old, was made favourite for the Welter Handicap, although he had not won a race for three years. He ran wretchedly, and the race was won by Lord Zetland's Grey Friars, who ran ten times unsuccessfully last season. To make this field of race-losing horses the more complete, Isobar, who had only won three races out of twenty-two, looked very like winning up to a late period of the race, and then collapsed. Odds were laid upon Hazlehatch for the Newmarket Stakes, as well they might be, considering that his only dangerous opponent was Hark, who had been beaten by Satiety, a colt that had once run unplaced to Hazlehatch. The race was won easily by the favourite. "Mr. Abington" had a walk over for The Whip, with his horse Quilp. It must, we think, have been a long time since an amateur jockey had ridden his own horse for this time-honoured trophy.

A field of fourteen for the One Thousand was much above the average, and it was more than double the size of that for the late Two Thousand. As in the Two Thousand, however, the public form of one competitor was far in advance of that of any of the others. This was Lord Calthorpe's Seabreeze, a beautiful chestnut filly, by Isonomy out of St. Marguerite. She had been beaten three times by Friar's Balsam, once by Galore, and once by Anarch; but she had beaten Anarch twice, and her five victories bore a very favourable comparison with those of any other filly in the race. Belle Mahone, the second favourite, had won three races as a two-year-old; on the other hand, she had been beaten by Ayrshire, who had been beaten by Seabreeze. She is a small filly, although big for her size, if the bull may be allowed, as she has depth of girth with short legs, and she is very well put together. Her Majesty, a filly with excellent shoulders and quarters, had won the Woodcote and the Prendergast Stakes. She had beaten Love-in-Idleness, a lengthy and level filly that had never won a race, but was now an equal favourite. Nina, a splendid mover, though somewhat short of bone, had been beaten by Seabreeze; the good-looking Dolores had been beaten by Seabreeze and by Nina; while both Sawdust and Estafette had been defeated by one or other of these two fillies. Then there was Mr. Douglas Baird's Briar Root, a brown filly by Springfield out of Eglantyne. Some people thought her the best looking of the whole party, while others considered her angular and ungainly. She had begun her racing career by winning the Whitsuntide Plate of 4,727*l.* at Manchester from a field of eighteen two-year-olds, and after that she had lost all the other races in which she had taken part. It was said that her Whitsuntide Plate form must have been all wrong, as Ayrshire, Caerlaverock, Galore, and Senanus had been behind her in that race, which they ought not to have been if her three subsequent performances were correct. Hall Mark had won the only race for which she started last year; Latania, a filly with size and power, had done the exact opposite, and the lengthy, evenly made Frondeuse had won one race and lost eight.

When the morning came, Seabreeze was said to be amiss. On the previous night she had stood at 11 to 10 in the betting; now she went down to 9 to 4; as the time for saddling drew near, she came up again to 5 to 4; and eventually she started at 6 to 4. As soon as the flag fell, Briar Root jumped away with the lead, on the extreme right. At the Bushes the pace had told its tale on Love-in-Idleness and several other fillies; but Seabreeze was steadily improving her position, and her backers began to feel very hopeful. Things looked still brighter for her as she came down the hill, and, before reaching the Abingdon Bottom, she had passed the rest of her opponents, with the single exception of Briar Root. She now looked very like a winner in the eyes of some, while others did not think that she moved very freely down the incline. Frondeuse and Belle Mahone were immediately behind her, though evidently beaten. As they came up the ascent to the winning-post, Seabreeze struggled gamely; but Briar Root still held the lead, and, although she seemed inclined to bear a little to the left when touched with the spur, she maintained her advantage to the end, and won by a couple of lengths. The result proves the truth of the saying that racehorses may unexpectedly return to their best form. If her running in the One Thousand is to be accepted as a confirmation of the form of the leading horses in the Whitsuntide Plate, it makes her latest performance a very high one, on the strength of her having beaten the winner of the Two Thousand in that race; and it also reminds us of a possibility of a return to his be t form of Caerlaverock, who had finished between the pair. Nearly every journal which treats of racing has pointed out the "singular coincidence" that Mr. D. Baird won the exceedingly valuable Electric Stakes and Whitsuntide Plate last year on the same day with the brother and sister, Woodland and Briar Root, and that neither of them won another race until the day of the One Thousand, when again each scored a victory; it was, however, a mere coincidence and nothing more, as Woodland's success for the Bretby Plate could not be considered a return to his Electric Stakes form; for he only beat Spearmint, the first favourite, by a head at 10 lbs., after that rather moderate horse had exhausted himself by bolting and running the entire course on his own account previous to the actual race. The first race of the day was won by Lord Randolph Churchill with his two-year-old filly, L'Abbesse de Jouarre, by Trappist. She seems well worth the 300 guineas that he gave for her at the sale of Mr. Snarry's yearlings last season, and the stakes she now won were worth as many pounds. Some adverse critics, however, think her forelegs a trifle too straight. Good judgment was shown in making Lord Calthorpe's Montaigne and Mr. Bridges Willyams's Vanda equal favourites, and Ketta a good third favourite, for a Selling Stakes, as there was only a neck between the two first named at the finish, while Ketta was but half a length behind Vanda. Isobar won a 100*l.* sweepstakes, but in disreputable company, and his owner must devoutly wish that he may show some signs of that return to early form on which we have been expatiating in the case of Briar Root. For the Fourth Welter Handicap Plate the weights were very nicely adjusted when Sky Pilot was made to give a year and 13 lbs. to Chamberlain, as there was a grand struggle between the pair, Chamberlain winning by a head. The First Spring Meeting has entirely altered the aspect of the Derby; whether it has rendered it a much more open race or not remains to be seen; but unquestionably it has given us the promise of an open as well as an interesting race for the Oaks.

TWO NEW PLAYS.

MR. AUGUSTIN DALY'S company of comedians has given abundant proof of something more than capacity during previous visits to England, and it is unlucky that The Railroad of Love, Mr. Daly's adaptation of a German work hitherto unknown in England, must be called a rather poor piece. To supply anything like a coherent account of the plot would occupy a great deal of ingenuity and involve a considerable expenditure, not to say waste, of time; in truth, there is practically n connexion between the love affairs of the three couples whose aspirations are set forth in the comedy. It has been said that the skill of the players is the more conclusively shown because they make a somewhat inchoate play more than acceptable; and in this we may find Mr. Daly's justification. The fact is that the cleverness of the company is not fully exhibited, for opportunities are lacking. They play admirably together, the "business" of the scene is done with peculiar neatness, but, with the exception of the part filled by Miss Rehan, the characters are of the most commonplace description. We have learned to expect much from Mr. James Lewis, and know well that we should not be disappointed if any chance were afforded him. Here there is none. The play bill describes Phenix Scuttlebury as "a polished relic of wasted energies," the precise significance of which is not very apparent. Scuttlebury is, however, little more than a conventional figure of farce. It is his mission in the play to persuade some one to marry his cousin, Mrs. Osprey, who deprives him of a fortune so long as she remains a widow, and presently he himself marries another widow. This is Mrs. Eutycia Laburnam, played by Mrs. G. H. Gilbert. We know what Mr. Lewis can do; we have seen the rich comedy of Mrs. Gilbert; and it is disappointing to find them cabined, cribbed, confined.

The Mrs. Osprey of Miss Rehan is marvellously clever, indeed it has touches of genius, and in the jealous scene comes near, possibly too near, to tragedy. There is, too, exquisite tact and grace in a love scene in which she and Everett stand on opposite sides of an open door, she declining to enter the room and meet him. Mr. John Drew's Everett is most decidedly good. He is ea y, natural, and alert. Mr. Otis Skinner and Miss Phœbe Russell are the third pair of lovers—Demaresq and Viva. Doubtless the company will soon be seen to greater advantage, and we look forward much to their performance of The Taming of the Shrew.

It is to be regretted that so pleasant and sympathetic a story as Bootles' Baby should have fallen for dramatic purposes into such clumsy hands as those of Mr. Hugh Moss, whose adaptation has been acted at the Globe Theatre. The aimless wanderings of the characters in and out, and their often purposeless talk when they are on the stage, afford melancholy proof of Mr. Moss's incapacity for constructing or writing a play. "Parents? I have lost both mine." "You are an orphan, then?"—this is a verbatim extract from the dialogue. The pity is the greater because the company by which the play is performed has been very judiciously chosen. The characters in Bootles' Baby are broadly drawn, and some of them do not make any great demand on representatives who are physically qualified. Thus the somewhat stolid manner and heavy voice of Mr. Maurice are capitally suited to the part of Captain Algernon Ferrers (to give "Bootles" his proper name and rank), and in other instances the right men have been selected. But in a very great measure the success which the play is likely to obtain, in spite of its crudeness, will arise from the really delightful performance of Miss Minnie Terry as Mignon, the little heroine, otherwise known as "Bootles' Baby," from the circumstance that, having discovered the child in his rooms, where it had been deposited by the unacknowledged wife of a brother officer (who believes that she has found her husband's quarters), Bootles has adopted it, refusing the suggestion of its heartless father that it shall be sent to the workhouse or the police-station. The child is charming because she is childlike. There is not a touch of the pert precocity which, as a rule, renders the stage child so particularly unpleasant. Miss Minnie Terry is always perfectly simple and natural; she seems to delight in her task—if, indeed, the word task should be used in speaking of an apparently effortless assumption of character. No thought of the audience is traceable in her demeanour; she is engrossed in her love for her protector, in her frolics with her friends, his brother officers, and in her affection for the kind lady—Helen Grace, in truth the wife of Captain Gavor Gilchrist and her mother—to whom she sends the invitation to come and live with them always, as Helen presently does, when at length able to accept the hand of Ferrers, whom she has long loved. The scenes of military life, in Bootles's quarters after mess, and in another part of the barracks on the regimental sports day, are novel and picturesque; and the child, always winning and lovable, is an agreeable contrast to the officers of the "Scarlet Lancers" in their full panoply or their mess jackets. The finding of the little creature in Bootles's bed makes a very pretty scene when one is able to dismiss the apprehension that she will begin to cry; for it must be understood that the small Miss Terry is seen after an interval of five years from the event in question, and the original Mignon is almost an infant, and might well be dazed by the glare and strange surroundings.

The third act is a model of what a play should not be, and the adapter has reason to thank the exponents of his characters for their good service. Mr. Maurice we have already commended. Mr. Charles Sugden's Gilchrist is a somewhat new type of villain, utterly heartless and shameless, and the actor carries out the conception with excellent judgment. Mr. Charles Collette's smart soldier servant is another skilful piece of work, with only a slight tendency to become too boisterous. Mr. Garthorne a little overshoots the mark as Captain Lucy. Mr. Gilbert Farquhar is easy and straightforward as Dr. Blantyre, and there is a gaiety and good humour about the Lieutenant Miles of Mr. Forbes Dawson which renders comprehensible to the audience his popularity in the regiment. Miss Edith Woodworth has not hitherto revealed the capacity that is apparent in her performance of Helen Grace. There is very genuine feeling in her love for her child, the maternal impulse is expressed with force and pathos. The situation is touching, because until at last the truth may be declared the child must not know that the lady who is so kind to her is her mother. The piece is acceptable even as it stands, with all its imperfections on its head; but a great chance has been missed. In capable hands the materials at the dramatist's disposal might have been made into an exceptionally striking play.

THE NATIONAL DEFENCE BILL FROM THE VOLUNTEER POINT OF VIEW.

THIS Bill, backed by Mr. Secretary Stanhope, Lord George Hamilton, and Mr. Brodrick, deals with three subjects—first, the Yeomanry and Volunteers; secondly, the Naval Reserve and Naval Artillery Volunteers; and, thirdly, railways and transport generally. We do not intend in the present article to deal with the last two subjects, but only with the portions of the Bill relating to the Volunteer force. The public do not seem to have realized how great are the changes proposed. At present, as the Memorandum prefixed to the Bill rightly says, Volunteers can only be called out for actual military service in case of actual or apprehended invasion of any part of the United Kingdom. By this Bill it is proposed that the Volunteers may be called out whenever an order for the embodiment of the Militia is in force. Now, such order may be issued by Her Majesty in Council in case of imminent national danger or of great emergency. It is impossible to say when any Government may deem great emergency to have arisen, and, therefore, the liability to service of the Volunteer force is greatly enlarged. There is a clause in the Bill to the effect that it shall not apply to those Volunteers already enrolled except with their consent. If such consent be not generally given, there would arise a very curious condition of affairs during the next three or four years; for in such a case only the last joined, and therefore least trained, men could be called out.

The most serious aspect of the Bill, however, is the effect it is likely to have on the recruiting and strength of the Volunteer force. Time alone will show whether employers will permit their employés to be enrolled in this force, if the chance of being called out for actual military service is thus increased. In any case the result will probably be that those who have permanent employment will hesitate before they enrol themselves under these conditions.

This scheme seems merely an attempt to raise a subsidiary militia with very small cost to the country, and to throw the burden of the expense on a body of men, who already devote much time and money to the service of the nation, without reward.

Of course it may be said that present Volunteers need not give their consent to being called out, but practically they must either do this or resign; for how can a corps, one part of which is liable to serve on different conditions to the other portion, be satisfactorily worked? Not to mention that, if this view be incorrect, it might happen that the senior officers would refuse their consent, and only the junior and most inexperienced officers would be available. We cannot but regard this Bill as devised in order to escape an increased Budget by making a small portion of the nation pay for what should undoubtedly be provided at the expense of the whole.

But we complain most of another feature of this Bill, which is a direct breach of faith with Volunteers now enrolled. On looking at the first schedule which contains the Acts, or portions of Acts, proposed to be repealed, we find subsections one and three of Section 18 of 26 & 27 Victoria cap. 65 included among the latter. Now the first of these sub-sections enacts that two guineas shall be provided for the use of every Volunteer (whatever his rank may be) whenever called out on actual military service, for the purpose of supplying him with necessaries, and power is given to commanding officers to expend the whole or any part of this sum as they deem fit on behalf of each man. The second of these subsections gives a bounty of one guinea to each Volunteer who has been called out, on the release of his corps from actual military service. This money is, therefore, absolutely taken away from the Volunteer force when called out. We find no mention of this alteration and no equivalent given in this Bill. But this is not all that we complain of. The preparers of this Bill have chosen to issue a Memorandum attached to it, which purports to give a summary of the provisions contained therein. In this Memorandum we find these words:—"But it is not proposed to impose any additional liability on existing men (sic) without their consent." (This sentence is peculiar in its diction; for, if it means anything, it means that only babes unborn are to have any additional liability imposed on them; but let this pass.) Notwithstanding this statement, we find that the cost of providing necessaries (which, we take it, include stout boots, clothing, &c.) is left for the individual Volunteer to bear, and that his bounty is taken away without his consent; and yet there is no mention of this intention in the Memorandum, which latter is the only document most Volunteers are likely to see. This, surely, is not as it should be. Mr. Secretary Stanhope on Wednesday, in answer to a deputation on the subject of National Defence, said, "You will observe, gentlemen, how largely we are depending upon the patriotism and intelligence of the Volunteers. They may rest assured that they will be called upon only if, unhappily, any grave danger to the security of this country is to be apprehended; but I feel absolutely confident that they will loyally co-operate with us in enabling their services to be utilized to the utmost possible extent, if unhappily the occasion should arise, by previous organization."

Does Mr. Secretary Stanhope imagine that the Volunteers will be for ever duped by expressions about the trust that the Government have in their loyal co-operation, whilst at the same time the Government is not behaving loyally to them, and whilst a Secretary of State for War issues a Memorandum in which there is so misleading and disingenuous a statement? The Volunteer force has hitherto done its work loyally and well, and with very little cost to the country, and yet the Government treats them in this underhand fashion. And will this treatment inspire the Volunteers with any faith in Mr. Secretary Stanhope's assurance about their not being called out unnecessarily? Doubtless Mr. Stanhope in his youth read the fable of the goose with the golden eggs; we should advise him to read it again and take its moral to heart. Altogether, we are sorry to see so paltry a trick played upon so deserving a body of men.

THE HAYMARKET MATINÉE.

THE performance given at the Haymarket on Wednesday last, for the complimentary benefit to Mrs. Leigh Murray, was in every way worthy of the event. The programme included A Quiet Rubber, Uncle's Will, and the First Night, which are all one-act pieces; the second act of Forget-me-Not; recitations by Mr. Henry Irving and Mrs. Keeley; Mr. Toole's humorous sketch, Trying a Magistrate; and songs from Mme. Antoinette Sterling. Thus it will be seen the unfortunate, if generally necessary, practice prevalent on such occasions of giving single acts from pieces having more than one act was only adhered to in the case of Forget-me-Not. The second act of this play, however, conveys what has gone before and what is to come very effectively, and the dialogue is so brilliant that it could not have been omitted from the programme without injury to the performance, particularly as it afforded an opportunity for the farewell appearance of Mrs. Leigh Murray. Mr. Hare's wonderful impersonation of the irascible Irish peer (Lesueur's original part) in Mr. Coghlan's version of Une Partie de Piquet, is too well known to require comment; it is enough to say that it has lost nothing of its old vigour, and Mr. Hare was so well supported by Mr. Herbert, Mr. Wenman, and Miss Maud Cathcart that the play showed no trace of having been got up merely for a matinée. Forget-me-Not was admirably rendered by a strong cast, including Miss Dorothy Dene, who made a charming Alice Verney, and Mrs. Leigh Murray as Mrs. Foley, the elderly companion. Of course Miss Geneviève Ward played the part of the adventuress, with which her name will always be associated. The character sustained by Mrs. Leigh Murray is of a kind very popular with English audiences. In the hands of an incapable actress it would be very tedious; but the admirable humour and reserve which always distinguish Mrs. Leigh Murray's acting were so conspicuous in the part as to contribute largely to the success of the act. Mr. Vernon, however, did not seem very well suited to the part of Sir Horace Welby, the interfering baronet. An address, written expressly for the occasion by Mr. Ashby Sterry, and spoken by Mrs. Keeley, afforded a pleasant relief to the intensity of Forget-me-Not. The appearance of Mrs. Keeley was an amply sufficient atonement for the somewhat infelicitous character of the address itself. This was followed in turn by Mr. Theyre Smith's Uncle's Will, with Mr. and Mrs. Kendal and Mr. Cathcart in the cast. The charm of Mrs. Kendal's interpretation was not marred by that unrest which she at times affects, and, from the familiarity of the actors with their respective characters, the piece was, on the whole, perhaps the most successful feature of a very brilliant performance. The First Night, the last item in the programme, suffered a little for want of rehearsal. The play is in four scenes, and the cast is a tolerably long one; it requires, therefore, to be rehearsed carefully, in order that it may be seen to advantage. Nevertheless, the play was very amusing, and very creditable to all those concerned in its performance. Mr. Brookfield's Hon. Bertie Fitzdangle was, however, a great deal more than creditable. He rendered the character with exquisite humour, finesse, and distinction; and, added to this, there was a suggestiveness (the word is not used in an offensive sense) which is too rarely exhibited by English actors. The Achille Talma Dufard of Mr. Beerbohm Tree was also an excellent piece of acting; while Mr. Righton and Mr. Kemble, as Hyacinth Parnassus and Theophilus Vamp (the names must sound pleasant to old playgoers, respectively rendered their parts with humour and effect. In conclusion, it is only necessary to add that Mr. Irving's humorous recitation from C. S. Calverley and Mr. Toole's oft-repeated sketch materially added to the enjoyment of the performance.

B

THE STORY OF THE LONDON POLICE.

II.

THE decade preceding the Great Exhibition witnessed a remarkable extension of the duties of the newly-organized police force of the metropolis; for between the year 1840 and 1850 the Houses of Parliament, the London Docks, the Arsenal at Woolwich, and other public buildings and places were put under the charge of the constabulary. The work of the force at that period and the multifarious nature of their duties was trifling as compared with the various tasks assigned them now. A recent official Return shows that, of the 10,561 constables available for duty on the 31st of December, 1886, there were "specially employed" (their services being paid for) at the Houses of Parliament by night, 19 men, including one inspector and two sergeants; General Post Office, 12; the Chapter House, Westminster Abbey, 1; the Admiralty and War Department, 1; Royal Parks and grounds, 103; Royal Palace, Osborne, 3; Windsor Castle, 3; Claremont, 1; Sandringham, 2; the Treasury, Pedlars' Act, 2; Messrs. Drummond's Bank, 2; Army and Navy Co-operative Stores, 12; South Kensington Museum, 74; Natural History Museum, 27; Army Clothing Stores, 14; Colonial and Indian Exhibition, 26; Brompton Cemetery, 1; British Museum, 24; Tower of London, 21; Bethnal Green Museum, 16; Magazine, Purfleet, 23; and the Royal Gunpowder Factory, 24. The strength of the Metropolitan Force is further reduced by men being drafted off to the dockyards and military stations; Woolwich absorbing 177, Portsmouth 206, Devonport 155, Chatham 176, and Pembroke 34. There are 231 employed at the cost of the Treasury, and of the total of 1,633 on this special service some are stationed at the Royal Mint, the Chartered Gasworks at Beckton, the Indian Stores, the railway-stations; Hayes Place, Hayes; Crossness, near Erith; "St. Dunstan's Villa, Regent's Park," 1; Gunnersbury Park and Osterley Park, 1 each; Sheen House, Mortlake, 1; Dover House, Roehampton, 1; Norke House, Epsom, 1; Hanger Hill House, 1; Messrs. De la Rue's, St. Luke's, 1; Charterhouse, 1; Messrs. Coutts's Bank, 3; Covent Garden Market, 7; Messrs. Garrard & Co., Messrs. Lambert & Co., Messrs. Hunt & Roskell, Messrs. Shoolbred & Co., not to mention many other firms and places. In 1852, when the population of London was, roughly speaking, just under two and a quarter millions, with ten millions of rateable property, there were stated to be 6,000 professional thieves, with a police force amounting in all to 5,525 persons, of which number 3,700 were on duty by night and 1,800 by day; and here it may be noted that the telegraph was first employed for police purposes in 1851, a wire being laid from the central police office in Whitehall to the Great Exhibition buildings in Hyde Park. The total cost of the Metropolitan Police in 1852 was 385,744*l*., towards which the Consolidated Fund paid 100,325*l*., the police-courts alone costing 45,000*l*. In connexion with these figures and the history of the Metropolitan Force forty years ago it is both interesting and curious to find in the Commissioner's Report for 1886 a paragraph stating that "since 1849, when the authorized strength of the police was 5,493, of whom 5,288 were available for police purposes, there have been built 488,374 new houses, while 3,009 are in course of erection, 1,810 miles of new streets have been added to the charge of the police, and the population has increased from 2,473,758 to 5 364,627. To meet this the available strength of the police force from ordinary duties, exclusive of those employed for the protection of public buildings in consequence of the dynamite outrages, is 8,465."

Each year since the earliest period referred to has witnessed an augmentation of the police force, though certainly not commensurate with the extraordinary increase of the population, and it will be interesting, before proceeding further in the work of investigation, to see precisely how the force is spread over the metropolitan area. The Metropolitan Police District extends over a radius of fifteen miles from Charing Cross, exclusive of the City of London "and the liberties thereof." The area of 688·31 square miles comprised in the district is bounded on the north by Colney Heath, in Hertfordshire, on the south by Mogadore, Todworth Heath; on the east by Lark Hall, in Essex; and on the west by Staines Moor, in Middlesex. Some idea of the material growth of London will be gained if we state that the rateable value of the metropolitan area has increased from about 10,000,000*l*., in the year 1852, to 33,815,723*l*., in the years 1886-7; while, as the Commissioner truly says, "of the enormous actual value of the property in the charge of the police it is impossible to form any estimate." This huge "district" is parcelled out into twenty-two divisions, each one being known by an alphabetical letter, ranging from A to Y. They consist of Whitehall, with a total of 1,103 constables, sergeants, inspectors, and superintendents, the latter being in this solitary instance three in number as against one in every other division; Westminster, 671; St. James's, [illegible]; Marylebone, 528; Holborn, 542; Paddington, 435; Finsbury, 538; Whitechapel, 545; Bethnal Green, 590; Bow, 704; Lambeth, 395; Southwark, 495; Islington, 624; Camberwell, 693; Greenwich, 571; Hampstead, 707; Hammersmith, 724; Wandsworth, 648; Clapham, 660; Kilburn, 544; and Highgate, 677. For the protection of the river Thames there are 148 constables, four sergeants, 49 inspectors, and one superintendent, bringing up the total to 13,056. That number, however, is exclusive of the police engaged in the Dockyard Divisions—Woolwich, Portsmouth, Devonport, Chatham, and Pembroke. Adding these to the detailed list given above, we find the grand total to be 13,804; and it will, we think, be useful, in order to show the gradual increase of the force to which reference has been already made, to append a statement of the actual yearly augmentation of the Metropolitan constabulary in the decennial period beginning in 1877 and ending in 1886. In 1877 the total of all ranks was 10,446; in 1878 it had risen to 10,447; 1879, 10,711; 1880, 10,943; 1881, 11,234; 1882, 11,699; 1883, 12,622; 1884, 12,880; 1885, 13,319; and in 1886, 13,804, or an increase in the ten years of 3,358. The increase in the numbers between 1885 and 1886 was—3 superintendents, 18 inspectors, 34 sergeants, and 430 constables. The 21 divisions (with the Thames 22) are supervised by four superintendents of districts, the Thames being included in No. 1 District (Finsbury, Whitechapel, Bethnal Green, Bow, and Islington), at the head of which is Lieut.-Colonel B. Monsell, who (as are the three other district superintendents) is styled Chief Constable.

Before entering into further details, and especially before offering a few critical observations on the work and proceedings of the force generally, we may appropriately take a hasty glance at the comments of the district and also of the divisional superintendents on the manner in which the battalions under their command equip themselves and the arduous duties with which they are entrusted. It is almost unnecessary to remark that the annual reports of superintendents are slightly optimistic in their tone and remarkable for the esprit de corps permeating them. Lieut.-Colonel Monsell, for example, "during the short time" he has "been in the Metropolitan Police," has "had the most cordial and ready support from all the superintendents in" his "district," and he "may congratulate the force in possessing such an able and efficient body of officers." The gallant Colonel, moreover, is "glad to find that, during the past year there has been a diminution of crime," while the state of discipline of the men in his district he (may we say naturally?) "considers to be most satisfactory." Nor is Chief Constable A. C. Howard (No. 2 District) a whit less eulogistic generally than his gallant colleague who commands No. 1. Mr. Howard is, if we mistake not, the gentleman whose ardour in connexion with the West End riotings evoked more ravings on the part of the agitators in a certain section of the press than were caused by any of his colleagues. He expresses the opinion that "a very marked improvement has taken place in the general behaviour and discipline of the men during the last few years." On the whole, "they deserve most fully the confidence so generally placed in them, and although a few cases come to light now and then in which their conduct is condemned, these tend," he considers, "to show in a stronger light the good conduct of the force generally." The efforts of the police in the suppression of crime "have been attended with a fair measure of success"; a commendable method of stating it. Mr. Howard's Report, we note, is by far the longest and most exhaustive of those statements furnished by the four district superintendents, and in a future article we shall probably take occasion to make some further references to it.

THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.

THE Achilles of Suffolk Street is sulking in his tent. In plain language, he has gone off with his velarium and his appurtenances, his pictures and those of his myrmidons. It would be unfair not to recognize what the Society has lost by the defection of its greatest and most original member. Mr. Whistler may have used his influence to the hurt of individuals, but he did good to the Society. He introduced a system of hanging which set an example to every show in London. He so arranged common pictures that, forming part of a decorative scheme and approached under the spell of other work, you could scarcely believe the evidence of your eyes as to their worthlessness. He gave, in fact, an artistic air to the place, which made it the talk of London. On the other hand, painters and pictures were improving before he came, and some of them seem inclined to go on in the same course without him.

The main features of this exhibition are the works of Mr. William Stott, dit of Oldham, of Mr. Edwin Ellis, of London, and of the Messrs. Harrison, of Paris. Since the time when he may almost be said to have founded a school with his picture of boys bathing at Gretz Mr. Stott has been very fertile in invention. He changes his fashion so often that his cast-off suits have been very welcome to those who seek originality in the newest of borrowed plumes. There may be many opinions as to his idea of how to deal with the subject of "Endymion" (242); there can be but one as to the refined and decorative beauty of his treatment of the idea. Perhaps the bald accuracy of the camera has hurried on the natural reaction which cannot but follow an era of common realism. Any way the tide has turned, and the new school is exercised how to treat fantastic or romantic subjects without degrading poetry by the commonplace, without too evidently contradicting our knowledge of nature, or too directly borrowing a style from the old masters. Such a problem Mr. Stott has had to solve in "Endymion." Unity of style and effect, a decorative and tranquil beauty of tone, and a realization like the embodiment of a dream, were imperatively indicated. Hence his breadth and suggestiveness, his suppression of commonplace glitter, importunate detail, and cheap violence of effect. The large quality of night is exquisitely given however; while the soft lustre of the flesh and the subdued richness of the flowers melt into the tranquil vagueness of the circular composition with a drowsy and slumbrous effect. In his pastel, "The Blue River" (467), Mr. Stott gets some of the witchery of those blue, aërial visions of sea and sky which in nature ravish the man and drive the painter to despair. Without altogether agreeing with the technique of "Summer" (279) we think it the most striking and the most robust landscape of the year; it is, however, no more than we have long been expecting from Mr. Ellis. He is a man with a natural genius for paint, and when he condescends to use his splendid strength with ordinary finesse and respect for truth he requires none of the support of a thorough French technique so necessary to weaker men. We should call this landscape a triumph of the English school if it were not so decidedly Mr. Ellis's own, both as to matter and manner. The composition, realistically romantic, treats of a charming wooded place by the sea. For once a delicate sky allows one to breathe freely in a picture by Mr. Ellis; its influence is felt in the aërial stretch of sand spotted in good taste with lively groups of figures and goats, and in the purple shimmer of cool lights which gives the foreground strength and reality if the picture is seen from a distance. Mr. Alexander Harrison's "Hoar-Frost" (249) is a slight thing for him, but it renders a difficult effect with skill and feeling. Mr. Birge Harrison's "Sweet Summer-time" (78) is painted in one of those formal styles which remind one of Français, Harpignies, Henri Zuber, and others. Its method, however, by no means resembles the square-touch system adopted in England by the Newlyn school, and we do not remember to have seen anything like it out of the Salon. Mr. Sidney Starr's "Portrait of Miss Gertrude Kingston" (140), conspicuous among figures, is hard and cold though well constructed. Mr. J. J. Shannon's "Mr. Leveson-Gower" (210) strikes us as rather leathery in colour and wooden in modelling, and we are inclined to prefer Mr. H. M. Paget's "Gudbrand Vigfusson" (144). Mr. E. E. Simmons sends a very true "Study of an Interior" (202) in low tone; Mr. W. C. Symons a "Diana and Endymion" (179), which shows a good sense of arrangement; and Mr. W. H. Llewellyn a clever "Portrait of a Lady" (278). Other good figure work of various sorts comes from Messrs. H. S. Tuke, Gotch, Gordon, Kennington, and Miss K. McCausland.

There is plenty of excellent landscape work, chiefly of small size. "Southampton" (158), and even the small and charming "Tidal Creek" (336), are scarcely conceived in their author's most refined vein of colour; but then it is by no means easy to equal Mr. Leslie Thomson at his best. Mr. Aubrey Hunt sends a very stylish sketch, "On the Marne" (25), and a modern version of Ziem's subjects, "Venetian Fishing Boats" (224); Mr. J. S. Hill a most harmonious little picture of "Lewes" (139); Mr. T. R. Way one of his excellent and luminous renderings of moonlight (160); and Mr. Ayrest Ingram a "Moonrise and Sundown" (230), a marine effect much truer and stronger than anything we have yet see from his brush. "Alders" (473), by Mr. J. Paterson, is a rich and powerful water-colour; and "Backwater at Staines" (436) a very delicate one, strangely arranged as a kind of triptych, by Mr. Cyrus Johnson. Very good work, which we would gladly speak of at length, comes from Messrs. P. Macnab, G. E. Corner, A. Priestman, W. Estall, Max, Ludby, R. Aspinwall, and one or two more.

THE ITALIAN OPERA.

ITALIAN Opera is not yet dead. On the contrary, Mr. Augustus Harris, "at the request of an influential Committee"—composed of Lord Charles Beresford, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Oliver Montagu, and three other connoisseurs of like eminence—has come to its rescue, has taken Covent Garden Theatre, has issued a subscription list, and has engaged a gallant group of artists. In spite, therefore, of the lavish impresario and the extortionate prima donna, this poor, tottering, tumbledown old form of art (as the wily Wagnerite is careful to describe it) has yet another hour of life, and yet another chance of imposing itself upon the public as an essential in the scheme of popular amusements. That it will be a whit more successful than it was last year is scarce to be expected or hoped. There are as many as ever to listen to and delight in the music of Don Giovanni and the Nozze and the Barbiere; the superstition of the Sonnambula and Lucrezia Borgia is still not altogether exploded; even the Traviata has its admirers, while the Huguenots is, to all intents and purposes, as lively and vigorous "wie am ersten Tag." Mr. Harris is sure of his public so far. He knows that Italian Opera is one of the conventions of fashionable life, and that this year his patrons will crowd to hear the same things night after night as their fathers before them. It is a question less of music than (with all reverence be it said) of a full subscription list and a pleasant and familiar entertainment, and for this reason it is not to be denied that the impresario has done wisely, according to his lights, in deciding to eliminate from his programme the interest of novelty, and to depend for such success as it is in him to make on the setting, and not on the jewel—on the manner of production, and in nowise on the stuff that is produced.

His personnel is quite excellent—is, indeed, as good as it could be. He has secured the services of Mme. Albani, of Mme. Sigrid Arnoldson, of Mmes. Valleria and Fürsch-Madi, of Mmes. Nordica, Hastreiter, and Minnie Hauk; Mme. Trebelli is with him, and so are Mlle. Bauermeister and Mme. Scalchi. His list of eminences of the other sex includes, not only MM. Cotogni and Ciampi (without whom Italian Opera would scarce seem itself), but also Signor Del Puente and MM. Jean and Edouard de Reszke; while in Mlles. Coralba and Guiri he has found two capital examples of the "première danseuse assoluta," and in Signori Mancinelli and Alberto Randegger he has the pick of "Musical Directors and Conductors," as in Mr. Carrodus he has the most classic and experienced of chefs d'attaque. Of course these ladies and gentlemen will do admirably what they are asked to do, and at their lips the old familiar strains of the old familiar operas will for half a quarter of a moment seem fresh and new. "It is always" (to quote a proverb which will probably be quite novel to most of the Organizing Committee) "the riding as does it." The late Fred Archer could no doubt have got pace out of a cab-horse, and Mme. Arnoldson and the brothers Reszke—to name but these—are capable, we make no question, of reinspiring the Sonnambula itself, and of creating a soul beneath the ribs of Luisa Miller. But, for all that, it is a pity that, in this time of curiosity and experiment, they should have nothing better to do; and it seems not improper to suggest to Mr. Harris that he might with advantage reconsider his determination to be merely traditional—included, as no doubt it was, with the management of the affair itself in the "request of an influential Committee"—and give over some half-dozen of his two-and-thirty subscription nights to the production of (say) a brace of novelties.

It seems as vain to hope for a chance of hearing Verdi's Otello as it is to expect that any English impresario will ever be bold and judicious enough to give us the Troyens of Berlioz. Again, to ask the Organizing Committee for Gluck—though in Mme. Trebelli they have, ready to their hands, one of the very few living artists who could sing the Orphée music as it should be sung—were to be merely inconsiderate and superfluous. Such an experiment might or might not succeed. The chances, we confess, are heavily against it. The master's convention is that of another age; to a generation pampered with the "nerve-dissolving" strains of Berlioz and Wagner his instrumentation might sound thin and tame; his music itself—so large in style, so noble in quality, so poignant in intention and effect—might fail, on a first motion, to commend itself to the unaccustomed ear. But, where Gluck might speak to no purpose, Wagner has but to be heard to command attention. Surely the time is ripe for a solemn performance of the Tannhäuser, for instance? The work has plenty of chances in its favour. The story is romantic, moving, not over-innocent; some of the music is already popular; the spectacular interest is brilliant enough to tempt a stage-manager of far less than the genius and the ambition of Mr. Harris; with the means at the disposal of the Organizing Committee the Covent Garden cast might be almost ideally perfect; last, but not least (and our influential Organizing Committee would do well to perpend this fact), there is a ballet in the piece, and of that ballet much might be made. To produce the Tannhäuser as Mr. Harris might produce it would, of course, do little for the fortunes of Italian Opera; but it would go far to wipe away the reproach from the coming season of being, artistically and musically speaking, absolutely null and void, and it could hardly fail to be a great pecuniary success.

A MANLY PROTEST.

(CHAWLES, loquitur.)

I AM honly a waiter as waits on the Heighty;
Yes, that is the dooty of yours to command;
The position aint 'igh, and the perks isn't weighty,
But still, I was proud of my place, understand.

I had stood by the hinfant Society's cradle,
And 'ailed its hauspicious political morn;
I had 'arked to the praise which, with Lord! what a ladle,
They sloosed the young 'ead of the 'appy new-born.

I have watched o'er its groath with peternal imotion,
I've welcomed its guests since its bankwets began,
I have frothed up the fizz for George Joeykin G-sh-n,
And 'ung on the words of our Grandest Hold Man.

Though I morned o'er the sizzum when 'Art-ngt-n left us,
I lived on the 'ope of our 'ealing the breech,
And I fancied, pore fool! that the quarrel as cleft us
Would never be wideued by haction or speech.

So conceive what I feel—for a waiter has reely
Some feelings, I venture the 'auty to tell—
When I see the hold Heighty 'ob-nobbing with 'E-ly,
And toasting, O 'Evans! his leader P-rn-ll.

Why you might have (by George) knocked me down with a toothpick
As flat as a pancake when 'Ald-ne arose,
And I 'eard with dismay that hingenuous youth pick
The words which he used his guest's 'ealth to perpose.

"We are proud of 'im"—"proud" was the startling expression—
"We're proud of Charles Stewart P-rn-ll."—I declare
That the sinnical coolness of such a confes-ion
Well—quite made me blush to the roots of my 'air.

"Ho! proud! ho indeed! were you proud of 'im, 'Ald-ne,"
I cried, in the bitterness deep of my sole,
"When civilization's resources were called in
To give your new pal his three months of Black 'Ole?"

Do yer think I've forgotten the cheering and clapping
That greeted the Old un's 'istoric erang
About "marchin' to disinte—something through rapping"?
And what a stout chorus the Heightyers sang?

Ho! proud of 'im, eh? What, the chap as you thrust with His mates into prison? That's rather too bad!
May I ask of you, gents, if the pride as you bust with Hextends to the treatment your 'ero has 'ad?

Ugh! 'Ero! Why, 'ang it, if that is his title,
A rum sort of rank for yourselves it insures;
The question it raises for you will be vitle—
If 'ero's his name, what the doose must be yours?

If 'e 'as a right to be sippin' his claret
And chewin' his holives as snug as you please;
If 'e 'as a right to his seat in that chair, it
Is you should be fastin' and down on your knees.

'Tis for you to fall proan and in abject repentance
Seek parding of 'im you've so ojusly wronged,
And to 'umbly solicit 'is leanient sentence,
As one to whose party you've always belonged.

Yes, it's prostrate you should be, and, though it may 'urt you
To hear the truth pushed so remoarselessly far,
It is thus—in the heye of political virtue,
Good faith, and good sense—that, by jingo, you har!

But never for Chawles! To the traitors and plotters
Whom once he denounced he would scorn to Ko-too;
So, shaking the dust of your shame from his trotters,
He bids you a cold and disdaneful ajoo.

REVIEWS.

PRAED'S POLITICAL POEMS.*

THE task of at last putting before the public something like a complete edition of Praed's works—a task which ought to have been performed a long time ago—is apparently going on, but in a rather inscrutable and singularly piecemeal fashion. Not long ago Sir George Young edited his uncle's prose works, or helped Mr. Henry Morley to edit them, in a scrubby little cheap library, with no notes and only a brief introduction. Now he edits the political poems. These, with very few exceptions—"Twenty-eight and Twenty-nine," "Utopia," and one or two more—were excluded from the edition of the poems which, when a very young man, he helped Derwent Coleridge to edit, though Praed himself printed some of them privately in his lifetime, being the only part of his works the reprinting of which he in any way superintended. Meanwhile the Derwent Coleridge edition itself, though containing much that never ought to have been published except perhaps as illustrative matter to a full memoir, though introduced with a notice of really astonishing critical and biographical inadequacy, so much so that it needs all one's reverence for the name of Coleridge not to use even harder words about the person guilty of it, and though practically unannotated, remains the only full storehouse of Praed's most characteristic work, and is only obtainable in second-hand copies, always dear and sometimes dirty. Yet again, all these books being issued in different forms and by different publishers make one of the raggedest regiments possible. The excellent Frederick William of Prussia, if he had seen them ranked together as they are ranked before us at this moment, would have infallibly ordered the publishers and editors to be flogged for not sorting, dressing, and drilling their men better, and, upon our word, we think they would have deserved it. Why on earth cannot we have a uniform handsome edition of the whole works of one of the most delightful writers and one of the least voluminous to be found anywhere out of the ranks of the absolutely immortal?

This said, enough has been said for grumbling, though it really is a trial. Sir George Young has done the present book very well indeed. It is the first really edited edition of anything of Praed's that has yet been issued, and considerable labour, with more than one lucky chance aiding it, appears to have gone to the editing. Scattered as Praed's political poems are, among divers newspapers, most of them long defunct, the identification of them except by the use of MS. versions would, in any case, have been difficult. But it was complicated by the fact that Praed and a friend of his, who wrote at his best nearly as well as Praed at his worst, used the same signature, Φ or φ, almost indiscriminately, and that the productions of both have been reprinted as Praed's by those American reprinters of whom it is difficult to speak harshly, inasmuch as, but for them, Praed's work, like that of Wilson, De Quincey, and not a few others, would have been left in a state of almost total neglect. By diligently examining internal characteristics, by searching his uncle's papers, and by happy aid from some collectors of autographs, especially Sir Theodore Martin and Mr. Locker Lampson, Sir George Young has succeeded, it would seem, in turning out all the tares which were the work of a certain Edward Fitzgerald (not, of course, either the Fitzgerald of "Who made the quartern loaves," or the Fitzgerald of Omar Khayam). He may possibly have uprooted a little of the wheat also, but, if so, it may be taken for granted that it was wheat that could be spared. For Praed was by no means always at, or even near, his best; and perhaps he was less often near it in these political poems than in any others. Yet another good deed of the editor's has to be noticed—a good deed which must have cost him considerable drudgery. He has carefully looked out, and indicated in brief head summaries to each poem, the personal and political allusions with which such poems necessarily abound, and which are as necessarily worse than Greek to subsequent generations.

In respect to the work itself which is thus creditably ushered, we find ourselves occupying towards Sir George Young a position which is exactly parallel to that which (as he himself records) Praed and Macaulay, friends as they were, occupied towards each other in point of political opinion. When they were at Cambridge, Macaulay, as a Tory, withstood Praed as a Whig; when they were in Parliament, they were still on opposite sides, but now Macaulay was the Whig and Praed the Tory. Sir George Young thought but modestly of his uncle's prose works, and we did not agree with him; we disagree with him still, but this time it is in thinking less, not more. It would hardly be necessary to dwell on this difference, which is quite compatible with an opinion in itself very high, if Sir George had not "extravagued," as some people say, a little about this political verse of his uncle's. He tells us that, as a writer of political satire, Praed is "first among English writers, before Prior, before Canning, before the authors of the Rolliad, and far before Moore or any of the still anonymous contributors to the later London press." Now to this we must demur as anything but critical. Praed is, no doubt, "before" all these writers in one variety of "light horsemanship," but it is the social, not the political line. Every one of the authors named—except perhaps Prior, whose chief power, like Praed's own, lay elsewhere—carries heavier metal and levels his guns straighter than this charming singer, whose heart was pretty evidently by no means so much with politics as it was with Medora's terror lest Araminta should wed unworthily, with the sufferings of the abbot in that ghastly hour when there was turning of keys and creaking of locks, with the forlorn knight whose attention was by turns directed to and with the waning and waxing of the joys of "the season." When he could he diverged from strict politics into a half-social, half-political vein, as in some of the best things in this very book—things already known from the older editions, such as "Twenty-eight and Twenty-nine," "Utopia," and others. When he could not do this he was very bright, very musical, very whimsical, very charming, but he was certainly not the Praed of the "Letters from Teignmouth," or "The Vicar," on the one hand; nor was he anything like the Canning of the "Mrs. Brownrigg" sonnet or the Moore of the Twopenny Postbag on the other. We might even doubt if without going so far we could not show Sir George Young some better political verse, merely as political verse, of a much more recent date than anything we can find here, except perhaps the (for Praed) unaccountably bloodthirsty epitaph on George IV., which no doubt is first-rate, and as good as Canning's "Benedicite," though much more unjust.

A noble heart all burnt to ashes
And the Baron of Katzberg's long moustaches,

Putting this comparative estimate aside, however, there is nothing or little but delight in the book. He must be a ferocious Tory indeed who cannot rejoice in the following lines, although he may think that the "checks" were "proper," and if he is a very Momus of a Tory may ask what is the exact meaning of "prevent them" except to rhyme:—

The people, in his happy reign,
Were blest beyond all other nations:
Unharmed by foreign axe or chain,
Unhealed by civil innovations;
They served the usual logs and stones
With all the usual rites and terrors,
And swallowed all their fathers' bones,
And swallowed all their father's errors.

When the fierce mob, with clubs and knives,
All swore that nothing should prevent them,
But that their representatives
Should actually represent them,
He interposed the proper checks,
By sending troops, with drums and banners,
To cut their speeches short, and necks,
And break their heads, to mend their manners.

* The Political and Occasional Poems of Winthrop Mackworth Praed. Edited by Sir George Young, Bart. London and New York: Ward, Lock, & Co. 1888.

And we think he must be a very silly Liberal who in the same way is not delighted by Praed's ironic summary of the various additional hoops which the Reform Bill was to put to all possible pots:—

It's to give to the troops, and the tars of the fleet,
No jacket to wear, and no pudding to eat;
When we've just done away with the mess and the drill,
Will we lick the Mounseers? Ask the Duke if we will.
Derry down.

It's to get us a parson, as good as St. Paul,
Who won't want a lodging or dinner at all;
He'll teach us our duties and preach us our fill,
But as for his tithes—he may starve, if he will.
Derry down.

It's to give us—good luck to it! freedom and trade;
Our goods will be sold and our debts will be paid.
It will conjure up wealth for the ledger and till—
I wish I could only find out how it will!
Derry down.

It will bring health to sickness, and warmth to the cold,
And wit to the foolish, and youth to the old,
And soup to the saucepan, and grist to the mill—
Fine words, honest friends! But I doubt if it will.
Derry down.

"Love's Eternity" is very good, though a little obvious, and, by the way, Sir George Young's description of it and of its rather numerous brothers of the same class shows how people may look at the different sides of the shield. He calls it "a type in which a train of social compliment or a mere verbal tune is made the setting for as many allusions to personages or topics of the day." We should call it a style in which allusions to personages and topics were made the excuse for a train of social compliment. However, we quite admit that it is possible to hold both views, and what is better, both parties can agree in liking the poems themselves. Probably the worst things here are those on the coronation of Charles X., which are facile and almost vulgar in their cheap Voltairianism. We wish we could quote the whole of the admirable "Speech by a Worthy Alderman"; but it is fortunately unnecessary to quote any part of that "On Seeing the Speaker Asleep," which is probably better known than any other of Praed's poems dealing with a strictly political subject, and is one of his very happiest. "The Old Tory," whether it lay very well in the mouth of a Tory of two or three years' standing who had frequently lampooned Toryism or not, is also capital:—

Lord Palmerston may turn about,
And curse the creed he held so long;
And moral Grant may now find out
That Canning was extremely wrong:
Lansdowne with Waithman may unite,
And Ministers with mobs agree
Truth may be falsehood, black grow white,
But, sir, you make no Whig of me.

You know I never learned to trust
The wisdom of the Scotch Review;
I worshipped not Napoleon's bust;
I could not blush for Waterloo:
I'm proud of England's glory still,
Of laurels won on land and sea;
Call me a bigot if you will,
But pray don't make a Whig of me.

Peel, not knowing the author, is said to have seen this quoted in a country paper, and to have complained that "they had nobody in London who could do anything so good." The series of attacks on Joseph Hume are all excellent, and Sir George Young has done good service by a side hit in a note at the most singular piece of whitewashing ever yet attempted, by which a Radical boroughmonger, a shady financier, an intolerable obstructive, and a generally mischievous politician has all his faults condoned for the single virtue of cheeseparing. Lord Grey gets, perhaps, Praed's hardest strokes, but that was because the poet could never forgive Grey's treatment of his idol Canning.

But, as we have hinted, the politics are really not the chief attraction of the book. They are personal, vague, and anything but consistent; yet Praed's admirable verse covers, and more than covers, all defects.

NOVELS.*

NONE of our modern novelists possesses more fully than Mrs. Oliphant the faculty of interpreting the feelings of middle-class people, or perhaps of middle-character people, if we may use an awkward phrase. Her power of getting inside the minds of ordinary folk, of plumbing the depths of natures perhaps rather shallow than deep, of expressing the blundering, bewildered, bemused state of mind which among such persons is called thinking, is scarcely equalled. Her facility has the snare which facility lays for all its possessors. It leads her into repetition, over-description, diffuse detail, exaggerations of explanation. She can do that sort of thing so well and so easily that she is led into doing a great deal too much of it. Mrs. Oliphant's novels, especially some of her later ones, would benefit more than most novels by some magic process of elimination of the superfluous. If, as Sydney Smith said in the summer heats, they could "take off their flesh and sit in their bones," they would be wonderfully stronger and firmer for it. Joyce is an example. If the story of Joyce Hayward's life; of her early, useful, contented existence as Joyce Matheson; her transformation into the awkward, unplaced Joyce Hayward; and her final flight from both positions, become untenable, had been crisply fashioned into one brief book, it would have been an excellent novel. Mrs. Oliphant, however, has her own way of telling her stories, and it is a way we are not disposed to quarrel with, even while wishing it other. As it is, Joyce is a pretty story. The author has rarely drawn a better sketch of the whimsical relations of a married couple than in Colonel Hayward and his "Elizabeth." The utter dependence of the "innocent old soldier" on his practical wife; her tenderness of protection and contempt; the abrupt pull up in both when a test point in conduct arrives, and Elizabeth's native vulgarity shows like a sunken rock amid the waters, are treated, as the author knows how to treat such a situation, with humour and sympathy. There is a certain cloudy indefiniteness about the Haywards' position. We have been allowed to suppose that Mrs. Hayward's uncertainty about the legality of her marriage had suggested voluntary restraint on her entrance into society; yet when the family, with the new addition of Joyce, return from Scotland to Richmond, we find it already on terms of close friendliness with the local magnates. The end of the story, or rather Joyce's fashion of putting an end to the entanglement they had all got into, is unsatisfactory. The author may argue that the end of life's entanglements is often unsatisfactory. But, if the ground is to be taken of probability and likeness to life, then the objection shifts to the unlikelihood of a beautiful and refined stranger being able to permanently conceal her existence from an active, sustained, and eager search in even the remotest of Scotch islands. Such an abode would seem, indeed, the least well chosen for obscurity. Nowadays no "unsuspected isle in far-off seas" presents anything like the chances of concealment offered by—say Vauxhall Bridge Road.

"Christina Compton sat upon the low garden wall of the villa which her father had taken at Cannes for the winter, and dangled her legs contentedly in the sunshine." A little later Miss Compton, who is seventeen, and "finished," drawing "her feet on the top of the wall, clasping her hands round her legs, and resting her chin upon her knees," proceeds to hold a long conversation with a Spanish pedlar who is passing by on the high road. This is the opening of Mr. W. E. Norris's story Chris, and from it we are hastily led to conclude that we are going to be treated to the history of a tousled tom-boy after the pattern so much affected by some modern novelists, and so hugely admired by a certain class of readers. The author, however, has no such purpose in his mind. Chris is neither tousled nor a tom-boy, but a shrewd, sensible, sweet-tempered girl, with a fair sense of humour, indomitable pluck, a power of calm self-restraint in difficult moments, and a placid obstinacy against pressure which is iron to tyranny and shifting sand to tenderness. Her story is simple, and owes its charm partly to the fascination of the girl, and partly to the author's graceful, humorous, bright, delicate manner of telling it. Chris has four lovers—two detrimental human beings, one of the same class, but eligible, and one adorable and adoring Yorkshire terrier, Peter, who is incomparably the best of the lot. Chris has a tolerant kindliness for the brutal Ellacombe, and even for the burgling Val Richardson; she loves Gerald Severne well enough to marry him; but her feeling for Peter is the passion of her life. Peter's death, and the action of his mistress when she discovers it, is in the vein of true tragedy. One needs to go back a second time over these two slender volumes to gather a complete sense of the impressions the author has put into them. They are full of shrewd appreciation of worldly people, of sense of the comic, and of sympathy with the feelings of an innocent and daring girl. The two or three adventures Chris goes through, before she settles into the final matrimonial one are cleverly kept within the ranges of possibility, although they are out of the common way. Her meeting in the Champs Elysées with three of her lovers all at once (the fourth and best was sleeping in his poor little grave in a London back-garden) is what might happen any day, though perhaps anything exactly like it may never have happened. And the burgling adventure in Balaclava Terrace has had its parallel in the cool command of nerve shown by an unconscious little girl philosopher under exciting circumstances.

In despite of some immaturity of thought and crudity of style, there is a good deal to like in Joan Vellacot, which, by the way, bears another name inside its cover. A Man's Mistake is perhaps meant as a second and partially explanatory title. It is, in point of fact, the mistake made by Major Hector Duncan in distinguishing the course of conduct dictated by honour, which is the turning-point of the story and of all Joan Vellacot's troubles and sorrows. It is the sort of mistake more frequently made in novels than in real life, and more probable in a more romantic age than our own. A man of the world, a soldier who has seen service and won his Victoria Cross, who is confessedly bound by no high-strung sense of transcendental sacrifice and is the reverse of sentimental, would, we imagine, see too clearly into the heart of things to allow himself to marry one woman while passionately loving another, merely because he had made a rash and hasty mistake in his proposal. Nevertheless, the thing as told by Miss Esmé Stuart is neither impossible nor even ill contrived, and our sympathies are

* Joyce. By Mrs. Oliphant. 3 vols. London: Macmillan & Co. 1888.
Chris. By W. E. Norris. 2 vols. London: Macmillan & Co. 1888.
Joan Vellacot. By Esmé Stuart. 3 vols. London: Bentley & Son. 1888.
She Came Between. A Love Story. By Mrs. Alexander Fraser. London: White & Co. 1888.
Pearl Stutton's Love. By J. G. Holmes. 3 vols. London: Wyman & Sons. 1888.

retained in favour of the mistaken Major and of both the women whose lives he mars by his error. Margaret Austin, whom the hero (he is a hero) marries, is one of the women we know so well in novels, and who are much more favourites with their author-creators than with readers. Margaret is "tall and broad"—surely a thing the reverse of excellent in woman. She has a soul of sweetest simplicity, and the purest heart in the world; but she has large hands and feet, she knows nothing of fashion, and has no interest in dress. What chance could she have against the clever, bright, droll, exquisite Joan, who has a genius for flirtation, and whose gowns are inspirations? Miss Stuart has kept clear of the banality of making Joan heartless or a coquette. She is as lovable as both Major Duncan and honest John Peel think her; and her faults are forgiven for their naturalness, and for her repentance. We have left Miss Stuart's story half untold that we may not deprive our readers of the pleasure of plucking out the heart of the mystery for themselves. The interest and cleverness of it are so apparent that we are induced to suggest how much more clear and distinct the principal figures would be were the crowd of nonentities round them less. A little more care, also, in writing would avoid inelegancies like "It made him obliged to have an eye to his daughter's attire," and inaccuracies like "He had however, as many would have thought, a very envious position." Such blemishes are rare in Miss Esmé Stuart's work. All the more reason that they should be entirely absent.

Mrs. Alexander Fraser's novel, She Came Between, is of the kind called ecstatic. It is very short, but amply long; for gush and italics, unmixed with baser matter, go far. Of all sorts and conditions of novels, this is the kind which most excites wonder as to why they are written, how they got published, whether they are read. There seems so little motive for them, and so little to be gained by their existence. A profusion of highly-coloured epithets conveying no genuine sense of natural beauty; strained descriptions of fictitious passion without a touch of true tenderness; the feeble forcibleness of dashes, italics, and notes of exclamation; these are the merest scaffolding of fiction, meaningless spars gathered round emptiness. In this foolish story no touch of reality redeems the fantastic grouping of four conventional lovers, who have no occupation but to "rain hot kisses" on "icy hands" or "scarlet lips," make stagey love to each other alternately like the figure of changing partners in a quadrille, rush frantically into burning houses for no object, and finally end in improbable catastrophes. One of the young ladies had been for three years as a governess in Belgium. It was there perhaps she learned to speak of le Conte de Villeneuve, meaning thereby a former lover, to carry on guerre à l'outrance, and to say soi-disant when the sense demands ci-devant. Her rival, who had spent her early life "au cinquième in the Batignolles of Paris," exclaims in italics on a critical occasion, "It was him!—Cyril!" But there are persons who consider the strictly grammatical treatment of the verb to be, through all its moods and tenses, pedantic, and no doubt Miss Aimée Carleton was one of them.

The writer of Pearl Stutton's Love, Mr. J. G. Holmes, author of Sir Richard's Revenge and other Poems, appears to have been driven into prose by the barbarous indifference of the public to his poetic performances. "My Pegasus," he complains, "has been caught and chained by critics and unscrupulous publishers." Probably Sir Richard's Revenge and other Poems were not successful. If we may judge of Mr. Holmes's previous literary compositions by that now before us, we cannot wonder. The only matter for surprise is that the publishers were sufficiently "unscrupulous" to allow the author's Pegasus to have a start at all. "I earnestly hope," continues Mr. Holmes, "these volumes will never be perused by cynic or sophist." Wider philanthropy would have led the hope to include all mankind. There are close on a thousand pages in these bulky volumes. We have not discovered one on which are traces of the qualities needful for a good novel. A helter-skelter style, oblivious of grammar, construction, consistency, or probability, runs riot and runs to excess. If the "untamed steed" (by which the author means his poetic faculty) did the like, the world owes a debt of gratitude to the critics and unscrupulous publishers who caught and chained him.

THE AUSTRALIAN HANDBOOK.*

THE Australian Handbook of Messrs Gordon & Gotch continues to be as great a wonder among handbooks as Australia is among new countries. It has grown into a bigness which makes the continued use of the term "handbook" a little absurd. The hand to hold this bulky volume must be the hand of one of those giants of which the genial soil of Australia is said to be prolific. Already the volume has bulged into dimensions which are calculated to trouble the peace of the London Directory, while the rate at which it has swollen leaves the New Zealand Debt far behind. The prospect before the generation to come is a little appalling. There are now about four millions of people in the Southern Colonies. A great part of the Australian continent is still unsettled—even unknown. The imagination staggers at the contemplation of The Handbook of Australia, say, twenty years hence.

The volume for the present year is distinguished by some new features. There is even some little reduction in bulk, though not in weight. By the use of smaller type, and a better arrangement of the matter, the Handbook has come to have a less bloated appearance; though there is an alarming potentiality of increase in the improvements. Besides the usual information about the colonies, which is in greater detail here than in any other publication accessible to the ordinary reader, we have for the first time a description of the important irrigation schemes which have been adopted by the Victorian and South Australian Governments—schemes which, when carried out, will utterly change the character of the surface soil of those two colonies; and a survey, geological and mineralogical, of that vast northern territory which, by a strange caprice of nomenclature, is still included within the term "South Australia." Another interesting novelty is the "Hundred Years' History of New South Wales," written with a fulness of knowledge of the early voyages and discoveries which bears evidence of minute and careful research. This history will serve to correct in many points the accepted archæology—the word is scarcely so inappropriate as at first sight appears—of Australia. There is now no doubt that, not only the Dutch, but the Spaniards and the Portuguese, were acquainted with the existence of what used to be known as New Holland, at least a couple of hundred years before the so-called discovery by Captain Cook. If we mean by "discovery" the sighting of the coast of the new Southern land, there is no doubt that the early navigators of Portugal and of Spain discovered Terra Australis even before the middle of the sixteenth century. The successors of Magalhaens in 1521, when they made their voyage from the Moluccas through the Straits which bear his name, could hardly have avoided sighting the great new island of the South. This South land in the old maps is generally marked "Java"—that island being supposed to extend across the equator and beyond the Tropic of Capricorn. The map of Rotz, dedicated to our Henry VIII., now in the British Museum, here called "a real work of art," makes a very fair guess at the outline of the new island, making the western coast terminate at 35° S., calling it the "Londe of Java." In a contemporary French map, of the date of 1550, also in the British Museum, the Eastern coast of Australia runs very nearly along the true line, though it is carried very much further south, the country beyond the parallel of 30° being, as Baring pointed out, by a very strange coincidence, named Coste des Herbciges, corresponding in position to what was afterwards Botany Bay. Afterwards the outlines became a good deal mixed like the names, and it is, perhaps, a little too much to say, as the writer in the Handbook seems to conclude, that before Cook's time, not only was Australia discovered, but its general shape and extent were laid down by geographers. The French savans in the first Napoleon's time, in order to minimize the achievements of the English navigators and to stimulate their own countrymen to the search for new lands in the Pacific, did their best to favour the conclusion that Australia was already well known to the world before Captain Cook made his so-called discoveries. In the Handbook the writer, in his zeal for geographical science, is a little too precise in the limitations he sets to Cook's labours. A great deal hangs upon the meaning we attach to the term "discovery." Unquestionably the existence of Australia was known to the navigators of the sixteenth century; just as unquestionably the existence of America was known before Columbus. It may be even admitted that the Portuguese and the Spaniards sighted some portions of the coasts of the Southern land, as the Dutch did after them, and even the French, before the date of Cook's first voyage. We may also presume that Cook knew something of the land which he was about to visit, even though he did not say much about his knowledge—therein imitating the reticence of his predecessors, who kept secret what they knew, lest they should give their rivals some advantage. The Portuguese and the Spanish, however, made no attempt whatever to make use of their discoveries. They did not know the worth of what they had discovered. There is no proof that either they or the Dutch ever landed on any part of the mainland. Their discovery, such as it was, was of purely scientific (and not much of that) and academical interest. We do not know that Australia has ever been claimed by England by any title founded on early discovery. It is true that Captain Cook hoisted English colours and took possession of the whole eastern coast "in right of His Majesty King George the Third," giving it for the first time that name which Sir Henry Parkes is so anxious to put off—of New South Wales; but whether any European had ever seen that coast before or not is nothing material to the point. Certainly no European had ever thought of claiming the land with a view to settlement. Therein consisted the difference between the English and any other way of proceeding with such discoveries—a difference in which are involved our relative capacities for colonization. Cook not only came and saw, but he landed and explored, and proved the territory to be fit for occupation. It was not until ten years afterwards, indeed, that the first shipment of settlers was sent out from England to Botany Bay, to be immediately transferred from Botany Bay to the shores of Port Jackson on the 26th of January, 1788.

The story of the essays and attempts at discovery previous to that date is of no other interest to those who have been celebrating the centenary of New South Wales than as proving the superior sagacity of the English navigator, who, except that he did not go out to seek for souls to be saved, has every claim to be entitled our English Columbus. The Spanish and Dutch found, but they did not take, having indeed their hands full already. The

* The Australian Handbook, and Shippers' and Importers' Directory for 1888. London, Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane: Gordon & Gotch. 1888.

English found, and took—to the undoubted benefit of mankind. The French, whose record is not such as to justify their claim to be regarded as the nation which sent forth its navigators out of pure zeal for science and the glory of civilization, tried to do precisely what we did, and failed. They actually trod on our heels more than once in the frantic attempt to seize the new territory; not knowing precisely what they wanted it for, but having a shrewd notion that it was likely to be useful to the English. La Pérouse appeared with his two ships off Botany Bay on the very day before Captain Phillip moved his party thence to Sydney Cove; and with a little more enterprise the Astrolabe and Bussole might actually have taken possession of the finest harbour in the Southern world. What happened on the coast of New South Wales happened on various other parts of the island-continent and in Tasmania, and was repeated in the first settlement of New Zealand. The French were generally a day too late. Sometimes, as in Western Australia, they were actually before us, giving names to all the headlands and bays, exploring, sounding —doing everything but settling. In Encounter Bay Captain Flinders, exploring, came suddenly face to face, in 1801, with Captain Baudin with the French ships on the same errand. The subsequent treatment of poor Flinders by the Government of Napoleon is an indelible disgrace on the French name. Being compelled to put in at the Isle of France for supplies, he was seized, in spite of his letter of protection, and kept in prison for seven years—a punishment, doubtless, for his having thwarted the French schemes of annexation on the Australian coast. From Western Australia, the tradition runs that the French were driven away, after spending a night on shore, by the loud croaking of the frogs, which are of a most raucous kind in that land. Under D'Entrecasteaux they had been nibbling at the South coast ten years before; charmed with the primitive simplicity of the savages; but not caring to contribute to their stock of provisions. They hovered about the mouths of the beautiful rivers Derwent and Huon in Van Diemen's Land, but the savants lost so much time in catching butterflies, Commodore Baudin told Flinders, but nothing practical was done in the matter of settlement. The truth is that they had none to settle. There was no material out of which to form colonies. They had the same chance with ourselves; but just as adventures are to the adventurous, so colonies are to colonizers.

The story is one which our kinsmen in Australia are never likely to forget; as well as some other leading incidents to be found duly recorded in the chronicle of Gordon & Gotch. There is the famous passage (hardly told with sufficient breadth, by-the-bye, in this hundred years' history) of how a certain Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, in these days a statesman claiming to be a champion of popular rights and of the higher morality, insisted upon New South Wales receiving convicts, on the plea that it would be not only favourable to its material fortunes, but "unattended with injury to its higher interests." How, in pursuance of these double ends, in contravention of his own pledges, and in the teeth of popular opinion, he despatched the Hashemy, with 212 convicts, to Sydney, which, arriving in harbour on the 8th of June, 1849, had to be summarily sent away again by the Governor, because of the fierce indignation of the inhabitants and the prospect of a dangerous tumult—all these and many more curious episodes in the early life of the colonies will be found in this large and bountiful volume; together with a vast amount of all the information which goes to the making of what is not a handbook, a directory, or a gazetteer, but an artful blending of all three.

DIXON'S EUDOCIA.*

THE antiquarian temper of the age shows itself in a variety of experiments, which intrude a little too feverishly into the department of creative art. There has never been a time, even in so-called Alexandrian periods of poetry, when so many and so utterly distinct models were followed as the present. Canon Dixon, whose repeated volumes of verse show him to be an excellent scholar and a connoisseur in the niceties of verse, has followed many masters, but is not without a certain thin and somewhat hard vein of his own. His Muse, as he seems to be conscious, is pallid and anæmic, and he strives to smarten her up with successive costumes taken from rich old mediæval wardrobes. In his latest publication, in The Story of Eudocia, he has striven to walk in the footsteps of Chaucer, and does contrive, on occasion, to be remarkably like Occleve, which, however, is quite another matter.

In his preface Canon Dixon makes rather a surprising statement. He remarks that since Chaucer there have been few examples of the successful use of the five-beat couplet in original serious narrative verse. "Indeed," he goes on to say, "there are not many examples altogether, whether successful or unsuccessful, of this verse used in original serious narrative." We suppose that "original" is introduced to get rid of Dryden and Pope; but even then the statement is very rash. Has Canon Dixon forgotten his Oxford coeval Mr. Morris, with whose first volume his own had so near a kinship? Has he forgotten Lamia, and the Tales of the Hall, and Rimini, and Sordello? Has he forgotten the many narrative poems in this measure published during the seventeenth century? The slip is a very strange one coming from a poet so highly cultivated as Canon Dixon, and is another example of the loss of perspective and proportion entailed by too resolute a devotion to the lesser literature of the late middle ages. Canon Dixon remembers few attempts at narrative verse in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries; and what such little creatures as Keats and Crabbe may have written is indifferent to a man to whom the Ayenbite of Inwyt has delivered up its secrets, and who is learned in all the rubbish of Lydgate.

When we come to examine the poem which is introduced to us with such a strange assumption of novelty, we find much that is respectable and little that is enjoyable. The poet tells us so much about the theory of his versification that we expect something very much more brilliant than what we get. If Canon Dixon were to fall into the hands of the Philistines, he would be roundly told that his poem is full of bad lines. We can fancy the mien of martyrdom with which he would gently point to Milton for justification of each of them. We will take one or two examples, and summon Milton for his defence. For instance, Canon Dixon says:—

> And set no whit steadier his royal seat;

while Paradise Lost has:—

> Which tasted works knowledge of good and evil.

We find in Eudocia:—

> Then anger rose from hopes aye quickened and quelled;

and in Paradise Lost:—

> With spots of gold and purple, azure and green.

In fact, we are ready to grant that every one of Canon Dixon's eccentricities can be paralleled in Milton's blank verse, and that Paradise Lost presents us with the absolutely impeccable canon of that form. But Milton writing in blank verse and Canon Dixon writing in rhymed couplets are two very different beings, and the younger poet does not seem to perceive why it was that the elder, following the instinct of his unrivalled ear, permitted his verse so many varieties of stress. He required to regain the colour and light which he had lost by the sacrifice of rhyme, and this he could do in a solid organism like a passage of blank verse in a way which is impossible when the couplet, however irregular it may be, is the normal limit of the form. So that it is useless, and worse than useless, for Canon Dixon to extract a solitary line from Paradise Lost, regardless of the harmony of which it is a fragment, and to reproduce it without melodious context in one limb of his own distich. This is like cutting one string out of a violin, and expecting it to become its own Paganini.

The narrative of Eudocia is subordinate to the poet's experiments in verse, and our interest in the story is for ever being diverted by our curiosity at the strange things which the narrator is doing with his metre. The tale appears to be taken out of Evagrius Scholasticus, a Church historian of the sixth century. When the action has to hurry on, Canon Dixon finds it very difficult to spur his dreamy Pegasus into a smarter pace, and we get such makeshifts as the following:—

> Alas! it cast his horse and broke his spine,
> But bow we both beneath the will divine, which is fearfully and wonderfully in the style of the unsuccessful prize-poem of an undergraduate.

It is needless to say that there are good things in Eudocia. Canon Dixon is too well equipped with learning and sympathy and feeling, and has in times past shown himself too good a metrist, to fail entirely. But the poem is an experiment in a thankless form, and exemplifies the error of approaching the art of poetry, which must seem spontaneous to give any real pleasure, from a point of view so theoretical and pedantic. Not to end disagreeably, we will quote what seems to us the best thing in the volume, a passage of Thracian landscape:—

> Unkind the road, bitter the wind that blew
> In blizzards rough, and the wood savage grew,
> Where howlèd wolves, and lions fought for prey.
> Under the bleak-grown pines we held our way;
> And some time by a stream we kept that led,
> As best we thought, down to a valley's bed,
> Whence we might issue to the open plain.
> But eftsoons turnèd this backward again,
> And showed us a great mountain to the sky,
> White with dry snow, above the woods on high;
> About the foot of which the dashing wave
> Raced on, and fell into a rocky cave
> With roaring sound, and the north wind with might > Burst from the sky, although the sun shone bright.

* The Story of Eudocia and her Brothers. By Richard Watson Dixon. Oxford: H. Daniel. 1888.

LIFE IN COREA.*

CONSIDERABLE portions of the contents of the present work have already appeared in blue-books and in the columns of the Field; and, with no wish to unduly disparage Mr. Carles's volume, we cannot but recognize that its chapters are better fitted for the pages of those channels of information than to constitute a separate work. When a traveller undertakes to write a book on a country about which so little is known as about Corea, the expectations of the public are raised and they look for something more than they might expect from a record of an autumn experience in Kerry or of six months in the Highlands. As an indication of his very imperfect knowledge of the country of which he writes and, we must add, also the very little trouble he took to make good his deficiencies in this respect, we may instance the following passage (p. 221):—"The road east of Chang-söng passed under the beacon hill outside the town. The watchman's cottage and the beacons on the summit drew my attention afterwards to the existence of beacons, in sight of each other, all along the line of the river as on the coast; but I was never able to ascertain whether it is true, as is asserted, that every night throughout the kingdom signals are flashed from hill to hill to assure the King in his palace that no trouble threatens either the coast or frontier from outside foes, and that peace reigns throughout the provinces." We wonder whether it ever occurred to Mr. Carles to look out at night to see whether the beacons were burning or not. No doubt as he was travelling during the greater part of his two visits in Corea he was too glad on the approach of night to exchange his saddle for his bed; but a traveller who aspires to instruct the world on the scenes of his journeys should make up his mind to sacrifice a few minutes of sleep to verify a statement which is commonly reported and which is certainly of sufficient interest to justify inquiry.

* Life in Corea. By W. Carles. With Illustrations and a Map. London: Macmillan & Co. 1888.

Mr. Carles's first acquaintance with Coreans was at Peking, whither two missions are sent annually from Soul, one to bear tribute to the Emperor as the suzerain of Corea, and the other to receive at his hands an almanac for the regulation of the calendar for the coming year. At the Chinese capital, however, the envoys and their suites held themselves studiously aloof from Europeans, and as Mr. Carles had, therefore, no opportunity of learning from them anything about their country, he was glad to accept an invitation to visit Soul in the company of a member of the well-known firm of Jardine, Matheson, & Co. His first experience of the country was not inspiriting. Chemulpo, the port of landing, is not a place to linger at. A few wretched plank buildings and mud huts constitute the town, and these when seen through a steady rain suggested at once to Mr. Carles the advisability of starting on the twenty-six-mile ride to Soul. The capital is relatively to Chemulpo what Peking is to Taku, but in his description of this city Mr. Carles again disappoints us. Its position has scarcely a parallel on the face of the globe. It stands surrounded by a natural barrier of mountains, and fills the entire valley, the passes through the hills giving the only means of approach; the mountain ramparts are pointed with a wall, which is said to have been built in imitation of the Great Wall of China, and which follows an equally futile course over mountain peaks and along the crests of precipices. Of all this Mr. Carles says next to nothing, but he does tell us that the city is about three miles square, and that the population is probably between 150,000 and 200,000.

In their native country the people showed no signs of that reticence towards foreigners which was assumed by the envoys in Peking, and the women formed the only section of the community which displayed a rooted objection either to look on the travellers or to be seen by them. "It seemed to us odd," writes Mr. Carles, in describing the streets of Soul, "that each woman that we met should have arrived that moment at her house; but, as we learnt later on, women have the right of entrée everywhere, and to avoid us they turned into the nearest house at hand." By so doing they probably saved their amour propre, and they certainly inflicted no penalty on the travellers; for a less attractive sight than a Corean woman it is difficult to imagine. Three pairs of loose, baggy trousers, worn one over the other, and bunched up at the hips; a badly fitting jacket; full white socks, and ungainly straw sandals; a green mantle covering the head and partly drawn over the face, form an attire which would require the features of the Venus de' Medici to redeem from hideousness. But, so far as Mr. Carles was able to judge, the features of the Corean women boast of no contrasts to their attire. The only exceptions observed were those of some ladies attached to the retinue of the magistrate at Kang-ge. These ladies, as though conscious of their charms, stood unveiled in the reception-hall; and when the magistrate, to Mr. Carles's great astonishment, asked his opinion of their beauty, "the girls seemed as anxious for the verdict as the magistrate himself."

But bashful modesty is by no means confined to the women. The men show a degree of prudery which, if shared in by the envoys who are chosen to visit Peking, must veil their faces with a perpetual blush during the whole of their stay in that capital. During the Duke of Genoa's visit to Corea in 1880 much time was occupied in an endeavour to open communication with the authorities on a part of the east coast. "The men on board his vessels had meanwhile been bathing and fishing. At length there came an official, not to open communication, but to remonstrate against the indecency of the men's conduct, which for some days past had prevented the villagers from leaving their homes."

Mr. Carles is neither a trained traveller nor a very observant one; but he writes pleasantly enough of his shooting expeditions and of the sorrows of himself and his dog in their many wanderings. Doubtless there are people who have a taste for this kind of journalistic record of travel, and to all such his book will be justly acceptable.

AMBULANCE SERMONS.*

THE author of this book has chosen the title—Ambulance Sermons—because he states important truths and derives practical lessons from them, which it is well known all sermon-writers do. But Dr. Austin has made a valuable contribution to the popular knowledge of medicine and surgery, because his teaching is based upon scientific principles; and he has written an interesting book, not only because people like to read about their ailments, and every one is more or less a doctor, but because it is pleasant to find that, after all, medical science is only common-sense remedies applied to commonplace ailments. He travels over a great deal of ground, from the maladies of babyhood to gunshot wounds (about which he remarks that the pain is felt at the point of exit, not of entrance, of the bullet); but nothing that he says appears to us of more general importance than his exposure of the almost universal blunder of mistaking symptoms for diseases. If, as he states, they are a "conservative reaction" of nature against disease, the danger of checking them is manifest, though it is sometimes necessary to direct or control them. But what a revelation and a revolution this is to most domestic "practice"! Most people have no idea what a cold is; when nature tries to get rid of it they find out that they have one. Dr. Austin seems to us to be a very sagacious friend; and, if he would only control his taste for fine writing, he would be a perfectly agreeable companion.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF ANCIENT ART.†

THIS is an attempt to give, in a series of thirty-four cheap lithographic plates, a sort of bird's-eye view of the whole subject of ancient art and archæology, ranging from the pyramids of Egypt down to late Roman lamps and coins. The scheme is not an unreasonable one for popular purposes; and these plates give selections, classified and arranged in chronological order, from a large number of costly illustrated works, such as are usually out of the range of private libraries. But unfortunately the lithographs are mostly poorly executed, and besides that, in many instances very inferior representations have been copied. The sculpture is coarsely and weakly drawn throughout, and often copied from sources which are now quite out of date. Thus, for example, the celebrated Hermes of Praxiteles is represented without the figure of the infant Dionysos, though many years have now elapsed since this very important addition to the group was made. The relief of the lions over the gate of Mycenæ is ludicrously bad, and in many others of the plates the drawings of sculpture are mere caricatures of the beauty and vigour of the originals. The architectural plates are the best part of this collection; some of the chief buildings at Athens, Olympia, and other plates being very fairly good, and useful as giving the more recent discoveries. One serious drawback to the value of these plates, even for the most elementary student, is the very frequent omission of a scale or any indication of the size of the object represented. The result is often hopelessly misleading; thus, for example, two pieces of the Parthenon frieze are represented on the same plate (No. 16) as being of different sizes, simply because the two illustrations happen to have been copied from different works. So also colossal statues and small statuettes are here reproduced in drawings of the same size, with no indication of an important difference in scale. If so ambitious a scheme was worth doing in a cheap form, it would have been worth while to do it with much more care and accuracy than has been expended in the production of this set of lithographs.

CHEMISTRY, FROM THE PRESENT STANDPOINT.‡

FRANCIS, LORD VERULAM said of the chemical theories of his contemporaries that, being based on but a few experiments, they were, if not imaginary, at least incapable of any general application, and therefore practically of little value. In his "Aphorisms," however, he pointedly admits that hypotheses and theories are the aids and instruments of thought, and the history of the science of chemistry supplies abundant evidence of the value and use of hypothetical assumption and deduction when confined to suitable limits. The modern development of theoretical chemistry may be assigned primarily to two hypotheses—that on the molecular constitution of gases, and that on the capacity for heat of the atoms—yet for a long time the majority of earnest workers simply ignored the results which must render the names of Avogadro, Dulong, and Petit permanent in the annals of science. Increased and clearer light, notably in the recent extensions of organic chemistry, has brought those hypotheses into due prominence, and they are now universally acknowledged to constitute the proper basis for determining atomic and molecular weights.

The antipathy and, as it were, instinctive resistance to even a reasonable hypothesis are curiously contrasted with the stubborn

---

* Ambulance Sermons. By J. S. Austin, M.D. London: George Redway.

† Menge, Antike Kunst. Tafel 1–34.

‡ Modern Theories of Chemistry. By Dr. Lothar Meyer. Translated from the German by P. P. Bedson, Professor of Chemistry, Newcastle, and W. C. Williams, Professor of Chemistry, Sheffield. London: Longmans & Co. 1888.

tenacity with which some chemists who are men of sense will hold by theories after they are actually become untenable. Who does not remember how, notwithstanding Lavoisier's conclusions, many eminent scientific men still perversely clung to their faith in phlogiston? The theory of Sir Humphry Davy as to the elementary nature of chlorine was stoutly opposed by Berzelius because it revolutionized the whole science, and overthrew his own hypothesis of electro-chemistry. From similar motives he disputed the theory of substitution which Dumas, Laurent, and others had maintained, and persisted in distrusting it, even when generally acknowledged.

On the other hand, some theories of the widest range have met with early acceptance; especially the atomic hypothesis of Dalton, which, though penetrating so deeply into the nature of chemical changes, has been verified on every hand to almost absolute demonstration. The theory of atomic linking is another instance of a different sort, because at first it was severely criticized by chemists of undoubted authority, yet it resembled it in the acceptance it soon secured; it has undoubtedly evinced in the most brilliant manner its capability for further development. The value of the atomic theory alone appears from the innumerable compounds whose composition it has predicted, besides furnishing a general point of view for studying the quantitative composition of compounds; the theory of atomic linking has also gained credit from the many cases of isomerism which it explains and discovers, and the new class of peculiar compounds which we owe to it.

Such results have naturally enhanced the weight and importance of chemical hypotheses, and they at present hold a far higher position than Lord Bacon is likely to have conceded them from à priori reasoning. There are two valuable results assignable to the use of hypotheses in scientific work. Any new theory must involve a series of experiments if it is to be overthrown and abolished, as well as if it is to be confirmed and established. That alone is great gain, as the history of every department of science abundantly proves. The second valuable result of hypotheses is as a stepping-stone to man in his endeavours towards a representation, more or less accurate and complete, of the natural phenomena which surround him—that is, towards a true theory of the universe.

With the opening of this century appeared one of the most original works on our subject, the Statique Chimique of Berthollet, which attempted to identify the reciprocal attraction called affinity with the attraction which Newton named universal gravitation. Afterwards Laplace, in his work on Probability, concluded that since no phenomenon is guided by mere hazard, the motion of matter in its ultimate or elemental state must be in obedience to the mathematical laws of mechanics, the principles of statics and dynamics, just as it is in the grosser and more palpable form to which we are accustomed. "The curve described by a single atom is as fixed," writes Laplace, "as the path of a planet, and between the two cases no other difference exists save that resulting from our ignorance." Yet, with all the ground that has been covered since Berthollet wrote, and in spite of the great results achieved, there has been no advance comparatively in the direction which he had in view. Not long after the publication of his Essai, during the learned discussion which he maintained with Proust as to the constancy of the quantitative proportions in which two or more bodies unite chemically, Dalton enounced his hypothesis, also atomic, which has since become the foundation of chemical science. Thus Berthollet's philosophic scheme for bringing chemistry into close alliance with physics, and probing the intimate kinship of the two sciences, was speedily neglected in order to apply the theory of Dalton, and by its means completely transform or reform all chemical knowledge. The enthusiastic application of one hypothesis to determining atomic weights and their combining proportions is sufficient to explain the marvellous advance and development reached in the first half of our century. Still, it is possible that, as higher stages are reached and greater refinement gained, the goal which Berthollet indicated may come to be eagerly sought after and at last descried and defined.

Formerly physicists, though using the terms molecules and atoms in speculating on matter, actually treated it as continuous, thus fixing an impassable gulf between their region and chemistry. A further hindrance was the notion of the material existence of heat, already referred to, which was disproved by Count Rumford and immediately accepted by Sir Humphry Davy; yet the latter could not relinquish the emission theory of light to accept the undulatory hypothesis, though defended by Hooke, Huygens, and Euler. On this theory, when established by Frèsnel and Poisson, was based the mechanical theory of heat, afterwards largely developed, which constitutes another bridge between chemistry and physics.

Probably a large chapter will open in the history of the science when an adequate theory of electricity is formulated, one which "can explain the interdependency of the phenomena of electricity with those of light and heat on the one hand, and the chemical forces on the other." It no longer seems too ambitious for man to aim at a knowledge of the atomic constitution of matter. Chemistry already speaks clearly as to the behaviour of atoms in compounds; and in due time the goal of Berthollet will be reached, though not on his lines, when atomic statics and dynamics form the crown of the edifice, and lay open many regions now unexplored.

The translation of the last edition of Professor Meyer's Modern Theories of Chemistry is a valuable addition to our scientific literature. The names and academic position of the translators are sufficient guarantee of the excellence of this standard work in its present form. Under this head we need only remark that the literary part of their work is well done, the English being idiomatic, clear, and manly, with scarcely anything to indicate the foreign source of the subject-matter.

In his last preface Dr. Meyer states that the object of his work is to sketch the development of certain well-defined theories which, after long-continued opposition, have at last obtained general recognition. Further, that the present edition includes the dynamics of atoms, thus completing chemical mechanics. To even a cursory reader it occurs that the work, as a whole, might be entitled "The Atoms"—since of its three parts the first deals with the atomic hypothesis, atomic weights, and chemical atoms; the second defines and discusses the "Statics of the Atoms"; while the third does the same for the "Dynamics of the Atoms."

Never surely have atoms held a place in science so important as in recent physical speculation. Clerk Maxwell showed how in the fifth century B.C. the Greek philosophers had formed a definite conception of their properties; which were all negative, if we remember aright, with one exception, that of being in perpetual motion. We know, also, that Lucretius bases his theory of the physical universe on a conception of atoms which was derived from the teaching of Epicurus. With the dawn of modern thought, when the Aristotelianism of the middle ages was passing away, Gassendi, Boyle, and Newton revived the theory of atomism; and the proof of universal gravitation first laid a basis for treating atomic physics in a scientific manner.

Of the two leading hypotheses of modern chemistry, as we have already indicated, one is that the atoms of all elementary bodies possess the same specific heat. When proposed by Dulong and Petit, it at first was received with hesitation and doubt. Probably some chemists thought it too simple, while others, like Berzelius, whom our author qualifies as "the first authority in this province," insisted on verification and corroboration. The first to assist in establishing the hypothesis was Neumann, in 1831; but the main supporter was Regnault, who since 1840 has clearly established the relationship between specific heat and atomic weight. Some have objected that this great law of specific heat only holds within certain limits; but the same could be said of Boyle and Marriotte's law, which is of undoubted value to the investigator.

The atomic weight is determined also by the law of isomorphism, found by Mitscherlich at the same time as that of Dulong and Petit; and which, though quite inferior to the two hypotheses we have spoken of, affords a valuable means of determining the number of atoms united to form a compound, and also the weight of each individual particle. It also tests and confirms atomic weights obtained from the vapour, density, or specific heat determinations.

The word atom and its historical definition are familiar enough; but since the ancient Greeks used it surely no one till the days of Sir William Thomson dreamt of measuring and weighing the thing. Dr. Meyer gives some interesting details as to the process, with remarks as to the relation of a molecule to the atoms which compose it. That suggests the question whether atoms are really ἄτομοι, absolutely indivisible particles of matter. If a mass of visible matter is composed of molecules, and each molecule or particle of the first order composed of atoms or particles of the second order, so an atom may similarly be conceived to be composed of particles of a third order. The theory of there being one primordial element—namely, hydrogen—from which all others are derived, is traced to Prout, who, in 1815, brought it forward soon after the general acceptance of Dalton's atomic theory. This view, according to Dr. Meyer, was supported by Dumas and others, on the ground that so many of the atomic weights are multiples of that of hydrogen, though some sufficient reasons against it are advanced by Turner, Berzelius, Marignac, and Stas.

The hypothesis of Avogadro is the second of the two great theories of the modern science. It was, in fact, a modification of the Daltonian atomic theory, arising from the conception of atoms being particles of a second order where molecules (as we have just seen) are reckoned those of the first order. Probably Avogadro's hypothesis was more immediately derived from Gay-Lussac's generalization than from Dalton's theory; but, however that may be, it has advanced our physical conception of the molecule, and has exerted great influence on later development by explaining the atomic constitution of compounds and many of their properties. In its simplest form it is that, under the same pressure and temperature, equal volumes of all gases contain the same number of molecules, and consequently the molecular weight is proportional to the density. Such workers as Clerk Maxwell have confirmed it in various ways, and now it is considered not only correct, but indispensable.

There are many physical properties due directly to the nature of the atoms and their arrangement, such as specific heat, latent heat of vaporization, and that of fusion. To establish the relation of the atoms to one another Dr. Meyer admits to be a difficult problem; but the solution, though scarcely yet begun, is clearly perceived by him not to surpass human powers.

The advanced masters now admit the action of mass to be a very important factor in chemical mechanics—so much so, they say, that this new doctrine will probably determine the future direction of the science. Frequently, for example, a diminution of the mass of the substances involved in a chemical change has an effect similar to that due to a rise of temperature. This subject, however, demands more space than we can at present afford. Other subjects largely treated by Dr. Meyer, such as thermochemistry and its illustrations by experimental data, we must also pass over at present.

One fault which we must find with the translators is that there is no index appended to the work. In a work of this class we consider such an omission unpardonable, and hope soon to see it remedied in a second edition.

PALESTINE ILLUSTRATED.*

IN the early spring of the year 1883 Sir Richard Temple travelled through Palestine. On his way he made many oil sketches of scenes in the Holy Land. The book before us is the reproduction of these sketches, thirty-two in number, with a running letterpress in eleven chapters, describing the journey and the places illustrated. There is little that is new in these chapters. The novelty about the book is the reproduction of the gorgeous colouring which marks the Syrian landscape, especially in the early spring, when brightness follows gloom, and rain follows sunshine, so rapidly and so suddenly as to produce the strangest and most beautiful effects, not to be witnessed later on in the year, when the sky has become a cloudless blue and the sunshine has become a glare of heat. Two or three excellent little maps by Messrs. Philip & Son accompany and explain the work. The chromolithographs all represent various studies of light and cloud which, judged as faithful attempts to show actual atmospheric appearances, as they were seen by the painter and transferred to his sketch-book on the spot, deserve great praise. Among them must be noticed especially the picture of Jerusalem at sunset, with the Dome of the Rock in the middle and the Mount of Olives beyond:—

> After a stormy day the clouds at eventide gathered in dense masses near the Mount of Olives, not resting on the mountain but hanging over it. This is the view which I have attempted to portray in the accompanying illustration (V.) The light of the setting sun struck the clouds, and imparted to them the highest colouring imaginable. Thus they formed, as it were, a gorgeous canopy and emblazoned standard over the sacred summit. The mountain itself has lost the forbidding aspect which it often has under the hot glare of a cloudless noon. Under the atmospheric conditions of this moment, it is aglow with a fiery light and is suffused with crimson hues. Under this pervading blush are hidden the dull details of the bare hill-side. Thus Olivet seemed for a while to be ethereal. On the southern shoulder we just discern the road coming from Bethany and leading to Gethsemane, along which our Lord rode on the first Palm Sunday. Beyond Olivet, the mountain range of Moab appears deep blue in the distance on the other side of the Dead Sea. Such is the scenery which displays Jerusalem as a jewel set in a casket. Though the mountains are close round about the city, they yet seem to stand quite apart, majestically veiled in their airy garb.

The view of the Dead Sea, again, is a surprising representation of colour and light. In the foreground of the picture are the hills, brown and purple, rocky and rough; beyond them the Sea itself, of an intense cold and uninviting green. The mountains of Moab rise beyond; and above lies the sapphire sky of sunrise. The effect produced is of extreme beauty, but with the sadness of barrenness and aridity—of a country which produces no green thing. The view of Mizpeh at sunset is also a very striking picture. It has a winter tarn filled with water—a rare thing in this dry country—to light up the foreground. The picture of Jacob's Well reminds us that the process employed lends itself the least favourably to drawings which contain buildings. The ruined arch over the well is vaguely rendered and has no force. On the other hand, the drawing of Dothan and Carmel, representing a country broken up with rugged hills and bounded by a long ridge, is admirable; while the "Storm on the Lake of Gennesareth" shows a very weird effect of driving cloud and wind across an evening sky, with the tossing water beneath. Since the picture of the "Ruins of Tiberias" was painted the Acropolis of the ancient city has been discovered and the old walls traced, showing that the supposed little town was a great city dominated by an important fortress with walls three miles in length. Sir Richard does not appear to have heard of this discovery, which should have lent an additional interest to his volume. It is the highest praise of this work, and a thing which its accomplished and illustrious author would be best pleased to receive, to say that the study of these pictures should prove of the greatest help in making young people understand and realize the historical portions of the Bible; while the letterpress may be read with advantage and instruction by all. Sir Richard pays a high and not undeserved tribute to the labours of Captain Conder in the Survey of Western Palestine.

RECORDS AND RECORD SEARCHING.†

MR. W. RYE'S last book is not so much an antiquarian work as a guide to those who are about to become antiquaries, or who, without any knowledge of mediæval matters, are desirous of investigating some especial point in their own genealogy or local history. Such inquirers, unless they possess an unusual amount of enthusiasm, are generally disheartened at the very outset by discovering that, before they can arrive at any result, they must obtain admittance to some large public office or library, and that, after having complied with a number of apparently vexatious formalities, they are confronted with a document written in a series of Chinese-like pothooks, which, when deciphered, are found to embody a species of Latin entirely unlike what the inquirer learned at school, referring to "Close Rolls," "Pipe Rolls," "Patent Rolls," "Placita de Quo Warranto," "Feet of Fines," and so forth; until, finding that a new alphabet and a new language must be learned before any progress can be made, he gives up his search in despair. Armed, however, with Mr. Rye's Guide-book, he can thread the mazes of the Record Office and British Museum, Somerset House, the Heralds' College, &c. Charts are provided for navigators in these deep and troubled waters, showing where to leave one's umbrella, where to sit and read or write, what to ask for, and of whom, till record-hunting appears to be simplicity itself. Moreover, there are "wrinkles for novices" (p. 39 et al.), and a variety of useful assistance towards the accomplishment of the inquirer's purpose. The first and second chapters, entitled respectively "How to Compile a Pedigree" and "How to Write the History of a Parish or other Place," will be found full of useful hints. Mr. Rye speaks with well-deserved praise of Farrar's Church Heraldry of Norfolk; but for those who dwell in less thoroughly explored counties we think he should have mentioned Papworth's invaluable Dictionary, which enables one, on finding a coat of arms, to discover the owner. He makes no reference to Wright's work on "Court Hand," which is a pity; for without a facsimile, with explanations, the novice will not make much of an ancient MS., even when furnished with such valuable clues as Mr. Rye affords anent the "Feet of Fines," "these invaluable records, the backbone of every genealogy and county history," which, as he "boastfully" points out, have only been thoroughly indexed and calendared for one county—Norfolk—by the indefatigable Le Neve, and again by himself. We earnestly wish that he may carry out the intention at which he hints (p. 26) of going through the Pipe Rolls for each county and "posting up" the interesting information to be found therein into the county histories, or at all events of doing so for some favoured counties. Surely the common derivation of Pipe is from the great cask (cf. Pipe of Port) in which these records were said to have been kept, not, as Mr. Rye suggests, "because the sheriffs all sent their accounts, as it were, through so many pipes into the common receptacle or exchequer"? A very useful part of the book is a list of the fees payable and regulations to be observed in all the libraries and offices wherein the record-hunter pursues his prey. We do not exactly see upon what grounds the Cambridge University Library is said to be subject to "cramped and illiberal rules," as contrasted with the Bodleian, the truth being that books are allowed to be taken out of the former to the reader's private residence, wherever that may be, whereas the recent agitation to extend this privilege to the frequenters of the Bodleian has not met with success.

BLESSED JOHN FISHER.*

AMONG the Englishmen of the sixteenth century whom the Roman See has lately declared worthy of special reverence no one better deserves to receive whatever honour such a declaration may confer than John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester. Even Mr. Froude, at whose hands ecclesiastics as a rule find little mercy, declares that he was a "single-hearted man, who lived in honest fear of evil"; and much more than this might be said in his praise, for his life was singularly holy, he was full of charity and all good works, in the opinion of Erasmus he was "a true bishop and a true theologian," and he willingly suffered death for what he believed to be the cause of truth and righteousness. The greater part of his life was uneventful, and when we come to the noble stand that for conscience sake he made against royal tyranny it is difficult to explain the course he adopted without entering at such length into the history of the questions with which he was concerned as to deprive the record of his personal action of the place that ought to be assigned to it in a biography. When, therefore, we say that the Rev. T. E. Bridgett's Life is somewhat tedious, we are willing to acknowledge the difficulties with which he has had to contend. He might, however, have made it more interesting if he had quoted less and had worked up his materials more; and if he had refrained from discussing the opinions of other modern authors in his text. He has founded his work chiefly on the Life ascribed to Dr. Richard Hall, of which MS. copies exist in the British Museum and other libraries, and which was printed, though, he says, with many interpolations, by Baily in 1655. Hall gives several particulars that are not to be found elsewhere, such as an account of the part taken by Fisher in the debate in Convocation with reference to the royal supremacy, and as he wrote in the reign of Mary, and was a Roman Catholic—at least so Mr. Bridgett contends in opposition to Lord Acton, who says that he was then a Protestant—his testimony when unsupported should be received with caution; for an author writing on the Roman side in that

---

* Palestine Illustrated. By Sir Richard Temple. London: Allen & Co. 1888.

† Records and Record Searching. By Walter Rye. London: Elliot Stock. Norwich: Goose & Co.

* Life of Blessed John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, and Martyr under Henry VIII. By the Rev. T. E. Bridgett, of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer. London: Burns & Oates, Limited. New York: Catholic Publication Society Company. 1888.

reign would naturally magnify one of the boldest and most famous upholders of the cause of the Queen's mother. Mr. Bridgett, however, appears to have carefully examined all other available sources of information, and his work, though written with a strong religious bias, and occasionally marred by some intemperance of expression, contains, on the whole, a trustworthy record of facts. His arguments sometimes fail to convince us, and we are not always able to accept his suggestions as worthy of consideration. It is amusing to find him endeavouring to defend Fisher from the charge of "great credulity" in the matter of the Holy Maid of Kent by quoting a passage from his works, in which he says that Luther was deceived by a "lying spirit," and that Savonarola was "misled by revelations." Fisher was not more credulous than many of his contemporaries; but, if he was not credulous as regards Elizabeth Barton's prophecies, he must consciously and for party purposes have countenanced a fraud, a course of which he was certainly incapable. Mr. Bridgett considers it "impossible to decide whether there was anything true or supernatural in the Maid's revelations," but, while he allows that her dying confession is decisive against her, adds—the italics are his—"if it is authentic." Can he show any reason for doubting that she made a confession of imposture? He devotes some pages to Mr. Froude's uncharitable remarks on the retractation that the Bishop was compelled to make when called to account by the King for certain words spoken in the Parliament of 1529. The whole affair, as far as it concerns Fisher's conduct, appears to us exceedingly trivial; but the explanation offered here still leaves him in the undignified position of a man who finds it expedient to explain away the obvious sense of something he has said. In speaking of the only serious blot on the Bishop's life—his treasonable messages to Chapuis urging the Emperor to make war on Henry—he asks, Is high treason always criminal before God or man? and seeks to excuse Fisher's conduct by comparing his messages with the invitation sent to the Prince of Orange. We will not enter on the theological question he suggests, but can assure him that high treason is always in every civilized State accounted a crime of the first magnitude, but that whether in a given case resistance to a king by rebellion should be reckoned as treason depends on circumstances.

The comparison he seeks to establish between Fisher's messages and the letter of the lords is superficial and deceptive. Shrewsbury and the rest did not invite a foreign prince to conquer England; for the United Provinces were not a Power that could have endangered the national independence, and the handful of troops that the Prince brought over with him could have been of no use had not the nation at large been ready to shake off the yoke of James II. Their invitation must, therefore, be regarded as part of a national act. This cannot be said of Fisher's invitation to the Emperor; for though it is perfectly true that the proceedings of Henry in the matter of the divorce had excited considerable dissatisfaction, it would be absurd to suppose that Charles would have been welcomed as a deliverer by "nineteen out of twenty of the common people." Nor can Fisher's messages be defended on the ground that he "appealed not to France or Scotland, but to the head of the Holy Roman Empire, who was the acknowledged arbitrator of Europe." Such a plea not only shows ignorance of the fact that the mediæval conception of Europe as a single commonwealth presided over by Pope and Emperor had now passed away, but is altogether beside the question; for Fisher's request to Charles was not that he should arbitrate between two States, but that he should interfere in the affairs of England—a country in which no Emperor had ever been allowed to exercise any act of sovereignty. Some of Mr. Bridgett's remarks on the ecclesiastical history of the reign are worthy of attention. For example, he points out with some force that, when the title of "Supreme Head" was considered by the clergy, "the question before their minds was that of the legislative powers, privileges, and immunities of the English Church" rather than of the authority of the See of Rome, that the title was "sufficiently vague and capable of an orthodox interpretation," and that the members of Convocation did not contemplate the possibility of any "formal schism." Among the few minor inaccuracies that will be found in his work we observe that he asserts that Anne Boleyn remained in France until "the end of 1524 or the beginning of 1525"; she had certainly returned to England by the spring of 1522. A somewhat unintelligible attempt to explain the character of Convocation suggests a confusion between that body and the representatives of the clerical estate in Parliament; the writ of summons with the præmunientes clause is certainly not addressed only to the archbishops, and it is a mistake to imagine that Convocation when duly assembled cannot proceed to transact any business without the special license of the Crown; for the royal assent is not even necessary for the discussion of a canon, though no new canon may be promulged without it. Lastly, with all deference to a clerical author, we must demur to the statement that John the Baptist was beheaded by order of Herod Agrippa.

THE FIGHTING VERES.*

SO many writers have mentioned the greatness, the antiquity, the nobility, and the personal bravery of the Veres during the last two centuries that it is somewhat surprising that their history has not been more closely examined in recent times. True the family is extinct. Their combativeness, no doubt, hastened their extinction. But a good account of all the Veres, on the same scale as this account of two of the last of them, might be a very useful book, and clear up the errors of Macaulay, Collins, Faulkner, and many other writers who have approached the subject with ignorance or prejudice, or both. The fact that their name is almost always written "De Vere," whereas they called and wrote themselves Vere or more often "Veer," speaks for itself.

The title of Mr. Markham's book is slightly misleading; for he only details the history of two of the "Fighting Veres," although every member of the family seems to have deserved the name. From Aubrey the Grim, the Crusader, and Aubrey the Chamberlain, killed in a London riot in 1140, descended a long line of soldiers. Earl Hugh of Oxford was a Crusader, like his ancestor. Earl Robert was knighted by Simon de Montfort. His son, another Robert, "the good Earl," served in the Scottish war of Edward III., and his son, again, Earl John, had a command both at Creçy and Poictiers. Earl Richard was one of the leaders at Agincourt, and his successor was on the victor's side at Bosworth. The seventeenth earl was engaged against the Armada, and the twentieth commanded a regiment in the Dutch wars. But Mr. Markham has selected as typical representatives of this combative race the two younger brothers of John Vere of Kirby, the nephew of John, sixteenth Earl of Oxford. They were Sir Francis Vere, whose monument in Westminster Abbey is so well known, and Horace, created in 1625 Lord Vere of Tilbury. The eighteenth and nineteenth earls, their cousins, and several other members of the family were killed fighting by their side in the Low Countries; and there can be no doubt that down to their last representative the whole family deserved the adjective Mr. Markham has made part of the title of his interesting book. There was also a "Sir Edward Vere," whose parentage is not known, the translator of Polybius, a great scholar, but, like the rest, before all things a soldier, who was killed at Bois-le-Duc in 1629. This war, in fact, must be held largely accountable for the extinction of the race; and Lord Vere of Tilbury was the last but one in the male line at the time of his death in 1635.

The war of independence in the Netherlands was watched with breathless interest in England. For sixty years it was the custom of young Englishmen to cross the sea and fight under some recognized leader in defence of the rights and liberties of the people oppressed by the Spaniards. Among all these leaders and soldiers the Veres are pre-eminent. "While others came and went, the Veres remained steadfastly at their posts, devoted their lives to the cause, and saw their work completed." Sir Francis was the first great English general of the modern school. His brother, Sir Horace, developed his teaching. Mr. Markham disclaims any intention of writing a history of the long war with which their names are so closely connected; his object, he says, is to present the lives of the men themselves, rather than to write a history of their times. Nevertheless, what with the special attention given to topography, what with the great political importance of the military operations, the book practically resolves itself into a history of the war of independence, and of the events to which it led. Not only were the brothers, Francis and Horace, engaged in it, but under them an army of nephews and cousins and connexions, whom they persuaded to join in the good cause. We read of six Veres, and many of the names of Holles, Harcourt, Wentworth, Fairfax, and Townshend, who were among their relations and connexions. Their pupils were the best generals in the great Civil War in England. General Monk began military life under Lord Vere, as Vere had begun under the Earl of Leicester, and these three names seem to connect the days of armour and arrows and tournaments with those of modern warfare, cannon and trenches and long sieges, the days of the successors of the men who fought in the wars of the Roses with the predecessors of those who won at Blenheim under Marlborough.

Mr. Markham agrees with the most modern authorities in taking Ver in the Cotentin as the cradle of the race. They were, he believes, of a Danish stock, and came to England from the same region which produced the Percys, Courcys, and Paganells. The first "Albericus de Ver" held, besides the manor of Kensington in Middlesex, nine lordships in Suffolk, fourteen in Essex, and one, Campes, in Cambridgeshire. One of the earls of Oxford was nicknamed "Little John o' Campes." The third "Albericus," or Aubrey, was the earliest example in our history of an earl "unattached," so to speak. When an earldom was an office as well as an honour, Earl Aubrey had no county, though he had the title and rank. Eventually he was given Cambridge first, and afterwards Oxford, in which last-named county he had "the third penny of the pleas of the Crown," as the customary salary of his office. But Mr. Markham does not go into any of these matters, and glancing lightly at the early history of the Veres, concentrates his attention on the two distinguished brothers, Francis and Horace. His maps are numerous and really illustrative of the history; and it is needless to observe that the text is graphic and accurate to the last degree. There is a complete and careful index.

* The Fighting Veres. By Clements R. Markham. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1888.

ART PUBLICATIONS.

THE current number of the Figaro Salon, the first of five to be issued by Messrs. Boussod, Valadon, & Co., comprises a good selection of reproductions from the great show in the Palais de l'Industrie, and a moderate but entirely intelligent critical comment from the pen of M. Albert Wolff. The representative character of this serial makes it an excellent guide to the general visitor, and the illustrations in the present example afford a true indication of the range and diversity of art at the Salon. In portraiture we have M. Bonnat's admirable record of Cardinal Lavigerie and M. Henner's "Portrait de Madame X." Among the landscapes are Mr. Ridgway Knight's delightful "L'Appel au Passeur" and Mme. Dieterle's Normandy cattle-piece, "Les Prés de Blangy." M. Réalmier-Dumas's "Bonaparte," M. Chalon's "Circe," M. Jules Breton's "L'Étoile du Berger," to say nothing of such works of assured popularity as "Le Rêve," by M. Detaille, and that moving and effective reminiscence of Sebastopol, "Le Drapeau," by M. Moreau de Tours, appeal to very various tastes, and are rendered with a far greater success than is usual with similar publications on this side of the Channel. M. Wolff is nothing if not discreet. If you cannot agree with him in thinking M. Chalon's curious symbolism in "Circe" embodies nothing but "une apothéose de féerie," and do not share his antipathy for the seductive prestidigitateur, M. Henner, there is nothing of irritating parti pris in M. Wolff's critical method. It is easy to be at one with him in the matter of the theatrical "Bonaparte" of M. Réalmier-Dumas, as in his sound commendation of M. Moreau de Tours, and his congratulations upon the return, after four years of absence, of M. Detaille to the Salon.

Messrs. Boussod, Valadon, & Co. have also published a photogravure of the "Triumph of Ariadne," after Hans Makart, a delicate reproduction in colour of M. de Beaufond's charming picture, "The First Communion," and an artist's proof of an etching by M. Lopisgich, entitled "The Haven." The photogravure is a very fair rendering of Hans Makart's tumultuous and rather confused composition, though, like the prudent M. Wolff, who declines to discuss engravings of pictures he has not seen, we hesitate to accept the modelling of the figures in every instance as wholly faithful, being dependent upon a possibly treacherous recollection of the original. With the very characteristic dry point of M. Lopisgich and the attractive rendering of M. de Beaufond's work there are no obstacles of the kind. The etching is a fine achievement in atmosphere and tone; while the print in colour is delightfully free from traces of mechanical process, and, unlike most novelties, is altogether pleasing, as well as in a notable way successful.

DIALECT.*

THESE are four out of fifty-five volumes published from 1873 to 1887, to be followed by three more in 1888, and a promise of eleven on the top of them, which bear witness to the industry of the members of the English Dialect Society, and hold out a very cheerful prospect to readers whose appetite for reading is voracious. The general reader who is rightly despised by the learned, may regale his vicious tastes by picking out the plums here and there, which he may look for and find for himself, if he will take a hint. But the very gigantic task of recording all local words ever spoken by Englishmen in every part of England is much too serious a matter to be trifled with by casual persons in pursuit of amusement.

Mr. Darlington, who contributes the South Cheshire Folk-Speech, lays down very good principles in his introduction (p. 14), which it would be well if he and others followed. He says:—

> I must remark that all I have said, and all I shall have occasion to say, concerns only the dialect as purely spoken. I take no note of expressions which are peculiar to certain individuals. Nor have I anything to do with the peculiar errors to which Hodge is liable in talking to a stranger, nor with those which occur from his inability to distinguish one big word from another. These eccentricities may amuse the reader, but they are misleading in a book written with a scientific object. Such modes of speech as the above may be classed under the general head of individualisms, and I have laid it down as a rule that individualisms shall have no place in my glossary.

These are golden rules, and it is a pity they have not been better observed by those who are responsible for some of these volumes. Mr. Darlington is a scholar, and has done his part well. But if South Cheshire demands 448 pages, what will all England demand? And this question suggests the piling up of volumes that will serve as a lofty monument to the memory of the English tongue, when that rich language has been ground down to the grist required by my lords of the Education Department administering the Elementary Education Acts.

Mr. Darlington, in his introduction (p. 13), notes a peculiarity which is very true. Farmers, he says, talk to their labourers in one tongue, and to their equals in another; he might have added, to their superiors in yet another. The talk of the three classes, the upper, middle, and lower, differs exceedingly, and it is not uncommon for each class to try to speak to the others in their own tongue. But, as in the time when Hamlet was written, the toe of the peasant comes so near the heel of the courtier, he galls his kibe; it is the lower that usually tries to talk the tongue of the higher class, unbending himself to his equals.

Mr. Alexander Ellis, F.R.S., has published a "Glossic," and the pronunciation of the words given by the Dialect Society may be discovered by this guide. The letters of standard English are used with accents and marks of many sorts to indicate the sounds which proceed from the lips of the dialect talkers. It would be a very interesting experiment to put Mr. Ellis, supposing he had never heard Cheshire, or Somersetshire, or Kent, to talk to one of those natives, just to see how he got on. If one word he spoke would be understood, he ought to be honoured for his invention.

Mr. Darlington publishes the whole Book of Ruth, written in the South Cheshire dialect according to Mr. Ellis's "Glossic," and here is the sixteenth verse of the first chapter to test the value of Mr. Ellis's ingenuity (p. 98):—

> Ŭn Róoth sed, Dü)nŭ beg ŭ mi tŭ léeˑŭv yŭ, ŭr tŭ goaˑbaak· frŭm folˑŭin aafˑtŭr yŭ: fŭr weeˑŭr· yoa· gon, ·ahy(l goa·: ŭn wéeˑŭr · yoa· loj·n ·ahy)l loj·; ·yoaˑr foaˑks)sn bi· ·mahy foaˑks, ŭn ·yoaˑr God ·mahy God.

In matters of dialect there are three sorts—a quite distinct word with a quite distinct meaning peculiar to the locality—an ordinary English word used in the locality in a quite distinct sense, differing completely from the ordinary sense—and the dialect of pronunciation only, differing from standard English in no other way. Of these three surely the first is of the greatest interest, and the others mere corruptions and vulgarisms of common talk. Corruptions and vulgarisms, especially if they are carried to excess, can certainly be very amusing, or a phrase so compounded may be very expressive, but they cannot be said to reach the height of a scientific object.

In South Cheshire Folk-Speech Mr. Darlington has the words Smock and Smock-frock, and many other such words, which are certainly English, and not by any means South Cheshire even in their simple pronunciation or use. This volume might be made much shorter, and therefore much better, by the omission of all universal and truly English words. South Cheshire is well done, however, as a whole, and can be recommended to the general reader to draw it, in the sense of hounds drawing a thick covert, for amusement.

A Dictionary of Kentish Dialect and Provincialisms in Use in the County of Kent, by Chancellor Parish and Mr. Shaw, is evidently the work of philologists of no mean acquirements and the bulk of the volume of but 194 pages shows what can be done with a rational sense of propriety, avoiding excess in the indulgence of a passion for printing. It is probable that Kent, lying in the high road of civilization between London and Paris, may have got rid at an early date of much of its dialect, but there is still an astonishing number of Kent words left behind, though many in this dictionary are words in use elsewhere, with a Kent meaning. The introduction is well worth reading, and explains the scheme of the volume in a commendable manner.

To give a notion of the Kent pronunciation, here is a verse from the song of "Dick and Sal at Canterbury Fair" (ver. 8):—

> He sed dare was a teejus fair,
> Dat lasted for a wick;
> And all de ploughmen dat went dare
> Must car dair shining stick.

This song of one hundred verses as a whole will be found amusing, and instructive as far as the Kent dialect is concerned.

The West Somerset Word-Book: a Glossary of Dialectical and Archaic Words and Phrases used in the West of Somerset and East of Devonshire, by Mr. Elworthy, is a most formidable missile thrown at the heads of the public. A fat volume 2¾ inches thick, with 876 mortal pages, besides 14 of preface, and 48 of introduction, in all 938. No less than 5½ pages are devoted to the pronunciation of the letter A, with a reference to Dr. Murray's new Dictionary on that subject; Mr. Ellis's method being also adopted by way of making a complete thing of it. All the rules of dialect proper are violated, and there is a superfluity of naughtiness in this regard that gives a hopeless aspect to the business of exploring the wilds of Somersetshire talk. The expressive and poetic metaphor, shout cake, used by children as a sarcasm on the scarcity of currants in the products of thrifty housekeepers, is applicable to the process of picking out the plums in this great work. Every page is burdened with standard English words used in a perfectly natural sense, with even the pronunciation not very much out of the way considering it as a Somersetshire performance. Somersetshire and East Devonshire, to say nothing of countries lying further west, offer an interesting field for study in the matter of dialect, the more is the pity that the job should be weighted with such surplusage. Mr. Elworthy has been over twenty years on this special Somersetshire study; why not take a few years more in the study of simplicity and conciseness, and in finding out what is Somersetshire and what is not? The public would be exceedingly patient, and willing to wait a while longer. Time and space are everything to most people, though they may be nothing but abstruse abstract philosophical problems to Mr. Elworthy. The preface is a great deal too long, and the introduction is a great deal too long; moreover, they both abound in commonplace observations on language in general. The Glossary contains the following, an example or two of much that fills the book:—"Aich [aeˑach] the name of the aspirate h." "Bump [bump] v.t. to jolt; to shake." "Deal [daeˑul] v.t. to conclude a bargain of purchase or sale; to buy." There is the word "Maid [maaˑyd] a girl; a lass. A woman servant of any age. I know a widow with a son who is a parlour-maid." The word maid is certainly very freely applied in the West of England, whether the compliment implied is deserved or not. But surely a lady who had a woman with a score of children for a lady's-maid would not be perpetrating West-Somersetshire dialect. Here also are to be found the hunting terms used in the far-famed Exmoor stag-hunting, terms common in all hunting-fields ever since the Conquest, many derived from the French, coolly put down as Somersetshire dialect. If Mr. Elworthy had taken the trouble to consult any hunting-man, he might have got hold of the right end of the stick, and he would never have said that when a deer "sinks" the valley or makes his "point," those and other hunting expressions are Somersetshire dialect. There are symptoms, too, in this fat book that Mr. Elworthy, although he may know the folk talk, does not know the folk. For instance, the word "organ" is explained as the plant penny-royal; whereas there is an absurdity in the common use of this word. Throughout the West of England people, especially women, make organ tay (tea) as a good thing for the human organs, of which penny-royal is one ingredient of several used by herbalists for the "organs." It is one of the numerous instances of fine words introduced into ordinary speech which a herbalist would be likely to revel in. To know folk-speech it is needful to know the folk, which, as they are always on their guard when they talk to the gentry, is by no means an easy thing. Some of the dialect to be found in searching through the book is peculiar, to say the least of it. The curious word "Allernbatch, sb., a boil or carbuncle," is one. "Nippigang, sb., a gathering, or whitlow; an abscess; carbuncle," is another for the same sort of thing. The word "angle" is used for intriguing—"(Aay au·vees kunsúd·urd (considered) eens ee wuz angleen aa·dr Mús Jee·un) I always thought he was angling after Miss Jane." "Bisgy" is a tool for rooting, with a curious derivation from the French besaiguë, double axe or bill. "Cloam" is the common word throughout the Western counties for earthenware, from which "Empten-cloam," for a drunkard, is derived. "Hawckémouth, a blustering, foul-mouthed person," is another curiosity in dialect. "Hizy-prizy, chicanery or sharp practice," is an uncomplimentary corruption of Nisi-prius. "Mazed," mad, is used freely in all the Western counties for excitement in general. A man in love with a maid is mazed arter her; from amaze and maze. "Tantarabobus, sb., name for the devil," is a very astonishing specimen of dialect, and makes one pause.

* South Cheshire Folk-Speech. By T. Darlington. Cheshire Glossary. By R. Holland. A Dictionary of Kentish Dialect. By the Rev. W. D. Parish and the Rev. W. F. Shaw. West Somerset Word-Book. By F. T. Elworthy. London: published for the English Dialect Society by Trübner & Co.

It is a good work for the investigators of the curiosities of words to rake up all the old bygone terms that can be found out among old men and women, old songs, and old scraps of writing. Many very fine old English words, much in danger of being lost, will be preserved, and perhaps revived, to keep our tongue rich, and we wish the Dialect Society all success; the fatness of some of their volumes, however, might be trained down with advantage.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THERE is a history or a legend that the pension which was granted, in days when there was no Mr. Labouchere, to our immortal Dibdin was granted, not so much in consideration of purely literary merits, as because of the large numbers of ardent youth whom his songs sent into the service of their king and country. We do not think that the French Republic has much reason to repeat this liberality in the case of the rather numerous novelists who, since the establishment of really compulsory and universal service, have dealt with military life. A few weeks ago we dealt with a dismal book on service abroad, by M. Bonnetain. This of M. Perrin's, on service at home (1), is cleaner and rather interestingly minute in its details, but, if possible, more dismal. Here, too, the hero comes to a bad end (a gun-carriage goes over his chest), and here, too, he is utterly disenchanted before the end comes. However, this class of military novels is at any rate better than another class of novels of which we have seen divers specimens lately, though we do not choose to review them by name or in detail. These may be called the novels of the Unfrocked Priesthood, and a very pretty collection they will make if they go on as they have begun.

M. Paul Mahalin (2) pursues his generous purpose of resuscitating the romance of cape and sword. This time he has chosen the days of the Regency, which indeed, like most others in the history of France, his master Alexander touched, and touching adorned, but which are less identified with him than some other periods.

The heroine of Fin d'amour (3), Léonie Derlange, is a rather amusing person, leaving, indeed, something to desire in point of strict morality, but quite "in the movement." Disappointed in an attempt on the legitimate affections of Sir Jipson, baronnet, she consoles herself with another, but less legitimate, suitor. Unluckily the less legitimate suitor is inconstant, and has the bad taste to relapse into love of his own wife. Result, the emptying of all six chambers of a revolver on the faithless one, a trial, and, of course, a triumphant acquittal. The book would have been better if it had been shorter, but it is not unamusing as it is. To Péché originel (4) we cannot quite give the same description. Its pathos is rather high-flown, and its satire seems to us a little blunt. And why is the harmless name of "Lionel" a prénom ronflant? M. Gennevraye (5) by the title of his volume of stories may suggest that impossible "blushing" officer of the same arm at whom Théophile Gautier unkindly scoffs; but there was no need for this captain to blush. He only had the care of a very masterful niece, who disturbed his repose not unpleasantly.

Two of the inevitable Russian, or at least Slav, story-books are before us. Count Tolstoi's (6) stories of military life in the Caucasus are, we believe, known already. They do not contain his worst work, and are translated by the usual E. Halpérine-Kaminski. Mlle. Poradowska's (7) book deals with Galicia, but as vodka is mentioned in it, the devotees of the Russian novel will probably be satisfied that it is all right.

Since his first book M. J. Ricard has done nothing so good as the first tale in La course à l'amour (8), and if this story itself had been his first, it would have been even more promising than Pitchoun! It is of good old 1830 style, with something of Gautier in it and something of Mérimée, and that, too, not at all an obviously imitated or borrowed something. The not exactly hallowed and violently ending delights of Jean Dartet, Parisian man of letters, and Mary Anne Dialli, half English, half gipsy artist, have, to our mind, much more force and power than those with which M. Alphonse Daudet intended to instruct his little boys. But why will a man of such powers as M. Ricard traffic in such stale matter as disillusion, neo-paganism, all the vieille défroque of Byronism thrice-turned and trimmed and dyed? Not that way, for a generation or two at least, lies the path to real success. We do not know why clowns should not love, but they rarely do it happily in fiction; and M. de Soudak's clown (9) is not an exception. And let us add that we do not mean by happily "felicitously." There is less felicity and not much more happiness in Reinette (10); and we are obliged to say that M. de Castellane, with apparently the best intentions, has made no great success of a painful, a disagreeable, and we think an impossible subject—the sacrifice, half revolting, half grotesque, of a mother in order to save her daughter's reputation (11). On the other hand, M. Cadol has put together pleasantly and skilfully three good stories in Mariage de princesse (12).

(1) Le canon: mœurs militaires. Par J. Perrin. Paris: Ollendorff.

(2) La pointe au corps. 2 tomes. Par P. Mahalin. Paris: Tresse et Stock.

(3) Fin d'amour. Par F. Vilars. Paris: Plon.

(4) Péché originel. Par F. de Girodon-Pralon. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(5) Les embarras d'un capitaine de dragons. Par A. Gennevraye. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(6) Au Caucase. Par Léon Tolstoi. Paris: Perrin.

(7) Yaga. Par Marguerite Poradowska. Paris: Ollendorff.

(8) La course à l'amour. Par J. Ricard. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(9) L'amour d'un clown. Par Louis de Soudak. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(10) Reinette. Par Sainte-Marie Binsce. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(11) Madame Bégum. Par le Mis. de Castellane. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(12) Mariage de princesse. Par E. Cadol. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

IN Letters from Dorothy Osborne to Sir William Temple (London: Griffith, Farran, Okeden, & Welsh), collected and edited by Mr. E. A. Parry, we have the pleasantest book imaginable. Dorothy Osborne—whose portrait, as reproduced in the present volume, shows her to have been an intelligent, resolute, egoistic, and altogether feminine sort of person—was a good deal in love with Temple, and the letters which she addressed to the object of her flame are very well worth reading indeed. They reveal to us, for one thing, the tricks and manners of a right woman; and, for another, they present us with an exemplar of what some two hundred years since was held to be the sort of thing that well-conducted young ladies should write (if they were clever enough) to the persons on whom their hopes were centred. The difference between them and the love-letters of to-day is the difference between (say) Racine and Ouida. In the correspondence of Dorothy Osborne there is always intelligence, there is always dignity and self-respect, there is always enough of reticence—enough of selection—to make us understand that the writer was, in her way, an artist; and, at the same time, there is, first and last, a sufficiency of humanity—enough of the interests of sentiment and individual effort and the sexual emotion—to reveal the writer for a true woman. In reading one is reminded not so much of Clarissa (though the letters are conceived and done upon a scale which recalls the epistolary achievement of that formidable creature) as of the brilliant, the wayward, the enchanting, yet natural and normal, Miss Howe. They are not so wild and witty as Miss Howe's; for Miss Howe is one of the most successful creations of one of our greatest novelists; but they are so lively and natural, so heartfelt in themselves, and so charming in effect, as to show that Dorothy Osborne and Anna Howe were sisters. One can give them no greater praise than that; and one cannot choose but be grateful to Mr. Parry for collecting and printing them, and to Macaulay for writing such an account of them as persuaded Mr. Parry of the reward that would be his who should print and collect them. Mr. Parry, indeed, is to be commended on more grounds than one. He has given us the reliquiæ of a very sprightly and individual creature, and he has done his own share of the work with a great deal of care and more of discretion than your first editor is wont to display.

The anonymous gentleman who is responsible, in The Bohemians of the Latin Quarter (London: Vizetelly), for an English—a so-called English—version of the immortal Scènes de la Vie de Bohème deserves at least the commendation due to them that rush in where those of a wiser and better race decline to tread. Murger's merits are largely those of manner and style. He had a good deal to say; but, after all, it was his way of saying it that made his book the irresistible influence we know. A poorer writer might have discoursed of Mimi and Marcel and the "Symphonie sur l'influence du Bleu dans les Arts" for a hundred volumes and got none to listen to him. Murger had but to present this same material—which is, after all, no more than an adaptation to humorous and sentimental purposes of the stuff of certain scenes in La Comédie Humaine—as he felt and was able to present it to found a tradition in literature, and in life to turn the heads of several generations of young women and young men. His books, of course, are untrue; but they are works of art in the good sense of the word, and the amount of pleasure they have given is only to be paralleled (perhaps) by the amount of mischief they have made. To give such stuff in English is a feat beyond the accomplishment of the common translator; and it is not to be gainsaid that the wit, the grace, the souffle of impudence and gaiety and youth, which count for so much in the charm of the Vie de Bohème are altogether absent from The Bohemians of the Latin Quarter. Still the thing is readable; the introduction, "Murger and his Work," presents such a roseate and romantic view of the author and the shifty, reckless, out-at-elbows set of vagabonds who were his models as may induce a certain number of good, honest English folk to pursue their researches into the mystery of Bohemianism, and plunge with interest into the book itself; and if the etchings with which the adventures of MM. Marcel and Rodolphe and Schaunard (and their female friends) are illustrated are not particularly suggestive or significant, they are French in style and Murgeresque in intention, and there are as many as ten of them—a fact which clothes the volume with a luxury not its due.

The worst that we can say of A Wayfarer's Wallet (London: Redway), by Mr. H. G. Hewlett, is that it means well and does not more than middlingly. Mr. Hewlett treats a number of subjects in a number of verses; his sentiments (he is avowedly no Tory) are unexceptionable, his manner is gentlemanlike, his effect is transient. Of Metempsychosis (London: Longmans) there is no more to be said than that its style is flushed, that its suggestions are youthful, that its import is obscure, and that it conveys to us an impression of the sound of an abundance of adjectives. The Tales and Legends in Verse (London: Kegan Paul) of Mr. E. Cooper Willis, Q.C., are written with both eyes, so to speak, on the Muse. Mr. Willis has grappled with his Inspiration most conscientiously, and has fought it out with her to the bitter end of close on a hundred and ninety pages; and the result is enough to show that, while his intentions are strictly honourable, his success is no more than that of most. His rhythms are conventionally perfect; his diction is conventionally eloquent; his themes are conventionally suggestive and inspiriting; his sense is conventionally poetical. 'Tis all that can be said for him; and, as poets go, 'tis much. In Matin Songs (London: Kegan Paul) the fact most obvious to the discerning reader is the author's youth. It is not a hot youth, nor a foolish youth, nor a stupid youth; it is, indeed, a tame, a timid, an inquiring but gentle and well-mannered, youth; but it is genuinely youthful, all the same, and its youthfulness is of the kind that disarms criticism:—

> List, gentles, to a maiden's tale
> That speaks of cruel wrong,
> Of suffering from a father's hand,
> Of ruthless pride and wrong,
> Of young lives withered as the flower.

Who could be cruel—who could be just—to that? For the rest non ragionam di lor! About the Lays of the Sea-side (London: Bumpus) of "Aliph Cheem" there is no such difficulty; it is merely vulgar and foolish. Those who care to do these things may sing the first number in the book, "A Lay of Margate," to the pleasing melody of "The Husband's Boat"; those who care to take their Ingoldsby at second-hand (and who shall tell how bad, how common, how witless, how 'Arry-and-'Arriettish, is Ingoldsby thus taken?) may follow him to his close.

We have also received A Memoir of Bishop Steere (London: Bell & Sons); Napoleon's Last Voyage (London: Simpkin), being—to quote the title-page—an "Extract from a Diary of Rear-Admiral Sir George Cockburn, with Particular Reference to Gen. Napoleon Buonaparte," published, at third or fourth hand, by Mr. Thos. Salkeld Borrodaile; Mr. Amos Reade's Life in the Cut (London: Swan Sonnenschein), which is a story, partly realistic and partly pietistic, of life on the canal; So as by Fire (London: The London Literary Society), a very long novel in one short volume; Mrs. Oliphant's Cousin Mary (London: Partridge); Sara Crewe; or, What Happened at Miss Minchin's (London: Warne), by Frances Hodgson Burnett; and Song-Tide; Poems and Lyrics of Joy and Sorrow (London: Walter Scott), by Philip Bourke Marston, edited—for the "Canterbury Poets" series—with an Introductory Memoir, by William Sharp.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

NOTICE TO ADVERTISERS.

The ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT has been REMOVED from 38 to 33 Southampton Street. All communications respecting ADVERTISEMENTS should therefore be addressed to Mr. JOHN HART, 33 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.
Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,698, MAY 12, 1888:

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

"No nobler Mission work has been entered on in recent years than this to our hardy Toilers of the Sea."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

MISSION TO DEEP-SEA FISHERMEN

Patron—HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

Treasurer and Chairman of General Council.—THOMAS B. MILLER, Esq.
Chairman of Finance Committee.—THOMAS GRAY, Esq., C.B.
Bankers.—Messrs. LLOYDS, BARNETTS, & BOSANQUETS, Lim., Lombard St., E.C.
OFFICES: BRIDGE HOUSE, Blackfriars Bridge, London, E.C.
Founder and Director—E. J. MATHER, Esq.

Eight Vessels now cruise with the North Sea Trawling Fleets. Each Vessel is specially fitted for this service, and is at once a Church, Dispensary, Library, and Club. Funds are being raised for the Maintenance of a New Hospital Mission Vessel ("The Queen Victoria"), which is greatly needed; accidents are so numerous as to simply appal an average Landsman. Who will help this great work? Small or Large Offerings will be thankfully acknowledged.

THE ANNUAL PUBLIC MEETING

WILL BE HELD AT

EXETER HALL, on WEDNESDAY, MAY 16.

At 2.30 There will be a Recital on the Great Organ by Mr. CHURCHILL SIDLEY, interspersed by Solo Singing.

At 3 The Chair will be taken by Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Bart., K.C.M.G., G.C.S.I., C.I.E., Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs. About 300 SMACKSMEN are expected on the Platform. Admission to the Afternoon Meeting will be by Tickets only, the prices being 10s. 6d., 2s. 6d., 1s., and 6d.

The EVENING MEETING will be

At 7 Under the Presidency of THOMAS GRAY, Esq., C.B., when there will be some new and beautifully painted Dissolving Views Illustrations of Life in the Trawling Fleets—accompanied by personal testimony of the Smacksmen, with Solo and Chorus Singing. Tickets, 1s. and 6d. each. Early application for tickets is requested.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION,
West Brompton, Earl's Court, and West Kensington.

Will be OPENED by the Rt. Hon. the LORD MAYOR OF LONDON in full State.

OPENING DAY, SATURDAY, MAY 12th, at 3 P.M.

PATRON.
HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF ITALY.

HON. PRESIDENT.
H.R.H. THE CROWN PRINCE OF ITALY.

DIRECTOR-GENERAL.
JOHN R. WHITLEY, Esq.

PRESIDENT OF THE ENGLISH RECEPTION COMMITTEE.
COL. J. T. NORTH.

PRESIDENT OF THE ITALIAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.
CAV. L. BONACINA.

The First Exclusively ITALIAN EXHIBITION held beyond the boundaries of the Peninsula.

The most valuable and varied Collection of ITALIAN SCULPTURE and PAINTINGS ever exhibited.

Magnificent and unique Display of ITALIAN INDUSTRIES.

THE HUNTING TENT, &c., OF THE LATE KING OF ITALY.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
SCENES FROM ITALY.

ROME IN LONDON.
Roman Market Place. Roman Forum.
Colosseum and Palace of the Cæsars.
Vesuvius, Bay of Naples, and Italian Fleet.
Borghese Gardens, Tuscan Farmhouse.
Capri Blue Grotto. Temple of Vesta.
Italian Government Naval Exhibits.
Venetian Lace Makers. Venetian Glass Manufactory.
Alpine Switchback Railway.
Venetian Illuminations.
Italian Restaurant and National Dishes.

The Italian Exhibition Band.
The Scots Guards Band.
Italian Concerts.
Neapolitan Mandolinists and Singers.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
Open 11 A.M. to 11 P.M.

Admission to the Exhibition—Opening Day, 5s.; all other days, 1s. No Half-Crown days.
Season Ticket Holders are entitled to admission to the Exhibition on the Opening Day.
Applications for Season Tickets to be made to
VINCENT A. APPLIN, Esq., Secretary.
Single Season Tickets, £1.
Double Season Tickets, admitting Gentleman and Lady, 30s.
Season Tickets for Children (under 16), 10s.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.

THE NEW GALLERY, Regent Street.—The SUMMER EXHIBITION is NOW OPEN, from Nine A.M. to Seven P.M. Admission One Shilling; Season Tickets, Five Shillings.

NIAGARA IN LONDON. COLOSSAL PICTURE of the GREAT FALLS. Original Effects, by Philippoteaux. Pleasant Lounge, Music, American Museum, Electric Light. Admission, 1s. No Fees. Ten A.M. to Eleven P.M. WEDNESDAY, 2s. 6d. Ten to Six; 1s. Six to Eleven. Praised by entire Press.—YORK STREET, Westminster. St. James's Park Station.
1,000 Visitors Daily.

PICCADILLY HALL, 31 Piccadilly. Daily Ten till Six. FREE EXHIBITION of rare antique OAK CARVINGS, &c. The famous old carved Oak Choir Stalls and Doorway, from the Carthusian Monastery of Buxheim, Bavaria, date 1600 to 1651; and other most interesting objects. Admission free on presentation of visiting card. Exhibited by J. ICHENHAUSER, of 68 New Bond Street, Specialist in Carved Oak, Sculptured Panellings, &c. &c.

ROYAL STATISTICAL SOCIETY.—The SEVENTH ORDINARY MEETING of the present Session will be held on Tuesday, May 15, 1888 at the Royal School of Mines, 28 Jermyn Street, S.W., at 7.45 P.M., when the following Paper will be read: "CONDITION and OCCUPATIONS of the PEOPLE of EAST LONDON and HACKNEY, 1887," by CHARLES BOOTH, Esq.

EDUCATIONAL.

CHELTENHAM COLLEGE.—The ANNUAL EXAMINATION for SCHOLARSHIPS will be held on July 17 and 18. Six Classical and Five Mathematical Scholarships of value ranging between £80 and £20, and tenable for three years, will be awarded.
Candidates must be under fifteen and over thirteen on July 1. Also a CHORAL SCHOLARSHIP, in value not less than £50 per annum, is offered for competition to boys (under twelve on July 1) who possess and desire to cultivate musical talent.
For further details apply to the SECRETARY, the College, Cheltenham.

CHELTENHAM COLLEGE.—The HEAD-MASTERSHIP of the MILITARY and CIVIL DEPARTMENT is VACANT, and a Successor to the late Head-Master will be appointed at the end of this month, to enter on his duties not later than September. The requisite qualifications are, a high Mathematical Degree at Cambridge or Oxford; experience in School Work and Organization; and knowledge of the character and standard of the Woolwich and Sandhurst Examinations.
The salary is £800 per annum without a house.
Candidates are requested to apply as soon as possible, enclosing Testimonials, to the Rev. Dr. KYNASTON, the College, Cheltenham.

BRADFIELD COLLEGE, BERKS. FOUR FOUNDATION SCHOLARSHIPS, annual value Ninety and Eighty guineas (covering Tuition and Boarding Fees), FOUR WARDEN'S ENTRANCE EXHIBITIONS, annual value Fifty guineas, and FOUR MINOR ENTRANCE EXHIBITIONS, annual value Thirty guineas, will be offered for competition by Examination, beginning May 29, 1888. Candidates must be between Eleven and Fifteen on August 1, 1888. Subjects of Examination—Divinity, Classics, Mathematics. Boys destined for a Modern Side education may offer French instead of Greek, and are eligible for the Exhibitions only.
Separate Papers for those over and under Thirteen. For further particulars apply to the WARDEN.

CLIFTON COLLEGE.—CLASSICAL, MATHEMATICAL, and NATURAL SCIENCE SCHOLARSHIPS. NINE or more OPEN to COMPETITION at MIDSUMMER 1888. Value from £25 to £50 a year, which may be increased from a special fund to £90 a year in cases of scholars who require it.—Further particulars from the HEAD-MASTER, or SECRETARY, The College, Clifton, Bristol.

ROYAL INDIAN ENGINEERING COLLEGE, COOPERS HILL, STAINES.
The course of study is arranged to fit an ENGINEER for employment in Europe, India, or the Colonies. About FIFTY STUDENTS will be admitted in September 1888. For Competition the Secretary of State will offer Fifteen Appointments in the Indian Public Works Department and Two in the Indian Telegraph Department.—For particulars, apply to the SECRETARY, at the College.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

PROVIDENT LIFE OFFICE, 50 REGENT STREET, LONDON, W.

ABSTRACT OF ANNUAL AND QUINQUENNIAL REPORT OF THE DIRECTORS FEBRUARY 17 1888

Proposals were received for New Assurances ... amounting to £ ... Of these ... were accepted, and Policies granted for £ ... the annual Premiums upon which were £ ... these figures show an increase upon the year 1886 of 101 in the number of Policies issued, £ ... in the amount assured and £ ... in the new annual Premiums.

Proposals for £77 0... were declined or not completed.

The Claims for the year were £ ... an increase of £10 070 upon the amount for 1886.

The Annual Income is now £119 719. The total funds at the close of the year were £2 01,2..., an increase of £15 144.

On the 31st of December last was completed another Quinquennial period and in accordance with the terms of the Deed of Constitution, a Valuation of the Liabilities under all Policies of Assurance has been made by the Actuary.

The Valuation of the Assets and Liabilities result in a surplus of £ ... after setting aside the amount reserved ... provided for under the Deed of Constitution ... to the Shareholders, while the reversionary value of £ ... has been added to the various Policies entitled to Bonus.

KINNAIRD ..., ...

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY

Established 1836

LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET ... ABERDEEN ... UNION TERRACE

INCOME and FUNDS 18...

Fire Premiums ... £ ...
Life Premiums ... ...
Interest ... 1...
Accumulated Funds ... £ ... 0 000

STANDARD LIFE OFFICE.

HALF A MILLION ... Death Claims ... Funds SIX AND A HALF MILLIONS, ...

83 KING WILLIAM STREET, E.C.
3 PALL MALL EAST, S.W.

PHŒNIX FIRE OFFICE

LOMBARD STREET and CHARING CROSS LONDON. Established 1782.
Insurances against Loss by Fire and Lightning effected in all parts of the World.
Loss Claims arranged with promptitude and liberality.
WILLIAM C. MACDONALD, FRANCIS B. MACDONALD, Joint Secretaries.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PALL MALL, S.W.
Subscribed Capital £1,200,000. Paid-up £300,000. Total Invested Funds over £1,600,000.
E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

ACCIDENTS ALL THE YEAR ROUND.—Provide against them by Policy of the RAILWAY PASSENGERS' ASSURANCE COMPANY, 64 Cornhill, London. ... Invested Capital and Reserve Fund £ ... Compensation paid ... £ ...,000. Moderate premiums ... Liberal Settlement of Claims. West End Office 8 Grand Hotel Buildings, W.C. Head Office 64 Cornhill.

WILLIAM J. VIAN, Secretary.

THE INSURANCE POLICYHOLDERS' MUTUAL PROTECTION LEAGUE Limited.

Every one Insured or intending to Insure should read the League Pamphlet ... PROFIT on PLUNDER &c. as to £10,000,000.

To be had post free for 6d. on application to the SECRETARY of the League, 8 Warwick Court, Gray's Inn, London, W.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.

THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes free of charge the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the purchase and sale of Stocks, Shares and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

"SECURUS JUDICAT ORBIS TERRARUM."

APOLLINARIS.

"THE QUEEN OF TABLE WATERS."

The filling at the Apollinaris Spring during the year 1887 amounted to 11,894,000 bottles.

FINDLATER'S WHISKIES.

BEST OLD IRISH and BEST ISLAY MALT 41s per dozen bottles.
Are the production of the Old Fashioned Pot Stills, matured and mellowed by age only.
Note the bronze green label with Trade Mark, a "Stag's Head."
83 WELLINGTON STREET, Covent Garden, and 219 BROMPTON ROAD, S.W.

Mr. C. B. HARNESS; Consulting Medical Electrician and Inventor of the world-famed Electropathic Belt, may be consulted daily free of charge, personally or by letter, at the ELECTROPATHIC ESTABLISHMENT of the Medical Battery Company Limited, 52 OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W. (corner of Rathbone Place). All in search of health should call to-day if possible, or write at once. Thousands of testimonials. Note only address, as above.

STRUVE'S

BRIGHTON SELTZER WATER.

PREPARED FROM THE WORLD-RENOWNED SPRING OF THE ROYAL GERMAN SPA, BRIGHTON,

And supplied uninterruptedly to Royalty by Royal Warrant of His late Majesty King William IV. and H.M. the Queen-Empress Victoria.

OF ALL CHEMISTS AND WINE MERCHANTS THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY. Carriage Paid on Six Dozen and upwards.

ROYAL GERMAN SPA, BRIGHTON.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.—Sold by all Stationers throughout the World.

BOOKS, &c.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly, London. All the New and Standard Books, Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c. Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates per annum, paid in advance.

Any part of the United Kingdom	£1 8 2
India and China	1 12 6
Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt and America	1 10 6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s. allowed off NEW BOOKS. Catalogues of New Surplus and Second-hand Books, on application. A Special Catalogue of Bundles ... Books at greatly reduced prices.

JOHN BUMPUS, BOOKSELLER TO HER MAJESTY, 350 Oxford Street, London.

AUTOGRAPH LETTERS and HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS. NEW ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE, post free Six Stamps. Comprising interesting ... of the Stuart Family ... Essex (Holograph MSS.) ... Oliver Cromwell ... James II. (Autograph MSS.) Charles I. ... Addison, Pope, Butler, David Hume, Charlotte Bronte ... Original Sketches, Sir Walter Scott (Original MSS.) ... Carlyle MSS. French Revolution ... Unpublished Sonnet) Thomas De Quincey MSS. ... Mrs. Hemans MS. ... Unpublished and several hundred Autograph Letters ... Rare Autograph Letters purchased.

E. J. DAVEY, St. Thomas's Buildings, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

One Penny, of all Newsagents. Specimen Copy 1½d. post free.

AMATEUR GARDENING for TOWN and COUNTRY. COLOURED PLATE GIVEN AWAY with every Number (Border Carnation, May 12) One Penny.

Office: 148 and 149 Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

THE HENRY IRVING SHAKESPEARE.

NOTICE.—The Third Volume of THE HENRY IRVING SHAKESPEARE, Edited by Henry Irving and Frank A. Marshall, and Illustrated by Gordon Browne, price 10s. 6d., will be published on Wednesday, the 30th inst.

LONDON: BLACKIE & SON, 49 AND 50 OLD BAILEY.

MRS. E. M. FIELD'S NEW WORK.

NOTICE.—The Second Edition of "ETHNE" is now ready, and to be had at all the Libraries, crown 8vo. cloth boards, 6s., with Etched Title and Frontispiece.

"Without exaggeration one of the most beautiful tales of ancient Irish life that has ever come under our notice. The character of Ethne is a masterpiece."—Dublin Opinion.

"A very attractive and interesting book ... Delightfully fresh and picturesque."—Guardian.

LONDON: GARDNER, DARTON, & CO., PATERNOSTER BUILDINGS.

A STORY OF ENGLISH COUNTRY LIFE.

At all Libraries, 1 vol. 7s. 6d.

NEWTON DOGVANE.

By FRANCIS FRANCIS, Author of "A Book on Angling" &c.

WITH ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS BY JOHN LEECH, COLOURED BY HAND.

LONDON: SPENCER BLACKETT (Successor to J. & R. MAXWELL), 35 ST. BRIDE STREET, E.C.

This day is published, royal 4to. price £3 3s.; coloured, £6 6s.

WITH SIXTY-EIGHT FULL-PAGE ILLUSTRATIONS

THE ORDERS OF CHIVALRY.

From the Original Statutes of the various Orders of Knighthood and other Sources of Information.

By Major J. H. LAURENCE-ARCHER, Formerly 60th King's Royal Rifle Corps.

LONDON: W. H. ALLEN & CO., 13 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S LIST.

NOW READY, THE FOURTH EDITION OF

MR. AND MRS. BANCROFT ON AND OFF THE STAGE.

2 vols. demy 8vo. 30s.

"No brighter or more entertaining book than 'Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft On and Off the Stage' has been published for several seasons. Mr. Yates' 'Reminiscences,' and Mr. Frith's, have spoiled the public for all but the best work in this department of literature, but this book of Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft is well worthy of a place with those masterpieces of modern gossip. The book, from beginning to end, is full of interest and entertainment, and it is, moreover, of much serious importance as a contribution to the history of the stage during the last two decades. The story is told with modesty, good taste, and discretion. Take it altogether, the book is admirable. Every one who cares at all for the stage will read it, and no one who begins it will put it down until the last page is turned."—Graphic.

Just ready, 1 vol. crown 8vo. red cloth, 3s. 6d.

LORD OAKBURN'S DAUGHTERS.

By Mrs. HENRY WOOD.

Forming the Fifth Volume of the New and Cheaper Edition of that Author's Works, now appearing in uniform style and price at monthly intervals.

NEW WORKS OF FICTION.

NOW READY.

THE ACADEMICIAN.

By HENRY ERROLL,
Author of "An Ugly Duckling" &c.

3 vols. crown 8vo.

"It is long since we have had the pleasure of welcoming into the ranks of fiction an author of such exceptional promise as Henry Erroll."—Graphic.

NARKA. By KATHLEEN O'MEARA, Author of "The Old House in Picardy" &c. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

LOYALTY GEORGE. By Mrs. PARR, Author of "Adam and Eve" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.
"An interesting story from beginning to end, told in a natural and simple way. ....Glimpses of green, peaceful coast scenery, not too frequent to hide the figures and not too scarce for the pictures to lack local colour, are everywhere interwoven in this delightful book, which has throughout a freshness as of the breezy air on the coast of Devonshire."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE PARTING of the WAYS. By Miss M. BETHAM-EDWARDS, Author of "Kitty" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.
"The very laudable object of this novel is to amuse the reader..... The writing is lively, the conversations are clever, and there is a sparkle of good spirits as well as originality throughout."—Murray's Magazine.

JOAN VELLACOT. By ESMÉ STUART, Author of "Muriel's Marriage" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.
PUBLISHERS IN ORDINARY TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S NEW BOOKS.

A CLOUD on ST. ANGELO. A Novel. By CYRIL BENNETT, Author of "The Massage Case." 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth.
"The book, which shows considerable power of narration as well as of character delineation, will be found entertaining and pleasant to read."—Scottish Leader.

NATURAL CAUSATION. An Essay in Four Parts. By C. E. PLUMPTRE, Author of "General Sketch of the History of Pantheism" &c. Demy 8vo. cloth. [Now ready.

THE GERMAN EMPEROR and EMPRESS: FREDERICK III. and VICTORIA: the Story of their Lives. Being the Sixth and Popular Edition of "Two Royal Lives." By DOROTHEA ROBERTS. Crown 8vo. with Portraits, cloth, 2s. 6d.
"A book sure to be popular in domestic circles .....The book, we should imagine, gives a just idea of the character of the two exalted personages whose public and private life supply mainly its material."—Graphic.

JEWISH PORTRAITS. By Lady MAGNUS, Author of "Outlines of Jewish History" &c. Small crown 8vo. with Illustration by Harry Furniss, cloth, 5s.

LONDON: T. FISHER UNWIN, 26 PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

This day, with 2 Portraits, 8vo. 15s.

MEMOIR of GEORGE EDMUND STREET, R.A., ARCHITECT. By his Son, ARTHUR EDMUND STREET.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET.

Revised Edition, pp. 324, bound 1s., or 12 stamps.

HOMŒOPATHIC FAMILY INSTRUCTOR. By Drs. R. and W. EPPS. Describes fully and prescribes for general diseases.
London: JAMES EPPS & CO., 48 Threadneedle Street, and 170 Piccadilly.

HURST & BLACKETT'S NEW NOVELS.

ALL ELSE of NO AVAIL. By BEN HAYWARD. 3 vols.

THE WEB of FATE: a Dramatic Story. By W. J. WILDING. 2 vols.

IN WHITE and GOLD: a Story. By Mrs. F. H. WILLIAMSON. 3 vols.

JOY COMETH in the MORNING: a Country Tale. By ALGERNON GISSING. 2 vols.

BERNARD and MARCIA: a Story of Middle Age. By ELIZABETH GLAISTER. 3 vols.

A WILY WIDOW. By HENRY CRESSWELL, Author of "A Modern Greek Heroine" &c. 3 vols.

LONDON: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS:
FROM ONE GUINEA PER ANNUM.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS
FROM TWO GUINEAS PER ANNUM.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY:
For Books exchangeable by the Library Messengers,
FROM TWO GUINEAS PER ANNUM.

ALL THE BEST AND MOST POPULAR BOOKS OF THE SEASON ARE IN CIRCULATION AT MUDIE'S LIBRARY.

MUDIE'S CLEARANCE LIST contains many thousand Volumes of Standard and other Works withdrawn from circulation, and now offered for Sale at Greatly Reduced Prices.

Prospectuses and Clearance Lists sent postage free on application.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LIMITED,
30 TO 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.

BRANCH OFFICES:
281 REGENT STREET, AND 2 KING STREET, CHEAPSIDE

BAEDEKER'S TOURISTS' GUIDE-BOOKS.

Illustrated with NUMEROUS MAPS, PLANS, PANORAMAS, and VIEWS. 12mo. cloth.
GREAT BRITAIN 10s.—LONDON AND ITS ENVIRONS. 6s.—BELGIUM AND HOLLAND. 6s.—THE RHINE. 6s.—NORTHERN GERMANY. 7s.—SOUTHERN GERMANY, AUSTRIA, HUNGARY, AND TRANSYLVANIA. 7s.—THE EASTERN ALPS. 6s.—NORTHERN ITALY. 6s.—CENTRAL ITALY AND ROME. 6s.—SOUTHERN ITALY AND SICILY. 6s.—NORWAY AND SWEDEN. 9s.—PARIS AND ITS ENVIRONS. 6s.—SWITZERLAND. 7s.—LOWER EGYPT. 16s.—PALESTINE AND SYRIA. 20s.—THE TRAVELLER'S MANUAL OF CONVERSATION IN ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, AND ITALIAN. 3s.
The above post free. Detailed Lists on application.
DULAU & CO., 37 SOHO SQUARE.

GRAHAM and ASHBEE.—TRAVELS in TUNISIA. 8vo. with Map and Plates, some coloured, cloth. 25s.
"One of the best of modern books—a notable exception to the average literature relating to the Beylik—beautifully illustrated."—Athenæum.

MADEIRA; its Climate and Scenery. A Handbook for Invalids and other Visitors. With Chapters on the Fauna, Flora, Geology, and Meteorology. By JAMES YATE JOHNSON. With Plan and Maps. Third Edition. 7s. 6d.

THE THOROUGH GUIDE SERIES.

Illustrated with numerous Maps and Plans. 12mo. cloth.
By M. J. B. BADDELEY, B.A., and C. S. WARD, M.A. Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.
THE ENGLISH LAKE DISTRICT. 5s.—SCOTLAND, Part I. ("The Highlands"). 7s.—SCOTLAND, Part II. ("Northern Highlands"). 3s. 6d.—SCOTLAND, Part III. ("The Lowlands"). 4s.—NORTH DEVON AND NORTH CORNWALL. 3s. 6d.—SOUTH DEVON AND SOUTH CORNWALL. 4s.—THE PEAK DISTRICT. 2s. 6d.—THE EASTERN COUNTIES. 3s. 6d.—NORTH WALES. 5s.—SOUTH WALES. 3s. 6d.—IRELAND, Part I. ("Northern Counties"). 4s.—ORKNEY AND SHETLAND. 1s. 6d.
The above post free. Detailed List on application.
DULAU & CO., 37 SOHO SQUARE.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW.—The following NUMBERS of THE SATURDAY REVIEW are required, for which 1s. each will be given, viz.: 1, 2, 15, 25, 56, 59, 74, 75, 138, 174, 181, 482, 766, 778, and 1190 (clean copies)—at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

A NEW BOOK BY MR. HENRY JAMES.

PARTIAL PORTRAITS. By HENRY JAMES, Author of "The Europeans," "French Poets and Novelists," &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

SECOND AND CHEAPER EDITION.

THE MAKERS of VENICE: Doges, Conquerors, Painters, and Men of Letters. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of "The Makers of Florence" &c. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

Blackwood's Magazine says:—"Mrs. Oliphant's hand has not lost its cunning. 'The Makers of Venice' is even more delightful than 'The Makers of Florence.' The writing is bright and animated, the research thorough, the presentation of Venetian life brilliantly vivid. It is an entirely workmanlike piece of work by an artist who knows how to mix the colours on her palette to the best advantage, and by a story-teller who can translate the lay figures of the past into real men and women........We are grateful to Mrs. Oliphant for this very charming and instructive volume."

UNIFORM WITH AND COMPLETING MR. AINGER'S EDITION OF LAMB'S WORKS.

LETTERS of CHARLES LAMB. Newly arranged, with Additions, and a New Portrait. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by the Rev. ALFRED AINGER, M.A., Canon of Bristol. 2 vols. Globe 8vo. 10s.

The Guardian says:—"We are indebted to Canon Ainger for having crowned his task—surely a labour of love—of editing Charles Lamb's works with a collection of the letters so handy in size, so well printed, so carefully arranged, and so satisfactorily annotated, that he has beguiled us into once more reading the whole delightful series from beginning to end.........We have studied Mr. Ainger's delightful work with a care which is the measure of our interest in it and of our gratitude to him for his toil."

ILLUSTRATED WITH 24 FULL-PAGE PHOTOGRAVURES.

MEMOIR of PETER DE WINT. By WALTER ARMSTRONG, B.A. Oxon., Author of "Alfred Stevens," "Scottish Painters," &c. Illustrated by 24 Photogravures from the Artist's Pictures. Super-Royal 4to. 31s. 6d.

THE RENAISSANCE: Studies in Art and Poetry. By WALTER PATER, Fellow of Brasenose College, Author of "Marius the Epicurean: his Sensations and Ideas," "Imaginary Portraits." Fourth Thousand, Revised and Enlarged. Extra Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL LIBRARIES.

BY THOMAS HARDY.

WESSEX TALES, Strange, Lively, and Commonplace. By THOMAS HARDY, Author of "The Woodlanders," "Far from the Madding Crowd," &c. 2 vols. Globe 8vo. 12s.

By W. E. NORRIS.

CHRIS. By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "My Friend Jim" &c. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 21s.

The Dublin Evening Mail says:—"'Chris' is a thoroughly interesting story......Almost every scene is painted with a delicacy of touch and perfection of finish that completely exclude any feeling of dulness."

The Scottish Leader says:—"Mr. Norris stands high in the long list of contemporary novelists by reason of his unfailing vivacity of style, his command of certain cynical humour which is almost 'Thackerayan' in quality, his wide and varied knowledge of life, and his deftness in the construction and development of a telling plot. All these qualities are more or less revealed in his latest story 'Chris.'"

BY MRS. OLIPHANT.

JOYCE. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of "Sir Tom," "Hester," "A Country Gentleman." "The Second Son," &c. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

The Globe says:—"'Joyce' differs from many recent novels, not only in exhibiting exceptional knowledge of human nature, but in unusual powers of depicting it."

The Scotsman says:—"There are many strongly dramatic incidents in 'Joyce,' and most of the characters are firmly delineated.. .....Of the characters whom Mrs. Oliphant introduces, the farm labourer and his wife who 'reared' Joyce must take the first place. They are at once humorous and pathetic. Colonel Haywood will bring Colonel Newcombe to the remembrance of most readers........'Joyce' will be found entertaining and profitable."

BY J. HENRY SHORTHOUSE.

A TEACHER of the VIOLIN; and other Tales. By J. H. SHORTHOUSE, Author of "John Inglesant," "Sir Percival," "The Little Schoolmaster Mark," &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

The Academy says:—"The book is rich in work of a very exceptional loveliness of conception and execution, and those who in its pages make the acquaintance of Mr. Shorthouse for the first time are people to be envied."

NEW EDITIONS OF POPULAR NOVELS.

SIX-SHILLING NOVELS. BY F. MARION CRAWFORD.

MARZIO'S CRUCIFIX. By F. MARION CRAWFORD, Author of "Mr. Isaacs," "Dr. Claudius," "Zoroaster," &c. Crown 8vo 6s.

The Guardian says:—"Like all Mr. Crawford's novels, 'Marzio's Crucifix' is full of good things well said, sound observations on life and character, so lightly and gracefully turned that one does not immediately realize what homely well-worn truths they embody."

PAUL PATOFF. By F. MARION CRAWFORD, Crown 8vo. 6s.

The Saturday Review says:—"Altogether 'Paul Patoff' is one of the freshest and most original books that have been published for some time."

The Spectator says:—"The reader will be repaid by finding a really surprising amount of able and suggestive writing."

TWO-SHILLING NOVELS. BY MRS. OLIPHANT.

THE SECOND SON.

The Morning Post says:—"Mrs. Oliphant has never shown herself more completely mistress of her art than in this story......It is clever and powerful."

SIR TOM.

The Saturday Review says:—"The story is told with uncommon power and consistency. Mrs. Oliphant in parts has seldom surpassed it in humour and pathos."

HESTER.

The Academy says:—"Mrs. Oliphant at her best is with one or two exceptions the best of English novelists. She is at her best in 'Hester.'"

A COUNTRY GENTLEMAN.

The Guardian says:—"The best English character-novel that has appeared since death cut short the series of George Eliot's mighty works. It is written in Mrs. Oliphant's best style."

THE WIZARD'S SON.

The Morning Post says:—"This is assuredly the most original of Mrs. Oliphant's works."

The Academy says:—"Very enjoyable......Mrs. Oliphant has never given us anything better than her picture of the little town of Sloebury."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "HOGAN M.P."

ISMAY'S CHILDREN. By the Author of "Flitters, Tatters, and the Counsellor," "Hogan M.P.," "The Hon. Miss Ferrard," &c.

The Times says:—"Another novel from the pen of the author of 'Hogan M.P.' and one which can have nothing but commendation........The series of pictures which it comprises of Irish life and character is full of beauty, humour, and pathos."

The Athenæum says:—"No one who is anxious to fathom the enigma of the Irish character will be deterred......from the careful study of what we have no hesitation in pronouncing to be the most valuable and dispassionate contribution towards the solution of that problem which has been put forth in this generation in the domain of fiction......So remarkable and powerful a novel as 'Ismay's Children.'"

BY HUGH CONWAY, AUTHOR OF "CALLED BACK."

A FAMILY AFFAIR.

The Athenæum says:—"One of the best of recent novels."

The Spectator says:—"A novel of very great attractiveness."

LIVING OR DEAD?

The Morning Post says:—"The tale is one of absorbing and romantic interest."

The Scotsman says:—"There is never any dulness in it."

BY D. CHRISTIE MURRAY.

AUNT RACHEL. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY, Author of "Joseph's Coat" &c.

The Guardian says:—"The story is told in Mr. Christie Murray's best manner; our readers will scarcely need to be informed how good that manner is."

BY W. E. NORRIS.

MY FRIEND JIM. By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "Matrimony," "No New Thing," "Chris," &c.

The Times says:—"The story abounds in quiet strokes of humour and touches of human nature."

The Spectator says:—"Mr. Norris is an exceedingly clever writer, and 'My Friend Jim' is an exceedingly clever book, even for him."

PLATO.—LACHES. Edited, with Introduction and Notes by M. T. TATHAM, M.A., Balliol College, Oxford; formerly Assistant-Master at Westminster School. Fcp. 8vo. 2s. 6d. (Classical Series.)

ARISTOTLE.—The POLITICS. Translated, with Analysis and Critical Notes. By J. E. C. WELLDON, M.A., Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and Head-Master of Harrow. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

MACMILLAN & CO., BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Printed by SPOTTISWOODE & CO., at No. 5 New-street Square, in the Parish of St. Bride, in the City of London; and Published by WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, No. 38 Southampton Street, Strand, in the Parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, in the County of Middlesex.—Saturday, May 12, 1888.

THE

SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,699, Vol. 65. May 19, 1888. [Registered for Transmission abroad.] Price 6d.

THE ENEMIES OF ENGLAND.

As Sir Charles Dilke and other authorities have made up their minds that a Franco-Russian coalition against England is only a question of time, and that it would go hard with us if that coalition should come about, it is, we suppose, desirable to consider the case. What the result of the consideration from one point at least must be is scarcely doubtful, and little or nothing need be said about it here. It certainly will not do for England to be unprepared; but, then, that is nothing new, and is no more the moral of to-day than of any day in the course of centuries, past, present, and to come. If the rich man is not also a strong man, if he is not armed, and does not keep his goods, those goods will pretty certainly be spoiled, and if the spoiler is not one person or Power, it will be another. The weakest points of the Empire are perfectly well known both to Englishmen and to their probable enemies. As for the immediate agents of the proposed cutting up of the British Empire, we do not know that they are very well chosen. Both Powers would, no doubt, be very glad to do themselves a good turn at the expense of England; that is undoubted. And it is equally undoubted that they have fewer causes of quarrel with each other (save and except the awkwardness of a partnership between the chief European Republic and the chief European despotism) than any other two. But we have pointed out before, and may fairly point out again, that they would find some difficulty in working together, and that the risk run by the Western member of the partnership would be so out of all proportion to the risk run by the Eastern as to give pause to any but the most harebrained French Government. Yet again, that matter of the cutting up which has been just referred to would be anything but easily arranged; and there is more than one Power which has the most vital interest in preventing at all hazards that turning of the Mediterranean into a French lake which is almost the only way in which France could reap her share of the plunder. And the supposition that any Power, whether directly interested or not, would regard with indifference a proceeding which, if successful on the aggressors' part, would put the whole of Europe at those aggressors' mercy, is a little fanciful. We can count on no one's good will; for, in the first place, it would be a little difficult to find any Power which has real good-will towards England, and, in the second, good-will counts in any case for next to nothing in politics. But interest counts for everything; and if Germany, and Austria, and Italy, not to mention Spain and the smaller Powers, were to look quietly on while Russia and France reduced England to nonentity, the statesmen and the people of these countries would very amply deserve the consequences which would pretty assuredly follow. Last of all, preposterous as the suggestion may seem, and though it is no doubt possible to imagine a ruinous coalition against Great Britain, we are by no means certain that England could not give a fair account of France and Russia. There might be very unpleasant experiences first, both at home and abroad, and it might be necessary to encourage the others, as in the case of Byng, if not (which Heaven forbid!) as in the case of De Witt. But it is not wholly insane to ask whether the Australian colonies could not with some imperial aid cope with the French and the Russians in the Pacific; and the whole energies of the Indian Government are now bent on putting India in a condition to fight her own battle. Moreover, it is sometimes forgotten that France is not entirely destitute of trade, and that the Customs regulations of the Continent are not exactly favourable to the restriction of that trade to land routes.

The present purpose, however, is to deal, not with France, but with Russia. Even the alarmist must admit that Russia is likely to begin in Asia, not in Europe; and indeed it is obviously impossible that she should do anything else, considering that, by hypothesis, she is not to do anything to offend or alarm the Great Powers of Central Europe. A day or two ago scaremongers were nearly certain that the thing had begun already in the shape of a movement among the tribes between Penjdeh and Herat. Later advices seem to show that the particular incident was not correctly reported. But that matters very little. Everybody, except Mr. Gladstone and the (in one way or another) paid advocates of Russia knows that the Penjdeh settlement was never intended on the Russian side either to be final or to be faithfully observed. The Russian practice in such matters is quite uniform in substance, though necessarily conditioned in detail by circumstances. The beginning of the arrangements for breaking a treaty is not always made on the evening of the day on which the treaty is signed. Encroachment, disavowal; encroachment, excuse; encroachment, maintenance and improvement of ditto, succeed in pretty regular order, but with no pedantic insistence on regular intervals. Without being further in the confidence either of the enterprising Alikhanoff or of his superiors than any Englishman can, we suspect, pretend to be, it would be impossible to foretell the times and the seasons of each step. But we should be disposed to lean rather to the side which it seems the Russian General Soboleff has recently taken in a review article than to that which Sir Charles Dilke seems to affect. The heart of the Czar appears to be considerably more set upon Bulgaria than upon Afghanistan, and there is no doubt that the plan advocated by a considerable portion of Russian opinion, of using Central Asia as a lever to keep England quiet in the Balkans, is a sufficiently obvious, and might with weak English rulers be a not wholly ineffective, plan. On the other hand, a fresh raising of the Central Asian question per se, unless the offensive and defensive arrangement with France were an established fact, would be a very dubious proceeding for Russia. For we suppose there is no Englishman so craven or so ill-informed that he thinks this country unable to meet Russia by herself, disabled from attacking Turkey for fear of European complications, and driven to do what she could with Persia instead.

The most interesting and reasonable part of the recent rumours, indeed, has a good deal to do with Persia—a country which, as every one at all acquainted with Eastern affairs must be aware, is almost necessarily destined to be the scene of affairs of great importance before long. As personal questions have great weight in the East, it is by no means improbable that the reported Russian uneasiness at the appointment of Sir H. Drummond-Wolff to Teheran is real. Sir Henry has not hitherto been an entirely fortunate diplomatist, and we have frequently spoken our own opinion about his famous floating mission to the Porte. But he has shown ability of precisely the kind which Russia is most afraid of, and which Orientals respect most; he is thoroughly at home in the East; and he is known not to be the kind of person who will contentedly play that second fiddle which for some years has been the appointed instrument of Her Majesty's representative with the Shah. Now it has long been the ambition, and has sometimes been not far from being the good hap, of Russia to play towards Persia nearly the same part as that which she used to play towards Poland before actually swallowing that country; and she would very much like to carry out the parallel in its entirety. In the way of doing this there can be no more unpleasant obstacle than an inquisitive, a determined, and an adroit English Minister at Teheran. And one of the most obvious ways of preventing such a Minister from obtaining [illegible] influence is to make the SHAH feel that Ru[illegible] unpleasant about frontier questions and so forth if she is displeased as she can be pleasant when she is pleased. But Sir H. DRUMMOND-WOLFF is not exactly the man to be frustrated by such very simple play as this, and, if well supported, he ought to be able to strengthen the British position very materially. For we have over Russia the great advantage of being notoriously guiltless of all designs on the independence even of a single Persian province, which is certainly more than can be said for the other side. England can hardly be too good friends with Persia, and in particular English agents on the Persian side of the new Perso-Russian frontier in Khorassan can hardly be too numerous, too carefully selected, and too well paid. At present we are very ill off for such, and the result is, to say nothing worse, the arrival of a great deal of false and useless information and the non-arrival of a great deal of information which would be both true and valuable.

SOUTH AFRICA.

AT the meeting which was held under the presidency of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN to hear Mr. MACKENZIE'S lecture on South African affairs there was much difference of opinion, but the Chairman expressed the conviction of all parties that some definite and vigorous course of action must be adopted. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has always been consistent in his determination to maintain the unity and greatness of the Empire. Even when he represented the advanced Radicals in Mr. GLADSTONE'S Administration, he was understood to differ from a large body of his political allies on questions of foreign policy. During his late mission to Washington he took many opportunities of protesting against schemes which tended to detach the Dominion of Canada from its allegiance to the Crown. He appears to be not less sensible of the duty of protecting English interests in South Africa, and of keeping faith with the native tribes which have acknowledged the supremacy of the Imperial Government. Even if the connexion with some of the great colonies were to be dissolved, there would still be strong reason for maintaining the existing connexion with the Cape. One of the speakers at the meeting suggested the possibility of retaining the naval station at Simon's Bay when the Cape Colony had become independent. It is undoubtedly necessary to secure an alternative route to the East in the not improbable contingency of the interruption of the passage by the Suez Canal; but there is a wide difference between the occupation of an isolated fortress and the unquestioned possession of the country to which it geographically belongs. The jealousies which arise from the English tenure of Gibraltar are sufficiently troublesome. It is not desirable to reproduce the same relations in the Southern hemisphere. The emancipated colony, or, perhaps, some more powerful claimant, would learn to regard as intruders the fleets and garrisons which might survive the English sovereignty, and, as in the case of Gibraltar, the presence of foreign forces would be deemed an encroachment on local rights. If the position were once abandoned or lost, no plausible demand could be preferred for the restitution of an outlying and distant post. As long as the port and its defences are parts of an acknowledged dependency of England they will naturally share the fortunes of the territory in which they are situated.

Mr. MACKENZIE and some of the speakers who discussed his lecture hold that the offices of Governor of the Cape and High Commissioner for the affairs of South Africa ought not to be held by the same person. The ability and experience of Sir HERCULES ROBINSON are generally admitted, but some of his subordinate officers have strongly disapproved of parts of his policy, and it has been thought that deference to a responsible Ministry in the Cape Colony is inconsistent with the independence of the representative in the neighbouring territories of the Imperial Government. The measures of Mr. MACKENZIE and Sir CHARLES WARREN, who attended the meeting, have been overruled by the HIGH COMMISSIONER, and they still, as might be expected, dissent from his policy. The home Government is not likely to restrict his authority during his term of office, but possibly the experiment of a separation of offices may be tried when a successor is appointed. The Cape Parliament makes no claim to control over dominions in which colonial interests are not involved; but it must often be difficult to distinguish between the rights of the Imperial Government and the measures which directly or indirectly affect the colony. The most urgent question which at present awaits decision concerns English and colonial traders almost equally. There is a serious risk that access to the interior may be barred by the intervention of other European Powers. The Portuguese Government has advanced a claim to a tract of land extending from the Eastern to the Western coast. If the pretension is established, nearly the whole continent of Africa will be closed to English trade. A still more formidable, though less immediate, cause of anxiety arises from the recent policy of the German Empire. The settlements on the Western coast which were made a few years ago seem to have been injudiciously chosen, and although commercial factories and military posts may be here and there established, no German colony has been founded in any part of Africa where Europeans can thrive as colonists. The lands south of the Zambesi would be more desirable, and there is reason to fear that large tracts might be acquired if the Dutch Republics were, through jealousy of England, tempted to invite or accept a German Protectorate.

It may be hoped that neither the Colonial Office nor the HIGH COMMISSIONER will encourage a domestic agitation which coincides in time with the pressure of many external difficulties. It has been seriously proposed to make Natal a self-governing colony. The concession of Ministerial responsibility has succeeded fairly in many homogeneous populations of English extraction. It has, in fact, served as a provisional arrangement, which has postponed, perhaps for an indefinite time, the assertion of independence. It is useless to inquire whether a compromise which could not be withheld was in itself intrinsically desirable. Parliamentary government is utterly unsuitable to communities in which a minority of superior race lives among a half-civilized and more numerous population. Mr. FROUDE illustrates in his work on the West Indies the tendencies and results of representative institutions when negroes or other inferior races are either admitted to a share in the exercise of political power or excluded from the enjoyment of equal rights. The Americans have, with their usual energy, furnished the best solution of the difficulty by granting votes to the emancipated negroes of the Southern States, while the whites contrive to reserve all power to themselves. It would not be easy to apply the same practice to Natal. In that colony twenty thousand colonists of European extraction live in the midst of four hundred thousand Zulus. It is a proof of the good sense and ability of successive Lieutenant-Governors and of the natural docility of the natives that there have never been serious disturbances or quarrels between the two races. Even at the time of the Zulu War the coloured inhabitants of Natal were quiet; and, as long as they are protected by the authorities of the Crown Colony, there is no reason to apprehend native disaffection. It is hoped that their more warlike kinsmen in Zululand will follow their example now that they have at last been assured of English protection.

In a Natal Parliament either the natives must be allowed to vote or they must be totally excluded from the franchise. It is unnecessary to dilate on the absurdity of giving the coloured majority absolute power over the colonists. The alternative of a supreme white oligarchy is only a little less objectionable. The continuance of the present form of government is indispensable to the interests of all parties, unless, indeed, the powers of the Council were still further restricted. The recently annexed portions of Zululand are to be governed in the native fashion, under the supervision of an English Resident. It would be intolerable that the subject tribes should witness the spectacle of a little Parliament on the other side of the border. Those who best understand the condition and the history of South Africa are by no means unanimous in their opinion on the expediency of the hasty concession of responsible government to the Cape. At this time the whole white population amounts to a quarter of a million, and the number of natives and Europeans in the whole of South Africa is estimated at three millions. The Legislature of the Cape has wisely declined to allow the natives to possess power in proportion to their numbers. At the same time it has a right to take credit for a not illiberal method of dealing with the question. Natives who possess a moderate property qualification are allowed a vote, so that the franchise is neither dangerously extensive nor invidiously restricted. On the whole, the policy of the Cape Government with respect to the native population of the colony has been neither unwise nor ungenerous. It has now deliberately [illegible] all responsibility for the management of the tribes which are still independent. It is on this ground that the Imperial Government finds itself charged with the general control of native affairs. For many years the Zulus and other warlike races were regarded with not unreasonable apprehension. Their power is now broken, at least for the present, and the Dutch Republics are more formidable rivals. It is not improbable that the discovery of gold and diamonds may reinforce the English population within the limits of the South African Republics.

The functions which have been retained or assumed by the Imperial Government need not, except in the contingency of a serious war, involve great expense; and, if the burden were heavier, it could not be prudently declined. The trade of South Africa is worth protecting even at considerable cost, and in the present day commercial freedom disappears as soon as any civilized Power but one has taken possession of a territory. The interior of Africa has not yet advanced to the conception of prohibitive or protective tariffs. Perhaps some of them may learn from the results of the German annexation of Zanzibar the relations of modern civilization to trade. It is understood that negotiations are pending with Portugal on the subject of Delagoa Bay; but only sanguine politicians will anticipate a favourable result.

PACKING FOR THE COUNTRY.

IT will hardly, even by Mr. GLADSTONE'S most fervent devotees, be taken as an instance of anti-Gladstonian malignity if we observe that of late years Mr. GLADSTONE, when in Opposition, has not been an extraordinarily punctual or constant attendant on, or partaker in, the debates of the House of Commons. As he very justly says, he is an old man; age requires rest; and when can that rest better be taken than when on the one side an ungrateful country drives you from office, and on the other ardent and capable lieutenants—MORLEYS, TANNERS, HARCOURTS, CONYBEARES, PARNELLS, EGANS (but, no; Mr. EGAN is not yet in Parliament)—are ready to do the needful work? It is not, therefore, wicked to assume that when Mr. GLADSTONE is extraordinarily vigilant and talkative there must be some special motive, even though that motive is not apparent on the surface. On the surface no two more unlikely occasions for an ex-Prime Minister to intervene could be selected than the two occasions of Mr. GLADSTONE'S speeches on Monday and Tuesday last. The Monday performance seems—so apparently preposterous was it—to have fairly puzzled some good persons. An Irish magistrate, telling the simple truth, but not using formal legal terms, informs the SPEAKER that Mr. DILLON has been convicted of taking part in the Plan of Campaign. Of course, what he has technically been convicted of is participation in certain illegal acts which are inseparable from, and which, together and with others, make up id genus belli quod audit "the Plan of Cam-"paign," as the Holy Office classically and with exactness calls it. That the Irish members should make a fuss about this was, of course, natural; for, in the first place, it took up time; in the second, it gave an opportunity of abusing magistrates; in the third, the short announcement that a man and an M.P. has got six months for taking part in the Plan of Campaign is likely to sound uncomfortably in Irish ears. That Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT should join them was nothing; and the growing and deepening conviction which Mr. MORLEY evidently feels that it is a sin and a shame that Mr. BALFOUR should be in a place once held by worthier men may account for his aid. But Mr. GLADSTONE'S participation was a little strange. Perhaps it may be said, with more real than apparent force, that if Mr. GLADSTONE had not been Mr. GLADSTONE the thing would have been simply impossible. As it was, "homoousion" and "homoiousion" rang to ancient ears a less horrid difference than "the Plan of Campaign" and "a certain illegal conspiracy called the Plan of Campaign" do to Mr. GLADSTONE. The dreadful breach of privilege committed excluded all consideration of motive and of presumed innocence. It was one of the gravest matters on which Parliament could possibly be engaged, except (may we suggest?) the possible case of an undergraduate member of the House being reported to the Speaker as "gated," instead of "confined to college"—which is very fairly parallel. There was "no question more grave." "The "tribunals of the country were bound to respect the House," and so on, for nearly half a column of the Times. And though Mr. GLADSTONE'S speech on the other obstructive debate of Tuesday was not quite so obviously absurd, it was equally strange in itself, in its subject, and in its occasion.

But, if there is one thing that is quite certain about Mr. GLADSTONE, it is that he is not a fool. Many other things, some of them not good or nice, might be said of him, but not this. The characteristics of a fool are numerous, but for public and political purposes they may be said to be two, generally found together, though sometimes separate. The fool does not possess any clear and distinct idea of the ends which he desires to reach, and he still less possesses any clear and distinct notion of the means by which they are to be reached. In neither of these ways is Mr. GLADSTONE a fool, for his miscalculation in the Home Rule matter is human and not merely foolish. Further, Mr. GLADSTONE must have been greatly encouraged by his Nonconformist audience last week in pursuing the course which from these two speeches it is clear that he is pursuing. It was a ticklish business to address not quite four thousand ministers, present in the flesh or by their sufficient deputies, on such a theme. For, though some notorious charlatans were among them, the majority—the great majority—of the audience were men, no doubt, not very intelligent nor very well educated, but personally honest, respectable, sincere, and (as far as a burning social jealousy of the Established Church will let them be) Christian. Now Christianity, in every one of its myriad forms, except those of a few obscure heresies not now openly professed by any one, pronounces those who act upon the principles and carry on the practices of Mr. GLADSTONE'S allies in Ireland to be reprobate in this world, and punishable with the most terrible of all penalties in the next. Even a man of Mr. GLADSTONE'S courage and of Mr. GLADSTONE'S ingenuity must have felt his heart beat a little when he set to work to inveigle four thousand ministers of religion into setting their hands solemnly to the new commandments, "Thou shalt steal from thy land-"lord" and "Thou shalt murder him who takes boycotted "land." But he did it; and both the fact of his undertaking and the fact of his achieving the feat shows, when taken in connexion with these two curious speeches in the House, the lines upon which he and his are going to the country for this Parliamentary recess, and, if they can manage it, on greater occasions hereafter.

Now in order to go to the country certain luggage is required, and Mr. GLADSTONE'S way of selecting and packing up that luggage is known of old. It has never been decided by critics whether the whimsical wit of Mr. LEWIS CARROLL (who is known to be a good Tory) had Mr. GLADSTONE directly in view when drawing the personage who informed his followers, without a murmur on their part, "What I "tell you three times is true." But Mr. GLADSTONE'S method of establishing first principles is, and has long been, precisely this. It is by this that, in face of evidence of every possible kind, including the printed admissions of his Irish partisans, he has established it that the proceedings at Mitchelstown were an attack by the police on the people, and not an attack by the people on the police. It is thus that he is trying to establish something similar as to the riot at Ennis. It is thus that he has tried, though with less success, to discover in the practice of increasing sentences on appeal a new and hellish device of the Tory Government, instead of a continuation of precedents set again and again by his own administration, and now solemnly approved by a Divisional Court of exceptionally Liberal constitution. It is thus that he is basing on the KING-HARMAN appointment a charge of scandalous and unheard-of jobbery. And it is thus, no doubt, that he is laying the foundation of a fresh charge about Mr. HAMILTON'S report to the SPEAKER on the conviction of Mr. DILLON. The process is clear and easy, and the object explains the at first sight ludicrous and unintelligible solemnity of the terms used to describe a simple substitution of popular for technical language. First (that is to say, on Monday), Mr. GLADSTONE applies to this language of Mr. HAMILTON descriptions which would be not wholly inappropriate to the Arrest of the Five Members. When he next refers to it we shall without doubt find him referring, not to the fact, but to his description of the fact; and assuming, or rather laying it down, that the description answers to the thing. And next we shall find him sternly, and to all appearance justly, denouncing the perpetrators of atrocities which no doubt would be atrocious enough if they existed anywhere except in his own imagination and vocabulary. He has so far laid it down that "there is no question graver for the House of Com-"mons than the personal liberty of its members." There is a touch of rhetoric even here perhaps; for there are some things graver, such as the safety of the country at large and the protection of innocent persons from such tyranny as that of the National League. Still, it is not necessary to deny that the question is a very grave question indeed. Unluckily it does not here come in in the very slightest degree. It is not a question of the personal liberty of Mr. DILLON, the circumstances of the restriction of which are perfectly well known and are correctly conveyed to every person of ordinary intelligence by Mr. HAMILTON'S report. It is practically a question of red tape, of ribbons instead of buckles in the shoes—a question, or rather a quibble, so utterly idle and ridiculous that, except for the purpose of introducing and substituting his own unfavourable description of it, even Mr. GLADSTONE would have been ashamed to touch it. But as it is, we shall almost beyond doubt hear, for some months to come, from Mr. GLADSTONE and from all the baser sort of Gladstonians, that the House of Commons is indifferent to the personal liberty of its members, because Mr. HAMILTON has omitted the "divers, that is to say, two thousand," and the "not having the fear of GOD before his eyes, but acting "under the instigation of the Devil," in his description of the crime which Mr. DILLON has committed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

THE passage of arms between the Marquess of SALISBURY and Lord WOLSELEY ended, as the Duke of CAMBRIDGE observed, in an agreeable manner. The ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S answer to the PRIME MINISTER'S rebuke was delivered in good terms and accepted in an excellent spirit. In the familiar phrase, honours were easy. On the one hand, the ADJUTANT-GENERAL caused his speech at Sir JOHN PENDER'S dinner to look more foolish than ever, when he earnestly assured the House of Lords that, though he accused all politicians of being persons of a low morality, he had no intention of accusing HER MAJESTY'S present Ministers of being below the highest moral standard. He was, in fact, attacking the politician in the abstract, and not kicking his shins in the concrete form of Mr. STANHOPE. We are afraid that this is another way of saying that he was talking in a rather loose after-dinner way. It is not pleasant for a gentleman to be compelled to make this confession, even in the serene atmosphere of the House of Lords. On the other hand, Lord WOLSELEY had the satisfaction of extorting from the PRIME MINISTER the confession, certain to be made use of by the enemy, that he had never heard of some very important evidence given by the ADJUTANT-GENERAL to a Commission appointed by himself, which reported to his own Government. This Report has been printed, much read, and commented on—to some extent even acted on—and yet the PRIME MINISTER cannot recollect that one of its most important parts has even been brought to his ears. It was certainly somebody's business so to bring it. A pleasant dash of humour was imported into the evening's proceedings by Lord GRANVILLE, who complained that, although Lord WOLSELEY had withdrawn his accusations against the Conservatives, he still left the Liberals open to the charge of low morality. The ADJUTANT-GENERAL seems to have gone in some sort through the experience of that clergyman who, having suddenly to preach for a colleague, and having no sermon ready, fell back on a resource too little used by the cloth, and read one of the homilies. Next day he was surprised to receive the earnest assurance of a conspicuous parishioner that he had never beaten his wife. His Lordship's words have obviously fallen on many ears made tender by conscience, and hence all these vehement assurances from distinguished public men that they never neglected the defence of the country to serve a party purpose. We receive these assertions with the polite faith due to the word of English gentlemen. No doubt errors of judgment have been the cause of our failures hitherto; but what mattered it how the head lay so long as the heart was right? Now all politicians see how mistaken their heads were, and the rectitude of their hearts will at last have a chance. MARK ANTONY, in SHAKSPEARE'S play of Julius Cæsar, said things worth reading, but too well known to require quotation.

Tuesday evening's proceedings in the House of Commons were less artistic than Monday's in the Lords, and, in some respects, less profitable. Mr. SMITH, indeed, asked for and obtained two sums of money for defensive purposes; but there are several considerations which make it difficult to regard his success with any great enthusiasm. The grant for the Australian squadron is required to carry out a plan formed a year ago, which cannot be carried fully into effect for two years more. There will thus have been a period long enough to allow for two great wars, at the modern rate of speed, between the formation of the plan and its execution. This was doubtless mainly inevitable; but still it is, in its way, an example of our habit of doing things at the last moment. The second vote is a much less pardonable example of the same slovenly and unintelligent method of doing business. It is for fortifications, and is required, we can hardly say to complete, but to begin to carry towards completion, the work of supplying the arsenals and coaling stations with sufficient defences, which was begun in Lord NORTHBROOK'S time. That Minister, as all the world remembers, was driven by popular fear and anger to undertake the supply of great additions to the navy and the construction of important fortifications. Characteristically enough, the task he began under pressure is about to be carried on when it seems not unlikely that there will be another and an even fiercer clamour raised against the Conservative Ministry. How absolutely necessary it is that the work should be done is made perfectly clear by Mr. SMITH. On his own showing, not only great foreign stations such as Malta and Gibraltar are too weak, but such vital spots at home as Portsmouth are in pressing need of strengthening. It is to be given at last, but Mr. SMITH does not expect that the necessary guns will be ready for three years. During this time we shall at many points be in the unpleasant predicament of the lobster who has just wriggled out of his old shell and has not yet formed the new one. He is in an awkwardly soft state if by any chance another crustaceous beast with its nippers fully armed falls on him. Now we would wish to avoid the sin of Lord WOLSELEY, and so shall not say another word touching a connexion between Ministers and low morality. Still, it would seem that there must be something which comes between HER MAJESTY'S Ministers and the defences of the country—else how can we account for this confessed neglect? The development of modern artillery and the weakness of our fortifications were as notorious three years ago as they are now, and yet nothing serious was even attempted until panic began to threaten the Ministry. So far from arranging for the manufacture of guns, the Ministry has not even taken steps to provide that guns could be made at need. We who can manufacture for foreign navies cannot turn out guns enough for our own under a period of years.

It is somewhat unprofitable to comment as yet on the cloud of rumours which are flying about—on stories that an admiral has been asked to draw up a scheme of coast defence, that a general has been asked to make a standard of stores, that a Third Army Corps is to be organized, &c. &c. We only hope that these are not the usual swarm of more or less delusive schemes which arise whenever a Cabinet is well scared by panic. Not having the means to decide we shall suspend judgment. Of one thing, however, we are quite sure, and it is that the Conservative Ministry has at this moment an opportunity to gain itself everlasting honour and do the country service by putting the defences on a proper footing. There is absolutely no need for lengthy inquiry by any Royal Commission, and we could perfectly well dispense with the body which is to be appointed during the Whitsun holidays to inquire at large again. The Intelligence Departments of either service could easily make an estimate of what is required to complete our supply of weapons of all kinds, and could draw up a scheme for their proper use. Our want at this moment is far less want of men than want of arms for them and want of organization. The country would most assuredly grant all the money needed, and would not care a straw whether it was obtained by way of loan or even out of the Sinking Fund, or in any other manner horrifying to pedantic financiers, who think their nostrums more sacred than the safety of the country. All it requires is that it should be told the truth honestly and asked for supply by trustworthy persons. If there is no ground for fear, then the Ministry can prove there is none; if there is, it can point that ground out. Let it come forward, make its demand, and defy folly in the House of Commons. The country is so ready to meet it halfway that even Lord RANDOLPH has discovered that he never wanted to cut down the Estimates. But in the absence of authoritative leading from those who ought to govern, it is not wonderful that the country is beginning to listen to shrieking alarmists, and we may again see the usual panic quieted by the usual ill-digested measures and followed by the usual reaction of indifference and contempt. The alarmists are at present in full cry, declaring that there are no men, no guns, no ships, no nothing. They have their hearing for the moment, and serious attention is paid to critics of the stamp of the egregious person who declared the other day that the sun of England is about to set for ever because the Mediterranean Squadron is not equal in time of peace to the larger half of the French fleet, which has its head-quarters at Toulon. This gabble passes for the moment; but it is soon found out, and then the whole thing is dropped in disgust, the good with the bad.

CRICKET.

THE season is very young, but has already proved that Mr. GRACE can hit, as of yore, over the Grand Stand at Lord's, and that the Australians are a strong eleven. We need not be broken-hearted because they beat Surrey so terribly by an innings and 154, for the Surrey men were clearly "less noble than themselves." MAURICE READ and LOHMANN (who did better than most) had just come off a voyage, and it is of old experience that "nothing mars a "man like the sea." Mr. W. W. READ was manifestly not in practice, and he was twice leg before wicket, both times to the bowling of Mr. TURNER. LOHMANN hurt a toe-nail, could not bowl after the accident, and had a man to run for him. Both he and MAURICE READ made some capital hits in the second innings, and it was a great pity that READ ran himself out. LOHMANN's fall came in a peculiar manner. He was being bowled to by Mr. TROTT, who is slow, with a very great and manifest break from leg, something like Mr. NEPEAN'S. This kind of bowling is often very effective, though good bats soon learn all the tricks of it. One of Mr. TROTT's tricks was to bowl a ball which apparently had not any break whatever, for when LOHMANN stopped it with his leg, he was not only given out, but admitted the justice of the decision. Habemus confitentem reum. No doubt the bowling of Mr. TURNER and Mr. FERRIS, with their batting, was the most remarkable feature of the match. Mr. TURNER hit uncommonly hard in his contribution of 104. If the bowlers can play such innings, one is inclined to argue, how strong the rest of the team must be. Mr. TURNER is a fast right-handed bowler; his delivery is not so high, nor his demeanour so menacing, as that of Mr. SPOFFORTH, but he has the same arts, the same curves, and occasional slow balls with a deceptive action. It was not easy, on Tuesday, to see much break on his balls from the roof of the pavilion, but there is enough; "'twill serve." Mr. FERRIS is left-handed, with a high delivery, and it appeared to us that his balls occasionally "come in with the arm" from the off to the leg side, and at other times break back very fast off the ground from leg to off. In fact he is a very dangerous bowler, as Mr. TROTT may also be; while Mr. JONES is rapid, and promptly did what was needful for the Surrey tail—no very hard task so early in the season. The learned were inclined to think that, on a fine day at Lord's, Messrs. TURNER and FERRIS would one day find themselves mastered, and that the change bowlers would prove of little avail. MAURICE READ and LOHMANN certainly showed that the chief Australians can be hit to all the boundaries, as is the manner of all bowlers upon the fruitful earth. But they had then been at work for a considerable time. We must remember, also, that on wet wickets Mr. BOYLE was wont to be very useful; and of Mr. TROTT and Mr. JONES it would be rash to hold a contemptuous opinion. Taking their batting and bowling together, Mr. TURNER and Mr. FERRIS appear very good substitutes for Mr. SPOFFORTH and Mr. GIFFEN. Mr. BANNERMAN is batting as successfully as ever; Mr. MCDONNELL has not forgotten his swashing blow; there is Mr. BLACKHAM at his old post, the wicket. It looks like a very strong Australian Eleven, and is perhaps free from some elements of internal dissension. Meanwhile Notts, after her hollow defeat of Sussex, looks very powerful. Perhaps M.C.C. has discovered a useful bowler in DAVIDSON, of Derbyshire. Mr. SIDNEY CHRISTOPHERSON has shown that he can hit, which nobody doubts; and thirty off nine strokes for Kent v. M.C.C. is "sharp work"—as Prince BULBO said when he understood that he was to fight a duel with axes for the weapons. But Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON'S bowling at Lord's does not look very much as if he would imperil Australian wickets for the Gentlemen.

Indeed, the Gentlemen this year do not seem at all dangerous antagonists. Last year they had Mr. GRACE, Mr. NEPEAN, Mr. FORSTER, Mr. ROLLER, Mr. BUCKLAND, and Mr. APPLEBY to bowl. It is said that a bowling freshman, not from one of the large schools, has arisen on the Cambridge horizon. He is certainly much needed. Mr. KEY is a tower of strength, and Mr. W. W. READ will doubtless get into practice. But the red and raving eye of imagination, when it glances down the dim future, does not see a very victorious Eleven of the Gentlemen of England.

Perhaps cricketers are not historically minded, and do not care to ascend the stream of time much beyond their own recollections. For others Messrs. SWAN SONNENSCHEIN, LOWREY, & Co. have reprinted, as Chronicles of Cricket, old NYREN's delightful book, LILLYWHITE'S Handbook of Cricket, and Mr. DENISON'S Sketches of the Players, which contains the documents of the early controversy about round-hand bowling. NYREN'S work has long been rare, and, like other rare books, hath a habit of escaping from its owner's custody. It is not every one who, like THOMAS A KEMPIS, can recall his lost books by miracle. Never was a better nor more pleasant book about cricket written, the tone of the Reminiscences is so honest, kindly, and unaffected. Most players know it only by extracts; we advise them all to read it, now it is within everybody's reach, and to play the game in the spirit of SMALL, DAVID HARRIS, and the other manly heroes of Broadhalfpenny. Mr. DENISON'S little book is not so rare but that five shillings will purchase it, or LOVE'S much older Heroick Poem, in the open market. But they do not often appear there, and when you have got them they take to themselves wings, like all things fair and fleet, going where the dead roses go. Consequently the publishers have done well to reprint NYREN, DENISON, and LILLYWHITE; they might reprint LOVE too, and BELDHAM'S "Handbook," which we have never been able to obtain. Moreover, the reminiscences of old cricketers might be collected by a careful editor; a few will appear in the "Badminton" book, but no regular search has been made among veterans of 1825-1845. A very pleasant work is within the reach of diligence and taste. The pictures in the new collection are unpleasantly rude results of some "process" or other, mere blurred shadows of portraits of the tall hat and braces period. In LILLYWHITE'S little treatise are some bold remarks. He bids bowlers try to make the ball "shoot." Except by a very low delivery, which has disadvantages many, "shooters" cannot be produced of set purpose, and they are now very rare except on wild rural grounds, where anything may happen. LILLYWHITE also says, "If you have to bowl at a "batsman who is in the habit of shifting himself before his "wicket, bowl well at his legs below the knee, and, upon "hitting them, appeal immediately to the umpire at your "end, and, if the ball is pitched in a line with the wicket, "the umpire will give him out." He also says, "Practise "taking a short run to deliver your ball, you will by so "doing save yourself much unnecessary fatigue." This is not the advice of a distinguished contemporary authority—at least he recommends a pretty long run to slow bowlers. If the old Hints by a Wykhamite and Felix on the Bat were also reprinted cricketers would find them entertaining. Perhaps there is room also for a small volume of cricketing poems, though few of them are so good as Mr. PROWSE'S lines on ALFRED MYNN:—

> Said the good old Kentish farmers, with a good old Kentish grin,
> "Why there ain't a man among them as can match our Alfred Mynn."

The new edition of LILLYWHITE does not contain the portraits of Mr. MYNN, Mr. LANGDON, Mr. KYNASTON, and Mr. TAYLOR, but only of the four players, PINCH, BOX, LILLYWHITE (born 1792), and COBBETT. It concludes with advising M.C.C. to check the batters' habit of making "a hole "for placing the foot in, to the no small annoyance of their "successors, and the constant inconvenience of the bowler." A complete Cricketer's Library of Antiquities would go into very little space, and, properly illustrated, would be a pleasant possession.

THE RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC BILL.

ALTHOUGH the Railway and Canal Traffic Bill is not free from objection in its present form, the amendments which are proposed on behalf of freighters who suppose themselves to have an adverse interest would make it infinitely worse. It will be the duty of the PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE to insist on the acceptance of the terms which have been settled by the Government. It happens that in this matter no political party is interested in the protection of the vested rights which are threatened with partial confiscation. It is not true that in Parliamentary contests the Railway Companies, even when they are, as in this instance, unanimous, possess any considerable power. Almost all freighters and the majority of passengers have votes; while shareholders, though in one sense they are numerous, command comparatively few votes at elections. They cannot even trust to the sympathy and consideration of the professed champions of proprietary rights. Some of their most inveterate antagonists are county members and Conservative country gentlemen. It happened, unluckily for the Railway Companies, that in the exercise of their legal powers they came into collision with landowners and farmers. Some of their adversaries have never understood the merits of the questions in dispute, and many are more or less unconsciously biassed by the demands of their rural constituents. It is not surprising that another section of the House, which is preparing for agitation against all forms of property, should profit by a popular prejudice which is directed against great industrial bodies. It is true that, in their corporate capacity, the Companies may be called powerful and rich. The actual owners of the property are, for the most part, petty capitalists, often dependent for their livelihood on the modest investments made in reliance on the security of Parliamentary engagements. The present measure differs but little from the Bill which passed the House of Lords in the Session of 1877, though one of its most reasonable provisions was this year expunged in the same House on the proposal of Lord JERSEY. It may be hoped that Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH will not consent to the further mutilation of the scheme.

There is no question on which the Companies and their opponents differ more widely than the constitution of the tribunal to which railway disputes are to be referred. In all other kinds of litigation, except where matters of fact are submitted to a jury, or are by consent of parties referred to a non-professional arbitrator, lawyers are exclusively entrusted with the duty of interpreting legal obligations. Those who wish for unbiassed decisions by the most competent authority would place greater confidence in a judge of the High Court than in a Commission including a majority of laymen. There is not the smallest reason to suppose that a judge would be prejudiced in favour of the Companies, and on the other hand their assailants scarcely disguise their hope that lay Commissioners would be disposed to deviate from strict impartiality. The experiment of the existing Commission has been but moderately successful. One legal member out of three has not unfrequently found himself in a minority, when it is not improbable that he may have been in the right. That the Commission has never acquired the confidence of railway administrators is proved by the small number of cases with which it has dealt, yet some of its judgments affect interests of the greatest importance, and involve legal questions of great complication and difficulty. The Commissioners have habitually discouraged appeals, and their judgments would consequently have been final but for the inconvenient remedy of prohibition. By the new Bill the resort to writs of prohibition is abolished, but suitors will have the advantage of raising questions of law before the Court of Appeal. The findings of the Commission on issues of fact will be conclusive, even though the judge may have been outvoted by his colleagues. One of the lay members is to be qualified by his knowledge of trade and manufacture, and another must be familiar with railway business. They would both have been better placed as assessors of the judge. Experts are valuable as witnesses and sometimes as advisers, but they seldom possess judicial aptitude. There would be a great anomaly in the possibility that an eminent judge might be overruled by a retired manufacturer and a former railway manager. In many cases it would be difficult to separate issues of fact from strictly legal questions.

Many of the complainants still hanker after mileage rates, though they may be forced to content themselves with a more or less near approximation to a principle which is intrinsically vicious. The application of the rule would operate as a protective duty in favour of the nearest markets or places of production. No serious attempt will be made on the present occasion to prevent Durham from competing with Staffordshire or Nottinghamshire for the supply of coal to London; but the encouragement which judicious managers have afforded to struggling traders will be represented as a grievance. It is unfortunate that one result of a liberal and comprehensive policy seemed to constitute a preference in favour of certain foreign goods. The irritation which ensued was at the same time natural and unfounded, and it has largely affected current legislation. It is doubtful whether a Railway and Canal Bill would have been introduced but for the supposed preference given to foreign produce when the rates were regulated by competition with the sea. The prohibition of the unpopular practice will cause some loss to certain railways, and it will hamper the business of traders; but the Protectionists will be disappointed, as the low rates will be continued when the traffic is diverted to the sea. The precedent will be used to justify further interference with the discretion of the Companies. The changes in the law which are necessary to prevent the cheap conveyance of imported goods ought to be carefully watched. As in still more important departments of economic legislation, the consumers are not represented, though their interests, for the most part, coincide with those of the carriers who bring the commodities which they require. If they insisted on their rights, schemes for restricting competition would be regarded with suspicion and distaste. The much more objectionable attacks on the property of the Railway Companies unfortunately receive much popular support. It seems useless to remind landowners that they are destined to be the next victims of the advocates of spoliation.

A compulsory reduction of rates might not be wholly advantageous to freighters. Parliament can deprive shareholders of the rights which they have purchased; but it can scarcely compel their directors and managers to continue the unequalled accommodation which English railways have hitherto offered. There will be almost unlimited room for reduction in the speed and number of trains when some of them can no longer be run at a profit. If it is expected that the Companies can be coerced into expenditure, the anticipation will be disappointed. The Board of Trade has frequently declined to relieve railway managers of their responsibilities, and any undertaking of the kind on the part either of the Board or of the Railway Commissioners would involve a transfer of the management of the railway. The present Commission has sometimes received applications for the enforcement of agreements to run trains at specified times in pursuance of formal agreements. A judicial body may enforce a covenant, but it is incapable of regulating traffic from day to day. A diminution of the goods or passenger service could scarcely be denounced as a breach of legal duty. It has never, except in a few cases for special reasons, been the practice of Parliament to prescribe the nature or extent of accommodation to be provided by the Companies. They are almost equally unassailable on the question of undue preference. It is not a little remarkable that they have seldom been even accused of such an offence. The alleged advantage which was supposed to have been conferred on certain foreign goods might have been effectually checked if it had in reality amounted to undue preference. In other cases dissatisfied freighters have often complained rather of the light rates charged to their competitors than of their own excessive burdens. It is quite right that undue preference should be forbidden. The legal meaning of the term is defined by a long series of judicial decisions. The Railway and Canal Traffic Act will not alter the meaning of the words or affect the validity of the rule which now prevails. The law is seldom brought into operation, because railway managers have no predilections.

The new classification of goods and of rates will be necessarily referred by Parliament to an authority somewhat less incompetent than itself. The Board of Trade will have a complicated task to perform. In the whole of the kingdom there are now in force not less than fifty millions of separate rates. On the operation of these the general managers receive constant reports from the members of their staffs, and modifications are incessantly made according to results. A chief rule of railway administration is that traffic shall be charged as much as it will bear. When a rate can be neither raised nor lowered without loss to the Company, it justifies the calculation on which it rests. In the great majority of cases the rate, as it is regulated by practical experience, is below the statutable maximum. The Board of Trade will probably not attempt to destroy the elasticity of the tariff; and, as there has been no question of augmenting the legal charges, it will probably propose in many cases to reduce the legal maximum. The application of an arbitrary limit to the amount of rates will be unjust where it is not inoperative. It would be idle to protest against a Bill in which all political parties are agreed; but it is perhaps not too late to protest against further relaxations of the fundamental doctrines of justice.

A PLEA FOR THE MUZZLE.

LORD CARNARVON raised a useful discussion in the House of Lords last Monday on the subject of hydrophobia. He reminded the House in feeling terms that, since the Committee of Peers presented its report in 1887, one of their colleagues had himself fallen a victim to the disease. The death of Lord DONERAILE, his unavailing recourse to M. PASTEUR, and the consequent doubt thrown upon the soundness of that great experimentalizer's conclusions, were a nine days' wonder, which has long been forgotten by the general public. Lord DONERAILE's social position, and his reputation in Ireland as a sportsman, made his case very conspicuous. But no class is exempt from this terrible plague, and while it continues to exist in England no pains should be spared to stamp it out. The present system, or want of system, is absolutely indefensible. A year or two ago there was a marked increase of mortality from hydrophobia in London. Inquests were held, coroners made strong observations, and it was agreed that, in spite of OUIDA, something must be done. The Commissioner of Metropolitan Police issued his famous muzzling order, which was carried out, with more or less strictness, for several months. The effect was excellent. The death-rate went down, the value of muzzles went up, and the nervous citizen began once more to feel secure. Then, of course, the cry of the canine sentimentalist arose, and prevailed. It was represented as wanton cruelty to muzzle dogs for the sake of protecting themselves as well as mankind from the ravages of a deadly complaint. Sir CHARLES WARREN withdrew the order, and things relapsed into their ancient state. The legal maxim that every dog must be allowed his first bite has been extended so as to give him the practical opportunity as well as the theoretical privilege. The Lords Committee, which took the best medical and scientific evidence, arrived without hesitation at the conclusion that rabies cannot be spontaneously generated in a dog. It must be communicated from another animal, and communicated by means of a bite. This fact not only reduces the question within narrow limits, but also points very plainly to the means of prevention, which in this case would certainly be better than cure, if cure were not unhappily impossible. If muzzling could be enforced with absolute stringency for a very short time, rabies in dogs and hydrophobia in men would cease to exist. They would become as extinct as the sweating sickness and the black death.

Of course, it is not sufficient to make the use of muzzles compulsory in London. The introduction of a single mad dog from the country might destroy the effect of a year's metropolitan muzzling. The law would have to be rigidly applied in every part of the United Kingdom without regard to local pressure or prejudice. The PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL, in his very unsatisfactory reply to Lord CARNARVON, referred to the probable action of County Councils under Mr. RITCHIE'S Bill. But that is not enough. If all the counties in England except one adopted precautions, the one might do more harm than the rest would do good. There is already, as Lord CRANBROOK explained, power under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act for local authorities to make regulations. Some have made them, many have not. It must be admitted that Lord CRANBROOK'S instances of successful extirpation are too few and too small to be very encouraging. The island of Réunion and a single district of Prussia are all the examples which the researches of the Privy Council can supply. But what the public would like to know is whether, in any circumstances, stringent measures have failed after an appreciable period of trial. The objection of cruelty to the dogs themselves is, as has often been shown, utterly preposterous. A wire muzzle is no more oppressive than a black coat in July, and far less so than a tall hat in August. If an intelligent dog were asked whether he would wear a muzzle or run the risk of catching rabies, there cannot be much doubt what his answer would be. Moreover, as we have said, the infliction, such as it is, would only be temporary. The extirpation of rabies, which would almost certainly follow it, would of course do away with its future necessity. The arguments for the muzzle are even stronger than the arguments for vaccination, being practically undisputed by competent judges. But, if any good is to be done, the Government must act, and must introduce a general measure. Lord CRANBROOK is the mouthpiece of permanent officers at the Privy Council, who are accustomed to regard the functions of a central department as severely restricted. The principle is, as a rule, sound. But there are exceptions to it, and one of them is the rational treatment of a preventible disease. It would even be necessary to stop unmuzzled dogs at the Custom House on their arrival from abroad if assurance is to be made double sure.

MR. BALFOUR AND LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.

WE are afraid that the Nonconformist ministers who presented Mr. GLADSTONE with their address of congratulation—or was it condolence?—the other day at the Memorial Hall, have minds not very accessible to any evidence, however powerful, which may tend to impugn the character or proceedings of their hero. Otherwise we might suppose that Mr. BALFOUR'S absolutely crushing reply at Battersea to Mr. GLADSTONE'S speech on the aforesaid occasion would surely make some of them a little uncomfortable. We will, at any rate, ask them—for though we have no sympathy with him that loveth and believeth a lie, we do not like to see a lie believed in by men who are much too respectable to love it—we will ask them, we say, to consider the legend of Mr. GLADSTONE'S political virtue and moral nobility of character by the light, not of any argumentative process, however plausible or even to most other men convincing, but of the following plain, hard, easily verifiable, absolutely unassailable facts. Mr. BALFOUR'S speech occupies nearly three columns of the Times. Almost the whole of it—and it does not, so far as we can see, contain a superfluous word—is taken up with the detailed refutation of injurious charges brought by Mr. GLADSTONE against the Irish Executive or its officers; and in every one of these cases, without exception, Mr. BALFOUR shows—on the testimony either of official records or of authorities favourable to the accuser himself, or of eye-witnesses to the facts to which they speak, and whose statements, if incorrect, could be contradicted by hundreds of other spectators—that Mr. GLADSTONE has been guilty of the grossest and most unworthy slander. He has alleged that "lads and poor men" have been imprisoned in Ireland for selling copies of newspapers of the contents of which they were ignorant. The records of their prosecution under the Crimes Act will show that a guilty knowledge was proved against them in every instance. He has alleged that the Crimes Act has been used not against crime, but against legitimate combination. Again, the records will show that the only combinations which have been struck at are conspiracies to boycott and conspiracies to carry out the Plan of Campaign, combinations which Mr. GLADSTONE does not dare to describe as either legal or moral, and the latter of which even Mr. PARNELL declines to defend. Mr. GLADSTONE asserted at the Memorial Hall that the crowd at Mitchelstown were attacked "under a pretence of a riot which was not a riot." A witness so favourable to him as the Freeman's Journal states distinctly that the mob "gave a wild exulting cheer, "and burst after the police"; that the rioters who were not really rioters "kicked at least a dozen police helmets "before them like footballs," and that "one poor creature "in uniform, who appeared to be internally injured, was left "to crawl alone to the barracks under a shower of stones "and blows" from the peaceful crowd. Mr. GLADSTONE told the Nonconformist ministers that cavalry were sent by the orders of Colonel TURNER into the courtyard at Ennis to ride down the people assembled there. Colonel TURNER has stated, and no one has ventured to contradict him, that no single cavalry soldier penetrated into the yard at all, and that, of the two soldiers who got as far as the archway, one was a trooper advancing against orders, and the other his officer springing forward to check him. Mr. GLADSTONE denounced the Government for "evading and "nullifying" the power of appeal under the Crimes Act by the "mean, dishonourable, and discreditable trick of pro-"curing cumulative sentences," and declared that, in the solitary instance of such a thing happening in his own time, it happened without the knowledge of Lord SPENCER, Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN, or himself. Mr. BALFOUR shows, by a reference to the particular case, that it was impossible that Lord SPENCER, and almost incredible that Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN, should have been ignorant of it; and further that cumulative sentences were passed under Mr. GLADSTONE'S administration over and over again. Last, and most monstrous of all, Mr. GLADSTONE has declared that the increase of sentence on appeal is a thing absolutely unheard of before the rule of the present Government. And it appears from a return imprudently applied for by Sir WILFRID LAWSON that an increase of sentence on appeal has occurred in every single year of Mr. GLADSTONE'S two Administrations; and that, while there is no year in which at least one such increase of sentence has not occurred, there are some years in which the number of such cases has risen to three or four.

Now we do not ask the Nonconformist ministers to recant their Gladstonianism rashly or without consideration. On the contrary, writing as we do on the morrow of Mr. BALFOUR's speech, we would rather that the Nonconformist ministers should reserve judgment till Saturday night. We should prefer this for two reasons—first, because Saturday night is the eve of Sunday; and, secondly, because the delay will give Mr. GLADSTONE time to adopt the course which, if he were the man the Nonconformist ministers take him for, he would decide upon without a moment's hesitation. It might be too much to expect of him to make any amende to his Parliamentary opponents, who, he may think, must take their chance of the truth or falsehood of accusations flung across the table of the House of Commons. But the last three of these refuted accusations directly impugn the character and conduct of persons altogether outside the Parliamentary game. The first of them imputes to a resident magistrate and retired military officer a lapse of judgment or a loss of nerve and head which, if it had really occurred, would have been calculated most gravely to discredit his capacity for such duties as he was then engaged in. The second charges the permanent officials in Ireland with having, unknown to and against the wishes of the Ministers whom they served, descended to "a transaction "which should receive the contempt of every honest, nay "almost of every dishonest, man." The third has been made the basis of the vilest insinuations of partiality, subservience, and almost corruption on the part of the Irish County Court judges. Here, then, are three persons, or classes of persons, whom Mr. GLADSTONE has been shown, in one case by uncontradicted evidence, in the other two by evidence on record, and, therefore, incapable of contradiction, to have most cruelly calumniated. If he does not, as we have not the slightest doubt that he will not (for we cannot profess to share Mr. BALFOUR's "curiosity" on that head), express one word of regret for having slandered them, then will the Nonconformist ministers, as persons who, to use Mr. GLADSTONE's own language, profess "to associate political "action with the principles of our holy religion," seriously consider their personal relations to him before going into their chapels to discharge their religious functions to-morrow morning?

It is satisfactory to note in Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL's speech at Preston a certain consciousness that there is that in his recent Parliamentary attitude which requires explanation. We shall be excused, perhaps, for treating what he had to say on this point as the most important part of his latest speech. His references to the situation in Ireland were unexceptionable in tone and spirit, and his comparison of the mission of the Duke of NORFOLK with that of Mr. ERRINGTON was particularly effective. Nor do we, at any rate, find much to complain of in his present mode of treating the question of the national defences; and we will even allow some force to his criticism on the particular means adopted for providing Mr. BALFOUR with the Parliamentary assistance he so undoubtedly requires. What we are chiefly concerned with is Lord RANDOLPH's attempted vindication of his speech on Mr. PARNELL's Irish County Government Bill—an attempt which we gladly recognize as a sign of grace, and which we should have been very glad to find adequate. In this important quality, however, it is unfortunately wanting. Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL has either missed or evaded the real objections to the premature demand for the extension of the local government system of reform to Ireland. It is not the "scandal argument" which he has to meet; and all the illustrations, therefore, which he draws from the London Vestries and the Metropolitan Board of Works are quite beside the question. Of what use is it to cite examples of the "scenes" which occur at London Vestries, or of the scandals which have compromised the reputation of the Metropolitan Board? The real objection to setting up a new system of local government in Ireland is not that it will be administrated by rowdy, corrupt, or incapable bodies, but that it will put power into the hands of a class of men who will use it for purposes hostile to the Imperial Government and the legislative unity of the realm. If Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL could show that Londoners were disloyal before the establishment of Vestries and the Board of Works, and that they then became only noisy and ill behaved, the parallel which he institutes would have something to say for itself. But as he cannot show this, the precedents he appeals to are of no validity at all.

LAW AND POLICE.

THE campaign which was opened some months ago in the columns of this Review against the sale of indecent publications has since been conducted by the police with some success, and continues to produce satisfactory results. It is not perhaps desirable to go further into particulars now that the attention of the authorities has been thoroughly aroused. But the sentence passed by Sir ROBERT FOWLER last Wednesday upon an offender of this description, and the remarks with which he accompanied it, show that the City is not behind the rest of London in putting down a social pest. The Resolution unanimously adopted by the House of Commons, on the motion of Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, proves that, in acting with vigour, the magistrates have, as Sir ROBERT intimated, the general sense of the community at their back. From time to time there arise cases such as that of EDWARD ROWDEN, which are most difficult to deal with in a manner adequate to the occasion. For five years this man, whom charity would assume to be insane, has persecuted with his insolent addresses Miss LANE FOX and her mother, Lady CONYERS. He has been sent to prison, once for six months, once for eighteen. But he no sooner comes out of gaol than he resumes his old habits, and his last performance was to send Lady CONYERS a libellous telegram about her daughter, which was, for obvious reasons, not read in Court. As Mr. GEORGE LEWIS, who appeared for the prosecution, did not ask to have ROWDEN committed on the charge of libel, but only that he should be bound over to keep the peace, Mr. VAUGHAN could do no more than fix the sureties at a high rate. But it seems desirable that by some means or other hardened offenders of this description should be permanently excluded from society, either in an asylum or a penitentiary. The case of ADELAIDE OTWAY, summoned for assaulting her husband, and damaging his hat, affords an amusing comment upon the sentimental sympathy which this lady's wrongs recently excited in certain quarters. Between Mr. and Mrs. OTWAY there is, from a moral point of view, not very much to choose. But, as he seems only anxious to keep the peace, while she is bent upon breaking it, the civil authority is compelled to decide in favour of the less turbulent sinner. Mrs. OTWAY's grievance, upon which the religious musings of the professional sentimentalist have been copiously poured, is that her one conjugal infidelity prevents her from obtaining a judicial separation from her equally unfaithful spouse. The point is a nice one, in SWIFT's sense of that term, and there may be something in the abstract to be said for Mrs. OTWAY's view. But a lady who follows her husband through the streets of London for the purpose of smashing his hat cannot seriously complain that he is not forbidden to associate with her. It is he who wants protection, and not she.

Two cases heard on Tuesday, the one at Marlborough Street, the other at Westminster, illustrate very forcibly the comparative estimate which the law—or at least its administrators—put upon person and property. Mrs. DENIS LEARY went on Monday last to the funeral of her eldest sister. Her husband was angry because she would not go into a public-house on her way home. When they got to their room, he turned out the children, and tried to throw her from the window. Through no fault of his own he failed in his attempt. He then seized a knife, and threatened to cut her throat. At this point, however, he thought of his own neck, and exclaimed, "I won't swing for you; I will kill "you in another way." So he threw her down, jumped upon her, beat her and kicked her, until she became insensible. He had done the same thing before, and had six months for it. When he was arrested, he kicked and bit so that he had to be strapped down, and taken to the station on an ambulance. This brute received from Mr. NEWTON another sentence of six months' hard labour. Precisely the same punishment was inflicted the same day by Mr. D'EYNCOURT upon EDWARD BROWN. EDWARD BROWN's offence was stealing a coat, or rather trying to steal it. A less accomplished thief never stood at the bar. He pleaded guilty, and excused himself on the ground of poverty, the result of illness. Of course that was no excuse. It is a sin to steal a pin, and a crime, which is more in point, to steal a coat. Poor BROWN seems to be a very simple creature. He went into the coffee-room of the Alexandra Hotel and ordered a glass of sherry. He then went into the lobby and took a coat from a peg. It was not his coat, but General KENNEDY's. He might have taken it over his arm without being observed. But he tried to put it on; it did not fit, and the head-waiter detained him. It is impossible to defend BROWN's feeble effort at larceny, and the waiter showed commendable promptitude in arresting him. Moreover, it appeared that BROWN had once before taken the coat, not of a Major-General, but of a billiard-marker. A month's imprisonment would probably have been sufficient to cure so very timid a rogue of his larcenous propensities. At all events, we cannot help thinking, with all respect for the Service, that MRS. LEARY's life, which must be in great and imminent danger when her husband comes out of prison, is more valuable than General KENNEDY's coat. LEARY, for some inscrutable reason, was tried for assault, instead of for attempt to murder. Penal servitude for life would not have been too much for him any more than for the poor, wretched woman to whom Mr. Justice CHARLES lately awarded that terrible sentence for unspeakable cruelty to a child. Six months for doing your best to kill your wife is, to put it plainly, a scandalous outrage.

FOREIGN IMMIGRATION.

THE question what to do with offensive strangers who arrive from distant parts without visible means of subsistence is becoming a somewhat anxious one in several countries at present. In Canada, even, there is some difficulty about it, and complaints are heard of the paupers who arrive from London with either no trade to work at or with no health to toil at what trade they have. In this case we ourselves are the offenders, but here at home we are in the passive voice. The evidence given before the Lords' Committee on the sweating system touches a great many subjects, and is as yet not exhausted. It may be taken to have proved already, however, that foreign immigration has distinctly aggravated a native evil. The sweater is a production of our own unquestionably, and has been developed by over-population and the unmerciful struggle of trade. Still, he has had improved opportunities since the Polish, Russian, and German Jews have begun to pour into the East End of London. He is able to tighten the screw still further; and the native workman, who suffers from the pressure, is naturally angry. Others than workmen are displeased at the presence of these filthy Jewish gabardines in such numbers. We imagine that the gentleman who learned from the evidence that a vest he had ordered had been "sweated out" in the East to a very low den must have been conscious for a moment of the feeling which children call creepy-crawly. It is certain that some effort to control the evil must be made before long.

For us the question is, however, mainly a police one; and, though not altogether simple or free from complications, is not unmanageable. In Australia it presents itself on a much larger scale, and is very capable of causing trouble between the mother-country and the colony, and very serious trouble indeed between England and China. The Australian Colonies have long complained of the flood of Chinese immigration which pours into them. They have requested the help of HER MAJESTY's Ministers to keep it out, and, not having received any assistance, have acted for themselves. New South Wales has set the example of stopping the entry of any more Chinese. It will almost certainly be found that the other colonies will follow suit, with the resolution Victoria showed when it refused to allow English convicts to be landed at Melbourne. This determination is no matter for blame. The Australians are fighting for their lives, so to speak, and have a perfect right to refuse to be swamped by Chinese. The Chinaman is a very dangerous person in Australia. China, with its swarming population, is close at hand, and could very soon deluge all the colonies with Chinese in excess of the men of English race. Chinamen are not only thrifty and sober, but very clannish, and it is notorious that wherever they go they carry with them the organization of the secret societies, which are capable of giving them the unity of an army. It is not a probable, but is certainly a possible thing, that Australia might have one day to deal with a much more terrible version of the outbreak which nearly ruined Rajah BROOKE's settlement at Sarawak. The Indian Government has always felt bound to keep a keen watch over the Chinese at Singapore. For these reasons, as well as because they bring down the rate of wages, and make life hard for Englishmen, the colonies are justified in excluding the Chinese. But, unfortunately, to this question, as to most others, there are two sides—there is the Chinese as well as the Australian side. If HER MAJESTY's Government has been able to do nothing effectual for New South Wales in this matter one reason may be that for a long time past it has been trying to come to an arrangement with China on a variety of questions of trade, suzerainty, and frontier rights. In most cases we are asking for something from China. Now, how can we demand concessions in the morning and ask the Chinese to agree to exclusion in the afternoon? The morals of that ancient people are dubious, but their diplomatic logic is excellent. We think we can imagine the perfect sweetness and courtesy with which the Chinese Ambassador would receive H. B. M. Minister who came to present the Australian demand. "Your Excellency," he might say, "will perceive the justice of my observation "when I remark that the policy of excluding the outer "barbarian is right or is wrong. Now, if it is right, how "can your Excellency come and ask for leave to be given "to your pushing countrymen to navigate the whole "Canton River, and why have we been lectured because we "objected to have our easy-going old customs disturbed by "your puffing and panting and fussing? If it is wrong, "how can the exalted justice of your Government reconcile "itself to the exclusion of Chinamen from its dominions?" What answer could H. B. M. Minister make? It will, therefore, be seen that, if the colonies persist, the mother-country may find itself burdened with a most unwelcome dispute with a friend who may at a day's notice be vitally important to us in the Far East. Which, again, shows that managing the affairs of the British Empire is not an easy business.

UNIVERSAL ART CRITICISM.

ANNUALLY do the art critics flock to Burlington House and discharge the delicate task of estimating the artistic work of the year en somme. Progress is always presumed, and a verdict determined by some standard of average is arrived at. But what is the average? Averages differ according to the experience or ideal of the observer. This year, if we accept the judgment of a new Review, the show at the Royal Academy is uncommonly depressing. Possibly it is. But what is remarkable enough is that the indomitable critic is perfectly ready to indicate the right road of regeneration. Perhaps an assumption of omniscience is becoming in the oracle of a Review that styles itself the Universal. It is fitting that he should not fall into the empirical error of diffidence; and, to do Mr. HARRY QUILTER justice, he does not. He knows all about it. He can place an unerring, if not a pulseless, finger on the weak parts of the body artistic, and his diagnosis no man—unless he be a painter—is likely to dispute. Thus much, at least, is due to the frank expression of a really superb confidence. He declares that art never, never can be the "servant of "fashion" or the "handmaid of falsehood," and then he lays about him to prove that art in England is largely subservient to fashion and falsity. Like art itself, his artistic faith is based on essential beauty and truth, qualities of universal and eternal appeal, and, "as I know," says Mr. QUILTER, "based securely." There is much consolation to the weak-kneed devotee in this infallibility. Securus judicat orbis terrarum might be Mr. QUILTER's motto, as it is that of the Apollinaris Company. To praise the efforts of good young men of stolid English proclivities, and to be the terror of established artists long ingrained in wicked ways, are the telling points of Mr. QUILTER's programme. Something of the sort has been heard before, and heard by inattentive ears. Nevertheless is it the burden of the old critic and the new Review. But, lest all our younger painters should rejoice prematurely in the strength of their advocate, the elect among them are indicated. These are they who do "quiet serious work," who boast not themselves of a little French education, and do not, from admiring M. CAROLUS-DURAN, learn to sneer at Mr. FRITH. Here be mysteries. Who would not think there was no better way of avoiding the "catch-penny trivialities" of Academic art—the "millinered babies" and "comic "poodles" at which Mr. QUILTER righteously rages—than to acquire technique in the Paris schools, and a feeling for style and the serious from the examples of French masters? Alas, no! it leads to paltry sneers at Mr. FRITH's expense, and as patriots first, and lovers of art very much afterwards, the true-born Englishman weeps. Let, then, the graceless youth who admire French art mend their ways, or they will lose much universal patronage.

Now it may be very silly, no doubt, to sneer at Mr. FRITH, who is a painter of varied gifts and great popularity, but what can be said of a survey of this year's Academy which ignores M. CAROLUS-DURAN and Mr. SOLOMON'S impressive "Niobe," which slights Mr. SARGENT'S "diabolically "clever" portraits, and at the same time hints little but faults in, and hesitates incongruous dislikes of the work of Sir FREDERICK LEIGHTON, Sir JOHN MILLAIS, and Mr. ALMA TADEMA? There is more compensation, perhaps, in the notion of Mr. ALFRED GILBERT playing CELLINI to M. AUGUSTE RODIN'S MICHAEL ANGELO, and Mr. QUILTER will find he is not singular in thinking it is a dreadful waste of good paint to smear it by the ton or so on an acre of canvas, in order to glorify a Scotch mist or a Scotch cow. All the same, it is hard to see why Mr. COLIN HUNTER should wince, or why Mr. QUILTER, like Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, playing the art critic, should be for cutting down a man's impasto merely because he admires Mr. AUMONIER'S excellent landscapes. This way regeneration does not lie. Still less is it to be sought in the awkward pleasantries with which the critic associates the works of Mr. TADEMA and Sir FREDERICK LEIGHTON. It may be a universal sort of wit, and it is beyond question abominably vulgar, to say of Mr. TADEMA—who never pretends to be universal—that his picture is "but a WHITELEY kind of "Heliogabalus," and his conception of the incident such as might be expected of "a good decent father of a family who "pays his butcher and baker." It may also be vastly diverting to learn from the President's "Andromache" that the painter's inspiration is not Attic, is not even Greek, is but derived from a "copybook Greece." Of course Mr. QUILTER is at liberty to think all this, backed by the authority of "my classical friend Mr. SACHEVEREL "COKE"; but he might have devised a more excellent and mannerly way of expression. It is the oddest way of improving the public taste. There is a familiar apothegm—good copy-book Greek too—about the easy corruption of good manners of which no apostle in art or society ought to need reminder.

IRELAND.

OPINIONS may differ as to whether Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL'S analysis of the causes of improvement in Ireland is correct in every detail, but there can be little doubt of the soundness of one of the reasons assigned by him as of the fact itself. The agitation is unquestionably wearing itself out by sheer force of ineffectual effort. This is not to say, of course, that the agitators themselves are exhausted, although it is evident that they have been considerably cowed; but it is becoming daily more difficult for them to work upon the people. The machinery of disorder cannot be kept going at high pressure without a liberal supply of fuel, and it is fuel—the fuel of success, real or apparent—which they now find running so distressingly short. Many weeks have elapsed since the Parnellites have gained even the semblance of a victory, and in the meantime blow after blow has fallen upon them and their cause. The Papal condemnation of the Plan of Campaign, Mr. PARNELL'S practical repudiation of it, the imprisonment of Mr. O'BRIEN, the conviction and exemplary sentence passed upon Mr. DILLON, and, lastly, the judgment of the Irish Court of Exchequer affirming the legality of the increase of sentences on appeal—all these calamities have followed one upon another with almost bewildering rapidity. It is becoming more and more clear that the first and most unexpected has not been the least disconcerting of the series. Mr. O'BRIEN'S attempted bluster about the Pontifical rebuke the other day before an audience containing several priests was very ill received and very promptly protested against by his sacerdotal hearers; and the brave words since used by MICHAEL DAVITT on the subject at a meeting at Liverpool do not amount to much. The persistency with which the agitators harp upon O'CONNELL'S wholly irrelevant declaration that Irish Catholics would take their religion, but not their politics, from Rome, indicates pretty clearly that they dare not face the real difficulty of their position. It is precisely because the recent deliverance of the Holy See is not in political matter; it is precisely because all Irish Catholics are summoned by it to obey the injunctions of the Head of their Church on a point, not of politics, but of morality, and therefore, as they are bound to believe, of religion, that Mr. DILLON and Mr. O'BRIEN and the rest of them are making such desperate efforts to counteract its influence. If the action of LEO XIII. in this matter was really an attempt at political dictation, and was so recognized by the Irish Episcopature and priesthood, it would not be worth the while of lay agitators to notice it at all. It is their alarmed appreciation of the fact that the bishops and clergy recognize this admonition from the Vatican as binding on their consciences, and know it to be their duty to impress it upon their flocks—this it is which makes the Papal Circular the staple of oratory for every Parnellite spouter who professes to despise it.

Nor is it only individual Parnellites who thus display their uneasiness. The entire Nationalist party, or what may fairly be described as such, has just made collective advertisement of its state of mind on the subject at the meeting just held at the Dublin Mansion House. The long and pompous preamble of the resolution adopted by the meeting reduces itself on analysis to the proposition, repeated in many different forms, that HIS HOLINESS has been misled as to the facts. It has already been pointed out by Catholics of authority that it is not permissible to an orthodox member of the Church of Rome to raise the plea at all; but, even if it were legitimate, the grounds on which it is sought to found it are ludicrously weak. The author of the resolution "ventures to affirm" that the allegations of fact which are put forth in the Circular of the Holy Office "could not have been pro-"mulgated under the authority of the Holy Office if state-"ments so prejudicial to the Irish people had been tested "by reference to the prelates of Ireland and the elected "representatives of the Irish people." While they were about it, the resolutionists might as well have "ventured "to affirm" that Archbishop WALSH is not at Rome, or that Monsignor PERSICO had never been to Ireland, or when there had never conferred with any Irish prelate or member of Parliament. It is, of course, perfectly well known, and to none better than those who now allege the "untested" character of the POPE'S conclusions, that the very contrary in the case. It is notorious that HIS HOLINESS proceeded in the matter with the utmost care; that he was unwilling to act except after an investigation of the circumstances on the spot by a specially commissioned inquirer; that this emissary, so far from entering on his mission with any prepossession against the ecclesiastical promoters of the now condemned movement, actually provoked adverse criticism by the closeness of his intercourse with the chief of those persons, Archbishop WALSH; and, finally, that the Papal decree was not pronounced until the ARCHBISHOP had had an opportunity of arguing his case at the Vatican in person. If, after that, the POPE is to be declared wrong in his facts, we do not know how a judge's accuracy is ever to be ensured.

THE SMALL HOLDINGS BILL.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS'S Bill, which was amiably offered by him to the Government, is a fairly good specimen of a class of measure which often turns up in these days. It was, or is (for, thanks to Mr. MUNTZ, it is not dead, but only sleeps), designed to make some indefinite class of persons happy at the public expense and with no loss to anybody. The small proprietor is, and long has been, the object of Mr. JESSE COLLINGS'S care. Let us be understood—not the small proprietor who is, but who is to be. To re-create the yeoman class in defiance of GOLDSMITH and experience is the ambition of the member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham. This Bill was to effect the object by the usual mixture of compulsion and bribery. A Local Board was (for, after all, we are afraid we must use the past tense) to have the right, first, to make its mind up that small proprietors ought to exist; secondly, to use the rates to bring them into existence; thirdly, to choose the land it wanted and buy it at the market rate; fourthly, to secure its outlay on the land of the small holding. The small holder was to have the right to make a profit out of the holding if he could. Here, we maintain, was a very typical Bill, and its history was not unamusing. Mr. JESSE COLLINGS introduced it with a speech to show that a prosperous yeomanry was an excellent thing, and that various persons of his acquaintance would like to be prosperous yeomen if somebody would supply the capital—which we can quite readily believe. The Government was decidedly civil, and sent forward Mr. LONG to speak for it—Mr. LONG good alike to pass Local Government and kill Small Holdings. The Opposition, with its usual manners and magnanimity, tried to spill poor Mr. Jesse Collings by the Closure; but the Ministry rallied to his aid and made a House. Then Mr. Muntz came stoutly forward, and, complaining of the hardship of not being allowed to speak, repeated what had been said before till the hand of the clock pointed to half-past five, and the debate stood adjourned till—who knows when?

As for the arguments in the case, it is hardly necessary to examine them until we have first decided whether, as a matter of fact, a peasant proprietary can be made any more than a poet. We have no instance in which it has been made. The small proprietors of France used to be cited as an example to the contrary, but De Tocqueville knocked that common error on the head long ago. As a matter of fact, the French peasantry were owners of the greater part of the soil of the country long before the Revolution, and what the nobles owned were the feudal rights. The peasants profited by the Revolution no doubt, partly because it abolished the servitudes on their land, and partly because it threw a vast quantity of land into the market which they were able to pay for out of their savings. They had been trained to make those savings by centuries of toil and parsimony. Their descendants to this day work harder and live worse than the worst paid agricultural labourer in England. If we are not to reject the evidence of almost all foreign observers, and the nearly unanimous verdict of native writers, this part of the population of France is almost incredibly brutal, sordid, and intent on mere money. Is this what Mr. Collings wishes to see reproduced here? Doubtless not; but it is nearly useless to ask, because Mr. Collings is simply in pursuit of a Chimera bombinans in vacuo, a black tulip, a blue rose, which he will never attain to; never, oh! never. What proves it is precisely this very simple fact—namely, that, if a peasant proprietary would answer in this country, it would exist already. There is abundance of land to be got quite cheap—the owners being only too glad to part with it—and if it can be made to pay, why is it not taken? A private Company to buy land and resell it could work at a profit. If Mr. Broadhurst's soul thirsts for the intellectual and healthy occupation of the small farmer, why does he not acquire a small farm? It would hardly cost as much as a single election. Mr. Broadhurst knows better. He is not ignorant that the small proprietor has to toil late and starve much to make little and even nothing, so he prefers the House of Commons. Other people who know country life seem to be equally wise, and so we have no yeomanry, except in a few places here and there, where habit and family pride (which can be quite as intense in a peasant as in a duke) keeps a small class obstinately toiling and starving on the soil.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL LAWYER.

We do not desire in the brief remarks which we are about to make on the judgment of the Irish Court of Exchequer in Father McFadden's case to reopen the controversy which that decision finally closes. Nor do we intend to dwell in any hostile spirit on the bearing of this particular judicial incident on recent contentions in the House of Commons and on the platform. Common generosity, indeed, would forbid such a course. To dream within a few days of denouncing a particular course of procedure as not only monstrously oppressive but as without precedent in administrative history, and then to find out that during your own administrative career you have yourself created fourteen precedents to the same effect, must be a blow so cruel, even to men who have suffered many such blows of late, that no man of ordinary feeling would add to the distress of the sufferer by taunts. So far as the tender historical consciences of Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues are concerned we would prefer to use the judgment of Chief Baron Palles and his brethren as a salve rather than an irritant. We would refer to it, if at all, in this connexion for the sole purpose of showing that the Executive policy which the Opposition denounced in such comic ignorance of the fact that it was their own policy as well is not so wicked as they naturally supposed it to be under the circumstances of their mistake.

Our present object is to draw from it a somewhat wider moral than any which it yields in connexion with Parliamentary attacks and recriminations on the subject of Executive policy. We should like to utilize the important judgment of the Court of Exchequer in the case for the explosion of what we may call the imposture of the constitutional lawyer. We do not say that there is no such thing as a constitutional lawyer, as sceptics have been known to maintain of the international lawyer; but we do say that he is not to be found, in an effective form, within the precincts of the House of Commons, or, we will add, within the sphere of active political life. The constitutional lawyer, in relation to political controversies, means simply the man who invents party reasons for interpreting a disputed question of law. There are more ways than one, of course, in which he may proceed. He may—and this is no doubt the wisest course—affect to deal with the question as one of "dry law," of the strict interpretation of Acts of Parliament or of judicial decisions. Or he may, like the (Parliamentary) constitutional lawyer of our day, rise nobly superior to all such grovelling methods, and, relying solely upon the contents of that expansive bosom in which the "principles of liberty" and "the spirit of the Constitution" are enshrined, pronounce at once, and without either argument or appeal, upon the question whether this or that construction of a question of civil or criminal law is "constitutional" or the reverse. Both these types have been typically illustrated in the recent dispute—the one by Mr. Horwood, the other by the constitutional lawyer himself, Sir William Harcourt. Mr. Horwood argued that a sentence could not be increased under the terms of a section "empowering a "Court to confirm, vary, or reverse" the decisions of a lower Court, because the word "vary" came between the words "confirm" and "reverse," and could not therefore import a higher power than that of confirmation itself. Sir William Harcourt did not chop logic in this way, but used the "one "plain argument" that it was unconstitutional to increase sentences, and (ignorant, alas! that he himself had been a patron within the last few years of those distinguished judges) contended that none but a Scroggs or a Jeffreys, anxious to curry favour with the Executive, would add to the original penalty inflicted upon an appellant prisoner. The crowd of correspondents who followed in the wake of these distinguished disputants in the Times had each of them an affinity either with one or the other. Either they talked big about the principles of the Constitution, or they split hairs about the interpretation of 14 & 15 Vic. cap. 93, sec. 24. And now the Irish Court of Exchequer, consisting of three judges—L.C. Baron Palles, Baron Dowse, and Mr. Justice Andrews—who are the very last men on the Irish Bench to lean to an oppressive construction of penal statutes, have decided, with almost disdainful expedition, that the appeal in these cases is a "rehearing" (which, indeed, we had to remind Sir William Harcourt and his friends that they insisted on making it), and that in relation to such rehearing, as in relation to any other subject whatever, the word "vary" bears its natural meaning of to alter, and cannot be restrained to the signification of altering in one particular way. In other words, a judicial tribunal has declared the legality of the challenged decision of the County Court judges to be perfectly clear, and has made our "constitu- "tional lawyer" look supremely ridiculous. We hope that the lay public, the next time he essays to teach them, will not forget the figure which he cuts just now.

COPYRIGHT IN AMERICA.

Almost simultaneously with the decision of an English Court (in the Little Lord Fauntleroy case), there comes the cheering information that the Senate of the United States has passed the Chace-Breckenridge International Copyright Bill by the solid majority of thirty-five votes to ten. This Bill, introduced into the Senate by Senator Chace, of Rhode Island, is identical with the Bill introduced into the House of Representatives by Mr. Breckenridge, of Kentucky; and there is every reason to believe that the Bill will pass the House as easily as it passed the Senate—if it can be reached this Session. As to this there is great doubt unfortunately. The Appropriation Bills, the Tariff debate, the pressure of an approaching national election—all these, and other causes, may combine to prevent the consideration of the International Copyright Bill. But, if it comes up, it will probably be passed without amendment. The public recommendations of President Cleveland make it certain that, when he receives the Bill from the Senate and the House of Representatives, he will sign it at once, and the United States will have made a beginning in the good work of protecting literary property, even when it is produced by a friendly foreigner.

If the Chace-Breckenridge Bill should become law at this session of Congress, the popular English authors will enjoy in the United States after July 1st a protection not unlike that now enjoyed in Great Britain by the popular American author. As it is the popular American author only who now benefits by the present British law, so it will be the popular English author only who will benefit by the proposed American law. It must not be forgotten that the English law is in a most unsatisfactory state, and that it is not for English writers to throw stones at the American law. No American book is protected in England unless it is published in England before it is published in America; and it is probably necessary also that the American author shall be under the English flag (say in Canada) at the time of this prior publication. All American books not published first in England are free to pirate; and articles in the New Princeton Review have recently shown how freely certain English publishers of the baser sort have availed themselves of this privilege. Under the provisions of the CHACE-BRECKENRIDGE Bill simultaneous publication is required, and also the deposit of two copies of the book, which shall have been composed and printed in the United States. This is a little, but not much, harder than the conditions imposed in Great Britain. Imperfect as the Bill is, it is a great step in advance; it is a recognition of an author's property rights in his own work; it will stop the habit of piracy; it will give stability to the American publishing trade; and it will be a stepping-stone to improvements in the future. For the present, it is the best that can be had. The American Copyright League, organized five years ago by Dr. EDWARD EGGLESTON and Mr. R. W. GILDER, the editor of the Century Magazine, and now containing on its rolls nearly every author in America, has been labouring steadfastly for a simple author's copyright, without conditions or formalities. At the suggestion of Dr. EGGLESTON there was organized this winter an American Publishers' League, headed by Mr. W. W. APPLETON and Mr. G. H. PUTNAM. Other Leagues have sprung up throughout the country, notably one in Boston, of which the chief spirit was Mr. ESTES, the publisher. "Authors' Readings" were given in New York and in Washington; meetings were held; articles were written; pamphlets were published; public interest was aroused. Then, on investigation and consultation, it was found that the Typographical Union, one of the most intelligent and powerful of the labour organizations, would oppose the original Bill of the League giving simple author's copyright, but would support cordially a Bill granting copyright on condition of re-manufacture in America. The assistance of the printers was valuable, and the Bill was modified in accordance with their views. As it stands now, it is a compromise measure, advocated by the authors, the publishers, and the printers of America. It was introduced into the Senate by Mr. CHACE, a Republican and a Protectionist, and into the House of Representatives by Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, a Democrat and a Tariff-reformer. As we have said, it may not be reached this Session; but this year or next, sooner or later, this Bill, or one similar to it, will surely become a law. "It is "not by any means the kind of Bill that some of the "earliest and most active friends of international copy-"right would like to see," says the Evening Post of New York, which has always been one of the foremost advocates of the movement, "but it has the immense and over-"whelming merit of being an acknowledgment of the right "of foreigners to the enjoyment of literary property on "American soil." This is an exact statement of the condition of affairs. Indeed, the Bill is so very great an improvement on the present lawlessness that it is ungracious to consider its defects, obvious as they are.

BLACKTHORN WINTER.

AN inveterate custom of English conversation, combined with the engaging versatility of the English climate, from which the custom derives both its origin and its vigour, must be our excuse for devoting some specific attention to this branch of the English weather. The angler who visits Devonshire for the first time, before his perceptions become adjusted to the diminutive proportions of the Devonshire trout, will display his basket of troutkins to the landlord of his inn, observing discontentedly that the fish in these rivers seem very small. This, as a bald fact, is beyond the reach of dispute; but mine host will not submit without a struggle to the disparagement of the little creatures which contribute so largely to his receipts. "Yes, sir, they are small," he will reply, with an air of imperfect conviction; "but," he will add, with a certain mysterious significance, "you'll find them very sweet." In similar fashion we may observe, mutatis mutandis, of the blackthorn winter that, though small, it is peculiarly bitter. This bitterness is chiefly due to its occurring at such an abominably inconvenient time. As a mere replica of winter on a small scale there is nothing the least original about it, and nothing specially distasteful. Its offensiveness lies rather in the time than in the season. It is true that we ought to be prepared for it, if only by reason of the melancholy regularity with which it recurs; but some hope, the hope which springs eternal in the human heart, tempts us year by year to cherish the fond fancy that we have got rid of the winter by the middle of May.

It seems to be established, as a matter of meteorology, that a spell of cold may always be expected between the 13th and the 20th of May, and with a punctuality worthy of better things it rarely disappoints us. May, as we all know, is the merry month, and this little arctic visitation is admirably calculated to make the Englishman take his merriment with all proper sadness. All sorts and conditions of men are affected by it. The undergraduate (for he too is a man) has been training for the previous three or four weeks with much enthusiasm and a certain amount of abstinence for the "Eights" or the "May Races," as the case may be. During the hot week which constantly ushers in the early days of training, the abstinence has been extremely irksome, but the enthusiasm has carried him through. A little cold weather is not altogether unwelcome to a man whose daily allowance of liquid is suddenly reduced by a half. But when familiarity has reduced this privation to a position of comparative contempt, warm weather does much to alleviate the small miseries of rowing, and to spectator and oarsman alike is of the first importance for the races themselves. This being so, it is a matter of considerable and not entirely silent regret that these sports should take place when the thorn is white with blossom.

This bleak period often comes rather hard upon the angler also. Now the angler is a gentle creature when he is not breaking through hedges, or trampling over hay-fields, or trespassing, or poaching. But, though he is a sort of shorn lamb amongst men, Providence does not invariably temper the wind of the blackthorn winter for him. On the contrary, he too often finds that a balmy north-easter will effectually temper the rise of the May-fly, and keep the trout sulking on the bottom during the two precious days which he has stolen from his work.

Indeed the blackthorn winter is no respecter of persons. Like the gentle rain from heaven (which often accompanies it), it falls alike upon the just and upon the unjust, a reflection which at once recalls some of the livelier associations of the Bank holiday. In the abstract, perhaps, philanthropy may feel a generous regret when the Golden Numbers ordain that Bank holiday shall coincide with blackthorn winter.

Not content, moreover, with plaguing us directly, the blackthorn winter deals us an indirect blow through the vegetable kingdom. The sudden crop of colds, coughs, throats, and so forth, which its genial influence calls into life, disappears and is forgotten when the tardy summer actually comes. But the ruined crop of fruit blossoms, which it often contrives to nip, will preserve its melancholy memories for us right into the autumn. This misplaced confidence in a few early days of treacherous warmth, which commonly proves fatal to the fruit tree, produces an analogous though less deadly effect upon what may be described as human botany. In spite of the doubtful advantages which reason may confer, mankind are still content to copy the lower creation in many important respects. In the matter of clothing we imitate the plant at a respectful distance; and, though we lack its praiseworthy uniformity of flower, we have an irregular flowering season of our own at much the same time. In the spring a young man's fancy lightly turns on his tailor's assortment of new patterns. Ladies in their own line do much the same thing—only, of course, more so; and in ladies the gradual process of flowering is more easily observed. To them, as to other flora, the blackthorn winter comes as a malign influence; and, though happily it is not invariably fatal, it produces a curious state of arrested vegetation.

Finally, we may observe that one of the most injured victims of the blackthorn winter is the blackthorn itself. It is hardly necessary, even in this age of "affinities," to remark that there is no connexion whatever between the two, except coincidence in time; and it is really hard on this pretty blossom to be execrated as the last relic of the dying winter, instead of being hailed as the harbinger of the summer which is at hand.

EXTRACT OF AMBROSIA.

THE practice of cheaply reprinting classics is a very excellent one, and one as to which, despite many things recently done, England is far behind France and Germany. Any one at all acquainted with English literature would have no difficulty in reeling off by the score the names of works and authors of interest and merit, sometimes of very great interest and merit, that are unobtainable except by search through the second-hand booksellers' shops, and then only in grubby copies, which do not even appeal to the factitious sympathies of the bibliophile, and are very distinctly repugnant to the simple and natural tastes of the book-lover. But, if there are to be reprints, let them be good of their kind; and this we cannot quite say of a selection from the Noctes Ambrosianæ (London: Hamilton Adams & Co. Glasgow: Morrison) which has just appeared and lies before us. In the first place, the publishers have prefixed a "Prefatory Note" which is one of the greatest curiosities of literature in a small way known to us. By what kind of person it can have been written some experience of many kinds of writers and the exercise of brains (which perhaps too partial friends have considered to be not absolutely sterile) fail altogether to inform us. Whoever he was, the author knew very little about his subject. He does not know that Wilson's taking to the Scotch Bar was not "in accordance with a custom among gentlemen of independent fortune," but because he had lost his fortune; he does not know that the Noctes, instead of "beginning to appear in March 1825," only "begin" at that date to be reprinted by Professor Ferrier in the usual edition, and had been going on for years. He thinks that "he was appointed editor of Blackwood," which we have Wilson's own positive statement that he never was. But his knowledge, or his want of it, is not so wonderful as his style, to which the "round mouth" of Christopher himself, and not the pinched lips of this ghastly, thin-faced time, would be needed to do justice critically. "And no less," says this wonderful person, "was his genius shown by the production of an English poem for the Newdegate prize of 50*l.*, in which he was the successful competitor." "In having studied Scots law, however, it was not with the object of a profession." "The amount of interest their appearance excited has few parallels in Scottish literature, being read with extraordinary avidity." "Questions of politics, science, and other affairs that have now passed out from that stage from which they were viewed fifty years ago." How can you avidly read an interest? would be a sufficiently interesting question if its interest were not eclipsed by the other, How can a thing be at once on a stage and viewed from that stage?

However, the astonishing thing (which has more the air of a prize parish school essay than of anything else) is only a few pages long and may be skipped. The reprint itself would be welcome simpliciter if it merely reproduced in a cheaper form the current edition of Wilson's part of the Noctes; and would be welcome, not simpliciter at all, but with effusive expressions of gratitude, if it gave the whole series, including those earlier Noctes which Ferrier excluded altogether because he was not sure what Wilson wrote in them, and those parts of the later which he excluded as not Wilson's. But it is only a selection of extracts; a fairly full one, comprising more than three hundred good-sized and well-filled pages, but still a selection. And after turning it over we are confirmed in the opinion from which an earlier selection, made, we believe, by the very capable hand of Mr. Skelton, failed to convert us, that the Noctes cannot properly be shown in this way. They might, perhaps (though we are not sure even of this), be "sampled" for a generation intolerant of length by giving a few whole nights. But it is part of the merit of the originals that their quips and cranks, their desultory meanderings here and there, all hold together by a certain genuine literary connexion, and that mere scraps, mere panni, cannot be torn away without losing half their brilliancy and humour, without, indeed, in some cases becoming nearly unmeaning. Especially is this the case with the more extravagant flights. Even in the original, and when the reader has been put in the right key by the context, such extravaganzas as Tickler's sport with the eagle, pike, and red deer at Dalnacardoch, as the Shepherd's mystical adventure with the Bonassus (obviously turning on some cryptic local and temporary jest which even Ferrier could not or would not explain), and as his adventures in the character of an African lion are rather "steep." Read by themselves we should fear that they are only too likely to confirm the common and almost universal, but most mistaken, idea that the Noctes are mere wildernesses of boisterous undergraduate gaiety, with which ladies and gentlemen of a refined age cannot be expected to sympathize.

Still of that charity are we that we always recognize in any such book at least the possibility of its directing to the original some one who would otherwise not have been directed, and for this deed that it may possibly do we would not take the life even of a book prefaced by such a note as that from which we have quoted, devised on a principle which we cannot approve, and subject to the further charges of neglecting chronological order altogether, and of not giving the numbers or dates of the particular Noctes extracted from, so that the ignorant may trace the context of each if they desire to do so. We forgive all this—at least as Christians—in consideration of the possibility just referred to, and of the further fact tha it is pleasant to turn over the pages, and even in this jumbled condition to recognize parts of one of the most thoroughly refreshing books that exist anywhere.

For this is what the Noctes Ambrosianæ really are to any one who has not the singular and, we think, purely nervous failing of being disgusted by the mere appearance of dialect in a book. We do not pretend to see in this dialect the charms which no doubt it possesses for natives of what Mr. Gladstone (was it not?) somewhat unhappily referred to as "the Land of the Leal." "Might" is not more beautiful to us for being spelt "micht," nor a fool much more comfortably contemptible when he appears as a "fulé." But if it does no particular good (it sometimes does "crisp" a jest a little), it does no harm, and is perfectly intelligible to any tolerably rational and well-read person who knows his Scott (which whosoever knoweth not without doubt he shall perish everlastingly) and is not quite ignorant of his Burns. Then there is the extraordinary variety of the book—a variety which no doubt appears less when it is cut up into extracts in this way, and the loss of which is another argument against the extract system. Compared with the dreary twaddle of which Friends in Council set the fashion, and in which a certain number of prigs talk after their kind on set subjects, the lawless vagabundity of the Noctes—from painting to politics, from literature to leapfrog—has all the freshness and variety of actual conversation. Perhaps the parts of it of which Wilson would himself have been most proud, the elaborate word-painting and sentiment which he mostly (to atone perhaps for liberties of other kinds) puts into the mouth of the Shepherd, are the least attractive now. But even they have no little charm of their kind, and sometimes rise to eloquence not less artful and a great deal more natural than our post-Ruskinian rhapsodies. A good deal of the by-play, the local colour, the temporary allusions, and so forth, is no doubt uninteresting enough; but it must be remembered that all this can always be skipped when presented in extenso, while not unfrequently there are links and stepping-stones in it which it is impossible to include in an extract, and which yet are wanted for the comprehension of the parts extracted. The eating and drinking are both stupendous and terrible, but the present extractor has been wise not to shun them altogether. For only fancy a Barmecide Noctes—Ambrose's without oysters—a kettleless snuggery! Yet there are some who would, they say, prefer them.

The extractor, happily, is not of these, and gives us, for instance, the capital "Dinner in the Forest," from one of the latest Noctes, but in one of the earliest extracts. And a very casual selection from the selection will show how much else there is. The curious passage in which Wilson develops his ideas about Faust; the description of the eagles' nest in Glen A'an; the apology for pugilism, in which Christopher puts all his own science; the "Defence of Socrates," in which he makes the characteristic mistake of confusing Taylor the Platonist with Taylor of Norwich; the agreeable passage (ending, it is true, with a rather full-flavoured Ambrosianism) on Ganders; the comparison, in an unusually good piece of criticism, of Wordsworth and Cowper; the great Swimming Match out into the North Sea; the exceedingly curious description of Christopher's habits of composition, an odd compound of exact autobiography and wild extravagance; the famous passages on Burke and Hare; the fragment, really profound for the author, on the desire of posthumous fame; a dozen passages at least in the Sporting Jacket vein—but we are getting into a sentence as long as one of Clarendon's, and that only with a few of the comparatively few extracts given here. Let us, therefore, sum up by saying that every one who is not a prig, or a milksop, or, as the Noctes would themselves say, a "Sumph," or a superior person, or anything else pestilential, should read the Noctes. Let him, if 'twill no better be, dip into this or another extract book first, and then into the wider original. If he, being not one of the above, cannot enjoy them, let him be very sorry and rather humble; if he can, let him not be exalted unduly, but grateful and jocund, as at a permanent and profitable investment. For the Noctes make one of those rare books, not by any means always of the first order of literature as literature, to which, when a man has once obtained the key or by good luck inherited a key naturally, he can constantly return for rest, delight, and refreshment. Such books are, we say, rare; they are of very different kinds, and all of them do not fit all cases. But it has been justly said that it is to them, and to them only, that the famous phrase "When a new book appears I read an old one" applies, and that no one who does not practically understand that phrase knows what the real delight of reading is.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

II.

IN our first article on the subject we had to point out what seemed to us the shortcoming of the Academy. It is a pleasanter task to find out what is good in it; and, in spite of its depressing general aspect, there is much. Once accustomed to the prominent rubbish due to the system of hanging and aware of its "habitat," one passes it over, and receives a more agreeable impression of the show. It is but just to speak first of the large figure-pictures, compositions which demand from their authors, in addition to natural gifts of eye, some knowledge of pictorial effect, of the organization of masses of colour on a large scale, of the science of grouping, and of the effects of handling in treatment. We have this year a notable example of the realistically romantic from Mr. Solomon and of the classically decorative from Sir Frederick Leighton. Whilst a great revival of technique on the lines of Velasquez, Hals, Rembrandt, has taken place among Frenchmen, it would be absurd to deny that many of their experiments in treatment have led to bad results. In their large pictures it must be admitted that the Old Masters wisely sacrificed to a decorative ensemble, and the practice of some modern Frenchmen tends to show that the unmodified application of lately discovered realistic formulas to large canvases is rarely successful. In the action of colour on the eye what is true of small is not necessarily true of large quantities of the same stuff. In two or three feet of Corot the eye unconsciously embraces an atmospheric unity of tone. Make a Corot of twenty feet and you would have vast stretches of bald local tint, which at the proper distance would scarcely be strong enough to suggest luminous and vibrating aërial colour. We all know pictures in which the mechanical enlargement of fresh, grey, atmospheric schemes of colour has resulted in dreary wastes of professional French grey. The practice of mechanically enlarging the handling of a "pochade," as well as its areas of colour, often helps to complete the disillusionment. When huge realism succeeds, it is owing first to the choice of a possible subject, then to a tasteful modification of handling, a powerful mixture of the components of tones, and a most careful attention to the breadth of masses and their effect on each other. It will be seen that, in so far as Mr. Solomon attempts realism, he has set himself a difficult task. The subject is well chosen; the narrowness of the canvas and the upright swing of the fine composition secure a valuable concentration of interest; the light and shadow are divided into effective quantities, and the colour is atmospheric without being weak or slatey. The modelling, too, is good, especially in the prostrate half-nude figure, and if there is any useless prettiness of colour or feeble realization of form, it is in the group of huddled figures on the right. All things considered, "Niobe" (712) may be called the finest of Mr. Solomon's large compositions. The taste of the day still sets towards realism; but it would be a matter of regret if so dignified and complete a picture as Sir Frederick Leighton's "Captive Andromache" (227) should not meet with due appreciation. In the first place, it ought not to be compared with any of the good examples of French realistic art to be found in the gallery. It would be most unfair to look for the mystery of real light, subtle realistic reliefs or romantic envelopment of objects, in a picture which is purely decorative in aim. It is, however, no easier to organize a large scheme of decoration than a large realistic figure subject, and few painters could have done it with such consistent loftiness of style. To obtain this suavity of line, this excellent proportion in the grouping of so many elements, requires both continual study and immense natural faculty. As a draughtsman in line few can compare with Sir Frederick Leighton. Indeed, a little attention will reveal a beauty and refinement of line which alone do much to give this picture its noble unity of effect. The President is not quite an inspired colourist, but in this case his colour is well thought out, broad, and, as a whole, effective. His treatment of drapery is less stringy than usual, and the smoothness of his handling conceals no bad or feeble modelling. We cannot help feeling that the somewhat brown waxiness of colour in one of the foreground groups would be less apparent were the same pigments put on with a freer and more evident touch. Anything like the clever and marked workmanship of Messrs. Carolus-Duran or Sargent would be, of course, out of keeping here; but the soft, sinuous touch which Rubens sometimes put, without any brutality of impasto, on to the top of a thin rubbing, might have strengthened and revived the whole work.

Mr. F. Goodall sends two ambitious canvases, one of vast size, "By the Sea of Galilee" (329), and one of moderate dimensions, "David's Promise to Bathsheba." He is very fond of getting the texture of a tallow candle in his flesh, and perhaps its characterless roundness also influences his views of human anatomy. Mr. Long's "Crown of Justification" (453) is still more wooden and commonplace in form; but the worst picture in the Academy—"Nelson leaving England for the Last Time" (1055)—comes from Mr. Eyre Crowe. And yet it is difficult to refuse that honour to Mr. Laslett J. Pott's "All is Vanity" (1049). As if to show that, however bad an original may be, an imitation is always worse, this painter contrives to get both falser tone and more disagreeable colour than Mr. Pettie, whom he copies. To return to decent work, Mr. J. W. Waterhouse hardly succeeds so well with his out-of-doors subject, "The Lady of Shalott" (500), as he did last year with "Mariamne." The picture is very able, but unfortunately brutal and unromantic in treatment. Compared with many of the foregoing, Mr. Alma Tadema's "Roses of Heliogabalus" (298) is a small work yet it entirely lacks the organization which we admired in "Niobe" and "Captive Andromache." It may be a good thing to hide one's efforts at composition, but not to the extent of incomprehensibility and confusion. Mr. Tadema would seem to have gone on the principle of wall-papering—namely, that the design should be concealed. There is no reason why his picture should not be indefinitely prolonged; no one could tell how often the pattern was repeated. Yet we find buried here admirable studies of heads and still-life picture of marble, metal, furniture, and stuffs, executed with a technical power as astonishing as that of any living man. Mr. Watts's "Dawn" (173) is a stately figure, painted with more certainty than usual, and, though scarcely subtle in colour, it is less spotty than many of his works. Mr. Orchardson, in "Her Mother's Voice" (286), shows his usual art and, we are sorry to say, his usual elements of composition, minus a pink shade to his lamp. Mr. F. Dicksee has put plenty of expression into the figures of "Within the Shadow of the Church" (5). He has drawn them well; his technique, too, especially in the tree and the rose-bush, is efficient of its kind; and the light and shadow are broadly massed; but he has, somehow, failed to put the stamp of reality on his picture. Mr. Marcus Stone is more conscientious this year; he has some good work, especially in the landscape parts of his pictures, "In Love" (236) and the little diploma work "Good Friends" (171). Mr. Seymour Lucas displays little vigour or enthusiasm in the painting of "St. Paul's: the King's Visit to Wren" (648); he produces fair, but commonplace, workmanship, which no one would stop to look at were it not for the subject. The poetry of painting, like the poetry of language, consists in the treatment rather than in the subject. No more than in literature do the mere threadbare facts of a story, of observation, of science, or of morals constitute artistic emotion. The same statement may be made baldly or poetically. If you translate Milton's "Avenge, O Lord!" you have but the text of a common Scotch sermon. Now half the pictures on the line, however loftily their titles may sound, suggest nothing more forcibly than the painted tin and wood of the toyshop, and they are accepted by the public in the same spirit that children accept toys—anything will do for a make-believe provided it has the right name. It must be admitted, on the other hand, that, as it is impossible by teaching to make a man really feel the connexion between sentiment and the resources of style, only too many artists educated in schools of style must learn their mannerism as a formula. Though this may result in pictures that are wearisome when seen in numbers, it tends any way to produce a fair style of decoration for houses, and to provide the great genius, when he comes, with an efficient tool ready to his hand. In "Fish Sale, Polperro" (537), Mr. Mouat Loudan has considerably fallen off. The style he employs was invented many years ago in France to give the taste of actuality by subtle aërial reliefs, to allow the important masses to emerge from the feeble chaos of detail, to make sure that the impression of the artist should strike the spectator more forcibly than the mechanical labours in which he rivals the camera. But, if Mr. Mouat Loudan's values are weak, his planes confused, and his impression non-existent, his picture at least possesses a unity of colour and a tranquillity of tone by far more decorative than the equally flat, still more false, and clamorously garish works of the bad Academician. There is no occasion to mention works similar in style to Mr. Mouat Loudan's, which are no more sound than his. Mr. Stanhope Forbes, in "The Village Philharmonic" (1,143), and Mr. Bramley, in "A Hopeless Dawn" (351), have not done wrong to leave grey effects alone for awhile, and seek some of the mysteries of deeper tone. Mr. Stanhope Forbes's composition, by the way, is more scattered and less effective than Mr. Bramley's. As usual there are plenty of Venetian subjects, of which the newest and most vigorous is perhaps Mr. R. H. Blum's "Venetian Lace Workers" (49). Mr. H. Woods gets a fresh and brilliant daylight in "Saluting the Cardinal" (213), which is far from unpleasant or untrue. Mr. H. S. Tuke, in "Land in Sight" (82), gives the action of the red-haired skipper starting up, his expression, the tint of his hair, the modelling of his face with great refinement and scarcely any trace of mannerism. Mr. Schmalz's "Faithful unto Death" (542), a number of buxom Christian girls waiting for the lions, may be supposed to belong to the modern school of technique. It is, however, perfectly flat, and the crowds in the amphitheatre are made out with a hard and stupid insistence of delineation which takes away all the charm of suggestion. We cannot, however, pass over two finely executed pictures which certainly belong to two different but high orders of technique. Mr. J. L. Gérôme's perfectly elaborated and yet freshly coloured little gem, "Le Barde Noir" (205), is a masterpiece of small cabinet picture finish. The other picture, Mr. A. Aublet's "Turc en Prière" (433), is drawn and modelled with a fine precision and sureness of touch which do much to relieve the dulness of the subject. "A Love Letter" (81), by Mr. F. D. Millet, and "In Time of Peace" (68), by Mr. R. Gemmell Hutchison, are pictures which, although painted with a less obvious style than many, contain an excellent study of expression, good drawing, and a conscientious respect for the real aspect of a scene. Other work, executed with a like sincerity of purpose, as well as further examples of fine handling and educated technique, will be easily found, though we cannot mention them here. Enough has been said of the various sorts of figure-painting; it only remains to say in general that a much higher level of treatment and workmanship is reached in portraiture than in the figure-subject. The better schools of technique still lean on Nature, and will not trust themselves to paint what they cannot actually see. Certainly this is a respectable fear, but it tends to make art dull; and there is no reason why the few who have imagination should stay in the high road with the many simply because it is the fashion. At any rate, as far as style is concerned, the four or five best works in the Academy have yet to be spoken of when we come to deal with the portraiture.

THE OPERA.

In these days, when the natural exhibition of emotion is as a rule the aim of those who interpret character on the stage, the purely conventional performance of opera seems particularly quaint. Operatic singers, with very rare exceptions, have an ideal of their own, which is based strictly on stage-tradition; they carry out the set business of their parts, and are quite contented and happy. As regards Covent Garden, which opened on Monday for a season of Italian opera—or, to speak by the card, opera in Italian—under the management of Mr. Augustus Harris, it may be urged, as an excuse for performers, that the size of the theatre necessitates a certain breadth of treatment, as the delicate effects which would tell on a smaller stage would here be lost; but, admitting this, the fact remains that the representatives of the leading characters of opera only on the rarest occasions show any disposition to think for themselves. They have been taught their parts, where to stand and what to do, and one after another they go through the same routine—a species of drill. Every experienced opera-goer knows precisely what is coming whenever any of the familiar works are put up for performance. Take, for instance, the first scene of Lucrezia Borgia, with which composition the season began. The Duke sits at the left-hand side of the table in the very scantily furnished apartment which does duty for a mediæval justice-room. The Duchess sits on the opposite side. Gennaro is led in through a door on the left; the Duchess gives an exceedingly pronounced start, on seeing which the Duke turns to her with anger and suspicion in his mien. Whoever has seen Lucrezia Borgia of recent years has seen all this and the rest which follows; it is always exactly the same; but why should it be so? When managers produce Hamlet the tragedy is not invariably presented in precisely the same way. Why does no one think out new, natural, and varied methods of representing opera? Mr. Harris—let justice be done him—has ventured to depart from tradition in one respect. The Duke's room has mats before the door! So far as a long and careful observation of opera goes, we are inclined to venture the opinion that this is the first operatic potentate who ever had mats in his palace. We believe they are quite wrong; and we are not sure about the suits of armour with which the chamber is decorated. Still there is a departure here from set traditions, and we welcome it.

Of course we know what the manager's excuse would be for representing opera according to regulation. There is no time for rehearsal. The same "business" is followed all the world over, so that whether at Madrid, St. Petersburg, or New York, a Lucrezia or a Gennaro, a Leonora or a Manrico, can take up the character and fit it into the various scenes. Reviewers, however, are not specially called upon to study the necessities and conveniences of managers or singers. It is only with the effect of the performance that the critic is concerned, and we think that readers will agree with our protest against following placidly and contentedly year after year the well-trodden ways of operatic tradition. There must always, no doubt, be something artificial about opera; but why not strive to make it as little artificial—that is to say, as natural—as circumstances and conditions permit? There is surely no psychological reason why singers in opera should be very much stupider than those who act without singing?

As for the performance of Lucrezia Borgia, there is very little to be said about it. Mme. Fürsch-Madi has a voice, is a well-trained singer, and knows the part as it is taught to its representatives. Very much the same may be said of Signor Ravelli, who was the Gennaro, and of Signor Navarino, the Duke. Mme. Trebelli has remarkable artistic impulse, and is out of sight the best of Maffeo Orsinis. Her voice retains much of its beauty in spite of the long years which have passed since she first made a great reputation. Perhaps there is no more perfect exponent of the Italian school of singing than this French artist. The orchestra was a little coarse at times—instrumentalists are apt to play this easy score somewhat perfunctorily—but better work was done on Tuesday when Carmen was given, with Mme. Nordica as the heroine, Miss McIntyre and M. Etienne de Reims as Michaela and Don José. The Carmen was a little disappointing. The character must have attracted Mme. Nordica, or she would not have played it; she has evidently studied it with care, but she was not convincing, and the music does not suit her well. Miss McIntyre is a débutante of much promise. She has a very agreeable voice, has been well taught, and, though obviously inexperienced as an actress, displayed feeling and fervour which unmistakably bespeak appreciation of character and strong aptitude for her art. M. Etienne de Reims is a very fair example of his genre. He is a very good actor—we are led to mention this first, as it is his most notable distinction. We did not care much for his voice, and he has the defects of the French school; still, as judged by the canons of that school, he is a capable vocalist. Signor Del Puente was the Toreador, and made a moderate success with his song; but the alteration of phrases for the purpose of avoiding the lower notes is destructive to the character of the composition. The minor parts were fairly filled. The chorus is unusually numerous and well chosen. Signor Mancinelli's ability as conductor is universally recognized.

THE JUBILEE STAKES.

THE great Jubilee Stakes at Kempton Park more than holds its ground. When other rich stakes followed it last year, it was prophesied that it would never again excite so much interest. The novelty of such races would, people thought, soon wear off, and the comparative failure of several of them last season seemed to bear out this expectation. The very name of Jubilee, again, had undoubtedly lost some of its freshness, since the stakes of that name had been run for a year ago. Nevertheless, a month before the race the Kempton Park Jubilee Stakes was introduced into the betting-ring, and from that time until the event was over it continued to be a fertile source of speculation. Mr. Vyner's Minting was at once established first favourite, while Thunderstorm was made second favourite at 8 to 1. During the greater part of the month that intervened between the opening of the betting and the race itself, these two horses were alternately first favourites. When Bendigo won this race last year under 9 st. 7 lbs., it was considered a wonderful performance, and Minting was now allotted 7 lbs. more. Ten stone was an enormous weight to carry in a large handicap, and the margin of 4 st. 7 lbs. between the heaviest and lightest weights was very great.

To win a handicap under 9 st. or more is a very exceptional thing. Welter handicaps are, of course, another matter; but in ordinary handicaps the best known instances of victories under such weights are soon enumerated. St. Gatien won the Cesarewitch under 8 st. 12 lbs.; Foxhall and Florence, handicapped at 9 st. and 9 st. 1 lb., won the Cambridgeshire; and Isonomy carried 9 st. 12 lbs. to victory for the Manchester Cup. Five-and-twenty years have elapsed since the Chester Cup was won under 9 st. 4 lbs. by Asteroid, who was thought to have performed an extraordinary feat. Bend Or and Master Kildare won the City and Suburban under 9 st. and 9 st. 2 lbs. The Great Metropolitan Stakes, the Lincolnshire Handicap, the Great Northamptonshire Stakes, the Liverpool Summer Cup, and many other important handicaps, had not been won, for at least a great number of years, under so heavy a burden as 9 st. A great handicap, however, had once been won under 10 st. and more. In 1869 Vespasian won the Chesterfield Cup at Goodwood under 10 st. 4 lbs., as has been pointed out by every sporting writer during the last few days; but he was hardly giving away so much weight to the best of his opponents as Minting was now to give. We only mention these facts to show what a great thing Minting was asked to do when he was handicapped at 10 st. for the Jubilee Stakes at Kempton Park. That his treatment by the handicapper was not considered unfair was shown by his position in the betting-lists, and it was evident that a large number of his backers believed last year's Ascot running between Minting and Bendigo to have been correct. Minting was generally considered to have been a very unlucky horse, and there can be little doubt that he would have won the Derby in an ordinary year. It is true that the same thing was said of The Bard, and well it might, for he was probably quite equal to the average of Derby winners. After all, perhaps Minting was not such a very unlucky horse as he was represented. As a two-year-old he won the Middle Park Plate and other races worth 7,396*l.*; as a three-year-old he won the Grand Prix de Paris of 5,904*l.*; and as a four-year-old he won the Jubilee Cup of 1,495*l.*, at Ascot. He never was beaten by any horse except Ormonde, and with regard to that almost preternatural racehorse he was no more "unlucky" than any other horse may be said to be when inferior to others. On the contrary, we should rather be inclined to say that he was a remarkably lucky horse in having only one superior; and, so far as looks were concerned, many excellent judges preferred him to Ormonde.

Thunderstorm, handicapped at 8 st., was, like his great rival, a five-year-old. His two-year-old career, while respectable enough, had been as nothing in comparison with that of Minting. He won three races as a three-year-old, but his form was then very second, if not third, rate; and as a four-year-old, although he won the same number of races and 1,676*l.* in stakes, he lost eight. His last performance of the season, however, on the 25th of November, at Manchester, was so good as to raise him greatly in public estimation. In the Lincolnshire Handicap, this spring, after starting at 33 to 1, he ran very well under 8 st. 5 lbs., and could probably have finished third if he had not been eased when his jockey found that he could not win. Being a big, heavy-framed horse, he seemed at Lincoln to want time, and it was thought that the interval of nearly a couple of months between the Lincolnshire Handicap and the Kempton Park Jubilee Stakes would make him many pounds better. For some time Tyrone, who ran third to Bendigo for this race last year under 7 st. 9 lbs., and was now to carry only 6 st. 12 lbs., was a strong third favourite, in the face of the fact that he had been unplaced for all the five other races in which he ran last season. Within a week of the race there was a report that something was wrong with him, and he became unsteady in the betting for a time; but at last he was made third favourite. Another heavily-backed horse was Gallinule, a four-year-old to whom we alluded in a former article as having been purchased last autumn for 5,100 guineas by "Mr. Abington," although he had lost every race for which he ran that season; and now he was to carry 8 st. 3 lbs.—a weight at which he might almost be said to have been handicapped rather on his price than on his performances—not a bad method of handicapping either in some instances. Many backers were also found for Lord Calthorpe's Florentino, a four-year-old handicapped at 8 st. It will be remembered that as a two-year-old he won the Middle Park Plate, in which he defeated Enterprise, the subsequent winner of the Two Thousand. In that race he himself ran very badly. At Ascot he won the St. James's Palace Stakes of 1,500*l.* from Timothy, Savile, and others; at Derby he ran "almost the same horse," to use a racing phrase, as Gloriation, the winner of the Cambridgeshire, as he gave him 3 lbs. and ran him to a neck, and in September he was easily beaten by Rêve d'Or for the Great Foal Stakes at Newmarket, on a course about a quarter of a mile beyond his distance. Upon the whole there was a great deal to be said, on public form, for his chances for the Jubilee Stakes. The handicapper had apparently handicapped him with Minting on Gloriation's form with Bendigo in the Cambridgeshire, and he seemed fully justified in so doing. At the start he was second favourite.

The weather was magnificent, and if the dust was disagreeable on the roads, everything was pleasant on the racecourse. A very great improvement had been made in the course itself. It used to be quite straight for about five furlongs, and then it took a very sharp turn to the right, ending with another straight piece. At this sharp turn several horses last year were supposed to have lost their chances, by being shut out or bumped against. The present start is almost where it used to be, but the new course bears at once to the left and continues straight for rather less than half a mile, when it makes a gentle bend to the right; then it goes on straight again for about a furlong and a half, when it makes a second and rather sharper bend, and runs into the old straight finish, just at the place where the dangerous turn used to be.

Nineteen horses came out for the race. Some time was lost in the parade and preparatory canters. Then there were several failures at the post, and the start took place nearly half an hour after the appointed time. Before they got off, Maxim was badly kicked in the stifle, and went lame for a few moments. When at last the flag fell, The Cobbler, a fine powerful four-year-old with only 6 st. 8 lbs. on his back, sprang off with the lead and made the running almost as fast as his legs could carry him. Maxim was evidently far from disabled, as he was soon going well in the front rank. So also was Minting, for, in spite of his weight, Webb did not keep him in the background in the early part of the race. Gallinule, too, was well forward, and Tyrone, Thunderstorm, and The Baron were in good positions. When they had run a quarter of a mile, The Cobbler was leading by half a dozen lengths from Maxim, Minting, and Gallinule. Thunderstorm and Florentine began to tire before half the course had been traversed, and on approaching the last bend the expensive Gallinule dropped behind Minting. Hitherto Maxim had been a good way in front of Minting, but now the favourite's head was at his quarters. On turning into the straight, The Cobbler was so far ahead of the rest of the field that the cry was raised "They will never be able to catch him," and for a moment the backers of the favourite had apparently some cause for trembling. Maxim and Minting entered the straight side by side, then came Tyrone and Phil, the colt that ran second for the Two Thousand last year, and next followed that celebrated loser of races, Isosceles, who had run twenty-one times without ever winning. Was he now going to break the spell? Then came the second in last year's Derby, but not looking very like running second this time. A quarter of a mile from home, The Cobbler was beginning to show symptoms of fatigue, while Minting was shaking off Maxim. Tyrone at the same time was making a gallant effort, although it was soon clear that he could not quite win. Just below Tattersall's enclosure Webb sent Minting to the front, and it was a grand sight when he sailed past the exhausted Cobbler and dashed up to the winning-post, an easy winner by three lengths. The judge placed Tyrone second and The Cobbler third. Many spectators were under a different impression; but, as the judge's decision is final, nothing more need be said on the subject.

Minting's victory fairly eclipsed that of Bendigo, as has been said over and over again during the past week; but it did more than this. It confirmed his form with Bendigo at Ascot; and when we consider Bendigo's extraordinary performances, not only in the Jubilee Stakes but elsewhere, and necessarily place Minting considerably above him, we not only prove Minting to be one of the best horses that has ever appeared upon the turf, but exalt his conqueror, Ormonde, to a higher pinnacle of greatness than any which he has yet occupied. Even if we admit that Ormonde was as well as he had ever been in his life when he beat Minting by a neck for the Hardwicke Stakes at Ascot last year, it cannot be denied that he ran the best horse of the pair. Few, however, would be prepared to make such an admission. At the time Ormonde was unquestionably a roarer, and the infirmity of roaring, even in a slight degree, could scarcely fail to affect a horse over a mile and a half, especially on so tiring a course as that at Ascot. On the other hand, he would be a bold man who would prophesy a more brilliant career for Ormonde than for Minting at the stud. That very roaring which we have urged in Ormonde's favour when estimating his victory over Minting is anything but a point in his favour for breeding purposes; while Minting's wonderful power, bone, and substance combined with the finest characteristics of the thoroughbred horse and devoid of the least lumber or coarseness, render him about the most attractive horse in existence, either on the turf or at the stud. With Birdcatcher at each side of his pedigree—both his great-grandsire, and his great-great-grandam, having been by that horse—two strains of Touchstone in the middle of it, and Melbourne for his dam's grandsire, Minting's blood is surely good enough to please any reasonable breeder.

THE ELECTION AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

THE election of a full member of the Royal Academy in the place of Mr. Pickersgill, who has resigned, took place at the end of last week, and resulted in the promotion of Mr. Hamo Thornycroft from among the Associates. It was generally expected that a painter would be elected, as the customary number of sculptors was already full. It seems, however, to have been felt that Mr. Thornycroft's claims, strengthened as they were on the present occasion by his beautiful statue of "Medea," should no longer be overlooked, and he has had the honour of passing over the heads of twelve Associates senior to himself. He is, if we may trust the compendiums of such information, by several years the youngest of the forty, and we congratulate the Royal Academy with having strengthened its governing body by adding to it so vigorous an artist. It is distinctly to the advantage of art throughout this country that there should be young blood on the Council of the Royal Academy.

We must defer to a later occasion our account of the "Medea" and of such other contributions to the exhibited sculpture of the year as Mr. Thornycroft has made. But we are glad of an opportunity of saying a word about the progress of sculpture in this country. The election of Mr. Thornycroft closely follows on two interesting events—the unfavourable, but inevitable, decision regarding the Chantrey Bequest, and the impassioned praise of sculpture which was the notable point of Sir Frederick Leighton's speech at the Academy banquet. It emphasizes the novel respect with which sculpture is treated in this country. A very few years ago the art received all the kicks and none of the halfpence that were going about. Now it still is sadly in lack of halfpence, but at least it gets no kicks from quarters where kicks would be dishonour. The British nation, and especially the average M.P., is still strangely in the dark as regards all plastic things, and ever will be. But the observant and cultivated part of the public has waked up to the fact that we have in England a school of sculpture which is now one of the most remarkable in Europe, and that certain of our most attractive younger artists are sculptors. Of this conscientious and original school of modellers Mr. Thornycroft is in some sort the leader. He was the first to come to the point; it is he who is still best known to the public; and the fact of his early election to the full honours of the Royal Academy is a proof, no less than the recent election of Mr. Gilbert and Mr. Onslow Ford to be A.R.A.'s, of the recognition of this new kind of sculpture by the official body. We have so often been obliged to desist from sparing the rod in dealing with the Royal Academy that it is a pleasure, as it is bare justice, to say that it has always been very generous in its treatment of sculpture. Nor should the sculptors forget how much they owe to the personal care and enthusiasm of one who is a very distinguished sculptor himself, Sir Frederick Leighton.

ISSUING SHARES AT A DISCOUNT.

A WEEK ago we discussed a decision of the Court of Appeal which had fluttered Stock Exchange and banking circles; to-day we shall call attention to another case in the same Court which concerns a larger class—all, indeed, who are interested in limited liability Companies—for it declares illegal the issue of shares at a discount. Until recently it was commonly supposed that, where the memorandum and articles of association permitted it, a Company could dispose of its shares on any terms it pleased. Lately, however, a decision was given contrary to this view, and the judgment in the Court of Appeal last Thursday, in the case of the Almada and Tirito Company, goes to establish that it is illegal under any circumstances, to issue shares at a discount. The facts of the case are as follows. The Company was in need of money, and in July last resolutions were passed for an increase of capital from 210,000 shares of 1*l.* each to 420,000 shares, also of 1*l.* each, the additional shares being credited with 18*s.* paid up. The new shares were offered to the shareholders in the proportion of one for each old share held, and an agreement was subsequently registered, containing in a schedule the names of the applicants for the shares. Some of those to whom the new shares were allotted desired to cancel the allotments, and they took proceedings to have their names struck off the list. The application was formally decided against the applicants by Mr. Justice Chitty, and was then taken to the Court of Appeal, where the three judges unanimously decided that the application must be complied with, since the Directors had acted ultra vires in issuing the shares at one-tenth of their nominal value. It seems to be admitted on all sides that the Directors had acted in good faith. They wanted more money, and were well aware that they could not issue new shares at par. They offered the shares to the old shareholders—that is, to persons who were already interested in the Company and were supposed to know its actual position; and doubtless they believed that, in offering the shares at 2*s.* each, crediting the allottees with them as fully paid up, they were conferring a benefit upon the shareholders. The judges however, in assigning reasons for their decision, declared that, even though the money was required by the Company, yet it was contrary to the Act of 1862 for the Directors to issue shares at a discount. The judgment cannot fail to check a practice which has become a very great abuse ever since the Companies Acts were passed. Respectable Boards of Directors have always refused, indeed, to sell at a discount shares which were offered to the public at par, though under exceptional circumstances even respectable Boards have sometimes issued their shares at a discount when they had previously obtained the consent of the shareholders in general meeting. But unscrupulous Boards have constantly resorted to the practice. They bring out a Company with an excessive capital, well aware that the public will not subscribe for the shares in full; they sell the shares to persons in collusion with them at a very great discount; and these persons, having the means of influencing unwary investors, gradually sell them to widows, spinsters, country clergymen, professional men, and others who are not in a position to obtain accurate information as to the real condition of the Company. It would now appear that unwary investors of this class, had they really known their rights, might have applied to have their names taken off the register, and thus defeated the unscrupulous Company promoters; but, unfortunately, unwary investors are seldom aware of their real rights, while in too many cases they learn the condition of the Companies in which they invest too late to obtain redress.

The decision, as we have just said, will throw obstacles in the way of these unscrupulous promoters and directors; but, unless the payment of excessive commissions is also declared illegal, a way will be found of avoiding the decision. A broker, or a person acting as a broker, may be given so large a commission for placing the shares of a Company that practically the shares will be sold at a considerable discount; but of course every abuse cannot be reached by a single legal decision, and it is important to have it declared law that the issuing of shares at a discount is illegal. The decision at the same time raises many embarrassing questions, and places several Companies and multitudes of shareholders in a very difficult position. As we have said, it has been until lately almost universally held that shares could be issued at a discount, and in multitudes of cases they have been so issued. From the judgment of the Court of Appeal it now appears that the original allottees of those shares are liable for the amount with which the shares have been credited. In the case, that is to say, in which a pound share is allotted as fully paid up, when in fact the amount paid upon it is only two shillings, the original allottee in case of the winding up of the Company would be liable for the full 18*s*. But what is the position of a purchaser without notice from an original allottee? The share is credited as fully paid, and the purchaser has no notice that it was issued at a discount; indeed, where the issue took place years ago, there are no means of discriminating between those shares which were issued at par and those which were issued at a discount. In what position then, would the purchaser for the current market value of such a share find himself? Could he be called upon, suppose the Company went into liquidation, for the full amount which had not been paid upon the share? It would seem clearly inequitable that he should be held liable, since he had no notice of the way in which the shares were originally allotted, and since, so far as he was concerned, it would be very difficult indeed to distinguish between the shares issued at par and the shares issued at a discount. Yet, if the ruling of the Court of Appeal is to have any practical effect, either the original allottee must be held to be liable, even though he has sold the shares perhaps years ago, or the present holder of the shares must be so held, though he may have had when buying no notice that the shares were issued at a discount, and no means of acquainting himself of the fact. Perhaps it will be found in practice that the question will arise very seldom. The Companies so placed that are wound up and have to make a call upon the shareholders are happily not very numerous. In any case, if it should be found necessary, doubtless Parliament would interfere to prevent hardship, for both the issuing of shares and their acceptance by allottees were in ignorance of the law. Another question of importance raised by this decision is as to the position of contractors and others who consent to accept shares in payment for goods or for services rendered. What is the position of such persons in case of a liquidation? If the shares have been accepted at par we presume no question could be raised, but in the majority of instances we should think that contractors and others would hardly consent to accept shares at par, especially where the Company was newly established, and the probable value of the shares could not be accurately estimated. Suppose, then, that a contractor undertaking work for an industrial company consented to accept part payment in one pound shares with ten shillings credited as paid, could the contractor, if the Company failed, be held liable for ten shillings upon the shares so allotted?

Perhaps, however, the most usual form in which the question would arise regarding shares issued at a discount is that of reorganizati n. A Company has suffered heavy losses which have swept away the greater part of its capital, and it is decided to wind-up the old Company and transfer its business to a new one. The new one may consist of the old shareholders almost exclusively, who consent to pay one or two shillings for the pound share, and are credited with eighteen or nineteen shillings; or the business may really be sold to a new Company, the new shareholders bringing working capital and paying off the debts of the old one, and the old shareholders being granted deferred shares which are credited as fully paid, except as regards sixpence or a shilling or two shillings. In either case there is a large issue of shares at a discount. What is the position of the allottees of those shares? It has been argued that the decision of the Court of Appeal does not apply to the case. The old Company is completely wound up, and its assets and liabilities sold to a new Company, the shareholders in the old Company receiving as purchase-money shares which are credited as fully paid, upon which, however, they are called upon to pay only a fraction of the nominal amount. The holders of these shares, then, seem to be in the position of the holders of vendors' shares. It is a quite common thing, for example, for patentees and others to accept in part-payment of what they have to sell vendor shares, which are credited to them as fully paid, but on which they in fact pay nothing. Whether they pay nothing at all, or whether they pay a shilling or two shillings, it is contended, does not seem to be material, and therefore it is inferred that the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of the Almada and Tirito Company does not apply. But the question which we are now discussing, it is to be recollected, was not before the Court, and how it would be decided is thereore problematical. Certainly the language of Lord Justice Cotton was wide enough to cover the issue of shares at a discount upon reorganization. Very often, no doubt, these reorganizations are as dishonest as any of the malpractices of unscrupulous promoters and directors; but happily that is not always the case. In very many instances reorganization is rendered necessary by circumstances beyond the control of the Board which proposes it, and it is the only means that can be adopted for preserving a business, which is really sound, but which at the same time never can make any adequate return upon the old capital that has practically been lost. New capital is absolutely required, and yet it would be difficult to induce the old shareholders to part with their property entirely without consideration. If there was a compulsory winding up and a forced sale the property would be entirely wasted. If, on the other hand, the winding up were voluntary, the business could be kept together and might be nursed into a handsome paying concern. The shareholders could be induced to consent to a voluntary winding up only by giving them a chance of at least a contingent profit. It is on this ground that in the bonâ fide cases of reorganization the shareholders in the old Company are offered shares issued at a large discount but credited as fully paid, and it would be unfortunate in many instances if such an arrangement were rendered impossible in the future.

THE GROSVENOR GALLERY.

II.

FACING Mr. Hacker's work in the west gallery of the Grosvenor hangs another large picture in high, bright tone, "A Noble Family of Huguenot Refugees shipwrecked on the Suffolk Coast" (30). Mr. W. F. Britten has drawn and modelled his figures with more care than Mr. Hacker, but he has not found so pleasant a scheme of colour or of composition. The wish to show their sufferings has led him to give these people most wretchedly dirty flesh tints. The sunshine, if there is any, would give their skin at least some unity of effect. However, though we see shadows on the ground, we see no sign of sunlight on the figures. He might, also, have displayed more ingenuity in adapting the arrangement of the waves to the composition; his lines of foam are hard, stiff, and undecorative. He has fallen, in fact, into the wrong kind of realism, the realism of storytelling and illustrative incident, instead of the realism of effect. In his large "Smugglers" (59) Mr. John R. Reid takes an ordinary subject from the most frequented pastures of realism, and lavishes on it all the decorative bravura which the Old Masters reserved for scenes too rich or too imaginative for common treatment. It is curious to see an everyday open-air village incident, ragged figures, the familiar fisherman and peasant girl, street stalls, and shop windows, treated with all the pomp and extravagance of colour which only the richest stuffs, the grandest composition, and the most heroic subjects can justify. This violence, unfortunately, bears no relation to the scene, and instead of elucidating, buries it in a scheme of contradictory decoration. It is painted in first-rate imitation of the grand style of accessories in some great picture by Rubens or Veronese; but then where is the picture? A great artist like Vollon understands the scope of his tastes and talents, and frankly gives you his still-life without surrounding it with the "repoussoir" of an incongruous and pretended account of a story. Mr. Reid was right to abandon realistic treatment; it is dull if not done with more subtlety of observation than he could bring to bear on it. Will he not also abandon the pretence of realistic stories and subjects? When not true the matter of realism is still duller than the manner, and can only hamper a man with his fine and genuine feeling for colours, stuffs, textures, and brushwork. Mr. Jacomb Hood in his "Triumph of Spring" (170) has taken perhaps the best and sanest view of the task imposed by a large canvas. He has found a telling division and grouping of colours and figures, light and shade. His picture is high and bright in tone, and neither black nor weak. In a few places he has a little overcharged the realism of details, but in large questions he has decided rightly as to the amount of obviousness with which truth may be presented in an imaginative work. Amongst other notable figure-pictures of smaller size we may mention the "Piazza d'Erbe, Verona" (118), of Professor Menzel, a sort of first-class Graphic illustration, full of action, character, and lively grouping; but, as a picture, sadly in need of the unity of effect which could be given by a few broad touches of light in the foreground; Mr. E. M. Hale's "In the Temple Gardens" (175), an effect of light sincerely observed and painted in good value, though somewhat hardly; Mr. W. E. Lockhart's "Pompeiian Picture" (44), excellent in the expressions of the faces and the attitudes, and coloured with a regard for truth, if with a somewhat disagreeable coldness; Mr. C. N. Kennedy's pleasantly-toned canvas, "The Mermaid" (20); Mr. Kennington's meaningless but well-drawn "Water Nymph" (47), and "A Song without Words" (1), a harmoniously coloured small canvas which does something to justify Mr. Pettie's reputation. Mr. G. D. Leslie has set his figure "Rosebuds" (90) against an open-air background, just as Mr. Clausen has set his "Ploughboy." Note the conventional wire of laky red with which the Academician makes a mouth, his flesh stippled in hot colours, his sienna shadows, and his spotty background, and then turn to the work of the young man who is ruined by imbibing the principles of French technique. We have said something of Mr. Clausen's picture in a previous article; we will do no more than point to the subtle modelling of the mouth and eyes, the truly aërial way in which the boy's head, hand, clothes, and whip are relieved from the background, and the elegant but properly subordinated treatment of the landscape itself. Mr. Leslie is not an unfair example; he draws better and feels things more genuinely than half of the Academicians. A true regard for the art of the country should lead us to welcome an improvement in technique from wherever it may spring. Let us have no false patriotism in art; it does not matter where good technique can be best learnt at present; it was, at any rate, invented centuries ago, and neither in France nor England. Amongst portraits we have specimens of the work of Sir J. Millais, Mr. Holl, Mr. Herkomer, and Mr. Richmond, which call for no special remark. Less easily seen, "His Honour Judge Collier" (61), a rather dry portrait by Mr. John Collier, is perhaps the most firm and decided piece of modelling in the gallery. Sounder form than usual underlies Mr. J. J. Shannon's dashing style in "Henry Vigne" (151). Other good portraits are Mr. Solomon's easy and clever, but not very refined, "Rev. Dr. Löwy" (180); Mr. T. Graham's very sympathetic and expressively touched "W. Q. Orchardson, Esq., R.A." (85); 173, by Mr. T. Benham, which seems in its lofty position a finely modelled head; and a fresh, lively-looking work—"Mrs. Monckton" (144)—from Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

B

In landscape from Mr. W. J. Hennessey comes "Spring" (181), most fairylike in the delicacy of its brilliant tone, in the silvery softness of its sky and apple-blossoms, and in its exquisite but logical mystery of air, which leads you from trunk to trunk into the depths of an enchantingly suggestive distance; from Mr. Mark Fisher, "Winter Fare" (165), a study of naked trees, sheep, and distance, in which a free and beautiful manner conceals so much form and value that the work may serve as an eternal protest against niggling; from Mr. A. Lemon "A Breezy Day" (189), a romantic-looking place, treated with romantic breadth and nobility of style; from Mr. Edwin Ellis a bold and majestic chalk promontory, "Full Summer, Flambro'," with a splendid breadth of foreground and a blue sky which would be none the worse for being a little more atmospheric, and from Mr. Leslie Thomson a dark rich "Moonrise" (48), and two lovely little compositions, "Essex" (301) and "Morning" (283). These are perhaps the best; but, in addition, Mr. A. Stokes has given us a well-drawn and atmospheric study of pines in "When the Bracken rusted on the Marge" (32); Mr. Rattray a fine sky in "When the Wavelets kiss the Pebbly Shore" (42); Mr. J. Aumonier an admirably harmonious scheme of colour in "Silver Night" (6); Mr. Henry Simpson a fresh, bold, and true account of "A Winter's Day, Morocco" (28), in which the difficult values of a southern middle distance are by no means scamped; and Mr. J. E. Christie a very graceful representation of a girl in a boat, "The Old Boat House" (55). We have not space to give a detailed account of good work by Messrs. Napier Hemy, Alfred East, Anderson Hague, Henry Moore, F. Hind, Hugh Wilkinson, J. H. Snell, W. E. Norton, and several others.

DRAMATIC RECORD.

MRS. BERNARD-BEERE'S Peg Woffington, which she is playing for a series of matinées at the Opera Comique, shows a distinct improvement on her previous assumption of this interesting and effective character. Unfortunately, however, the very nature of the part enables her to indulge in all those restless and fidgety habits which go so far to spoil what otherwise would be so charming in her acting. She is so well endowed by nature with exceptional gifts that we are surprised to find her persistently neglecting one of the greatest of all histrionic arts—repose. Her sense of humour was well displayed throughout in Masks and Faces, and it would be difficult to dance the famous jig with greater spirit. In every detail of the scenes with Triplet and his hungry family Mrs. Bernard-Beere was excellent, and the Triplet of Mr. Neville is a very natural and effective piece of acting. He carefully avoids the "cant" in which most actors who play this particular part usually think fit to indulge, and is manly and interesting, even if he is hungry and generally "grubby." Miss Kate Vaughan was a bewitching Mabel, and was notably excellent in the scene in which she forces the jealous Peg to yield to her persuasions. There is not much to be said for the Sir Charles Pomander of M. Marius; but Messrs. D. Denison and William Farren, jun., were capital, especially in the last two acts. Mr. William Herbert was a refined and sympathetic Vane.

That most affected of plays, The Lady of Lyons, was given on Tuesday afternoon at the Olympic, with a view of introducing Miss Annie Rose (Mrs. Horace Nevill) in the part of Pauline Deschapelles. She has evidently placed herself under very able tuition, and if her Pauline was far from perfect, it was in many ways admirable. Her voice was soft and melodious, and her elocution distinct and varied. She moves with ease and grace, and has acquired a very rare art among English actresses, that of repose. She, at least, can stand still in an easy and dignified attitude, and her general knowledge of technique is excellent. In the earlier scenes she manifested the possession of unusually poetic feeling, but the two scenes in the cottage were beyond her strength, and her enunciation became a trifle monotonous. Mrs. Nevill had the good sense to surround herself with a capable company. Mr. Forbes Robertson made a decidedly good Claude Melnotte. Mr. Fernandez vulgarized Damas, and there is nothing to be said in favour of the impersonators of M. or Mme. Deschapelles. A word of praise, however, is due to the pleasant Widow Melnotte of Mrs. H. Leigh.

A special matinée was held on Wednesday at the Criterion for the production of two new plays by Mr. J. H. Campbell. In The Viper on the Hearth the author has endeavoured to tell in one act the story of a girl who treacherously intercepts the love-letters of her friend and rival. Inasmuch as her [illegible] affect the happiness of [illegible] persons, and the interests of [illegible], who are all introduced into the play as leading characters, the limits of the piece do not admit of an adequate explanation of the plot. The confusion is made more irritating by the stilted dialogue, which is altogether too melodramatic for a piece of this kind. The Deputy, a three-act farcical comedy, might, on the other hand, be compressed into one act. Mr. Campbell has followed the lines of A Man with Three Wives and other plays of the same kind with which Criterion audiences are familiar. He entirely lacks, however, the skill to create a humorous dramatic situation, and his conception of appropriate dialogue is not more happy than when he is handling a pathetic subject. Both plays were exceptionally well acted and mounted, but it cannot be said that they justified their production.

TWO EXHIBITIONS.

THE Italian Exhibition, of which we have heard a great deal during the past few months, and which owes its origin entirely to the initiative and energy of an Englishman, Mr. J. R. Whitley, was opened on Saturday afternoon last by the Lord Mayor in State. Although far from complete, the Exhibition is even now extremely interesting in every department. The picture galleries are magnificent, and contain many works of exceptional merit, and very few which are entirely bad. The prevailing tone, as a rule, is high, and some of the pictures speak well for the progress which Italy has made in art since the completion of her unity in 1870. The immense works representing subjects in Roman and Sicilian history by Signor Sciuti, which fill one room, are likely to attract considerable attention. They are very fine, and are painted with a power and a brilliance of colour which, unfortunately, is almost unknown amongst our own artists, and notwithstanding their huge proportions they do not offend, a defect so frequently found in works of art of such unusual magnitude. There is certainly enough to see in these picture galleries for several days, and whilst we think that the Italian artists might take a lesson from our own in carefulness of finish, there is no question but that they in their turn can teach us a great deal. The portraits, however, we noticed in our somewhat casual visit are, as a rule, inferior. In the statue gallery the most remarkable group sent is Monteverde's of Jenner vaccinating a child. This is singularly powerful. The exhibits, which number nearly three thousand, have been very well classified by Mr. Whitley so as to represent the various provinces, and the decorations of the building are in good taste and unpretentious. The carved furniture, glass, wrought-iron, bronze, and other articles of a like description have never been surpassed at any previous exhibition. The furniture strikes us as being not only handsomely ornamented, but admirably finished. The most remarkable feature in all these objects for the embellishment of the house is the originality of their designs. The specimens of Venetian lace sent are magnificent, and the silks and brocades are quite up to the mark of the many specimens we still possess of those for which Italy was celebrated in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. In short, many pleasant hours and even days can be passed in this Exhibition with profit; there is so much to see that is of value and interest.

The gardens have been beautifully decorated, so as to recall somewhat vaguely perhaps those which are so common in Italy, in which architecture takes up quite as much space as horticulture. There is a large panorama of the Roman Forum, by Signor Liverani, which would be all the more realistic if he were to darken the shadows, so as to make its architectural features stand out in bolder relief. As we see it now it appears a little flat. The switchback runs through snow-capped Alps, and beneath one of the rustic bridges there is an excellent representation of the "Blue Grotto" at Capri. The large theatre will not be opened for another fortnight, and then the marionettes and fantoccini will doubtless delight the multitude. The immense section to be devoted to what are called comestibles, groceries, wines, candles, &c., is the least advanced part of the Exhibition; but in a few days, like the rest of the building, it will be in perfect order. Messrs. Bertram & Roberts have made arrangements with certain Italian cooks of note, who will ere long arrive, and who will prepare for us "Maccheroni alla Napolitana" and "Risotto alla Milanese," and other national dishes, and these we shall be able to wash down with Chianti, Falerno, Lacryma Christi, or sparkling Asti. We hear nothing definite relative to the arena, where Buffalo Bill and his Indian friends disported themselves last year. Surely it will soon open its portals for some entertainment or other which shall recall the pastimes of Italy in days gone by, and for which this vast amphitheatre is so well suited? At night the Italian Exhibition gardens, which are charmingly illuminated and made gay with music—including, by the way, a clever troupe of Neapolitan singers—will form one of the most attractive lounges of a season which threatens otherwise to be one of the dullest on record.

To celebrate the Silver Wedding of the Prince and Princess of Wales, and with a view of assisting Her Royal Highness in her endeavours to suitably endow the British Home for Incurables at Clapham—a charity which is associated with her name, since it was the first to which she gave her patronage a few weeks after her arrival in England twenty-five years ago—an Exhibition, called the Anglo-Danish, has been opened in the gardens of the Horticultural Society at South Kensington. The inaugural ceremony was performed by the Prince and Princess of Wales, accompanied by several members of the Royal Family, and, thanks to the energy of Mr. A. J. [illegible] and others, it was made truly impressive. It took place in the Albert Hall, and Mme. Albani sang "Home, Sweet Home," and Mlle. Otta Bronnum, a Danish young lady, who wore the Amager costume, sang a very pretty national song, the words of which are by Hans Christian Andersen. She has a peculiar Northern voice, with exceptionally sweet high notes. The Exhibition itself is arranged in the quadrants which surround the gardens, and is not of great importance, and is chiefly remarkable for the paucity of Danish objects it contains. There is, however, an excellent gallery of Danish pictures, to which we shall return on a future occasion. In the gardens there is a Danish village, said to be an exact reproduction of Amager, which is picturesque and well contrived. There is a switchback railway, too, which runs through very high mountains of canvas, above whose snowy peaks the "cloud-capped towers" of the Natural History Museum appear as imposingly as if in a vision by Martin. A toboggan slide, a representation of Ophelia's well, recently discovered by that venturesome traveller, Sarah Bernhardt, and Hamlet's grave, are also objects worthy of visitation. We must not forget the theatre, which has been built of pinewood, possibly imported from Denmark, in the Court so long associated with China, and which alone of all the aggregation of buildings which formed the bygone exhibitions remains intact. Here some exquisitely grouped tableaux vivants, representing scenes from Hans Christian Andersen's stories, have been arranged by Mr. Savile Clarke, who, as all the world knows, is a past master in the art of organizing entertainments of this kind. These will prove one of the chief attractions of an exhibition which, after all, is but a charming disguise assumed by charity to assist one of the most amiable of Princesses in furthering a good work.

STAGE SCIENCE.

VI.

THE art of "making up" for the stage is much more difficult to acquire than most people imagine, and it is also one which as a rule is, unfortunately, very little understood in this country. English actors usually paint their faces very carelessly, indeed coarsely, and the present general use of grease-paint, or crayon gras, is detrimental, if not to the health, certainly to the acting itself. Mlle. Clairon, the famous French actress of the last century, makes the following observations in her well-known but little-read Mémoires :—"I was always of opinion," says she, "that the less paint or powder an actor or actress employs the better. Some of our histrions cover their faces with preparations of grease so thickly that it is impossible for them to give expression to the more subtle emotions. How can they do so when all the lines of their faces are filled up with oily paste? For my part, I never used when acting anything but a little poudre de riz, rouge when necessary, and burnt cork mixed with crème de Ninon [evidently a preparation of cold cream of the eighteenth century and so called], with which to darken my eyebrows and eye-lashes; otherwise, no actress of my time used less of those numerous preparations which are now so greatly abused upon our stage." The chief result of this scant acquaintance with the materials which over-fill the "make-up" box was possibly the celebrity Mlle. Clairon obtained as being an actress of singularly subtle expression. The skin of her face, not being clogged with grease and other cosmetics, remained flexible, and she was able to display a variety of delicate shades of emotion which those actors whose faces are concealed by a mask can never hope to express. To come to another instance nearer our own time, Mlle. Rachel, it is a well-known fact that this transcendent actress scarcely used powder or paint at all. She darkened her eyebrows and eye-lashes, and that was about all; but her skin was naturally sallow, and looked deathly white by gaslight. When she wished to appear particularly haggard, she was wont to take burnt cork and rub a little of it softly into the hollows of her cheeks and temples. Of course, in many characters it is absolutely necessary for an artist to use the fard or grease—as, for instance, when playing such parts as Othello, Aïda, or Azucena—but even in these it should be used sparingly, and the greatest care taken to efface the shiny look it often produces. When The Winter's Tale was recently revived, one of the principal actors rendered himself ridiculous by neglecting to tone down the "gloss," and the consequence was that he shone, as was impertinently remarked rather loudly by an occupant of the gallery, like a novel kind of fly-catcher. Men have undoubtedly to "make up" a great deal more than women, who usually play young characters, whereas it very often occurs that a young man has to impersonate an old one, and not unfrequently vice versâ. The great Frédérick took many hours to "make up" his face. It is recorded of him that he would take a picture of the part he was to play with him into his dressing-room as early as two o'clock in the afternoon, and not finish his preparations until it was time for the curtain to rise. In one of his most celebrated impersonations, that of Warner in Trente Ans, his make-up was so astonishing that Charles Dickens tells us, in one of his letters, that it absolutely amazed him to see how gradually he appeared to grow older and older until the last act arrived, in which the prematurely aged gambler meets his horrible fate. But Frédérick was so extremely careful that even at a distance of two yards it would have been difficult to detect the paint and other accessories with which he transformed himself from a young to an old man. Another great artist who devoted much time to disguising her face was Mme. Ristori, whose regular features enabled her to assume with extraordinary success an idealized likeness to the heroic and historical personages whose parts she generally acted. Nothing could exceed the minute care and delicacy with which she worked to make herself strikingly like Mary Stuart, for instance. Seated in front of a looking-glass, with all her boxes of powders and pastes and her brushes systematically arranged on the toilet-table, she would literally copy upon her own face all the lines which she saw in a fine picture of Mary Stuart which was placed close by her. Her most striking "make-up," however, was that of Elizabeth. She had purchased, at great expense, when in England, several excellent original pictures of Queen Bess, taken at various periods of her life, and also a great number of engravings, and when she played Giacometti's tragedy, she had all her pictures with her, and between the acts, with surprising rapidity, painted according to them, so that the spectators saw her grow old from act to act, and in the last scene, in which she died, her reproduction on her own face and figure of the ravages of remorse was quite appalling. "It is so important," Mme. Ristori once remarked, "for an actress to be careful in this matter. I have seen a fine situation destroyed by the slovenly way in which a wig has been put on, the joint across the forehead being so perceptible as to completely destroy all illusion. I remember once assisting at the performance of one of the greatest actresses of our time, who was, however, very negligent of her 'make-up.' She was playing La Dame aux Camélias, and, notwithstanding all her genius, spoilt all the pathos of her part because she had forgotten to take the rouge off; so that she looked quite blooming to the end of the piece." But Mme. Ristori perhaps carried her talent for "making up" occasionally a little too far, for in the last scene of Elizabeth she used to blacken her teeth by means of pieces of sticking plaster, which, although realistic, was horribly ghastly. The late Miss Charlotte Cushman's Meg Merrilies was another instance of perfect "make-up." This lady was frequently engaged the entire afternoon in preparing herself for her evening triumph. She had a very clever theory that, in order to appear old upon the stage, the wisest thing was to carefully study the lines indicated by nature on one's face, which, she very rightly remarked, time would deepen only too soon. Anybody older than twenty-five may see in a looking-glass a number of lines and wrinkles which will deepen imperceptibly as time goes on. If they frown or pretend to cry, these will be emphasized at once. It is into these that the darkening material should be introduced with great skill and care if a realistic picture of age is to be produced. Most actors paint lines to indicate age quite independently of those which nature traces day by day in every human countenance, and a double set of wrinkles is frequently the unsatisfactory result. Three contemporary actors deserve the greatest credit for their exceptionally careful study of the art of making up—Mr. Henry Irving, Mr. Brookfield, and Mr. Beerbohm Tree. They at least take care that even the strongest opera-glass shall not destroy the illusion they intend to create. Many of our best actresses paint most carelessly. They usually redden their lips with a hideous cherry paste, which often looks quite revolting. The white is put on carelessly, so that the natural colour of the flesh is left behind the ears, and they rouge either too much or too little. The black about the eyes is put on so thickly as at times to quite clog the eyelids and to kill all expression, save that of the idiotic stare of an ill-made waxwork. Without entering into further particulars, we will make one concluding observation, and it is, that the artist would do well if he were, when "made up," to ask some friend to carefully see that the audience has not a chance of detecting where the "make-up" begins and ends, and, above all, that there is no crease above the forehead where the join of the wig can be seen, as was recently the case with M. Coquelin when he played in La Joie fait Peur, a piece of negligence on the part of so great an actor which can only be accounted for by some untoward circumstance. With regard to costume, this is a subject which all artists ought to study much more minutely than they do. There are innumerable books on costume, of which possibly the best are Planché's, and the more recent work by Racinet; but even these are not sufficient, and a clever artist will discover in the works of the old masters many valuable hints for costumes of past times. The paintings of the early Italian school, from Fra Angelico to Pinturicchio (so admirably reproduced by the Arundel Society), will enable him to select costumes of infinite beauty, grace, and distinction of colour of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries; and in the curious pictures of Botticelli he will find endless hints for effects which are ignored by the ordinary costumier, who is apt to have very broad and general notions of costume, usually derived from vulgar fashion-plates. The pictures of Holbein, Titian, Paul Veronese, and the other masters of the sixteenth century will suggest, not only beautiful patterns, but splendid designs. And for that very picturesque period which has been so much neglected by the stage, and which is known among artists as the "Vandyke," the paintings of this great master, especially the earlier ones executed in Genoa, will afford admirable models; and so will the delightful prints of Holler, most of which have been reproduced, or the originals of which, together with endless others, are to be found in the Print-room of the British Museum. As we have said in a previous article, it is not for the costumier to select the dress, but for the real artist to dictate to the tradesman what materials he should choose and how they should be "made up."

RICHTER CONCERTS.

DR. RICHTER has been induced this season, in consideration of the weakness of British flesh, to change the hours at which his concerts begin from eight to half-past eight. This having been conceded, it is painful and humiliating to have to record the fact that the first number in the programme is still as heretofore regarded by the audience as a sort of voluntary—an aptly furnished excuse for the exchange of friendly converse, and an appropriate stimulant for persons with jaded nervous systems, kindly provided to enable them to cope with the stowage of their hats and shawls. Such an attitude on the part of a large audience is irritating enough when the "Kaiser Marsch" is played, but becomes simply unendurable at a concert opening with the Egmont Overture. Of the "Kaiser Marsch," broadly regarded as a composition, we can say nothing differing from our already expressed opinion; but it was invested with majesty and pathos by Dr. Richter's wonderful handling of it on May 7th, when the present season of these concerts was opened. We have more than once had to complain during former seasons of this great conductor's leaning towards the adoption of tempi of a dangerous and excessive speed. It is probably owing to a more perfect reliance upon his orchestra that this perhaps originally unavoidable defect has now totally vanished, with a very marked result in the magnificently impressive rendering of the Fifth Symphony at the first concert this year. We may say in particular that we have never heard the scherzo and finale so marvellously played on any former occasion, with such unerring precision, strong passion, and noble control. The programme included Pagner's Address from the Meistersinger, Berlioz's Carnaval Romain Overture, Hagen's "Wacht" from the Götterdämmerung, and that wild creation of devilry and forest fire, Liszt's Fourth Hungarian Rhapsody, played in a true spirit and with faultless perfection, and on which we can bestow no higher praise than that unconsciously conveyed by an austere person in blue spectacles who remarked that "It was not music to bring forward at a respectable concert." There was a slight tendency towards heaviness in the rendering of the Carnaval Romain, of which Dr. Richter has given more brilliant interpretations on former occasions. Speaking of the overtures of Berlioz, it is much to be regretted that the Overture to Benvenuto Cellini is not more often to be met with in concert répertoires; it is indisputably one of the great musical creations of the present century, and never fails to make a profound impression when it is adequately interpreted. Pagner's Address and Hagen's "Wacht" were alike admirably sung by Mr. Henschel; but the latter excerpt, full of beauty and interest as it is, suffers great injury in being nakedly presented without the context.

Of the execution of last Monday's programme it is difficult to speak in terms of sufficiently high praise. It included the Egmont Overture, the Introduction and closing scene from Tristan und Isolde, the Walküren Ritt, and the closing scene from the Götterdämmerung. The second half of the concert was devoted to Mr. Stanford's Irish Symphony, faultlessly played, concerning which further comment is not now necessary. Perfect enjoyment of the most masterly and poetic interpretation of the Tristan Introduction which Dr. Richter has yet given us was somewhat marred by the ominous uncertainty of the strings at the commencement; but the conclusion was in every way admirable, and the "Ritt" was played with a majesty and fire which cannot be forgotten by those who were present on this occasion. Brass, strings, and wood wind were alike perfect. Dr. Richter has never afforded a more striking instance of his incomparable power of playing on the orchestra, and all the delicate tracery of the orchestration which seems to have been woven out of driving mist and the sheen of spears was developed with exquisitely balanced discretion and power. It would not be easy even under more favourable conditions to secure a more adequate performance of the closing scene from the Götterdämmerung. This scene is so complete in itself, and consists to such a considerable extent of a recapitulation of what has gone before in the Cyclus, that it suffers comparatively little by being transferred to the concert-room, and we know of no grander example of Wagner's later work that could be put before those who have not the opportunity of hearing the opera in its integrity. Great praise is due to Miss Pauline Cramer for her excellent achievement in the difficult task of singing Brünnhilde's music on the concert platform. Of the broad and noble style in which the Beethoven Overture was interpreted it seems almost unnecessary to speak, while it appears doubly urgent to protest against the indecency of interrupting such music by laying tardy siege, carried out in a dire spirit, to the seats in St. James's Hall.

REVIEWS.

CELTIC MYTHOLOGY.*

CELTIC mythology has ever been of all mythologies the most obscure. Even the learning and patience of Professor Rhŷs, in his Hibbert Lectures, do not seem to make the Celtic faiths and legends much more intelligible. In Celtic a bard and an idiot have always been persons whom slender boundaries divide, and their handling of legend is as confusing as it is often picturesque and imaginative. The sources of Celtic myth are three. First, we have the records of Cæsar and references in Lucian, Lucan, and other classical writers. They studied Celtic religion when it had already begun to identify its gods with the departmental deities of Rome, a process which the Romans naturally abetted. This in itself is fatal to clearness. Before the Romans and Gauls were much in contact, it is certain enough that the latter, like most races in the higher barbarism, had assigned natural departments—war, love, commerce, meteorology, and so forth—to their divinities. On meeting the Romans they would find similar Latin gods of divers departments. They would thus identify the deities of the two faiths, just as Herodotus identifies Greek gods with those of Egypt, of Scythia, and of other countries, just as Sahagun found a Mars, a Ceres, and the rest among the Aztecs. But the identifications would be incomplete, naturally. Hence confusion when we find a Gaulish Jupiter or Hercules or Mars with what seem inappropriate symbols. It is evident that both the classical descriptions of gods and the notices in the second source of information—Gallo-Roman inscriptions in temples, on altars, on jewels—must be made perplexing by this habit of identification. Nor does the philological analysis of Gaulish divine names help us very much more than usual; for all such analyses, with their interpretations, are more or less conjectural. We may think that Professor Rhŷs's conjectures are ingenious and plausible, but we can hardly say that they do more at most than raise a presumption in favour of his hypothesis in each case. An author so candid and so open-minded will probably be the first to acknowledge this. Then we come to the third source of knowledge—the wandering, chaotic Sagas of early Welsh and Irish literature. These, as we possess them, are Christian in form, and they are severed by a great gulf of time and change from even the half-Romanized religion of Gaul in Cæsar's time. How much do the Sagas contain of pure Celtic divine mythology? Can we regard these vaporous heroes, locally seated in Ireland, Scotland, or Wales, as late forms of old Gaulish gods? Professor Rhŷs tries to disengage the elements of more ancient divine myth from much more recent heroic myth. But he seldom wins an assent to his conclusions, and we are not persuaded that the Nuds and Gwydions and Diarmaits, with their ladies, were ever Sky or Sun gods or heroes or maidens of the Dawn. In fact, considering Professor Rhŷs's partiality for the anthropological school of mythologists, it is amazing to find how he still lingers with Sun heroes and Dawn maidens. Not that the anthropologist denies the existence of such beings; but he does deny that they are so thick on the ground, and that they take such numerous disguises. In truth, the Irish and Welsh heroic tales (as in the Mabinogion) are much more like highly irresponsible novels of the early middle ages, with isolated pieces of very old folklore, than like Aryan sun-myths and dawn-myths of any sort or degree. However, the stories are very good reading, if the prodigality of superfluous and rather puerile fancy be allowed for. They are less like dreams than like nightmares of genius, and many an English reader who never met them before will thank Professor Rhŷs for the introduction.

Much the most satisfactory part of the Lectures is the first division, where Cæsar and the Inscriptions have driven some piles into the quaggy bog of Celtic antiquities. Professor Rhŷs begins with a summary of what Cæsar says about the gods he found in Gaul, and then checks that summary and a few other Latin texts by the Inscriptions, elucidating the whole by his learning in Celtic etymology. This is the shortest and far the most solid part (though doubtless not the most amusing part) of a massive volume. We start with Mercury—the Mercurius Artaius of an inscription found among some Roman ruins near Beaucroissant, in the Isère. What is "Artaius"? Did the god take his name from a place (e.g. Artay) or give to a place his name? Professor Rhŷs prefers the latter hypothesis; "for one can hardly be wrong in associating with Artio's name such a Celtic word as the Celtic âr, 'plough land,' whence it would seem by no means improbable that Mercurius Artairus was the Gallo-Roman title of the god called Mercurius Cultor in an inscription from Würtemberg." It may be—

We can but say it may be so
To every theory propounded—

but it may also be a place-name, or anything else. Again, when we read "Vasso Galate" as the name of a temple, in Gregory of Tours, Galate may be the Caleti of a Rhenish inscription, and Caleti may be the genitive of an adjective meaning "hard," and Vasso may be "equated" with the Welsh word gwas, Irish foss, Sanskrit Vastu, and Vasso-calet (Vasso Galate) may have meant "the hard mansion, or hard palace, perhaps one should rather say the hard temple." But when Professor Rhŷs says that it "must" have meant this, then one can only regret that the methods of philology do not appeal to us with this constraining force. The building in question was thick, the walls were thirty feet thick, but was it called "the hard temple"? As in trying to find a meaning for the word "Ogam" (p. 19) we advance no further than plausible guesses and analogies which the first rival philologist who comes along may meet with different guesses, not less plausible. However, it is most interesting to learn that our old friend Theodoric may have attracted into his legend (as distinct from his actual history) stories really belonging to "the Gaulish

* Celtic Mythology. (The Hibbert Lectures for 1886.) By John Rhŷs, Professor of Celtic in the University of Oxford. London: Williams & Norgate.

Apollo," one of whose names he bore. Toutiorix was the Gaulish Apollo, and the word "can only mean king of the people." The notion "is borne out by the general similarity between the mythic statements made about Dietrich and what is known in Celtic literature about Celtic Sun-gods."

Perhaps a yet more unexpected equation is that which (in a roundabout way) connects Camelot with Ouranos, if Camulodunum be Camelot. Camulodunum is "the stronghold of Camulos." Now Camulos must (Professor Rhŷs says "must") "be equated with the old Saxon Hímil, and the German word Himmel, heaven or sky, which etymologists refer to a stem, hem, Aryan Kam, inferred to mean 'curving, vaulting, or covering over.' . . . As a personal name, Camulos has its etymological equivalent in that of Cumal, King-warrior of Ireland and father of the great Finn, whose doings occupy so much room in Goidelic story. The name is to be compared in the first instance with that of Οὐρανος, or Uranus, and the Sanskrit Varunas; but as that of a Celtic Mars one should undoubtedly regard it as a synonym rather of the Greek Zeus or Italian Jove, both of which names were expressive also of the idea of the sky or the heavens. . . . There is further evidence to prove beyond doubt the identity of the Teutonic Tiu with the Celtic war-god under another name than Camulos, but the discussion of it must be postponed." Professor Rhŷs infers that the Celtic Jupiter had functions which in Roman religion belong rather to Mars. He compares to Pluto, or Dis, the Celtic Cernunnos, and here his ingenuity seems a little too fertile. Why did Cernunnos squat, and why had he horns? Professor Rhŷs thinks him akin to the Norse deity, Heimdal, who has two names, "which are said to mean a ram," and rams have horns. But whence was the idea of a horned god of the nether world derived? "As the first in point of order in space . . . he may have been originally pictured as a huge elk or a gigantic urus sitting quietly under the weight of the world." He may; but the conjecture is too aerial. So Professor Rhŷs tries another guess. "Having due regard to the god's connexion or identity with the earth—that is to say, with the solid ground—one should rather suppose the horns with which the god was endowed to be the mythical exponents of the hills and mountains which diversify the surface of the globe."

Each theory could not possibly be more hypothetical. Meanwhile we have the analogy of the Ram-god of Egyptian Thebes, who appears to have inherited the attributes of the beast locally worshipped and locally never eaten except in a yearly solemnity. We have no guess at all as to why Cernunnos was horned; but perhaps not to guess is an attitude as scientific as to invent hypotheses incapable of being tested or demonstrated.

The greater part of Professor Rhŷs's lecture is concerned with the heroic legends of Ireland and Wales. It is his opinion, and perhaps the majority of the learned agree with him, that the mythic kings of Britain and Ireland are shadows of the elder Celtic gods. We confess that we are not inclined to believe, à priori, that this has been the rule of mythical development. These wild legends in early forms may have been current about heroes even while, before Cæsar's time, the gods retained their honours. In any case, so very much local incident and colour has been introduced into the Welsh and Irish legends that we never could feel any certainty as to what elements, if any, are ancient and theological, what are recent and fanciful. For example, Nuada of the silver hand, King of the Fir Bolg or Bagmen, had lost a hand in war. Tiu also lost a hand in the mouth of Fenris's wolf, and Zeus had his tendons cut by Typho, and the lady in M. Fortuné du Boisgobey's La Main Coupée had her hand cut off, like the girl in the old French chanson populaire. But we cannot agree with Professor Rhŷs that because Tiu had his hand bitten off and Zeus had his tendons cut, therefore "the stories, you will see, differ considerably, but they are sufficiently similar to make it in the highest degree probable that the Irish Nuada is to be equated with Tiu and Zeus—in other words, Nuada may be safely regarded as a Celtic Zeus or Jupiter." No; we see neither the probability nor the safety of such inferences; above all, as Nuada's case is connected with a law which denied the crown to any maimed man. Other proofs turn on the hypothesis that Eogan Mor is a "Sun-hero," which we do not feel tempted to concede. Nor, if Irish fable has a tale of a man who carried about a fair lady in a glass case (p. 145), are we at all led to hold that he is the sun any more than the geni with the lady in the glass case in the Arabian Nights was the sun. But Professor Rhŷs is very bold, and says that the glass case "seems to be a sort of picture of the expanse of the heavens lit up by the light of the sun; and in the Mac Oc, going about with his glass structure, we have a representation of the Aryan Zeus in his original character of god of the Sun and Daylight." But how early did the Celtic branch of the "Aryan race" become acquainted with glass, not in cups and dishes, but in quantities large enough to box a lady up in? To us the tale seems a mere romantic invention, as in Grimm's fairy tale of the pretty girl in the sepulchre of glass.

We differ endlessly with Professor Rhŷs; but about his learning, candour, and frankness there can be no difference. His "must be's" do not always appear even "may be's" to us; but, if he has theorized beyond what may be known, all that is actually known he sets forth in a very attractive form. The book is excellently printed, has a capital index, and is rich in old stories of the romantic age in Ireland. It is extremely readable, even if we cannot believe in the Sun-heroes, and the Dusk-maidens, and Dawn-maidens.

NOVELS.*

If any person should entertain the idea of reading these three novels consecutively, he is recommended to take them in the reverse order to that in which they are here considered. After a conscientious perusal of such works as will be presently discussed it is a treat to read so good a novel as The Blacksmith of Voe. Approximately speaking, it is everything that an everyday novel ought to be, and nothing that it ought not to be. It is not a work of genius inculcating moral principles, and worthy to be read again and again until it has become part of the lives of the cultivated, and until some degree of familiarity with its personages and events is a necessary element in a genteel education. Nor is it a disguised pamphlet about anything. It is just a straightforward ordinary story, told with animation and humour, in which we sympathize agreeably with virtue, and contemn the blackness and injudiciousness of sin. It interests, it amuses, and it does not teach. It is arranged with a suitable degree of skill, and written in good English. If there were more like it, it would be good for circulating libraries, and the vituperative talent—be the same greater or less—of reviewers would be less frequently exercised. Having justly signified so much in Mr. Cushing's favour, we may fairly point out to him that in his "prologue" he tells a falsehood. The miller of Voe having dropped a big stone on the head of his brother, the shepherd of Voe, whereby the latter has tumbled down a cliff, is said to "make his way down to his murdered brother." This is a definite assertion that the shepherd was dead, and that assertion is not true. It is legitimate for a novelist to deceive his reader, but he must deceive him by telling the truth in an artful manner. A convention of long standing has secured to novelists the right of describing as "lifeless" people who are not really dead, but their license goes no further. In this instance there is nothing to suggest Mr. Cushing's untruthfulness. Murders are often committed in prologues, and if Abel Boden had actually perished as he is here said to have Mr. Cushing would have been quite equal to the task of making a story out of the consequences. Without overlooking the sinfulness of deliberate deceit, we may acknowledge that the author does what he can to minimize his offence by confessing it immediately after the outset of his story. The shepherd of Voe comes back in twenty years, and becomes—nominally—the blacksmith of Voe, his identity being promptly revealed to the reader, but of course withheld for a time from the inhabitants of the village. The period of his absence has been sufficient for his son and his wicked brother's daughter to grow old enough to be interesting; and the blacksmith, the miller, and their respective offspring are obviously equal to the exigencies of three volumes. There is only one adventure, and nothing very startling in the way of complications. Two other personages substantially make up the caste—a cultured gentleman of leisure and his sister, rejoicing in the astonishing names of Balthasar and Janoca Phythian. They are both extremely good company, Balthasar, who is a rambling sort of philosopher, being the more amusing, and Janoca the more attractive as a human being, though each is favoured in both respects. The worst personage, in all senses of the word, is the miller. His remorse and his reflections concerning his crime are depicted with a reiteration of small symptoms which is a little tiresome; but the blacksmith, without being very new, is at once estimable and good company; and the young people and their affections manage to deserve the sympathy of the well-regulated without becoming dull. The scene of the romance is Derbyshire, the landscape is dealt with adequately and often, the local colouring is kept within proper bounds, and there is a rather good second villain, called Am Ende, to whom ultimately nothing happens. Mr. Cushing, by the way, is not happy in his nomenclature. To call a bad man Am Ende, and make small jokes about the desirability of his am-ending his conduct, is unworthy of the merits of the story. We have said that Mr. Cushing's English is good. His French—at least "un mal quart d'heure"—is not good; but there is very little of it. The conclusion of the whole matter is that the story is good, and deserves to be read.

The Parting of the Ways is rather mad. No particular ways part in it, but the slovenliness of its title is perhaps the least of its faults. It contains two principal characters. Mr. Rapham, at the opening of the story, appears, out of the African parts of the Ewigkeit, with boundless wealth, which he has amassed there by slave-dealing. Subject to the disdain with which his friends, and the author, regard that branch of commerce, he is the ordinary parvenu millionaire of contemporary fiction. He "lives by contract," which means that his house, his food, his carriages, his men-servants and maid-servants, and everything that is his, are supplied by somebody in the nature of Mr. Whiteley; and much heavy fun is made out of the circumstance. The other important personage is Miss Norrice Bee, who presently marries an imbecile politician of ancient lineage, bearing the patrician name of Villedieu. Before doing so she has invented a machine, she being a mechanician of no ordinary skill. How it worked is not explained; but it is made too apparent that she devised it at the special instigation of Professor Stokes, and to the great displeasure of Mr. Karl Pearson, and, moreover, against the peace of mind of Sir William Grove, his fame and dignity, and contrary to the law of the conservation of forces in that case made and provided. It was nothing less than a machine for abolishing weight. It enabled mothers to carry their babies, soldiers to carry their knapsacks, slenderly framed young ladies to carry arm-chairs containing portly officials from the War Office, without feeling any weight whatever or incurring the least fatigue. It was a simple arrangement of straps and buckles, and either had or had not, at some stage in its activity, something to do with an electric battery. It was generally agreed that this invention would turn the world upside down, and indeed no reason appears why the first purchaser of it who felt disposed to do so should not have picked up this entire planet and walked away with it, whistling the Boulanger march; but it is not recorded to have produced any very startling results. Profits arose from its sale, and were cruelly appropriated by the ex-slave-merchant, and subsequently restored to the injured heroine; but that might have happened with her second great invention, which was nothing more startling than a mechanical washerwoman. This sort of absurdity is an insult to the reader. A novel can have no merit unless the things related can be imagined as having really happened. Therefore, a novelist who should make his hero jump over the moon or drink up the Serpentine would be justly condemned as a writer of mere nonsense, and Miss M. Betham-Edwards must on the present occasion be reluctantly relegated to that dismal category. Apart from the invention the story is dull, and written with a strangely uncertain hold upon the mysteries of the British tongue. A less novel, but hardly less objectionable, phrase is achieved on the death of the wicked slave-merchant when we are informed that "the spirit of the liberticide passed away." The "Conclusion" contains a wild digression about the "diabolical wickedness" of vivisection when it is performed "with the object of alleviating human suffering," and we are philosophically asked, à propos of a marriage based more on convenience than on affection, "If, instead of personal attributes, belongings, surroundings, circumjacencies are fallen in love with, may not the promise of wedlock be equally fair?"

* The Blacksmith of Voe. A Novel. By Paul Cushing, Author of "Misogyny and the Maiden" &c. Edinburgh and London: Blackwood & Sons. 1888.

The Parting of the Ways. A Novel. By M. Betham-Edwards, Author of "Kitty" &c. London: Richard Bentley & Son. 1888.

Miracle Gold. A Novel. By Richard Dowling, Author of "The Mystery of Killard" &c. London: Ward & Downey. 1888.

If The Parting of the Ways is mad, Miracle Gold is madder. It is mainly about one Oscar Leigh who was a lunatic. He was also a "hideous, deformed, monstrous dwarf." His habits were disgusting. He had a particularly odious practice of pouring eau-de-cologne into his hands, taking it like snuff, and rubbing the dregs of it over his face. He was always saying "Hah!" and puffed, panted, groaned, and snorted with distressing frequency. He was, moreover, a fertile and inveterate liar. His lunacy took two active forms. One was the construction of a most marvellous clock. It told you most things, and wound itself up, sometimes with the assistance of a dummy figure of its inventor. The other was a scheme whereby he proposed to amass an enormous fortune by making imitation gold, to be called "miracle gold," and selling it a little below the market price of gold, from which it was to be indistinguishable by any known test. Here, however, he deviated into sanity. His method was to be simple. He had found a receiver of stolen goods, who had received a quantity of gold from a burglar, and was prepared to sell it cheap. This was to be the miracle gold. His insanity came in again in his having failed to consider how, after he had got his invention before the world, he was to keep up the supply. Eventually his clock was burnt, and he died, like T. Mivins, "of disgust." Among the persons who were privileged, in the course of the events narrated by Mr. Richard Dowling, to make the acquaintance of this nasty and futile person, were two lovely girls, no relation to each other, but so much alike that Leigh, when he first saw Dora, mistook her for Edith, with whom he was in love, and Hanbury, when he first saw Edith, mistook her for Dora, with whom he was in love, and to whom he was engaged to be married. The accidental likeness serves no purpose except to bring together Hanbury and Leigh, who might just as well have been left apart, and to make it more natural for Hanbury, when Dora jilted him, to become engaged to Edith in a week or so. Hanbury was the lineal personal representative of Stanislaus II., the last King of Poland. When Dora had persuaded him, much against his will, to take her for a walk through a slum, he dressed for the occasion "in a black frock-coat and low black felt hat." He was a man of the highest fashion. He had lucid intervals, but was dull while they lasted. The women in the book are naught. So is the story. It would be interesting if it were possible to ascertain whether there is more than meets the eye in the coincidence that The Parting of the Ways and Miracle Gold are both bound in gilt covers.

PHILOSOPHICAL LITERATURE.*

THERE is some temptation to a reviewer of Principal Drummond's elaborate treatise on The Jewish-Alexandrian Philosophy to enter upon a discussion of the whole subject rather than to examine the author's treatment of it. Were there no other objection, the two stout volumes before us show how futile were such a task. Dr. Drummond has been most minute and thorough in his work—so thorough, indeed, that much of the material which he has collected may be used against himself. Philo's confusion and inconsistency of thought are such that he lends himself to many interpretations; and, when we remember that each of his modern critics is apt to approach him from a special dogmatic standpoint, the difficulty of arriving at his probable meaning in particular cases is by no means lessened. The present author has endeavoured, not "to criticize Philo's philosophy, but simply to ascertain and expound it"; and, although he has been generally successful, there is now and then apparent a kind of bias in his work. Philo is made to appear at his best, and as more consistent than he really was. Before coming to the philosophy, Dr. Drummond gives an account of the circumstances in which it grew up and of the two great influences which helped to mould it. His picture of the state of Alexandria at the time when Eastern religion, become mystical, met Western philosophy, become sceptical, is at once true and graphic; while his portrait of the philosopher himself brings distinctly to light the different phases of his intellectual character. A Jew free from the narrowness generally associated with Judaism, a follower of Moses ready to avail himself of the culture of the Western schools, a believer in the one God, yet almost a Pantheist, an eclectic, but still an earnest man, Philo occupied a unique position. His influence upon the development of Christian theology was great; but we are glad, on the whole, that in the present work that matter has not been discussed, since we have escaped from the danger of theological controversy. In considering the Greek philosophers whose influence upon Philo is most apparent Dr. Drummond follows Heinze with regard to Heraclitus's conception of the Logos. He thinks it was "the rational law apparent in the world," and supposed to be analogous to human reason. "It is true what was subjective, conscious intelligence in us was objective, unconscious reason in the world." This is possible, but, even with the limitation of the last sentence, seems to go too far. Heraclitus never got beyond the materialistic conception, and the distinction between subjective and objective could not very well have been made by him. The Stoics, who adopted his physics, made the distinction visible, especially in their ethics, and their insistence upon it is the principal defect in their philosophy. Even with them, as our author admits (i. p. 83), the Logos was looked upon as something quite as material as Heraclitus's fire, although known under the new name of ether. At the same time, they seemed to rise above this in various ways, as in their notion of destiny and in the higher one of purposeful government of the world. The latter idea of itself is suggestive of the second great influence which bore upon Philo—namely, that from the religious side. As might be expected Dr. Drummond discusses this part of his subject with sympathy and intelligence. If too much of his discussion is taken up with examination of the theories of Gfrörer and Dahne without giving to them any very conclusive reply, the reason probably is that their doctrines as to Neoplatonic influence upon certain of the Hebrew writings are plausible, though as a rule somewhat arbitrary, and supported by quite insufficient evidence. In the Old Testament itself Philo could find quite enough material which, by his method of interpretation, might be harmonized with the prevalent Greek ideas. At first sight this would appear impossible. In face of the stern Monotheism of the Jews it seems difficult to conceive of their system of religion as having any kinship with the Pantheism of the Stoics. Yet the closer examination of the Old Testament reveals that there are certain points of relation which must not be overlooked. In Monotheism, no doubt, it is the negative relation between God and the world upon which most stress is laid. Still, the possibility—nay, the fact—of communion between God and man was ever in the thought of the writers; and, as Dr. Drummond indicates, their phrase "the angel of Yahveh" prepares the way for the Neoplatonic doctrine. "Their minds followed the religious tendency, and adopted language which satisfied the religious need, without submitting every expression to the analytical scrutiny of thought. But in any case we may discern here the dim feeling that that in God which is capable of manifestation is distinguishable from his transcendent and incomprehensible essence." Our author directs attention also to the phrase, "The word of God" in the Old Testament, although he wisely shows that the expression is related to the Alexandrian philosophy, more closely in phraseology than in thought. (It is worthy of note, in passing, that the same phrase is used by most Scottish Calvinists as referring to the Scriptures, and never, but in the most exceptional circumstances, in the sense suggested by the Fourth Gospel.) In the same way, when treating the Book of Ecclesiasticus, Dr. Drummond is disinclined to allow that it contains any elements for whose origin we must look to Alexandria. The onus of proof lies upon those who say that there are such elements; and no one acquainted with the book would venture to assert that they are predominant, or even [illegible], in it. There are none of the traces which we should naturally expect of either Greek speculation or Greek culture. "It must be shown not only that the phrases and sentiments which are appealed to were to be found in Alexandria, but that they cannot possibly be indigenous to Palestine. This has [illegible] been attempted, or, when attempted, has [illegible] conviction." To a certain extent these words (from i. p. 150) seem rather like an invitation to prove a negative; but the author's real point is that what was specially prominent in Alexandrian speculation is conspicuously absent here. So far as the LXX is concerned, it can scarcely be denied that it bears traces of its Alexandrian origin which might be construed as having been derived from the prevalent philosophy of the place. The fault of those who are attached to this view is that they usually endeavour to prove too much, and, by their too ingenious exegesis of certain passages, throw doubt upon the character of their whole argument. The conclusive reasoning of Zeller, which is favoured in Dr. Drummond's work, is to the effect that there is no need to look for outside influence at all, since, the more civilized the Jewish community became, the more would they be anxious to substitute for the early and imperfect form of their religion one more spiritual, especially in its conception of God. There are many points in the admirable chapter on the Book of Wisdom which we should have liked to notice. It must be sufficient, however, to draw attention with approval to our author's remark that here the incomprehensibility of God is not insisted upon so much as his self-revelation, and with dissent to his endeavour (i. p. 213) to read into the book what is an entirely modern notion. Bretschneider may or may not be right in supposing that it teaches the doctrine of the annihilation of the wicked; but it is going quite beyond the circle of the ideas prevalent at the time when the book was written to say that "we might fairly speak of the soul's death when we refer, not to its extinction, but to the forfeiture, through sin, of its highest life." We may add that Dr. Drummond—perhaps for the sake of securing in this book a direct passage to the Logos doctrine—lays undue stress upon its philosophical character. Many of the controverted points are more readily explicable if we leave that aside, or, at any rate, if we allow it more or less of poetical indefiniteness. In the case of Philo himself, most students are likely to think that Dr. Drummond has made him out to have been more of a systematic thinker than he really was. Without exactly altering the material upon which he has been working, the commentator introduces a more perfect system and sometimes higher ideas than his subject possessed. He admits that "in Philo, notwithstanding the width and freedom of his culture, the practical and religious interest was supreme, and formed his standard of estimate for all the departments of human study," but in certain parts of his second volume he seems to forget that this was the case. It was exactly because the religious interest was supreme that Philo was unsystematic. The eternity of matter, the pervading notion of that as evil, the confusion of the idea of God as τεχνίτης with a wider and almost contradictory conception, the conjunction of Jewish religious notions with the prevalent philosophical ideas of the Stoics, the many different applications of the Logos—all these show that, however possible it may be to extract a system from them by abstraction or elimination, the confusion in Philo's mind was such as to prevent his formulating an orderly philosophy of the universe. Eclecticism never succeeds without a principle; when it has a principle it loses its character as eclecticism. Our view is that Philo was in this sense unprincipled. Dr. Drummond is more favourable, yet he is compelled to talk of Philo's "vagueness of treatment," to admit contradictions, and to speak of certain passages as having probably been written in "careless haste." Nowhere is the difficulty of an expositor more manifest than in the endeavour to reconcile popular language with scientific ideas; and in the present case, the task is well nigh impossible. We are told e.g. that Philo "rejects as impious both anthropomorphism and anthropopathism," yet we know perfectly well that he continually uses anthropomorphic language—"for the instruction of the mass of mankind," as he himself says. Again we find Dr. Drummond asserting, "with some degree of confidence," that Philo thought of God as incapable of being confined within the limits of any locality, and "altogether exempt from the conditions of space," while at the same time God is spoken of as a "boundary," and as containing all things "in a circle." Taking another example, Dr. Drummond says—and the expression is most unhappy—that in Philo's view of a particular case "the dependence of the correlative terms is not mutual, but is all on one side," though how two terms can be correlative, while one is dependent and the other independent, is somewhat of a puzzle. The chapters upon "The Divine Powers" and "The Logos" are able and elaborate attempts to show that Philo's position involved no contradictions. In the former, Dr. Drummond sets himself a hard duty—that of explaining why and in what sense Philo speaks of the Powers. He does not, however, meet the criticisms of Zeller or of Gförer effectually. If the Powers are manifestations of the unknowable Eternal, we are no better off than before, for we must ask what is the relation between them and the Eternal, and between them and the world. If, as Dr. Drummond says, they are identified with the Divine nature, why is that said to be unknowable? Even supposing that Philo did not believe in the personality of the Powers, the difficulty is not removed. On this as on many other points, especially in connexion with the Logos chapter, our author must expect to meet with considerable hostile criticism. We cannot go into further detail in criticizing his most valuable work, but we can safely prophesy that from foes as well as from friends the author will receive due thanks for the great care, judgment, and ability which characterize it throughout.

* Philo Judaeus; or, the Jewish-Alexandrian Philosophy in its Development and Completion. By James Drummond, LL.D., Principal of Manchester New College, London. 2 vols. London: Williams & Norgate. 1888.

The Morality of Nations: a Study in the Evolution of Ethics. By Hugh Taylor. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co. 1888.

A Student's Manual of Psychology. Adapted from the "Katechismus der Psychologie" of Friedrich Kirchner by E. D. Drought. London: Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 1888.

If Mr. Hugh Taylor had been at pains to study his subject a little longer, and to follow out certain lines of thought which are suggested in his book, The Morality of Nations would have probably been a work of quite conspicuous merit. As it is, we have a very suggestive and interesting essay, marred only by the presence of views which are abstract, and therefore partial. The author is one of those, only too common among writers on ethics in the present day, who hold fast by the doctrine of evolution, without quite fully examining or understanding it. He applies his doctrine to ethics; and it is one of the best signs of his work that he is quick to note that there are certain limitations and changes necessary when we pass from the field of pure naturalism to that of spirit. Still, he does not see all that this change involves. He objects, it is true, to Mill's individualism (pp. 67, 69), but he does not see fully what is implied in the position which he himself takes up. He understands and insists upon the fact that "the morality of the whole is not the combined morality of the parts" (p. 66), and he is easily able to prove his thesis by a reference to the facts of history; yet he treats of the whole and the parts separately and abstractly, and consequently misses the valuable results to which he might otherwise have attained. Wherever he seems to have clearer insight—and there are many passages suggestive of this—it is only for a moment, and the imperfect view returns. When we read (p. 109) that "man, as a social being, requires, for the full development of his individuality, a vivid consciousness of the good of the community as distinct from, though involving, his own," and that individual activity "has never been developed to any extent when a national consciousness has been absent," we feel as though the author had reached the principle of which he is in search; and yet, when we read on, we find that he has not fully grasped it. In the chapter on "Morality and Force" Mr. Taylor is especially tantalizing. Throughout there are glimpses of the truth; but these are imperfect and unsatisfactory. In considering individual and organism he writes as though they not only could be, but actually are, separated the one from the other, losing sight of the fact that the individual, merging—as Mr. Taylor seems to admit he does—his own selfish individuality in the organism, receives therefrom a higher personality. By losing he finds himself. It is quite true that the law of individual development becomes subordinate to the law of social development (p. 103); but a better way of stating the truth would be to say that the latter is found to be the essential condition of the former. The individual, quâ individual, cannot develop at all. Since our author does not clearly see the process which we have indicated, it is not surprising to find him laying stress (p. 91) on the social sanction, and (p. 139) on Hobbes's idea of a coercive power. He tells us that "the instinct of self-denial derives much of its value from the stress laid upon it by society," and that "it is the force of the social sanction which reverses the self-destructive influence of altruism, and in a way identifies the opposite results of egoism and self-denial." This is quite a false way of looking at the matter. There is no morality in a self-sacrificing act which is done merely for the sake of approval; and there must be some rational ground for what Mr. Taylor here calls an "instinct." Altruism which is that and nothing more, self-sacrifice which has no end but itself, is valueless. Its negation, or renunciation, is of infinite worth only when it is looked upon as a step in a process—the denial of the natural which leads to the attainment of the spiritual. As to the reference to Hobbes and a "coercive power," Mr. Taylor again makes the mistake of trying to conceive of the individual by himself, and of a cluster of individuals who are every one isolated from every other. Any power which could coerce these must be external, arbitrary, and unnatural. The first part of the book is devoted to the "law of antagonism" between individuals, and shows how that disappears when the individual identifies himself with the organism. The second part dwells on the same law as between organisms, and leaves us there. Most evolutionists have the courage of their opinions so far as to prophesy; but Mr. Taylor confines himself to a hint and a hope. He has so strongly insisted upon antagonism that, even when he writes that it may only be a "phase" in moral evolution, he does not further pursue his thought. Had he done so carefully he would not have spoken of bare "identity" as the end to be reached, nor have called that "the greatest of all harmony." If he continues to study his subject, he will do well, in the first place, to abandon his ultra-empirical standpoint, and to learn that when reason goes to history the latter is sure to present a rational aspect. He will find that an absolute separation between the universal and the individual, as well as between individuals, is impossible, and that the end to be reached is that of the highest identity through and by the widest differences. He will then see more truth in Sir Henry Maine, and will recast his ideas both of justice and of the sacredness of property. His studies will also teach him that there is a way of looking at the question of freedom which is neither that of scientific fatalism nor that of the advocates of the liberty of indifference, so that he will cease to talk of "the lingering fiction of free-will." In short, he will discover that between the intuitionist moralists and himself there is another and a better way. We wish him well in his search for it.

The translation of Kirchner's Student's Manual of Psychology will be specially useful to those who study the mental phenomena from a physiological standpoint. To them Part II. will be the most interesting; for, even where its conclusions are assailable, the collection and arrangement of facts in support of them are of considerable value. In this part the sections upon the Freedom of the Will and upon Mental Diseases may be mentioned with approval. Such approval, however, cannot be given to the first portion of the book, wherein the influence of Herbart and—to some extent—of Lotze is very apparent. Kirchner wishes to avoid spiritualism as well as a one-sided empiricism, and the result is by no means satisfactory. A single sentence will serve to show what his "ideal-realism" means. He says (p. 130):—"We reject both the dualism of matter and force, and the one-sided supposition of a material or immaterial principle, but we regard as the substance of the cosmic order the spirit who is vitally active under the form of matter." It is not easy to understand the complacency with which the author looks upon this position as a relief from difficulties. To explain spirit by a category which it requires spirit to explain is an old, but has never been a successful, trick. It is true enough that by losing all differences in self-identical "substance" you avoid subjective idealism and materialism alike; but how are you to get a step beyond the abstraction in which you seem to have found security? The philosophy of Spinoza—here cited—is surely the best historical example of the difficulty, which is not in the slightest degree lessened by saying that there is "no matter which is not somehow pervaded by spirit, no spirit which is not manifested in matter." Are matter and spirit, then, to be looked upon as upon the same plane? If they are, the difficulties return. If they are not, we require some more satisfactory non-dualistic explanation than Kirchner gives. But the whole of his psychology is defective, and it is needless to dwell upon individual faults. Even the short "History" at the beginning is imperfect, and from its very condensation tends to become misleading.

IRISH WONDERS.*

"GO where you will in Ireland," says the author of Irish Wonders, "the story-teller is there, and, on slight provocation, will repeat his narrative; amplifying, explaining, embellishing, till from a single fact a connected history is evolved, giving motives, particulars, action, and result, the whole surrounded by rustic imagery, and told with a dramatic force that an actor might envy." Mr. M'Annaly has collected his materials for the presentation of this phase of unwritten Celtic literature "during a recent lengthy visit, in the course of which every county in the island was traversed from end to end, and constant association had with the peasant tenantry." The result of this labour of love is fourteen chapters, in which stories well known to the folklorist appear in the most modern Irish setting—e.g. when the mythical lord of the castle now covered by the waters of Lough Conn, in County Mayo, determined to make a fish-pond on the site of his village, we are told that he carried out the eviction of the inhabitants "wid process-sarvers, an' bailiffs, an' constables, an' sogers, an' polis." One of the evicted knelt upon the ground and cursed the chief, praying that "the throut pond 'ud be the death of him." The prayer was promptly answered; the waters rose, nor ceased to rise till they reached the battlements of the castle, where the chief was "down on his hard-hearted knees, sayin' his baids as fast as he could, an' bawlin' at all the saints aither to bring him a boat or taiche him how to swim quick.' As may be expected, the saints disregarded his appeal, and sent him to "where he naded more wather than he left behind him, an' had the comp'ny av a shwarm av other landlords that turned the poor out to starve." The unconscious anachronisms of this story remind us of Mr. Plowden's description of a picture in an Abyssinian church, representing the passage of the Red Sea, where the Egyptian soldiers of Pharaoh's host are represented as holding their muskets over their heads to keep them dry. Scepticism, we grieve to state, seems to be making progress among the Irish peasantry, although Mr. M'Annaly found "a boatman on the Shannon, a respectable man," who told him how Lough Ree was made, with the preface "sure that's no laigend, but the blessed truth as I'm living this minnit, for I'd sooner cut out me tongue be the root than desave yer Anner, when every wan knows there's not a taste av a lie in it at all." We learn for the first time that the "Phooka" has been tamed, and no longer indulges in the pranks about which we used to read in Croker's delightful Crookened Back and Daniel O'Rourke. There seems to be a good and a bad Banshee, the picture of the latter closely resembling a Japanese Bogy in one of Mr. Andrew Lang's books; but no mention is made of the pride which a true blue-blooded Irish family takes in the possession of a Banshee. We well remember an aristocratic old lady observing with scorn:—"No, my dear, the O'Gradys have a Banshee, and the O'Neills have a Banshee; but the ——'s! the idea of their setting up to have one!" There is a short and rather disappointing chapter on "The Polis," an "Irish Wonder," we suppose. It is, moreover, most unsympathetically written; indeed, though no clue is afforded to the author's nationality besides his name, his writing, when not in the Irish dialect, has a strong American flavour. From a hint let fall in this chapter we conjecture that the American labels on his portmanteau or some peculiarity of dress or manner attracted the attention of the "polis," to whom, indeed, his wanderings must have appeared mysterious in the extreme. The illustrations are of very unequal merit, some of the landscapes being exceedingly pretty, while most of the large figures—for example, the lady throwing some nondescript object like a large cocoanut out of the window of a Round Tower—are simply absurd. The page, moreover, is of an awkward shape, and the type somewhat fatiguing to the eye.

* Irish Wonders. By J. R. M'Annaly, Jun. London: Ward, Lock, & Co.

THREE CLASSICAL TRANSLATIONS.*

OF the two volumes of Bohn's Classical Library before us, the first requires less notice than the second. Of the Four Platonic Dialogues (produced in carrying out Messrs. Bell's useful idea of still further popularizing Bohn's various libraries by subdividing the volumes or issuing new ones at a less price) nothing more need be said than that those selected are the "Apology," the "Crito," the "Phædo," and the "Protagoras," that these four are undoubtedly best suited for him who is commencing Platonist, and that if he be so exceedingly unfortunate as not to be able to read them in the divine language of the original, the commencing Platonist must, no doubt, put up with a translation.

The second volume also requires no long, but it requires a little longer, mention. It must have been, from its preface, dated March 1 in the present year, the last work of the late Mr. King, who, judging from the frequent misprints, can hardly have corrected it for press; it is illustrated with reproductions of some of the gems he loved so well, it is busied to a great extent with that theosophy to the study of which his study of gems led him, and it is a good example of his considerable faculty for translation. But in substance it is rather what is called in not quite translatable French a livre factice. Instead of giving all Julian's own work, Mr. King has only given the short tractates "Upon the Sovereign Sun" and "Upon the Mother of the Gods," and has filled up more than two-thirds of the volume with Gregory Nazianzen's somewhat prolix attack on Julian and with Libanius's intolerably long-winded apology for him. No doubt, as Mr. King says, it is a curious and a rare thing to get pro and con stated in this way by contemporary persons of unusual information and talent. But, then, the worthy father and the worthy sophist are both so very long for any amount of fact that they have to communicate! Gregory was a man of great ability as well as sanctity, and Libanius, if not a saint, was very far from a fool. But they both preach; and a preachment a hundred pages long (it is fair to Gregory to say that his is two preachments) is rather too much of a good thing.

The third book is even more of a livre factice than the second. Mr. Clode must have taken nearly as much trouble with his actual fashion of arranging his book as if he had simply translated it from the original, and the result is very much less satisfactory. About half is taken, "with some slight alterations," from L'Estrange's Seneca's Morals by way of Abstract, which was itself not even a loose translation, but a kind of hash—a "digest," as the eccentric author calls it. The rest is taken from the still earlier work of Lodge, the dramatist-physician, with "alterations sparingly introduced." Thus we have two different varieties of not too scholarly archaism placed side by side, each deprived of such genuine archaic charm as in its purity it might possess by "slight alterations." Such a proceeding is neither just to Seneca, nor to Sir Roger, nor to Lodge, nor, we may add, to Mr. Clode himself. It has, indeed, produced a by no means unreadable book; for Lodge's work is often delightful, and L'Estrange's has a good deal of raciness and of unkempt vigour, which Mr. Clode has wisely abstained from "altering" too much. But we cannot commend his method.

MINERALS OF NEW SOUTH WALES.†

THE mineral wealth of the colony of New South Wales is great, but in regard to this the amount of exact scientific information which is to be found is not so large as might have been anticipated. Hence the present volume is a welcome addition to our knowledge, especially as it has been prepared by one whose authority as a man of science is already so great. The book, as we are told in the Introduction, had its origin in a paper read before the Royal Society of New South Wales in December 1874. This was afterwards augmented and included in the Mineral Products of New South Wales, issued by the Mining Department of the colony in 1882, and we have in the present volume a separate, enlarged, and practically re-written treatise, containing a considerable number of analyses of minerals and rocks, with much interesting information relating to their occurrence. Indicating, as the book does, the remarkable progress and the hopeful future of the colony of New South Wales, it has been appropriately published in the centennial year.

The first place in the book is given to gold, in which metal the colony is so rich. On the cover and on one of the pages is depicted a mass of gold, showing crystals of unusual size, which belongs to the Museum of Science and Art at Edinburgh, and is believed to have been obtained from New South Wales, though the exact locality is unknown. This specimen, Professor Liversidge states, is "perhaps one of the finest in existence," for well-developed crystals of gold are extremely rare, and never of large size. They seldom exceed a quarter of an inch in diameter, and generally are imperfectly developed, the faces being ordinarily

* Four Dialogues of Plato. Translated by H. Cary. London: Bell & Sons. 1888.

Julian the Emperor. Translations by W. King. London: Bell & Sons. 1888.

The Morals of Seneca. Edited by Walter Clode. "Camelot Classics." London: Walter Scott.

† The Minerals of New South Wales, &c. By A. Liversidge, M.A., F.R.S., Professor of Chemistry and Mineralogy in the University of Sydney. London: Trübner & Co. 1888.

more or less cavernous. In this specimen some of the crystals appear to surpass the above-mentioned magnitude, and to be well developed. An account of the more important New South Wales nuggets follows; several of these ranged between 100 and 300 ounces, but one of the largest weighed about 1,272 ounces. The history of the discovery of this extraordinary mass is given at some length. It is a curious instance of what is sometimes called "beginner's luck." It was found by a young native Australian in the service of a Mr. Kerr, among a heap of quartz on a creek on the river Turon, about fifty-three miles from Bathurst. The youth had been brought up at the Wellington Mission, and could thus understand the cause of the excitement which already existed in the colony. So he had taken a tomahawk—certainly not a very convenient substitute for a geological hammer—and had gone out "prospecting" over his employer's run:—

His attention was first called to the lucky spot by observing a speck of some glittering yellow substance upon the surface of a block of quartz, upon which he applied his tomahawk and broke off a portion. At that moment the splendid prize stood revealed to his sight. His first care was to start off home and disclose his discovery to his master, to whom he presented whatever gold might be procured from it.

The gold in the nuggets is never quite pure, but is always alloyed more or less with silver, together with traces of copper, bismuth, iron, and other metals. Thus the colour varies in different specimens. As a rule, the New South Wales gold is a fairly deep yellow, darker than that from Southern Queensland, but rather lighter than that from Victoria. Elaborate tables of analyses are given by Professor Liversidge, from which it appears that the average fineness of New South Wales gold is 22 carats 1·875 grains, or 93·5 per cent. gold and 6 per cent. silver, the residue consisting of various metals. Victorian gold is slightly finer, containing about 96 per cent. of that metal; while Queensland gold contains on an average only 87·25 per cent. Poorer still is the Maryborough gold, which has only 85 per cent. gold, with as much as 14 per cent. silver. The richest gold is from Mount Morgan, where it is practically pure.

An interesting summary is given of the history of gold discovery in New South Wales, a subject which has led to considerable controversy in Australia. From this it appears pretty clear that gold had been found more than once, though in small quantities, by convicts between the years 1814 and 1825, but that for obvious reasons the quest was more than discouraged by the authorities. Indirect evidence of its occurrence was, however, twice or thrice obtained prior to the year 1839, when gold was undoubtedly discovered in situ by Count Strzelecki; but he also refrained from publishing the discovery in consequence of the representations of the Governor, who argued that, if the colonies were known to be gold regions, the maintenance of discipline would be impossible. Two years later gold was again found in situ by the Rev. W. B. Clarke; but the first person to obtain it in remunerative quantities appears to have been a shepherd named Macgregor, in the year 1843 4. Gold was systematically worked and its existence in great quantities in various parts of the colony was demonstrated by Mr. Hargraves in 1851. In that year, the first included in the tables published by Professor Liversidge, 144,121 ounces were obtained. Since that date there have been considerable fluctuations in the amount produced. The largest was so early as 1852, when 818,751 ounces were obtained. A rapid fall then occurred, but after 1857 another rise began, until, in 1862, 640,622 ounces were procured. There was then a more gradual decline, followed by a rise to 425,130 ounces in 1872, since when there has been a slow but almost uniform decline, the quantity recorded in 1881 being 101,417 ounces.

A considerable quantity of silver is obtained in the colony. The native metal is very rare, but its compounds occur, and many ores of other metals are argentiferous. The quantity produced shows of late years a rapid increase, more than a million ounces being recorded in 1886. Platinum has been obtained in small quantities. The colony is rich in the ores of copper, lead, iron—those of zinc, tin, arsenic, antimony, with the very local metals bismuth and mercury, occur in considerable quantities—but nickel, cobalt, and even manganese are uncommon. Besides other of the less familiar metals, some of the rarest, such as osmium, iridium, and cerium, have been found. Altogether, in the produce of metallic minerals of commercial value New South Wales stands third among our colonies, being only surpassed by Victoria and the Cape of Good Hope.

Diamonds have been known to occur in the colony since 1851, and there are workings at two places—Mudgee and Bingera—each of which is estimated to have produced about six thousand specimens. The diamonds seem to be generally of small size, the largest recorded weighing about 5·625 carats. All have been obtained from alluvial deposits. Professor Liversidge avails himself of the prevalent laxity among mineralogists to include coal in his volume, though of course it has no right to be classified as a mineral, being really a rock. This, however, is excusable under the circumstances; and we accordingly obtain a valuable summary of facts relating to the New South Wales coal-fields. It is estimated that the seams which are now being worked underlie, within a readily accessible depth, 3,328 square miles, or nearly half of the area of the coal-fields of Great Britain. None of the shafts are at all deep as compared with those of the mother-country, many seams, indeed, being worked by adits. The strata also, as a rule, are either horizontal or but slightly inclined, which of course much enhances the value of the deposits. From the analyses given the New South Wales coals appear to contain a little more ash than the average English coals. Considerable quantities of material allied to torbanite or "kerosene-shale" have been found, the value of that obtained in 1886 being nearly 100,000*l.*

Several minerals in request for ornamental purposes are found in the colony. Opals of good quality occur, but are not common. These differ markedly from the well-known deep-coloured opals procured from the Bulla Creek, Queensland. Sapphires are not uncommon, especially in the auriferous districts. The ruby is much more rare. The colourless, yellow, and brown varieties of crystallized alumina have also been obtained. Beryls are rather common, and emeralds have been found. Zircons are frequent, especially in the auriferous drifts, some of them being "very beautiful gem stones of a hyacinth-red colour." Topaz is comparatively abundant all over the granite region of New England, especially, as is ordinarily the case, in the stanniferous districts. Garnets are as usual common in districts where granitic rocks or schists occur, but it is not said that, any of them are of value as gems. Various forms of spinel are also found, but these do not appear to have been polished as gems. On the ordinary minerals, quartz, felspar, mica, hornblende, and the like, it is needless to dwell, but it may be noted in passing that the colony, according to Professor Liversidge, contains good marbles. Mineral springs occur, but these at present are little known.

An appendix, which occupies nearly one-third of the volume, contains a series of papers written at various times by Professor Liversidge, which, as stated in the Introduction, are republished here, as being out of print. Some relate to geology rather than to mineralogy, and more than half of them refer to places which cannot be included even in the continent of Australia, as New Guinea, New Britain, New Ireland, and New Caledonia. We think, however, that, although this is giving a liberal interpretation to the "etcetera" of the title-page, Professor Liversidge has done well to reprint these papers, because they include the results of much careful chemical work, and the student is thus enabled to refer to a number of interesting analyses without the trouble of searching up and down periodicals not always readily accessible. Some, however, of the papers are germane to the main purpose of the book, such as an account of the Bingera Diamond Fields, and notes on meteorites, two from New South Wales and a third from Queensland. Figures are given of all these, and of the first, the Denliquin or Barrata meteorite, an enlarged microscopic section is represented; this meteorite is composed essentially of ferro-magnesian silicates (olivine and enstatite), with nickeliferous iron. The other meteorite from Bingera is of small size—weighing only a little more than 240 grammes—and is almost wholly metallic, containing 93·76 per cent. of iron and 4·39 per cent. of nickel. The Queensland meteorite, which appears to have been of large size, but of which only a fragment was forwarded to Professor Liversidge, is also one of the metallic group

The book, as will be inferred from our summary, is not one likely to attract the general reader, but it will be of great use to the scientific student, as containing so many analyses of minerals and rocks, and so much precise information. On this account also it will be very valuable to all interested in the economic progress of the colony of New South Wales. It includes the results of much independent research, as well as of careful compilation, and cannot fail to add to the high scientific reputation which Professor Liversidge has already obtained. Among other recommendations of the book are full indices, and an excellent map, showing the distribution of the principal minerals in the colony.

TRAVELS THROUGH ENGLAND.*

BY printing this instalment of Dr. Pococke's Travels through England the Camden Society shows that it is willing to extend its labours to manuscripts of a later date than those which generally engage its attention. And no one who reads the volume before us is likely to regret that the Society has included it in its publications; for it is full of interesting matter. Pococke, a Hampshire man by birth, held the office of precentor, first at Lismore, and then at Waterford, about the middle of last century. He was promoted to the bishopric of Ossory, and died in 1765, shortly after his translation to the See of Meath. Before he became a bishop he spent much of his time in travelling, and published two volumes of his travels in Egypt, Syria, and other countries. His tours in England are recorded in transcripts from letters addressed to his mother, and these are now being printed by the Society for the first time; the original letters, the editor tells us, have perished, the transcripts are in the British Museum. The present volume begins with a tour made in the summer of 1750. Pococke landed in the Isle of Man, where he was entertained by Bishop Wilson, crossed to Liverpool, visited several places in Staffordshire and Cheshire, travelled about in the Lake country, again entered Lancashire, crossed into Yorkshire, where he was a guest at some great houses, and then journeyed to London by Newark, Stamford, Huntingdon, Cambridge, and Waltham. Next comes the record of a tour through Devonshire, Cornwall, and Somerset, and, lastly, some notices of another journey chiefly through the midland counties, undertaken in the spring of the following year. Pococke describes the places he visited with considerable care, and, as he was an intelligent traveller, his letters are full of welcome information. He was a man of various tastes. He evidently collected fossils, and was interested in all matters of natural history. Considering the terms in which mountain scenery was then generally described, the admiration he expresses for the beauties of the Lake country is certainly creditable to him. At the same time the kind of scenery which evidently pleased him most was that presented by an "improved" pleasure-ground, with water flowing from one basin into another, and finally into a "fine [artificial] serpentine river," and a temple at the summit of an artificial mound, "with three or four vistos, one terminated by some Dorick building," and he gives full descriptions of "improvements" of this sort at Bramham House, Wentworth Castle, Stowe, and other famous places. All ancient monuments delighted him greatly, and his letters contain many notices of barrows, standing stones, and camps, and many copies of Roman and other inscriptions. He was not insensible to the splendour of noble buildings, and often recognized their special points of beauty or interest. His knowledge of architecture, however, may be gauged by his describing the columns of St. Joseph's Chapel at Glastonbury as "a sort of Gothick-Corinthian pilasters." In his account of Glastonbury, by the way, he makes a mistake that ought to have been explained in a footnote. The smaller parish church (St. Benedict's) has, he says, "Bishop Bevis [?] cypher and mitre on it"; the editor might as well have noted that the initials and mitre belong to Abbot Beere, who restored the church, and whose rebus, a beer-jug, appears on some of the battlements. The most valuable parts of Pococke's letters are his observations on the condition of the towns he visited, and on the trade and industries of the country generally. Only a few examples of these can be given here. Liverpool he finds much increased in size since his last visit; the people were building a fourth church, "have a great trade to the West Indies, send some ships to Guinea, and, I suppose, are the next town in trade to Bristol. They have no less than eight manufactories of glazed earthenware, which is reckoned among the best in England." At Halifax, which he likens for situation to Jerusalem, were, it was thought, eight thousand souls, of whom a few were Quakers and some Presbyterians. There he saw the stone stage on which "they used to execute with the maid, after the Scotch custom"—a mode of execution which was, he believes, adopted when the woollen manufacture was first established in the town, in order to prevent the colliers from stealing the cloth. The situation of Nottingham reminded him of some part of Constantinople; "it begins," he writes, "to be much frequented by gentlemen, some who retire to it from their country-houses, others who have left off trade, and many gentlemen of the neighbourhood have houses here for the winter." Doncaster chiefly subsisted "by being a great thoroughfare." He gives an account of the manner of making earthenware, stone-ware, and china in Staffordshire, describes the Cornish tin-works, has a good deal to say about the foul air in coal-mines, and notices in many small towns and villages the existence of manufactures which have now wholly, or almost wholly, been absorbed by larger places. As his editor remarks, he does not tell us much about the condition and habits of the people. Still, we get some interesting particulars, which are quoted in the Preface, as to the mode of life among the small farmers of Lancashire. He was struck by the "civility and obliging behaviour" of the inhabitants of the pottery villages of Staffordshire, and in Cornwall found the "common people much polished and ready to do all kind offices, especially among the tinners." In the western parts of Cornwall he says that the parish feasts—the wakes that Laud was so careful to preserve—were kept "with great prophaneness and debauchery," and mentions the habit of wrecking, "even to the breaking up of vessels." He tried to meet with some one who spoke Cornish, but declares that those who pretended to be able to do so only knew "a few common expressions" and the "derivation of names of places."

* The Travels through England of Dr. Richard Pococke, successively Bishop of Meath and of Ossory, during 1750, 1751, and later years. Edited by James Joel Cartwright, M.A., F.S.A., Treasurer of the Society. Vol. I. Printed for the Camden Society. 1888.

FOUR BOOKS ON TEUTONIC PHILOLOGY.*

IN the four works named below, Professor Skeat has given to the world the results of his labours during some twenty years in four different, though closely allied, spheres of knowledge. In 1868 he published under the auspices of the Philological Society a Moeso-Gothic Glossary, with references to all the extant works of Wulfila. It was an excellent idea to follow this up by an edition of a single Gospel, with a short grammar and glossary especially adapted for the use of beginners, and procurable at a small cost. No one who is interested in the history of the English language has now any excuse for not knowing at least the elements of Gothic, so necessary for the student of English philology. Gothic enables us, as it were, to get behind the phenomena of our own language, and to see causes at work which even in the earliest monuments of the English tongue had already produced their full effect. Moreover, by tracing English words back to their Gothic forms we are often enabled to establish their identity with corresponding words in other languages, though the original similarity may have wholly disappeared in the course of time. We take one or two examples almost at random, as they happen to meet our eye in turning over Mr. Skeat's pages. When we find, for instance, that the Gothic for "net" is nati, we see at once the reason for the form of the English word. Nati is a neuter ja stem. The termination has got worn away in the course of ages, but it has left its mark in the modification of the broad vowel a of the root into the narrow vowel of "net." So when we find that the Gothic for "tooth" is tunthus, plural tunthjus, we see not only the reason for the vowel change in the English plural "teeth," but also the identity of English tooth with Greek ὀδοντ- and Latin dent-. Again, the word for "mightier" in Mark i. 7 is swinthoza. This, with loss of n before th, as in tunthus, and change of z (i.e. voiced s) into r, gives us the A.-S. comparative swiðor, so often used where we say right, "the right hand" &c.—i.e. literally the stronger hand; a fact which in turn confirms the proposed identification of the root of sinister with that of senex, the common idea being that of weakness, and sinister being like swiðor a comparative in form. Having thus given some indication of the interest of Gothic to the intelligent student of English, we have only to say that Mr. Skeat's work is excellently adapted to the end he had in view in writing it; the paradigms are clear, the notes short and to the point.

There is a story told of a man who read a dictionary (we forget in what language) straight on end, and when he had finished, he is said to have observed that it was an interesting book, but a little disconnected. To obviate this want of connexion, Professor Skeat has, in the second work on our list, brought together the results arrived at in his Etymological Dictionary under the heads of the processes and principles which they illustrate. He has produced a useful, and in a sense a interesting, book—that is to say, it is a book which contains many interesting things. Two chapters are devoted by Mr. Skeat to the subject of spelling and spelling reform. We confess we do not see that the subject is much advanced by sentences like the following:—"It is surely a national disgrace to us to find that the wildest arguments . . . . are constantly being used even by well-educated persons, whose ignorance of Early English pronunciation and of modern English phonetics is so complete that they have no suspicion whatever of the amazing worthlessness of their ludicrous utterances" (p. 296). That is surely what Mr. Matthew Arnold calls "a style as far removed from urbanity as possible." It is not often that Mr. Skeat mislays his temper in this way. We do not propose to discuss the question as a whole, but one or two remarks we are tempted to make. The old scribes, says Mr. Skeat, spelt as they pronounced. And the consequence is that they all spelt differently. That is often very interesting to us, as it may enable us to tell the dialect or province to which the scribe of a manuscript belonged. But is Mr. Skeat going to "restore the heptarchy" in literature? Education, locomotion, centralization do away with many interesting local traits; but we do not therefore propose to reverse the progress of the century. And as it was inevitable that the invention of printing should substitute uniformity for local variety, so it was inevitable that it should stereotype that uniformity when once it was attained; just as the codification of unwritten customs arrest their further development by practice.

Among the works projected by the late Mr. Kemble was an edition of the Gospels which should show in one synoptic view the earliest and latest forms of the West-Saxon text (MSS. C.C.C.C. No. 140. Bodl. Hatton No. 38 [formerly 65]), the interlinear Northumbrian gloss of the Lindisfarne Gospels (Cotton MS. Nero D. iv.), and the similar gloss, partly Mercian and partly Northumbrian, contained in the Rushworth Gospels (Bodl. Auct. D. ii. 19). Mr. Kemble died before the completion of St. Matthew, which was finished by his colleague, the Rev. C. Hardwick, and appeared in 1858. The remaining three Gospels were edited by Mr. Skeat, and appeared in 1871, 1874, and 1878 respectively. The re-issue, therefore, of St. Matthew by Mr. Skeat gives us a homogeneous edition of the whole four Gospels, and is on that and many other grounds thoroughly welcome. The standard of accuracy in editing MSS. has advanced considerably since Kemble's day, and Mr. Skeat claims to have secured greater exactness in this respect. In order to test this claim we determined to collate a chapter in Mr. Skeat's edition with the two Oxford MSS. (Hatton and Rushworth) which furnish two out of his four texts. As regards the Hatton MSS. the result may be very briefly dismissed. We chose almost at random the twentieth chapter of St. Matthew. The only errors which we detected were that in v. 12 the MS. seemed to us to have werhtan for Mr. Skeat's worhtan; in v. 13 it certainly has wyrcende for his wyrcende, while in v. 29 Iericho is spelt with an initial capital. We should in one or two cases differ from Mr. Skeat as to the divisions between words and syllables, and, indeed, we think generally that the plan adopted by Professor Earle of representing the spacing of the MS. by corresponding spaces in printing is very preferable to Mr. Skeat's plan of inserting hyphens.

* The Gospel of St. Mark in Gothic according to the Translation made by Wulfila. Edited, with a Grammatical Introduction and Glossarial Index, by the Rev. Walter W. Skeat, M.A. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Principles of English Etymology. By the Rev. Walter W. Skeat, Litt.D. First Series. The Native Element. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

The Gospel according to St. Matthew in Anglo-Saxon, Northumbrian, and Old Mercian Versions, synoptically arranged. New editions. By the Same. Cambridge: at the University Press.

The Vision of William concerning Piers the Plowman, in Three Parallel Texts; together with Richard the Redeless. By William Langland. Edited, with Preface, Notes, and Glossary, by the Same. 2 vols. Oxford: at the Clarendon Press.

An eye accustomed to the look of an Anglo-Saxon MS. resents the presence of a hyphen as a modern and incongruous element. More important is, that its insertion sometimes begs questions which ought to be left open. As regards the Rushworth MS., the result of our inspection was less satisfactory. In v. 22 the scribe at first wrote "þa ondswarede," he then smudged out the "þa," and inserted it after "ondswarede." The reason of this was that the scribe began to write in the natural Saxon order, and then altered it to suit the order of the Latin which he was glossing, "respondens autem." So in v. 23 the scribe had written "ge iarwad" (gl. paratum), but the "ge" is smudged. Now, we are not sure that this was not unintentional, and that the form was not meant to be ge-iarwad parallel with the ge-gearwad of the Lindisfarne text. Anyhow, as Mr. Skeat professes to mention all the corrections of the text, these facts ought to have been noted. More important is that in v. 27 the words "betwix eow" after "wile" are omitted altogether (Kemble here omitted nearly a whole verse); while at the beginning of v. 33 a ⁊ (and) is inserted which is not in the MS. In this text also there are questions of word-division on which we should be inclined to differ with Mr. Skeat. But the inspection of the Rushworth MS. has suggested to us a more interesting question than that of Mr. Skeat's exact accuracy. The Lindisfarne gloss is, as we have said, Northumbrian throughout. The Rushworth gloss on St. Matthew is Mercian, and moreover is much freer in character. For whereas the former is an interlinear version on the Hamiltonian method, each Saxon word being written above the Latin word which it translates, regardless of Saxon order and syntax, the latter is much freer, and though influenced, as we have shown, by the Latin order, approaches more nearly to the character of an independent translation. But with the beginning of St. Mark the character of the Rushworth gloss changes; it becomes Northumbrian, and follows so closely the Lindisfarne MS. that it must have been copied, either from that or some closely related MS. Soon after the same point—namely, at Mark ii. 15—the hand of the scribe changes; and, with the curious exception of three verses in St. John (xviii. 1-3), where there is a reversion to the former hand, and to the former Mercian and freer style of gloss, this continues to the end. From notes in the MS. we know who these two scribes were—namely, Færman, a priest of the monastery of Harewood in the West Riding, and a scribe named Owun. How is the difference in their work to be explained? Dr. Murray's view, adopted by Mr. Skeat in the preface to St. John, is that Færman made an independent version of St. Matthew; that he then became acquainted with the Lindisfarne gloss, and began to copy it; but, wearying of the work of mere transcription, handed it over to Owun to complete. Against this view, plausible and ingenious as it is, the following facts may be noted (we confine ourselves still to the twentieth chapter of St. Matthew). In the latter half of v. 6 the gloss runs, "gemette oþre standende," i.e. he met with others standing; the Latin under this passage originally stood "uidit alios stantes"; but uidit has been altered by the glossator into inuenit (which is the reading of the Lindisfarne text) in order to bring it into harmony with the gloss. In the same way, in v. 21 the glosser has inserted the word dic, which was not in his Latin text, because the Saxon version has cwæþ. In the same way, meam is inserted in v. 23. Mr. Skeat has noticed these alterations of the Latin text, but he has not, we think, mentioned, what seems to us abundantly clear, that they are in the same hand and ink as the gloss. Hence the conclusion seems inevitable that the gloss to St. Matthew is not the original work of Færman, but was copied by him from some glossed MS., the Latin text of which did not agree exactly with that of the MS. into which he copied the gloss; and so he had to alter his Latin text in order to bring it into harmony with the gloss. A curious little fact confirming this view is the following. In v. 13 the scribe, instead of "be dinero dæglicum," "for a daily penny," i.e. "for a penny a day" (dinere being the Latin denarius), wrote at first "be dinere dægullicum," i.e. "for a secret penny." Now the adverb "degullice," secretly, actually occurs a little lower down, in v. 17, as a gloss to secreto. It was easy for a scribe, copying mechanically, to confuse dæglicum and dægullicum, especially if his eye caught the word degullice lower down in the page; but it is inconceivable that an independent translator should have written such nonsense as "a secret penny." We are driven, therefore, to the conclusion that the difference in the Rushworth MS. between the gloss on St. Matthew and that on the other three Gospels is due to the fact that they were copied from two different MSS., and not, as Dr. Murray and Mr. Skeat thought, to the fact that the one was and the other was not the independent work of Færman himself.

We have departed slightly from the chronological order of publication in our list, in order to observe the principle of keeping the best till last. In the two handsome volumes published by the Clarendon Press Mr. Skeat has brought together the results of twenty years' untiring labour on the text of The Vision of Piers the Plowman. These results have been known and appreciated by scholars as they appeared from time to time in the publications of the Early English Text Society. But those publications, though invaluable to students, are not very accessible to the general public, nor very acceptable to those who care for books as books, and not merely as literary tools.

For the text Mr. Skeat has done almost everything that could be done, having collated all the more important of the forty-five MSS. at present known to exist; nor is it likely that even the discovery of other MSS. would seriously affect the results arrived at. It is curious that of these forty-five MSS. only one contains the poem on Richard II. (Richard the Redeless), which is almost certainly by the same author. The fact is a striking illustration of the insecurity of the times, and of the danger supposed to attend the possession of literature bearing directly on current politics. The notes are a perfect mine of illustrations, historical, social, literary, and philological to the text of the poem. The French proverb says that everything comes to him who knows how to wait, a saying which is eminently true of literary research. We can easily imagine the pleasure of Mr. Skeat in coming upon some of the apt parallels which he has brought together from so many sources. Our only regret is that Mr. Skeat has not combined these illustrations into a general view of the relation of the poem to the history, life, and literature of the times. In return for this we would gladly have surrendered the copious extracts which he has given us in his Introduction from Whitaker and Milman. There are just a few points in the notes on which we are inclined to differ from Mr. Skeat. We will just mention one or two of the more important of these, in order to show that we are not oblivious of the first duty of a critic. On pp. 119 and 175 of vol. ii. the expressions "bothe the lawes," and "the two lawes" are interpreted as meaning the duty to God and to our neighbour. We are inclined to think that the reference is, in accordance with common mediæval usage, to the civil and canon laws, a combination which still survives in the title (borne by Mr. Skeat himself) of Legum Doctor, and the corresponding phrase Utriusque Juris Doctor. On pp. 143, 240, we think Mr. Skeat has gone wrong through not observing that the word moillere is the legal phrase mulier, meaning legitimate. The word mulier occurs, for instance, in this sense in Fortescue's tracts on the Succession. We believe, moreover, that this is the meaning of the word in all the places in which it occurs in Piers the Plowman; though in some cases the sense of "lawful wife" which Mr. Skeat assigns to it is not absolutely impossible. On p. 268 the phrase "to paye" is wrongly explained as meaning "to please"; the use of the word two lines lower down in the poem, and in Passus 23, 308, shows clearly that it is here to be taken in its usual sense. On p. 248 we are inclined to suggest that the phrase "lened me to a lenten" is perhaps to be explained by the parallel passage 11, 64, as meaning "I leaned against a linden tree"; while on p. 303, in the phrase used of some of the members of Richard II.'s packed Parliament of September 1397, that they had "supped with Simon over-night," the Simon meant is probably not Simon Peter, as Mr. Skeat thinks, understanding it as a symbolical expression for the clergy, but Simon Magus; and the whole phrase is a humorous way of saying that they had been bribed. But even if in these and a few other cases Mr. Skeat has really gone wrong, these are but slight blemishes on a very important work.

The historical interest of Langland's great poem and the light which it throws upon the social and ecclesiastical life of the time have often been recognized. The passages which have naturally attracted most notice are those in which he attacks the clergy, their non-residence (p. 8), their secular employments (pp. 18, 97, 127, 169), and secular garb (p. 444); their avarice and hardness (pp. 37, 444, 471), their want of learning (pp. 376, 386); his bitter remarks on the rival popes, their failure to make peace among kings and between themselves (pp. 129, 379, 473, 577), and their unlikeness to their spiritual ancestor St. Peter when he said, "Silver and gold have I none" (p. 403); his still more bitter denunciations of the friars which occur at almost every turn, and in which he shows his affinity with Wycliffe. On the strength of these passages he has been claimed by the Reformers. Fuller, e.g. in his Worthies of England, says "he may by Prolepsis be termed a Protestant." It is now beginning to be recognized that a mediæval writer may denounce the abuses of the mediæval Church without necessarily being a Luther or a Zwingli "born out of due time." Even in regard to Wycliffe himself, Dr. Shirley long ago remarked that, had he only abstained from attacking the doctrine of Transubstantiation, he might have been honoured as the founder of a new Order in the Church, and his "poor priests" might have taken their place by the side of the Dominicans and Franciscans. How far our author was from being a Protestant in the popular sense may be seen from the following doctrines and practices of which he distinctly approves; although, like all true moral and religious reformers, he places right intention and right conduct, love to God and love to man, far above all external observances, however sacred. We take the points in the order in which they occur in his work—Prayers to Saints form the pillars of Truth's abode (p. 187); the embroidering of "chasubles for chaplains" is urged on rich ladies as a charitable work (p. 195); purgatory (p. 239); the Pope has power "pardon to grant To people without penance to pass into Joy" —in other words, to grant indulgences (p. 249); virginity is set above marriage (pp. 368, 483); the clergy, "what so [ever] they do themselves," are nevertheless God's anointed (p. 373. Contrast Wycliffe's doctrine of "Dominion founded in grace"). Thomas Becket, the special object of Reformation fury, which erased his very name from the Calendar, "was slain . . . in salvation of man's soul," and "is an example to all bishops and a bright mirror" (p. 475). On p. 549 the poet says to his wife and daughter

> Arise and go reverence • God's resurrection,
> And creep on knees to the Cross • & kiss it for a Jewel—a practice expressly condemned at the Reformation; while on

p. 573 the doctrine of Transubstantiation is put into the mouth of Conscience herself:—

Here is bread y-blessed · and God's body there-under; where the word "there-under" exactly represents the theological substance of Transubstantiation (cf. p. 505). All these passages are from the latest recension of the poem; so that they represent the author's maturest views, who cannot, we fear, be acquitted of adherence to "the deplorable Roman religion," as Thackeray with his "wonted irony" calls it in his recently published letters. But it is not ecclesiastical abuses only that raise Langland's wrath. He is strong against the secular evils of the time—purveyance, livery, and maintenance—those standing plagues of the later middle ages, the corruption of judges and juries, the overbearing of law by force, the oppression of lords towards their tenants (p. 457), and of tradesmen towards the poor "that parcel-mele mote biggen"—i.e. who are forced to buy in small quantities (p. 69). He is as stern as Thackeray against the monstrosities of the marriage market (pp. 279 ff.), and denounces idle and fraudulent beggars with the zeal of a Poor-law reformer (pp. 204 ff.) Langland is emphatically one for whom "facit indignatio versum." He is very different in this from his great contemporary Chaucer, whose genial and worldly humour takes vice and imperfection for granted. And among his most beautiful lines are those which describe (pp. 230-1) the lawyer who uses his legal knowledge, not, as so many, for oppression, but to "see that such as are in need and necessity have right"; and the account of charity (pp. 446-9).

Besides being a moralist at once indignant and tender, the poet is a humourist of a very high order, full of keen and caustic observation. Mr. Skeat has rightly drawn attention to the number and interest of Langland's references to London, where he lived for a long time. But he had also lived in the country. Indeed, the line which in the latest or C-text runs

I have lived in London · many long years, is in the B-text

I have lived in land [i.e. in the country] quoth I · my name is long Will.

And the air of the country breathes in some of the most musical lines of the poem. This note is struck at the very opening:—

In a summer season · when soft was the sun, &c.

And there is another very similar passage, pp. 257-9:—

I went forth wide-where · walking mine one [i.e. alone]
In a wild wilderness · by a wood-side.
Bliss of the birds · abide me made,
And under a linden in a lawn · leaned I a stound [i.e. a while]
To list to their lays · and their lovely notes.

Very beautiful, too, is the description (too long to quote) of what Kind (i.e. Nature) showed to the poet in the "Mirror of Myddelerde," or Earth (pp. 359-361).

We trust we have said enough to show that, apart from the high historical and philological interest of Langland, his literary value is extremely great. Any one who reads to live and does not live to read, or, to put it differently, any one whose interest is literary rather than philological or historical, may be well content, if he have mastered Chaucer and Langland, to give the rest of Middle-English verse the go-by. At the end of the preface to the last volume of Piers the Plowman, published by the Early English Text Society, Mr. Skeat expresses the hope that his work may prove as useful as that of the Northern Farmer, who was well content to make it his boast that he had "stubb'd Thornaby waäste." We heartily congratulate him on this conclusion of his most important work. It is a perfect monument of patient industry and sound learning.

THE VIRGINIAN CAMPAIGN OF 1781.*

THESE two solid volumes are, in the first place, witnesses to the painful interest taken by Americans in their history. Painful, that is, in the old sense of the word, for it shrinks from no labour, and it publishes the results of its toil regardless of expense. A fair and safe way of showing what these volumes contain—and withal an easy way, which is no small merit—is to quote the voluminous title-page, whereon Mr. Stevens, "of Vermont, temporarily residing in London, England," amplifies the short title given on the back of his book. "The Campaign in Virginia, 1781. An exact Reprint of Six rare Pamphlets on the Clinton-Cornwallis Controversy; with very numerous important unpublished Manuscript Notes by Sir Henry Clinton, K.B.; and the omitted and hitherto unpublished Portions of the Letters in their Appendixes added from the Original Manuscripts. With a Supplement containing Extracts from the Journals of the House of Lords, a French Translation of Papers laid before the House, and a Catalogue of the additional Correspondence of Clinton, and of Cornwallis, in 1780-81: about 3456 Papers relating to the Controversy or bearing on affairs in America." Here is a title-page nearly as long as a preface, but carefully descriptive and thoroughly trustworthy—nay more, most commendably modest. Mr. Stevens not only gives all this, but more also. His reprint of the pamphlets with Clinton's notes is supplied with an elaborate set of finger-posts, so to speak, and cross references, so that no one who uses them has the smallest excuse for not knowing where to find all the pros and cons of the controversy. Mr. Stevens has also got his book up in a style deserving of much praise. The volumes are larger than human indolence can like, but paper and print are capital, and the type varies in size in proportions pleasing to the eye. It must have been a happy morning that in which Mr. Stevens arranged his title-page, adjusted its lines, and balanced its type.

From the nature of the case, Mr. Stevens's share of the book is largely beyond the reach of criticism. Unless one had the rare pamphlets covered with General Clinton's notes before him how shall he tell whether Mr. Stevens has copied those jottings accurately? Again, without going all through the straggling correspondence of the parties in the original, how shall he say whether it is carefully reprinted? These remarks we make as defining our own inevitable limitations, not as meaning to imply that Mr. Stevens has failed in any way to discharge the duties of a good and faithful editor. On the contrary, there is abundance of internal evidence that he has laboured strenuously, and missed nothing. Texts, notes, references, elucidations, and quotations from contemporary newspapers and magazines are all given. The result is a work which must be exceedingly useful to all students of the American War of Independence. Further, Mr. Stevens's own observations are thoroughly sensible in tone, and he sums up the merits both of the Virginian campaign and the quarrel between the English generals very soundly. Any doubt we have as to the value of the book is due entirely to the nature of the subject. It is not because the Virginian campaign of 1781 ended in the surrender at Yorktown that we find a thousand pages of print more than it deserves. That disaster can be now remembered with great equanimity, but the relative importance of the thing does not justify so much talk. Perhaps an Englishman may be prejudiced in this matter. In a history which has lasted for eighteen hundred years, more or less, and is so incomparably full and varied, one campaign of one war must have a very subordinate interest. Even while it was going on the Virginian campaign was, for England, only a part of a great and complicated whole. It had to be watched along with the diplomatic struggle with the Northern Powers, and open war with our neighbours across the Channel and the North Sea. Hood and Rodney were keeping the lists against all comers in the West Indies; Gibraltar was standing its famous siege; and in the East we were wrestling our last pull with France. Amidst all this the campaign in Virginia, in spite of its real importance, is considerably overshadowed for us. From the American point of view, which takes in so much less, it is more conspicuous, naturally; but even there it can hardly be worth two weighty volumes. After all Mr. Stevens's labour there is nothing new to be said about it. That Clinton and Cornwallis, though good officers and honourable men, were neither of them great soldiers, that they were far too weak in force for the work they had to do, that they were mistaken in dividing their army before the enemy, and that one of them was crushed by weight of numbers, were known facts, and cannot be made any more certain. In its details the campaign was not picturesque, and has no military significance. Therefore we cannot help thinking that Mr. Stevens has imposed upon himself a work of supererogation.

The merits of the controversy between the generals have also been already judged, and most admirably. Nothing more completely adequate can be imagined than the judgment given in their own time by the Monthly Review for January 1783, and quoted by Mr. Stevens, on the first of the pamphlets. "It had," said our esteemed ancestor in the press, "been happy for this country [we are to write now in the preter-pluperfect tense] that the conduct of our commanders had been so clear and decisive as to save them the trouble of penning narratives and defences. Ill-success is the parent of accusation, exculpation, and recrimination, and in this detail Sir Henry Clinton acquits himself of all share in Lord Cornwallis's misfortune, leaving that general to answer for misconceptions of the orders sent him, and for the choice of the post which he was reduced to surrender. A counter representation may probably follow from the other side, and such is all the satisfaction we have, and are likely to have, for the loss of America." The Monthly Reviewers were duller men than some rivals, according to Dr. Johnson, but this Monthly Reviewer was not a dull man. He turned out a neat piece of prophetic criticism and said all there was to say. Taken together, the pamphlets prove that neither of the generals had a definite practical military scheme in his head, that they went along from hand to mouth playing the extremely difficult game of co-operation from widely distant centres, and in their correspondence leaving much to be understood, and implying a great deal which ought to have been stated with precision. Finally, they were beaten because the united force of the enemy, more by accident than good management, fell upon one of them while they were divided. To be sure it must be said for them that they had to fight under conditions which would have tried Napoleon or Gustavus.

* Clinton-Cornwallis Controversy, growing out of the Campaign in Virginia, 1781. Compiled, collected, and edited by B. F. Stevens. London: 4 Trafalgar Square. 1888.

TWO BOOKS ON LATIN LITERATURE.*

THE altogether disproportionate attention which, from at least the middle of the seventeenth century to the first quarter of this nineteenth, Roman literature received at the expense of Greek in England naturally brought about a certain reaction, and until recently Greek has certainly attracted (we shall not say more than its share, having a strong opinion on that point, but) more than Latin. Of course there have been isolated exceptions, such as the great work done on single authors by the late Mr. Munro and the living Mr. Robinson Ellis, and the excellent study of the literature, as a literature, by Professor Sellar. Quite recently, again, there seems to have been a fresh set in the Roman direction, and the two books before us are instances of it. Whether they are capital instances will appear better when we have examined them more in detail.

* Society in Rome under the Cæsars. By W. R. Inge. London: Murray. 1888.
Roman Literature and Roman Art. By Rev. Robert Burn. London: Macmillan. 1888.

It is never well to be harsh to the young, and when the young are instructors of others yet younger maxima debetur pueris has a double meaning. Besides, Mr. Inge, who is a Master at Eton, and a Fellow of King's College as well, displays good gifts in more ways than one. He has evidently had the virtue as well as the good taste to read what he is writing about. Indeed, his book shows a really creditable acquaintance with Latin literature, especially Latin poetical literature, from Lucretius to Juvenal, beyond which his period does not go. The essay is a well-written essay, and, we doubt not, quite deserved the Hare prize which it got at Cambridge two years ago. But whether it deserved publication is another matter. Nobody who remembers his own undergraduate or early graduate days has much right to throw stones at Mr. Inge for the faults here observable as faults in a prize essay. Anybody who did not publish his own essays, prize or other, at such a period may perhaps have a little right to throw a pebble at this published book. Most men can remember the ingenuous way in which they "got into logical coaches," and rode to their destination, charmed with the smooth rolling of the vehicle, and quite careless of other considerations; the bland indifference with which they arrived at contradictory conclusions, the gravity with which they picked up and gave out as new the ideas of popular text-books and popular coaches, or (it comes to very much the same) with unheard-of audacity attacked these ideas. One may praise the composition of these little exercises, through which only, in most cases, a man comes to sound and original thinking; but one cannot praise the publishing of them. For instance, we should like Mr. Inge to compare two statements of his which occur at no greater distance than at pages 4 and 10 of his book:—

The righteous indignation with which Lucretius attacks the fables about Hell current among the vulgar seems to show that belief in a future punishment was strong enough to cause considerable unhappiness in the minds of many.

Let us, to be absolutely fair to Mr. Inge, mention that in a previous sentence he refers to the "apparent incredulity of educated persons" in such fables; but still the sentence just quoted seems to ring oddly in the memory when we come six pages later to the following:—

The belief in immortality was openly ridiculed in Cicero's time. Hardly an old woman could be found, if we believe the writer, who trembled at the fables about the infernal regions.

This again is safeguarded just afterwards by a caution not to accept the statements of authorities too strictly, to remember that expressions like Cicero's are hastily made, &c. But as Cicero's time and Lucretius's time coincide pretty exactly, it surely would have been better not to hazard at short distances general statements which directly contradict each other. The truth, of course, is that nothing can be more rash than to found any positive conclusion upon the language of a poetical and philosophical recluse like Lucretius or a rhetorical speaker and writer like Cicero. And this rashness, though, as the two provisos just referred to show, Mr. Inge really tries to guard himself against it, is the main fault of the book. The writer does not sufficiently remember that elaborate literature of the belles-lettres kind is the most dangerous of all texts to judge social matters from, and that in both the classical literatures, but especially in Latin, the quantity of literary evidence that we have, not of this kind, is wofully small. Suppose Marston's satires with little or nothing else had come down to us as evidence of the social state of London, what should we think of the generation of the Armada? Would Mr. Inge take the doleful descriptions of British impiety in Gildas as gospel?

There is another sign of youth in Mr. Inge's arguments; he mixes up his times. What is the use of quoting Cicero and Celsus, writers separated by some two hundred years, as giving contrasted evidence about belief in the superstitions of Paganism? You might as well quote Essays and Reviews and Hobbes as if they had reference to the same state of things. This lumping up of all classical writers is, no doubt, a very common fault; but we should hardly have expected it from an evidently well-read young scholar. "If we may believe Juvenal and Apuleius" is not so bad; but it is quite as bad as "if we may believe Fielding and Thackeray." Indeed, we should much like to know what Apuleius has to do with "the Cæsars" at all. Yet, again, Mr. Inge falls into that peculiar vice of which Macaulay and the late Mr. J. R. Green are the capital examples—the vice of generalizing from a single example or a small number of examples. He refers to a well-known scandalous story as to the abuse, in a particular instance, of a temple for purposes of seduction. But this is a terribly narrow foundation for the sweeping statement—"Even religion lent itself to be the ready minister of vice, and the temples of Isis were constantly used for the vilest purposes." The sentence before this—"Art lent itself to depict shameless and suggestive scenes"—is a very odd hendiadys; for the poor blessed word "suggestive" has surely nothing wicked per se about it. But it is chiefly in generalities of this kind that Mr. Inge is peccant, and when we come to the detailed accounts of manners and customs the book is nearly always careful and good. Its fault is an insufficient power of weighing and arranging evidence—a power which scarcely ever comes very early.

We can hardly speak so well of the other book before us, except as an album to turn over for the sake of its admirable illustrations. The author of Rome and the Campagna has Roman art, especially architecture, sufficiently near his finger ends, and his examples of them are well chosen and admirably rendered. But from this to writing a book on Roman literature in relation to Roman art is rather a long way, and to writing this book in the form of a comparative and philosophical history of Roman tendencies, character, and so forth, is a still longer. We own that we do not think Mr. Burn has reached even the shorter journey's end in a satisfactory manner. To begin with, the book is factitious in composition; the longest chapter, nearly one-third of the whole, is, the author tells us, slightly altered from his former work. It gives, indeed, a very interesting and minute account of Romano-Greek architecture, but an account which has in at least great part of its bulk absolutely nothing to do with the general subject. Then, too, Mr. Burn's fashion of arguing is very odd. "The characteristic tone," he says, "of Materialism which we see pervading all ancient Roman work is diametrically opposed to the spiritual and upward tendency expressed by Gothic architecture, and we are, therefore, prepared to find Roman art and poetry deadening the elevated tone of Christianity for many centuries." Anything stranger of its kind than this "therefore" we never had the honour of meeting. Roman art and literature were deadening and materializing, and, therefore, we find them deadening Gothic. One would imagine from Mr. Burn's words that Gothic was first, and then Roman art and poetry came and deadened it. Perhaps he does mean this, and refers to Renaissance and Palladian art. But, then, how about the many centuries? In plain language, though we have no doubt his meaning is right, his expression is a mere muddle. Nor do we wonder so much at this when we come to other expressions on particular points. Whether some anti-Jingo has got hold of Mr. Burn and inoculated him with venom we know not, but he has got into his head the certainly original notion that the overweening patriotism of the Romans was prejudicial to their literary power. We will give any one a dozen, a hundred, or, if he likes, a thousand guesses at what Mr. Burn sees in the magnificent passage—one of the few in which even lukewarm admirers of the Mantuan acknowledge him to have reached poetry high, if not the highest—"Excudent alii" with its climax "Tu regere imperio populos." Mr. Burn sees in it (we should really like to have a page turned here in order to give the full effect) "an almost menial worship of Imperial power." This extraordinary sentence is well followed by another, which, unless its meaning is hopelessly confused, calls the Æneid "in great part prosaic and lifeless." Now there is a kind of fashion at the present day, no doubt, of assuming certain esoteric preciousnesses and perfections in Virgil which the profane vulgar cannot see, and against this tendency it is well to make a stand. And we shall not say that Virgil was of the first order of poets. But if a poem which begins with the storm and the meeting of Æneas and his mother, goes on with the story of the fall of Troy and its sequel, continues with the whole fourth book, and, after this, gives us the games, and the descent into hell, and Nisus and Euryalus, and the visit to Evander, and the deaths of Lausus and Pallas, and Mezentius and Turnus—if this poem, giving all this and more in one of the most perfectly harmonious of poetical styles is prosaic and lifeless, then we will very gladly take a whole corpus poeticum of such lifeless prose as soon as Mr. Burn will write it for us. Indeed, any one who can say that any part of the Æneid is prosaic must be perfectly insensible to poetic form. However, very likely Mr. Burn did not mean this; indeed, we are under the impression that throughout the book he did not know very clearly what he meant, and did not know at all how to express what he meant. This, no doubt, is a pitiable, not a criminal state of mind; but it is a state of mind by no means conducive to the writing of a good book.

But study brings all things good, and now that people have begun to read Latin once more, they will no doubt some day begin to know something about it, if only they do not allow themselves to confine their attention to In-khorn and Ta-phouse, nor, as a great scholar adjures them, try to find out, not what was meant, but what was written only.

THE EARTHLY INFERNO.*

We wish we could introduce Mr. William Morris, the poet, to Mr. William Morris, the political revolutionist, between whom there has long been alienation. The one might learn a great deal from the other. The author of the lectures printed under the title of the Signs of Change would find his dreams—half idyllic, half bloodthirsty—rebuked in advance by the more truly inspired wisdom of the poem the title of which, by a happy irony, he appends to his name at the front of this work. Mr. Morris, like the wanderers whose illusions and sufferings and failure he told in noble verse, has himself set out in search of an earthly paradise. Like them, having passed through much affliction, he would find, if he had his way, that he had arrived at a place very different from that of his dreams. He might find himself in an earthly inferno. "So," as a poet he knows sings, "with the failing of our hoped delight, we grew to be like devils." Mr. Morris, in the volume before us, describes a state of things which does not exist, and proposes, as a cure for it, a state of things which could not possibly exist. With a certain artistic sense, in which he is not likely to be wanting, he darkens his picture of the present in order to heighten the charms of the dream of the future which he displays before his own duped vision. He writes as if the disclosures which have been made before the Lords' Committee on the sweating system gave a true picture of our industrial organisation, though they really apply only to four trades subject to very special conditions.

* Signs of Change. Seven Lectures, delivered on various occasions. By William Morris, Author of "The Earthly Paradise." London: Reeves & Turner. 1888.

Society, according to Mr. Morris, is divided into two classes; robbers and the persons whom they plunder, masters and slaves. These two classes are commonly called employers and labourers, or capitalists and workmen, but their moral relation is, in Mr. Morris's view, best expressed by the terms which he uses. Labour produces everything, and is, therefore, entitled to everything. But as labour cannot be set to work without capital—which supplies it with the means of livelihood while the products on which it must subsist are in the process of creation, and with the instruments, such as tools, machinery, buildings, in and by which it works—it is absolutely under the control of capital, and must submit to the terms which the capitalist imposes. As the capitalist, too, must live, and as he cannot eat spinning-jennies nor clothe himself with steam-engines, it might occur to Mr. Morris that he is as much in the power of the labourer as the labourer is in his power, and that the terms master and slave, plunderer and plundered, might be converted. The number of the labourers, and their competition with each other for work, compels them, in Mr. Morris's view, to accept such wages as are compatible with bare and comfortless existence. But competition is not entirely on one side. If the competition of labourers tends to lower wages, the competition of manufacturers tends to lower prices, and the labourer, who is the maker of one thing and the purchaser of many, finds the good and evil at least balanced. It further tends to equalize wages in different employments, which, as Mr. Mill points out, is a result of competition in harmony with the Socialist ideal. Further, there is a competition of employers for labourers, of which the result is to raise wages. That competition leads to adulteration and the production of articles cheap and nasty is true; but there is a competition also in excellence of quality as well as in vileness, and the action taken by the State through armies of inspectors in the protection of the purchaser and in derogation of the maxim caveat emptor enforces this better competition.

These are truisms, but it is necessary to re-state them when they are questioned by sciolists or denied by demagogues. The grave fact, however, remains. Are the English labouring classes in the position of starved, ill-clad, miserably housed, over-worked, and mentally impoverished destitution which is alleged? There is some incongruity in bringing Mr. Giffen's facts and researches into juxtaposition with Mr. Morris's dreams. Mr. Morris speaks of over-production for the sake of profit to the employer leading to exhausting over-work on the part of the labourers. Mr. Giffen has pointed out that a relative decline in the material productions of English industry is due in some degree to the success with which the labouring classes have enforced shorter hours of labour, and their disposition, to use his phrase, "to take things easy," a state of mind which is in some degree in harmony with Mr. Morris's socialistic ideal. So far are things from going from bad to worse that of late years an increase of population has been accompanied by a decrease of pauperism; the deposits in savings banks and the number of depositors—chiefly working men and the tradesmen depending upon working men—have greatly increased. As these savings represent a surplusage of earnings over spendings Mr. Morris's theory of starvation wages, or wages little above starvation point, is scarcely in harmony with the facts. Mr. Morris advocates his socialistic reconstruction of society, which is mostly borrowed from Fourier, for this reason, among others, that the organization of labour would leave leisure for the innocent recreations and elevating pursuits of life. Mr. Giffen has pointed out that there is a steady increase among the self-supporting population of the country of the classes devoting themselves to art, science, literature, amusements, and education. This fact exhibits a tendency in the direction of Mr. Morris's desires.

The fact is that, under the system of competition, the evils which Mr. Morris would abolish by Socialism are gradually curing themselves. To this fact Mr. Morris carefully shuts his eyes, or, when he cannot shut his eyes, he closes his mind. He denounces gradual reforms as leading men away from his own remedy of violent revolution. He looks forward, as possibly "the best we can hope to see," to a time when "the struggle, getting sharper and bitterer day by day"—it is becoming less sharp and less bitter day by day—"will break out openly into a slaughter of men by actual warfare instead of the slower and crueller methods of peaceful commerce. If we live to see that, we shall live to see much; for it will mean the rich classes grown conscious of their own wrong and robbery, and consciously defending them by open violence; and then the end will be drawing near."

Like some of his predecessors of the French revolutionary period, Mr. Morris mingles with his bloodthirsty aspirations dreams of a land flowing, not so much with milk and honey as with milk and water, of a society in which fellowship shall supersede mastership, in which men shall play at work and work at play, and society shall be dissolved in a sickly, spoony, and languid sentimentality which would probably issue in a hate like that of the soliloquist in the Spanish cloister. This, of course, is not his statement; it is our rude but faithful translation. For ourselves we believe that he entirely mistakes human nature. Sir William Grove's speculations are not necessary in order to show that antagonism is the law of the world, that conflict and competition are essential to the development of an energetic manliness of character, that the relations of men to each other are naturally and necessarily those of leaders and followers, masters and servants, of rivals and not of fellows in Mr. Morris's lackadaisical sense of the term—a sense incompatible with real comradeship and hearty goodwill.

In conclusion, may we commend to Mr. Morris his own earlier wisdom:—

> Dreamer of dreams, born out of my due time,
> Why should I strive to set the crooked straight?

He has endeavoured to build "a shadowy isle of bliss amidst the beatings of a steely sea," unconscious of what he once knew, that "its ravening monsters mighty men must slay," if they are to be slain, "not the poor singer of an empty day."

ARTISTIC ANATOMY.*

THERE are several works on Artistic Anatomy in English, French, and German. Our great work, of course, is the classical Marshall, which we have already reviewed, or rather we have attempted to do so. Before us is an outcome possibly of his work—at any rate, a most excellent practical treatise on the matter in hand. Our author is an accomplished artist, anatomist, and teacher, and finding, as he tells us in his preface, that there is no work on artistic anatomy which gives with sufficient fulness what the artist requires, has most certainly—without either extreme minuteness or, on the other hand, superficiality—given the art student exactly the necessary details for following out his work. Mr. Sparkes must most clearly have studied in the dissecting-room, or he could not have told us what we are so desirous ourselves of inculcating, that, besides knowledge gained by lectures, plates, models, casts, and reading, the art student should follow the example of such masters as Michael Angelo and Da Vinci, in careful attendance on and drawing from dissections, or indeed, if possible, making them himself. Every facility is given in London; the two great art schools, the Royal Academy and South Kensington, as also the lectures at University College, are illustrated by practical dissections in addition to the lectures, and the magnificent collection at the Royal College of Surgeons is open to all. The chief object of dissecting-room anatomy, of course, is to verify statements made in lecture, and to make the art student accurate.

Mr. Sparkes is to be much congratulated on having produced the most readable, accurate, and useful work for the English art student which has yet been placed before him, and it is a credit to South Kensington teaching and to English art literature.

DOCTORS AND DOCTORS.†

THE subject-matter of this work has been that of not a few others, but the author has certainly succeeded in imparting a freshness and interest which render it eminently readable. Written by one who is not in the ranks of the profession, it is strictly impartial and free from professional egotism, while exhibiting the greatest sympathy for physicians, past and present, in their many trials and disabilities. The thoughtful Englishman who takes a pride in his country's past history may well ponder the lessons here told, which should act as a wholesome tonic to complacent boasting, demonstrating as they undoubtedly do the gross ignorance and bovine stupidity of every rank of society in days not so very long gone by, days of which a not insignificant afterglow yet lingers amongst us. After the wreck of the old pagan civilizations, in which the science of medicine had held an honourable place, the Church devoted its energies, with all too much success, to the hampering, hindering, and smothering of this most beneficent of all the arts or sciences. Every effort was made to suppress the Jewish and Arabian physicians, who during the dark ages kept in some sort the traditions of a more enlightened epoch. How well the Church understood the nature of the duties which it thus arrogantly assumed may be gathered from the injunctions of Popes Benedict IX. and Urban II., which forbade the higher clergy to practise medicine at all, contemptuously relegating the art to the lowest of the priesthood, and endeavoured to prohibit surgery altogether, upon the ridiculous pretext that the Church abhorred the shedding of blood. Thus vilified and abused, medicine and surgery sank to a point at which they could certainly not be regarded as either a science or an art; and poor humanity was ruthlessly abandoned to the tender mercies of charlatans and impostors.

---

* A Manual of Artistic Anatomy. For the use of Students in Art. Being a Description of the Bones and Muscles that influence the External Form of Man. By John C. L. Sparkes, Principal of the National Art Training School, South Kensington [illegible] Department). Illustrated. [illegible]

† Doctors and Doctors. By Graham Everitt. London: [illegible] Sonnenschein & Co. 1888.

The Reformation in England wrought but little improvement, although Henry VIII. condescended so far as to elevate surgery to the dignity of a tradecraft by granting a charter to the Barber Surgeons in 1540. A charter had previously been granted to physicians living in or within seven miles of London giving them a quasi-monopoly of metropolitan practice. But beyond this nothing seems to have been done by the Legislature to encourage medical education, or to protect the lives of the lieges from quackery as murderous as it was impudent. The author, quoting from a work dated so late as 1727, states that it was at that time customary for "bishops and their officials" to grant licences as "doctors" to all and sundry illiterate persons who chose to apply and pay for their diplomas. Indeed, this monstrous system survived up to the year 1858, the Archbishop of Canterbury retaining up to then the legal right to confer degrees in medicine at his own discretion. That the profession, humiliated and handicapped by such want of recognition of its fair claims, should have struggled on to its present position speaks volumes for the honesty, devotion, and intrepidity of its pioneers.

Mr. Everett describes very graphically the different epidemics of the black death and the sweating sickness; but surely the statement that the former "is at this moment doing deadly work among the miners in certain parts of the Principality" (Wales?) requires some explanation.

The whole chapter entitled "The Red Cross on the Door" is, however, of thrilling interest; while the "Essay on Humbug" and the pages devoted to "false pretences" are particularly commendable at the present day, when thousands of well-to-do people, who would feel themselves grievously insulted if they were designated paupers, eagerly avail themselves of the all too profuse benefits of purblind hospital charity.

When on the subject of mineral waters the author takes occasion to write the following very candid criticism concerning two well-known towns:—"Unlike Bath, even in the days of its prosperity, Clifton was as dull as ditchwater, if dulness of so impenetrable a character can ever hope to be equalled." Of modern Bath, we are told, "If you wish to see 'provincialism'—that peculiarity of English country society which astonishes foreigners—not, perhaps, at its worst, but in a very advanced form, the reader (sic) should seek it at this Western city." This may be sound sense, but the sentence is certainly somewhat shaky. It is a pity, too, that the same person should figure alternately in these pages as "Lord John Hervey" and "Lord Hervey." Such slipshod carelessness is excusable, perhaps, in a French journalist whose fondness for "Sir Harcourt" or "Sir Northcote" is well known, but we expect more accuracy in an English author.

The author is quite right, however, in attributing the languishing state of these, as indeed of nearly all our British spas, to the lack of such attractions as render a temporary sojourn agreeable to a man of culture and travelled experience; to want of enterprise, and to the dog-in-the-manger manners of the dominant cliques. All which things render less startling the assertion that "no strangers visit Clifton, except for the purpose of leaving it with as little delay as possible"—a decidedly Hibernian reason for going anywhere.

Some curious stories are related of medicine-taking maniacs, who, to judge by the fortunes made by advertising quacks, must still in this so-called enlightened age be reckoned by millions.

The criminal folly of these self-constituted experimenters upon their own or their children's bodies is well illustrated in several cases mentioned; while the "Quackery of Modern Miracles" affords an easy task of literary dissection. A chapter on Spiritualism closes the work, which presents on the whole few faults, and affords much information, amusing as well as instructive, if indeed it does not altogether demonstrate that the present average knowledge and intelligence possessed by the public but scantily suffices to raise their minds above the level of barbarism.

NEW PRINTS.

WE have received from Messrs. Boussod & Valadon specimens of a series of Estampes Miniatures which they have been publishing. These prints represent fairly the pictures of the several painters from which they have been taken, and they are very elegant little works of art in themselves. Bouguereau, Cabanel, and Perrault may not swing a very robust brush or revel in a very glowing palette, but they thoroughly understand the science of composition and the way to arrange a canvas pictorially. "Calypso," by Bouguereau, makes a lovely print, suave in line and agreeable in tone; and Perrault's naked Nymph, "La Baigneuse," swinging in a hammock slung over a stream, is a little design full of grace and delicacy. Certainly the "Marche d'Esclaves," after Gérôme, has more interest of subject, incident, and possibility, yet it is very lovely, too, in the contrast of the soft-sweeping contours of the female slave to the harsh faces and severe draperies of the buyers and sellers. We have also "Les Pigeons de St. Marc," from Palmaroli; "Petites Maraudeuses," from Bouguereau. The first shows a young girl feeding the pigeons at an open window which looks out on Venice; the second shows a girl of fifteen, who has been holding up a child while it steals fruit from trees near the roadside. There is a variety of colour in these prints. Some are sepia-red, as Cabanel's "La Colombe"; some blue, as De Beaumont's "Les Sirènes"; some grey, as Bouguereau's "L'Aurore" and "Crépuscule," and the greater part a warmish black, like Morgan's "Very Great Secret."

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE more splendid periodical works on the Salon—works which in their splendour English art does not dare to imitate —are as yet not out or not complete; but we have some publications of the kind before us. The Paris Illustré Salon number has on its outside a full-size coloured reproduction of M. Brouillet's portrait of Mlle. Darlot (a work more remarkable for skilful handling of faint shades of colour than for charm), and at the end another chromolithograph, from M. Bonnat's "Cardinal Lavigerie," who looks so like a benevolent and polygamous old sheikh that we do not wonder at the popular tradition which ascribes to him more influence than half a dozen generals in the French conquest of Central North Africa. The black-and-white pieces are of unequal effectiveness—the portraits, especially M. Gervex's "Mlle. Jeanne Harding" and M. Henner's admirable "Mme. X.," being by far the best. The corresponding number of L'Art appeals less to popular taste, but gives a very full and interesting series of reproductions of sketches and studies by the artists themselves for or from the exhibited works. The English version of the authorized Illustrated Catalogue (Chatto & Windus) is also before us. It is impossible to criticize this well-known publication, and sufficient to say that the numerous or innumerable reproductions are fully as good as usual and as well suited to the purposes of such a Catalogue. But it is a pity that the rendering of the titles into English is not entrusted to more competent hands. "Navy infantry" for "Infanterie de marine" is bad enough; but "Milk Street" for "La voie lactée" is really a little too bad.

M. Maurice Bouchor (1) would appear to be both in a productive and an eclectic vein just now. It is but the other day that we noticed a volume of Vedic and other poems by him, and here is a crusading drama, a really authentic crusading drama, in Alexandrines, partly Hugonian, though not of what may be called the ultra-victorious type, but chiefly of a rather old-fashioned and pre-1830 stamp. We do not remember seeing anything of M. Bouchor's in this kind before. The dramatic action, which turns on the seduction of a good young French knight by a wicked Greek princess, is not very strong; but there is some good stuff in it, and the proper names come in with a right "thwick-twhack thirlery bouncing."

M. Jules de Glouvet (2) has contributed a good short story of the Revolution to the curiously unequal little collection entitled "Petite Bibliothèque Française." La ferme à Goron (3), in another pretty little series, is one of the unlovely peasant stories which, common for many years, have culminated in La terre; while the ever-fertile mine of Tolstoi has furnished M. Henri Olivier with a short and not, to our thinking, specially effective companion volume (4). On the other hand, M. Alexandre Tassart (5) seems to have determined to do his Russian novel on his own profane head, and not on the sacred one of Tolstoi, Dostoievsky, or any other of the fraternity who, if Swift had been living to-day, would have made him call a character of his "Dismalski" instead of "Dismallo." As it ends with the words "Soyez maudits tous les trois!" it will be seen that it is of the right kind.

Fate or accident has kept back M. Hubbard's (6) biography of the present President of the French Republic from our notice till rather late, but any one who is curious on the subject will find in it a brief sketch, with an exceptionally good etched portrait.

We cannot too heartily commend Admiral Maxse's five letters to the Justice on the subject of Ireland (7). The unfortunate spectacle of the readiness with which in England itself, and with every opportunity of knowing the truth, the most barefaced falsehoods as to "coercion" government in Ireland are swallowed makes it impossible to feel much surprise at the still greater currency which such falsehoods obtain in France. But it is interesting to find that that civilized world which is "with" Mr. Gladstone founds its argument upon such beliefs as that Irishmen cannot elect their mayors and have no Parliamentary franchise, that eviction is something quite different from the proceeding which is in France itself lawful to and exercised by every proprietor whose tenant does not pay his rent, and so forth. The Admiral's description of Mr. John Morley is graceful and correct:—"Mr. John Morley est un charmant homme de lettres, qui a une terreur féminine des responsabilités du pouvoir et s'est fait le défenseur d'une politique de poltronnerie et de concessions continuelles devant la menace." Yet we do not think that Admiral Maxse is a Tory.

We have here two French books for very young persons, both good.

(1) Dieu le veut. Par Maurice Bouchor. Paris: Fischbacher.

(2) Dans l'Argonne. Par Jules de Glouvet. Paris: Librairie des Bibliophiles.

(3) La ferme à Goron. Par H. Beauclar. Paris: Dupret.

(4) Le joueur. Par le Comte L. Tolstoï. Paris: Dupret.

(5) Le Prince de Karaoulnff. Par A. Tassart. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(6) Sadi Carnot. Par G. A. Hubbard. Paris: Quantin.

(7) La presse française et l'Irlande. Par l'Amiral Maxse. Paris: Schiller.

Mlle. Doriot's (8) is for the very beginners of all, with pleasingly fantastic illustrations, divided words, and so forth. Mr. Cormell Price's edition of the pleasant Bouillie de la Comtesse Berthe (9) would come in a little later, but very well.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

To yoke together Mr. Henry James's Partial Portraits (Macmillan & Co.) and Mr. W. L. Courtney's Studies New and Old (Chapman & Hall), in a painter's humour, is more tempting than profitable, though both books are reprints of essays on literary subjects. The Portraits have more finish than the Studies, and this is all that can be said of the relation suggested. And first for the Portraits. If one wants to know what is a partial portrait, there is full satisfaction in reading Mr. Henry James on Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson. This is a sweet and gracious tribute. Mr. James is too good a literary artist to fall into the excesses of those unhappy critics who prematurely exhausted their adjectival enthusiasm and found themselves hard put to for language when dealing with Kidnapped. It is with a seductive gradation of manner, which arouses a responsive confidence in the persuasive guide, that Mr. James passes from fond contemplation of Mr. Stevenson's earlier work to the declaration that Kidnapped is a classic to be ranked with Esmond—that is, that "five-sixths of the book" must be considered "a gallant companion to Thackeray's tour de force." So insinuating is the progress, so full of charm and sympathy, that you arrive at this conclusion half acquiescent, or at least indisposed to protest. It is instructive to compare the artistic theories displayed in the interesting paper on the Art of Fiction with the process by which Mr. James separates the one-sixth of Kidnapped from the five. Here we find that the novel should be an organic whole; that novels and romances, novels of character or of incident, and so forth, are idle distinctions; that the boundaries of incident, description, and dialogue are indefinable; and that Mr. James professes not to understand what Mr. Walter Besant means by "the story" in the novel. If, as Mr. James says, "a novel is a living thing, all one and continuous, like any other organism," how can Mr. James rank Esmond with Kidnapped—Thackeray's masterpiece with five-sixths of Mr. Stevenson's organism? It is, no doubt, very kind, though a little blind to the excrescent one-sixth. The truth is Mr. James is above his theories sometimes. He is not without blinkings of Mr. Besant's meaning, for instance, as we see in his amusing discourse on Anthony Trollope, in which he stoops to distinguishing the "main story" and the "under-plot." He knows, also, that the novelist does not merely live upon "putting people into books," despite his profession of faith in the portrait of Alphonse Daudet; and he ought to know English literature better than to say of the short story that it has had a better fortune in America than in England.

Mr. Courtney's Studies New and Old are for the most part readable essays, though somewhat sketchy, and narrowed to small issues. They lack Mr. James's delicacy of presentment and over-refining analysis. There is much of the assayer's trim exactitude about Mr. James's method of criticism, whereas Mr. Courtney is at times rough and ready. It is not precisely delicate to ask whether it is experience or morbid fancy that dictates certain of Mr. Swinburne's earlier poems, and to describe those poems as "the recondite ravings of an artificer of impotent emotions" is to emulate a prose style which the writer vigorously denounces in the same paper. Mr. Courtney is not at his best when discussing poets, is not so forcible or keenly perceptive as in tracing the influence of Hobbes, or reviewing Victor Cousin's judgment of Pascal and the late Mr. Cotter Morison's Service of Man. In a paper on Emerson there is excellent truth in Mr. Courtenay's strictures on the verse perpetrated by the philosopher of Concord, but his examples and comments are sometimes unfortunate. He thinks that Emerson wrote

> And striving to be man, the worm
> Mounts through all the spires of form

"without, seemingly, discovering that the last line is deficient in a syllable." The couplet is bad, because the thought is confused, the expression awkward, and not because the license complained of is illegitimate. Mr. Courtney might as reasonably object to Keats's

> And thou shalt quaff it, thou shalt hear
> Distant harvest-carols clear;

or Shelley's

> For it had learnt all harmonies
> Of the plains and of the skies.

Mr. Alfred J. Bamford's Turbans and Tails (Sampson Low & Co.) is a pleasantly written record of travel from Bengal to Peking, in which man and manners are the study of the genial voyager, and vastly preferable to the agonizing description of everyday sights which most afflicts readers of books of travel. Mr. Bamford does not appear to have gone far afield in China, but he writes with so much gusto of Shanghai and its population as to invest the theme with freshness. He is also a delighted and entertaining student of the Babu and his wondrous ways, and a humorous observer of various Indian birds that never forsake the neighbourhood of a bungalow.

All who love stories of the marvellous, quests after buried treasure, and sea yarns so good that one wishes them to go on for ever, will be grateful for a new edition, with illustrations, of Mr. W. Clark Russell's thrilling story The Frozen Pirate (Sampson Low). This is one of the books much reading does not stale. The storm and catastrophe at the outset are among the best of their kind, and the kind is not prolific. The discovery and thawing of the buccaneer is a stroke of genius in a story that is compact of fire and spirit.

The reissue of the new and improved edition of Bryan's Dictionary of Painters and Engravers (Bell & Sons) has arrived at a tenth part, and advanced midway in the letter S. It is edited by Messrs. R. E. Graves and Walter Armstrong.

Some Oxford Customs, by Bee Bee (Sonnenschein & Co.), is a little book by a lady, who describes the glories of Commemoration and various customs observed at Magdalen, Queen's, and other colleges in Oxford, with clearness and brevity. The result is a readable and useful little guide.

Mr. J. Watson Lyall's Sportsman's Time-Tables and Guide to the Rivers, Lochs, Moors, and Deer Forests of Scotland is issued monthly from May to October, is full of the information required by angler, tourist, and shooter, and has an excellent map of the country by Mr. J. Bartholomew.

Among our new editions we note Anselm, by Dean Church (Macmillan & Co.); Mr. Goldwin Smith's Cowper (Macmillan & Co.); An Analysis of Wit and Humour, by Mr. F. R. Fleet (Allen & Co.); the third edition of Culmshire Folk (Cassell & Co.); and The Second Son, by Mrs. Oliphant (Macmillan & Co.)

We have also received Vols. I. and II. of a History of the Catholic Church in Scotland, translated by D. Oswald Hunter Blair, O.S.B., from the German of Dr. Alphons Bellesheim, to be completed in four volumes (Blackwood & Sons); The Registers of the Parish Church of Rochdale, from October 1582 to March 1616, edited by Henry Fishwick, F.S.A. (Rochdale: Clegg); Electricity and Magnetism, by Thomas Dunman, revised and completed by Chapman Jones, F.I.C. (Ward, Lock, & Co.); Parts 3 and 4 of a First History of the English People, by Amy Baker (Longmans & Co.), and May's British and Irish Press Guide for 1888.

(8) The Beginner's Book in French. By Sophie Doriot. London: Swan Sonnenschein.

(9) La bouillie de la Comtesse Berthe. Par A. Dumas. Edited by Cormell Price. London: Rivingtons.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF NO. 1,699, MAY 19, 1888:

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LYCEUM THEATRE.—FAUST. To-night at Eight. Mr. IRVING, Miss ELLEN TERRY. THE AMBER HEART, Wednesday next; ROBERT MACAIRE, Wednesday next. Box Office (Mr. J. Hurst), 10 to 5. Seats can be booked by letter or telegram.—LYCEUM.

THE NEW GALLERY, Regent Street. — The SUMMER EXHIBITION is NOW OPEN, from Nine A.M. to Seven P.M. Admission One Shilling; Season Tickets, Five Shillings.

NIAGARA IN LONDON. COLOSSAL PICTURE of the GREAT FALLS. Original Effects, by Philippoteaux. Pleasant Lounge, Music, American Museum, Electric Light. Admission, 1s. No Fees. Ten A.M. to Eleven P.M. WEDNESDAY, 2s. 6d. Ten to Six; 1s. Six to Eleven. Praised by entire Press. — YORK STREET, Westminster. St. James's Park Station. 4,000 Visitors Daily.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION,
West Brompton, Earl's Court, and West Kensington.

PATRON.
HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF ITALY.
HON. PRESIDENT.
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE CROWN PRINCE OF ITALY.
DIRECTOR-GENERAL.
JOHN R. WHITLEY, Esq.
PRESIDENT OF THE ENGLISH RECEPTION COMMITTEE.
COL. J. T. NORTH.
PRESIDENT OF THE ITALIAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.
CAV. L. BONACINA.

The First Exclusively ITALIAN EXHIBITION held beyond the boundaries of the Peninsula.

The most valuable and varied Collection of ITALIAN SCULPTURE and PAINTINGS ever exhibited.

Magnificent and unique Display of ITALIAN INDUSTRIES.

THE HUNTING TENT, &c., OF THE LATE KING OF ITALY.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
SCENES FROM ITALY.

ROME IN LONDON.
Roman Market Place. Roman Forum.
Colosseum and Palace of the Cæsars.
Vesuvius, Bay of Naples, and Italian Fleet.
Borghese Gardens, Tuscan Farmhouse.
Capri Blue Grotto. Temple of Vesta.
Italian Government Naval Exhibits.
Venetian Lace-Makers.
Alpine Switchback Railway.
Venetian Illuminations.
Italian Restaurant and National Dishes.

The Italian Exhibition Band.
The Scots Guards Band.
Italian Concerts.
Neapolitan Mandolinists and Singers.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
Open 11 A.M. to 11 P.M.
Admission to the Exhibition, 1s. No Half-Crown days.
Applications for Season Tickets to be made to
VINCENT A. APPLIN, Esq., Secretary.
Single Season Tickets, £1.
Double Season Tickets, admitting Gentleman and Lady, 30s.
Season Tickets for Children (under 16), 10s.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY.
Admission free.
74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.
(About Twenty Doors West of Mudie's Library.)

On View from Ten to Six daily.

The GREAT MASTERS. Reproduced in Autotype Permanent Photography from the grand Works in the Louvre, Hermitage, Uffizi, Madrid, Sistine Chapel, National Gallery, London, the Royal Collections at Windsor and Buckingham Palace.

The various Galleries have separate Albums, easily looked over, and of great interest to lovers of Art. Visitors are quite welcome to come and study them, and they will not be solicited to make purchases.

For further particulars send for the New Pamphlet, forty pages and four Illustrations, entitled "AUTOTYPE: a Decorative and Educational Art." Free per post to any address.

Just published.

IDYLLS of the NORFOLK BROADS. By P. H. EMERSON, B.A., M.B. 12 Plates in Autogravure, in handsome Portfolio with descriptive letter-press.

Proofs on India paper (limited to 150 Copies)	£1 11 6
Prints on plate paper	1 1 0

Prospectus and all particulars, on application to
THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY, 74 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

LONDON LIBRARY, St. James's Square, S.W.— The FORTY-SEVENTH ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING of the Members will be held in the Reading-Room on Thursday, May 31, at Three P.M.
The Right Hon. the EARL of CARNARVON in the Chair.
ROBERT HARRISON, Secretary and Librarian.

EDUCATIONAL.

VICTORIA UNIVERSITY.

An ENTRANCE EXAMINATION in ARTS (introductory to the Faculty of Medicine) will be held in Owens College, Manchester, University College, Liverpool, and Yorkshire College, Leeds, on Monday, June 18, and following days.

A PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION (introductory to the Faculties of Arts, Science, and Law) will be held in Owens College, Manchester, University College, Liverpool, and Yorkshire College, Leeds, on Thursday, June 14, and following days.

Notice (in writing) of intention to be present should be sent in on or before Thursday, May 31, to the University Registrar, from whom conditions of entrance and further particulars as to these and other Examinations can be obtained.

Manchester.

A. T. BENTLEY, M.A.
Registrar.

BRADFIELD COLLEGE, BERKS. FOUR FOUNDATION SCHOLARSHIPS, annual value Ninety and Eighty guineas (covering Tuition and Boarding Fees), FOUR WARDEN'S ENTRANCE EXHIBITIONS, annual value Fifty guineas, and FOUR MINOR ENTRANCE EXHIBITIONS, annual value Thirty guineas, will be offered for competition by Examination, beginning May 29, 1888. Candidates must be between Eleven and Fifteen on August 1, 1888. Subjects of Examination—Divinity, Classics, Mathematics. Boys destined for a Modern Side education may offer French instead of Greek, and are eligible for the Exhibitions only.

Separate Papers for those over and under Thirteen. For further particulars apply to the WARDEN.

CHELTENHAM COLLEGE.—The ANNUAL EXAMINATION for SCHOLARSHIPS will be held on July 17 and 18. Six Classical and Five Mathematical Scholarships of value ranging between £80 and £20, and tenable for three years, will be awarded.

Candidates must be under fifteen and over thirteen on July 1. Also a CHORAL SCHOLARSHIP, in value not less than £50 per annum, is offered for competition to boys (under twelve on July 1) who possess and desire to cultivate musical talent.

For further details apply to the SECRETARY, the College, Cheltenham.

CLIFTON COLLEGE.—CLASSICAL, MATHEMATICAL, and NATURAL SCIENCE SCHOLARSHIPS. NINE or more OPEN to COMPETITION at MIDSUMMER 1888. Value from £25 to £50 a year, which may be increased from a special fund to £90 a year in cases of scholars who require it.—Further particulars from the HEAD-MASTER, or SECRETARY, The College, Clifton, Bristol.

ROYAL INDIAN ENGINEERING COLLEGE,
COOPERS HILL, STAINES.
The course of study is arranged to fit an ENGINEER for employment in Europe, India, or the Colonies. About FIFTY STUDENTS will be admitted in September 1888. For Competition the Secretary of State will offer Fifteen Appointments in the Indian Public Works Department and Two in the Indian Telegraph Department. — For particulars, apply to the SECRETARY, at the College.

RADLEY COLLEGE—SIX SCHOLARSHIPS (of the value, four of £50, one of £30, one of £20), tenable for four years, will be offered for competition by Examination, commencing June 6, 1888. Candidates must be under fourteen on the 1st January, 1888.—For further particulars, apply to the WARDEN, Radley College, Abingdon.

HEIDELBERG COLLEGE, Heidelberg, Germany.
Preparation for Army and all Exams., also for Commercial Life. For particulars address the PRINCIPALS.

MARLBOROUGH COLLEGE, May 1888.
TWELVE SCHOLARSHIPS, varying in value from £80 to £14 a year, together with Four Council Nominations (giving immediate admission), will be competed for in June next. One of these Scholarships (£80) is confined to Candidates not yet members of the School, the rest are open to members of the School and others without distinction; two will be offered for proficiency in Mathematics. Age of Candidates from eleven to sixteen. Full particulars may be obtained on application to Mr. F. J. LEADER, the College, Marlborough.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—An EXAMINATION to fill up VACANCIES on the Foundation and Exhibitions will begin on Tuesday, July 10. For particulars apply to Rev. the HEAD-MASTER, Dean's Yard.

BOYS' SCHOOL.

BELL FARM, Clewer Hill, WINDSOR.—SCHOOL for SONS of GENTLEMEN, to prepare for Eton and other Public Schools. Greek, Latin, French, Mathematics.—Apply to Miss HIBBURD.

OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS in NATURAL SCIENCE, of the value of 125 Guineas and £60, are awarded annually, in October, at ST. THOMAS'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL, Albert Embankment, S.E.
For particulars apply to the Medical Secretary.
W. M. ORD, Dean. R. W. REID, Vice-Dean.

A CAMBRIDGE WRANGLER, assisted by an Oxford Graduate, is desirous of meeting with a COMPANION PUPIL Reading for the University.—Address, H. S. ROMER, Great Malvern.

CHURCH of ENGLAND CENTRAL SOCIETY for PROVIDING HOMES for WAIFS and STRAYS.

OFFICES: 32 CHARING CROSS, S.W.

The object of this Society is to rescue from vicious surroundings the Orphans and Destitute Children met with in every parish, and especially in large towns.

The Committee make a point of not accepting any case which could more properly be dealt with by the Legislature such as the Poor Law and School Boards. They are also most careful to avoid relieving unworthy parents of their responsibility, and therefore invariably give the preference to children who have neither parents nor relations able to provide for them.

Our great need is additional support to the General Fund, which supports the homes and the boarded-out children.

Prospectuses, and collecting cards and boxes, will be gladly supplied by the Hon. Secretary, Mr. E. DE M. RUDOLPH, 32 Charing Cross, S.W., who will thankfully receive contributions; or they may be paid to the account of the Society at Messrs. DIMSDALE & Co.'s, 50 Cornhill, E.C.

Forms of application for the admission of children can be had from the HON. SECRETARY.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.
JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.—Sold by all Stationers throughout the World.

FRY'S

J. WYBRANTS OLPHERTS, M.D., says: "I find it the most agreeable beverage of the kind I have ever tasted, delicious both in flavour and odour."

PURE CONCENTRATED

E. BUCKNILL, M.D., says: "Your Pure Concentrated Cocoa is so extremely nice that I have ordered it for family use."

COCOA.

DO NOT PINCH THE NOSE

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

BUT GO TO
L. K. LEON & CO.
OPTICIANS, 167 PICCADILLY, W.

and purchase a pair of their Patent Self-Adjustable Eye-Glasses, fitted with cork nose-pieces, which can be worn by any one with comfort. The most difficult faces fitted. All our lenses are carefully adapted to the sight, and being made periscopic, of best axis cut pebbles, are guaranteed to give perfect comfort.

We have no Agents. 20,000 Sold at the Colonial Exhibition.

FISHER'S GLADSTONE BAG.
188 STRAND.
Catalogues post free.

Mr. C. B. HARNESS, Consulting Medical Electrician and Inventor of the world-famed Electropathic Belt, may be consulted daily free of charge, personally or by letter, at the ELECTROPATHIC ESTABLISHMENT of the Medical Battery Company, Limited, 52 OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W. (corner of Rathbone Place). All in search of health should call to-day, if possible, or write at once. Thousands of testimonials. Note only address, as above.

OFFICE TO LET.—Corner of Paternoster Row and Cheapside, fronting the latter. Fine position. Might be divided into two rooms. Rent, £80.—Apply to Mr. A. M. BURGESS, 1A Paternoster Row.

TO TRUSTEES and Others.—Four-and-a-half per cent. on FREEHOLD RENTALS, in the City of London—namely, £1,800 per annum in one collection, secured on commanding CORNER PREMISES, covering an area of nearly 10,000 square feet. Let on lease to a world-known Mercantile Firm. Reversion to increased Rent and other improvements at end of present Lease. Price £40,000.

For further particulars apply to Messrs. NORTON, TRIST, & GILBERT, Land Agents and Surveyors, 63 Old Broad Street, E.C.

FREEHOLD BUILDING GROUND, CITY OF LONDON, IN THE NEW APPROACH TO BILLINGSGATE MARKET.

THE COMMISSIONERS of SEWERS of the City of London will meet in the Guildhall of the said City on Tuesday, June 12, 1888, at Half-past Twelve o'clock precisely, to receive TENDERS for taking on BUILDING LEASES for a term of Eighty years several plots of very valuable FREEHOLD GROUND, between Botolph Lane, Lower Thames Street, and the new street extension to Billingsgate Market.

Further particulars, with conditions and printed Forms of Proposal, may be had on application at the Office of the Engineer to the Commission in the Guildhall.

The Commissioners do not bind themselves to accept the highest or any proposal.

Persons making proposals must attend personally or by a duly authorized agent on the above-mentioned day at Half-past Twelve o'clock precisely, and the parties whose offers are accepted will be required to execute an agreement and bond at the same time.

Proposals must be endorsed on the outside "Tender for Ground," and be delivered in addressed to the undersigned before Twelve o'clock on the said day of treaty.

Sewers' Office, Guildhall: May, 1888. HENRY BLAKE, Principal Clerk.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C. — The COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. The YEAR CLOSED with a DEFICIT of OVER £6,000. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond, 49 Charing Cross, S.W.

ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

ILFRACOMBE.—The ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn Tennis Courts, large Swimming Bath. Private Bath. Descriptive tariff of Manager.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane. THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables: the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the purchase and sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

REDNESS, ROUGHNESS, & CHAPPING PREVENTED.
FAIR WHITE HANDS AND HEALTHFUL SKIN AND COMPLEXION SECURED.

PEARS' SOAP.

This world-renowned Toilet Soap has obtained Fifteen International Awards as a Complexion Soap. It is specially suitable for Ladies, Children, or delicate and sensitive skins generally.

Its regular use cannot fail to benefit the worst complexion.

Recommended by Mrs. LANGTRY and Madame ADELINA PATTI.

CARDINAL AND HARFORD,

The oldest established Importers of

ORIENTAL CARPETS.

THE LEVANT WAREHOUSE,
108 & 109 HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

LEA & PERRINS' SAUCE.

In consequence of Imitations of

LEA & PERRINS' SAUCE,

which are calculated to deceive the Public,

LEA & PERRINS beg to draw attention to the fact that each bottle of the Original and Genuine

WORCESTERSHIRE SAUCE

bears the Signature of

LEA & PERRINS.

 Sold Wholesale by the Proprietors, Worcester; CROSSE & BLACKWELL, London; and Export Oilmen generally.
Retail by Dealers in Sauces throughout the World.

STRUVE'S

BRIGHTON SELTZER WATER.

PREPARED FROM THE WORLD-RENOWNED SPRING OF THE ROYAL GERMAN SPA, BRIGHTON,

And supplied uninterruptedly to Royalty by Royal Warrant of His late Majesty King William IV, and H.M. the Queen-Empress Victoria.

OF ALL CHEMISTS AND WINE MERCHANTS THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY.

Carriage Paid on Six Dozen and upwards.

ROYAL GERMAN SPA, BRIGHTON.

TONGA, the SPECIFIC for NEURALGIA.

"Tonga [illegible] in the treatment of Neuralgia."—Lancet. [illegible] has proved effective in all those cases in which we have prescribed it. [illegible]

[illegible] and 11s. Of all Chemists.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

CLERGY MUTUAL ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

ESTABLISHED 1829.

2 AND 3 THE SANCTUARY, WESTMINSTER, S.W.

OPEN TO THE CLERGY AND THEIR LAY RELATIVES.

NO AGENTS EMPLOYED AND NO COMMISSION PAID.

Trustees.

HIS GRACE THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.
THE RIGHT REV. THE LORD BISHOP OF WINCHESTER.
THE VERY REV. THE DEAN OF YORK.

Directors.

Chairman—THE VERY REV. THE DEAN OF WESTMINSTER.
Deputy-Chairman—THE HON. EDWARD W. DOUGLAS.

HUGH LINDSAY ANTROBUS, Esq.
THE ARCHDEACON OF BATH.
GEORGE T. BIDDULPH, Esq.
REV. CANON BLACKLEY, M.A.
REV. R. MILBURN BLAKISTON, M.A.
W. PAGET BOWMAN, Esq., M.A.
THE DEAN OF BRISTOL.
REV. J. M. BURN-MURDOCH, M.A.
REV. C. L. LOVETT CAMERON, M.A.
HON. HAMILTON J. A. CUFFE, B.A.
THE ARCHDEACON OF DURHAM.
THE DEAN OF EXETER.
REV. GEORGE ELLER, M.A.
REV. CANON ELLISON, M.A.
GEORGE T. SOTHERON ESTCOURT, Esq., M.A.
HON. AND REV. CANON GREY, M.A.
REV. CHARLES M. HARVEY, M.A.
THE ARCHDEACON OF LLANDAFF.
REV. CANON LONSDALE, M.A.
THE ARCHDEACON OF NORFOLK.
REV. CANON PROTHERO, M.A.
WILLIAM RIVINGTON, Esq.
REV. CHARLES J. ROBINSON, M.A.
DR. W. H. STONE, F.R.C.P.
REV. J. Y. STRATTON, M.A.
JOHN CHARLES THYNNE, Esq., M.A.
REV. PREBENDARY WACE, D.D.
THE DEAN OF YORK.

Physician—DR. STONE. Actuary—FRANK B. WYATT, Esq.

FINANCIAL INFORMATION, JUNE 1, 1887:

Accumulated Funds	£3,349,535
Annual Income	£371,977
Profits divided at Quinquennial Bonus, 1886	£486,000

THE SOCIETY OFFERS THE FOLLOWING ADVANTAGES:

1.—Absolute Security.
2.—Economy of Management; no Agents being employed or Commission paid.
3.—Low Rates of Premium and Liberal Surrender Values.
4.—Claims Paid immediately on Proof of Title.
5.—Freedom from Restriction as to Foreign Residence or Travel after Five Years' Assurance.
6.—No Shareholders; all Profits being the Property of the Assured.
7.—The Profit arising from the exceptionally low Rate of Mortality proved beyond doubt to prevail amongst the Clergy.

Annual Cost of an Assurance of £1,000 with full Profits.

AGE	£	s.	d.
25	20	1	8
30	23	3	4
35	26	10	0
40	31	1	8
45	36	3	4
50	43	13	4

Annual Cost of an Assurance of £1,000. Reduced Premium under Special Conditions

AGE	£	s.	d.
25	16	1	8
30	18	10	10
35	21	4	2
40	24	17	6
45	28	19	2
50	34	19	2

Copies of the 58th Annual Report, Prospectuses, Forms of Proposal, &c., may be obtained on application to the Office, 2 and 3 The Sanctuary, Westminster, S.W.

MATTHEW HODGSON, Secretary.

NATIONAL PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

FOR MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE. ESTD. 1835.

DIVISION of PROFITS.

£612,900 CASH PROFIT has just been apportioned amongst the Members, being more than 38 per cent. of the amount paid in Premiums during the past five years.

48 Gracechurch Street, London.

LONDON ASSURANCE CORPORATION.
Established by Royal Charter, A.D. 1720.
7 ROYAL EXCHANGE, AND 43A PALL MALL, S.W.

Marine, Fire, and Life Assurances have been granted by the Corporation for more than a century and a half.
Funds in hand exceed £3,400,000.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY.
Established 1836.
LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.
INCOME and FUNDS (1885).

Fire Premiums	£582,000
Life Premiums	196,000
Interest	138,000
Accumulated Funds	£3,297,000

STANDARD LIFE OFFICE.

HALF A MILLION paid in Death Claims every year.
Funds—SIX AND A HALF MILLIONS, increasing yearly.

83 KING WILLIAM STREET, E.C.
3 PALL MALL EAST, W.

PHŒNIX FIRE OFFICE.
LOMBARD STREET and CHARING CROSS, LONDON.—[illegible]

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.
[illegible]

A LUXURY HITHERTO UNKNOWN IN ENGLAND.

BARBER & COMPANY'S FRENCH COFFEE. (See that you have none other.) As used in Paris in its highest perfection, 10d. per lb. This is the choicest and most carefully selected Coffee "roasted on the French principle," and mixed with the finest Bruges Chicory. 2 lbs. sample in tins sent free for 2s. 4d. by parcels post to any post town in the United Kingdom and Channel Islands; 5 lbs. in tins for 5s. 6d.; 8 lbs. in tins for 8s. 10d.

BARBER & COMPANY, 274 REGENT CIRCUS, OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.

61 Bishopsgate Street, E.C.	Brighton—147 North Street.	Manchester—93 Market St.
102 Westbourne Grove, W.	Birmingham—Quadrt. New St.	Bristol—38 Corn Street.
King's Cross, N.	Liverpool—1 Church Street and Minster Buildings and London Road.	Preston—Fishergate.
42 Great Titchfield Street, W.		Hastings—Robertson St. & Havelock Road.
The Borough, London Bridge.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
For Improved and Economic Cookery.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
The only sort ever guaranteed GENUINE by Justus von Liebig.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
The finest Meat-Flavouring Stock, USE it for Soups, Made Dishes, Fish, Game, and other Sauces.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
Efficient TONIC in all cases of Weakness and Digestive Disorders.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
Highly recommended as a Nightcap instead of alcoholic drinks.

LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
GENUINE ONLY with facsimile of JUSTUS VON LIEBIG'S SIGNATURE in BLUE INK across label.

ASK FOR
LIEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT of MEAT.
With BLUE SIGNATURE.

ROWLANDS' MACASSAR OIL.

Prevents and arrests baldness and produces luxuriant and glossy hair. Also prepared in a GOLDEN COLOUR. Bottles, 3s. 6d., 7s., and 10s. 6d.

ROWLANDS' ODONTO.

A non-gritty Tooth Powder. Whitens the Teeth and prevents decay.

Ask Chemists for Rowlands' Articles.

"SECURUS JUDICAT ORBIS TERRARUM."

APOLLINARIS.

"THE QUEEN OF TABLE WATERS."

The filling at the Apollinaris Spring during the year 1887 amounted to 11,894,000 bottles.

FINDLATER'S WHISKIES.

BEST OLD IRISH and BEST ISLAY MALT, 41s. per dozen bottles.

Are the production of the Old-fashioned Pot Stills, matured and mellowed by age only.

Note the bronze green label, with Trade Mark, a "Stag's Head."

33 WELLINGTON STREET, Covent Garden, and 219 BROMPTON ROAD, S.W.

BOOKS, &c.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly, London. All the New and Standard Books. Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c. Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York; and 27 KING WILLIAM STREET, STRAND, LONDON, desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICATIONS, and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS.—CATALOGUES sent on application.

Just published.

THE ART of WOOD-ENGRAVING in ITALY in the FIFTEENTH CENTURY. By FRIEDRICH LIPPMANN, Director of the Royal Print-Room at Berlin. English Edition, with extensive Corrections and Additions by the Author, which have not appeared in the German original. 1 vol. imperial 8vo. with Sixty Facsimiles of the choicest early Italian Woodcuts, Roxburghe binding, 25s.

The Edition consists of only 600 Copies.

BERNARD QUARITCH, 15 Piccadilly, London.

NEW NOVEL AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

A CLOUD on ST. ANGELO. A Novel. By CYRIL BENNETT, Author of "The Massage Case." 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth.

"The conclusion is pathetic, and well brought about. Both in tone and manner, 'A Cloud on St. Angelo' has much that merits commendation."—Morning Post.

NATURAL CAUSATION. An Essay in Four Parts. By C. E. PLUMPTRE, Author of "General Sketch of the History of Pantheism" &c. Demy 8vo. cloth, 7s. 6d. [Now ready.

JEWISH PORTRAITS. By Lady MAGNUS, Author of "Outlines of Jewish History" &c. Small crown 8vo. with Frontispiece by Harry Furniss, cloth, 5s.

LONDON: T. FISHER UNWIN, 26 PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S LIST.

NOW READY, THE FOURTH EDITION OF

MR. AND MRS. BANCROFT ON AND OFF THE STAGE.

WRITTEN BY THEMSELVES.

2 vols. demy 8vo. 30s.

"It may safely be said that there is not one single uninteresting page in the whole of the two handsome volumes which Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft have spent their leisure in compiling."—The Theatre.

Now ready, 1 vol. crown 8vo. red cloth, 3s. 6d.

LORD OAKBURN'S DAUGHTERS.

By Mrs. HENRY WOOD.

Forming the Fifth Volume of the New and Cheaper Edition of that Author's Works, now appearing in uniform style and price at monthly intervals.

NEW WORKS OF FICTION.

NOW READY.

THE ACADEMICIAN. By HENRY ERROLL, Author of "An Ugly Duckling" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"It is long since we have had the pleasure of welcoming into the ranks of fiction an author of such exceptional promise as Henry Erroll."—Graphic.

LOYALTY GEORGE. By Mrs. PARR, Author of "Adam and Eve" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

THE PARTING of the WAYS. By Miss BETHAM-EDWARDS, Author of "Kitty" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"The very kind the object of this novel is to amuse the reader......The writing is lively, the conversations are clever, and there is a sparkle of good spirits as well as originality throughout."—Murray's Magazine.

JOAN VELLACOT. By Miss ESMÉ STUART, Author of "Muriel's Marriage" &c. 3 vols crown 8vo.

"By far the best book which has yet been written by its author. There is a well-constructed story, while at the same time she shows a power of analysis both minute and faithful."—Morning Post.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

On the 15th of every month, commencing May. Price 2s. 6d.

THE UNIVERSAL REVIEW.

Edited by HARRY QUILTER.

Contents for MAY.

PROEM. LEWIS MORRIS.
THE STATE OF EUROPE. Sir CHARLES DILKE, Bart.
M. ZOLA'S IDLE MURE. Mrs. LYNN LINTON.
ENGLISH INVESTORS AND AMERICAN SECURITIES.
THE ROYAL ACADEMY. HARRY QUILTER.
GENERAL BOULANGER. EMILY CRAWFORD.
THE REFORM OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS. EARL OF PEMBROKE.
WHAT THE SKULL SPAKE. Sir E. ARNOLD, K.C.I.E., C.S.I.
LA MUSIQUE DANS BALZAC. LOUIS DE FOURCAUD.
A ROMAN OF GREATER ROME. A. W. VERRALL.
ONE OF THE "FORTY" (L'IMMORTEL). ALPHONSE DAUDET.
THE WORLD IN MAY. The EDITOR.

Full-page Illustrations by Sir F. Leighton, P.R.A., F. Sandys, J. W. Waterhouse, A.

Illustrations in text by Debat-Ponsan, A. and H. Moore, A. Poynter R.A., Aumonier, Hunt, B. Leighton, Herkomer, R.A., Orchardson, R.A., Rivière, R.A., Loudan, Frith, R.A., Sadler, Boughton, A., Murray, Colin Hunter, A., &c. &c. &c.

LONDON: SWAN SONNENSCHEIN & CO.

AUTOGRAPH LETTERS and HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS. NEW ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE, post free Six Stamps. Comprising interesting Specimens of Members of the Stuart Family, Richard Devereux, Earl of Essex (Holograph MSS.), Oliver Cromwell, Richard Cromwell, James I (Holograph MSS.), Charles I., Samuel Pepys, Admiral Blake, Nelson, Addison, Pope, Bentley, David Hume, Charlotte Brontë, George Eliot, Charles Dickens, Randolph Caldecott (Holograph and Original Sketches), Sir Walter Scott (Original MSS.), S. T. Coleridge (MS. Poem), Carlyle (MSS. "French Revolution"), Thomas Hood (MS. Poem), Hartley Coleridge (Unpublished Sonnet), Thomas De Quincey (MSS. Unpublished), Mrs. Hemans (MS. Poem, Unpublished); and several hundred Autograph Letters, Manuscripts, &c. of Literary and Antiquarian interest.

S. J. DAVEY, St. Thomas's Buildings, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.
Rare Autograph Letters purchased.

One Penny, of all Newsagents. Specimen Copy, 1½d. post free.

AMATEUR GARDENING for TOWN and COUNTRY. COLOURED PLATE GIVEN AWAY with every Number (Primula Gipsy Queen, May 19). One Penny.

Office: 148 and 149 Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

LONDON LIBRARY, ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

President—Lord TENNYSON.

Vice-Presidents—Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE, M.P., Sir E. H. BUNBURY, Bart., Sir HENRY BARKLY, K.C.B., the Very Rev. the DEAN of LLANDAFF.

Trustees—Earl of CARNARVON, Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Earl of ROSEBERY.

The Library contains 100,000 volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature in various languages.

Subscription, £3 a year without entrance fee, or £2 with entrance fee of £6; life-membership, £26. Fifteen volumes are allowed to country and ten to town members. Reading Room open from 10 to half-past 6. Catalogue, Supplement (1875-80), price 5s.; to Members, 4s. Fifth Edition of the Catalogue in the Press. Prospectus on application.

ROBERT HARRISON, Secretary and Librarian.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates per annum, paid in advance:

Any part of the United Kingdom	£1	8	2
India and China	1	12	6
Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America	1	10	6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

BOOKS OF INTEREST AT THE PRESENT TIME.

MRS. E. M. FIELD'S NEW WORK.

NOTICE.—The Second Edition of "ETHNE" is now ready, and to be had at all the Libraries, crown 8vo. cloth boards, 6s., with Etched Title and Frontispiece.

"Without exaggeration one of the most beautiful tales of ancient Irish life that has ever come under our notice. The character of Ethne is a masterpiece."—Public Opinion.

"A very attractive and interesting book......Delightfully fresh and picturesque."—Guardian.

FROM PHARAOH to FELLAH. By C. F. MOBERLY BELL, Author of "Egyptian Finance" &c. With upwards of 130 Illustrations from Drawings by Georges Montbard. Engraved by Charles Barbant. Crown 8vo. fancy cloth boards, price 16s.

"Written with singular and most captivating brightness and humour. Mr. Moberly Bell and Mr. Georges Montbard have made as bright and readable a book as has ever been written upon Egypt past and present."—Manchester Examiner.

"At once original, fresh, and amusing."—Standard.

WESTMINSTER CLOISTERS: the Story of a Life's Ambition. By M. BIDDER. With Illustrated Frontispiece, Title-page, and Initial Letters. Crown 8vo. appropriate cloth boards, 5s.

"A very graceful and touching story of life in the great monastery of Westminster, during the time when Richard Cœur de Lion was held captive in Germany. The book will certainly be a favourite, both with girls and boys."—Guardian.

AUGUSTUS SHORT, First Bishop of Adelaide. The Story of a Thirty-four Years' Episcopate. By Canon WHITINGTON. Crown 8vo. with Portrait, cloth boards, 7s. 6d. [In a few days.

TEN YEARS in MELANESIA. By the Rev. ALFRED PENNY, M.A. With Chart and Illustrations from Drawings by the Author and H. J. Rhodes. Second Edition, Revised, crown 8vo. cloth boards, 5s.

"A most interesting and charmingly written description of Melanesian life."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"A distinct contribution to our knowledge of Melanesia."—Saturday Review.

"Singularly free from exaggeration or optimism. Bears the marks of careful observation, and for the most part could have been written only by one who had been for some time resident, and was well acquainted with the people."—Athenæum.

FROM EAST to WEST; or, Glances at the Church's Work in Distant Lands. By the Right Rev. J. M. STRACHAN, M.D., D.D., Bishop of Rangoon. Crown 8vo. Illustrated, cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

BISHOP SAMUEL WILBERFORCE'S SPEECHES on MISSIONS. Edited by the Rev. HENRY ROWLEY. Second Edition. 8vo. cloth boards, 7s.

A SKETCH of the LIFE and LABOURS of ADDINGTON VENABLES, Bishop of Nassau. By the Rev. W. F. H. KING, M.A., Commissary to the late Bishop. With Portrait, Map, and Illustrations. Crown 8vo. cloth, bevelled boards, 3s. 6d.

"His life was one of utter self-denial and sheer hard work for God and his Church."—John Bull.

THE LIFE of EDWARD FIELD, D.D., late Bishop of Newfoundland. By the Rev. H. W. TUCKER, M.A., Secretary to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. With Map of Newfoundland. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. cloth boards, 5s.

"A record of a devoted life."—Pall Mall Gazette.

RECOLLECTIONS of BRITISH BURMA. By the late Right Rev. J. H. TITCOMB, D.D., First Bishop of Rangoon. Demy 8vo. Illustrated, half-cloth, 2s. 6d.

THE LIFE of GEORGE AUGUSTUS SELWYN, D.D. By the Rev. H. W. TUCKER, M.A. With 2 Portraits, Map, Facsimile Letters, and Engraving of the Lady Chapel of Lichfield Cathedral. 2 vols. 8vo. 800 pp. cloth boards, price 24s. Popular Edition, 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth boards, 12s.

"Of more than ordinary interest."—Quarterly Review.

TWENTY YEARS in CENTRAL AFRICA: the Story of the Universities' Mission, from its Commencement under Bishop Mackenzie to the Present Time. By the Rev. HENRY ROWLEY. Crown 8vo. with Map, cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

"The volume abounds in thrilling incidents."—American Churchman.

SISTER LOUISE: the Story of her Life-Work. The Sister Dora of America. Second Edition. Fcp. 8vo. with Portrait, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

THE APOSTLE of the INDIANS of GUIANA: a Memoir of the Life and Labours of the Rev. W. H. BRETT, B.D., Forty Years a Missionary in British Guiana. By the Rev. F. P. L. JOSA, Rector of Holy Trinity, Essequibo. With Portrait and Illustrations. Crown 8vo. cloth boards, 6s. [Just published.

"A most stimulating account of the truly apostolic labours of one of the most devoted and successful missionaries of recent times."—Nonconformist.

LONDON: WELLS GARDNER, DARTON, & CO., PATERNOSTER BUILDINGS.

ACTS OF PARLIAMENT, PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS,

AND

OFFICIAL PUBLICATIONS

ARE OBTAINABLE FROM

EYRE & SPOTTISWOODE,

EAST HARDING STREET.

"He must have been an enemy to entertaining knowledge who first spread the report that Blue Books are dry reading. A more misleading idea could hardly be conceived."—Daily Telegraph.

"People who complain that Blue Books are dull ought to dive into some of the collections of Consular Reports lately published by the Foreign Office, and they would find good reason for changing their opinion."—Morning Post.

"Every political club should have these books......I think the people of the country ought certainly to read them.... If I could get these works taken by every political club, and read, I am certain the people of this country would make a most tremendous movement in favour of economy."—LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.

If you want to purchase an Act of Parliament, a Bill under discussion in either House of Parliament, a Return compiled for the use of Members, or a Report made by the Members of a Royal Commission or a Select Committee; or if you require any Naval or Military Book, or any Publication issued by the Government,

APPLY TO

EYRE & SPOTTISWOODE,

Sole Agents for Official Publications,

EAST HARDING STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Price 1s. post free.

COLD CATCHING, COLD PREVENTING, COLD CURING.
By JOHN H. CLARKE, M.D.
London: JAMES EPPS & Co., 48 Threadneedle Street, and 170 Piccadilly.

NEW VOLUME, EDITED BY SIR GEORGE YOUNG.

Now ready, crown 8vo, cloth extra, bevelled, uncut edges, 5s.

PRAED'S POLITICAL POEMS

The Political and Occasional Poems of Winthrop Mackworth Praed.

Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by Sir GEORGE YOUNG.

"One of the most delightful writers, and one of the least voluminous to be found anywhere out of the ranks of the absolutely immortal......Sir George Young has done the present book very well indeed......There is nothing or little but delight in the book."—Saturday Review.

"Turn where we may in this book of poems, we come upon something bright, clever, and amusing."—St. James's Gazette.

"Now, for the first time, is afforded the opportunity of judging the entire work of a writer whose keen wit and untiring vivacity assign him a foremost place among English satirists."—Morning Post.

"The delightful humour of Praed has made many a reader love him as well as laugh with him......It will be difficult to imagine a greater treat for the lover of political verse, crammed with topical allusions......Gratitude may blunt our critical powers, for we must own to having read these pages with ever-increasing enjoyment."—Daily News.

"Praed has his acknowledged place in literature as a master of the light touch in verse. He wrote such graceful, elegant, humorous songs as are seldom heard to-day.........Praed's power and lightness are nowhere shown to better advantage than in the political poems that come from his pen......The collection is full of hearty amusement, and will receive a hearty welcome."—Scotsman.

LONDON: WARD, LOCK, & CO., WARWICK HOUSE, SALISBURY SQUARE, E.C.

"The pleasantest book imaginable."—SATURDAY REVIEW.

Demy 8vo. printed on hand-made paper, with Photographs and Facsimiles of Autographs, price One Guinea.

LETTERS from DOROTHY OSBORNE

TO

SIR WILLIAM TEMPLE.

1652—54.

Edited by EDWARD ABBOTT PARRY,
Barrister-at-Law.

"There have been few books of letters so well worth reading."—Daily Telegraph.

"Welcome sketches of the life and thought of a refined and admirable woman of the seventeenth century."—Morning Post.

"Rarely has a more charming series of letters been published than those of Dorothy Osborne to her future husband, Sir William Temple. They are love letters and something more. The lady was gifted not only with a delightful literary style a style, indeed, far more readable than that of her celebrated husband but she also possessed an acute perception of persons and circumstances; she was by turns tender, serious, wise, gay, and satirical, and in her love letters all these qualities are reflected."—Scotsman.

GRIFFITH, FARRAN, OKEDEN, & WELSH, St. Paul's Churchyard, London.

THE NEW TRANSLATION OF DON QUIXOTE.

Just published.

THE INGENIOUS GENTLEMAN,

DON QUIXOTE OF LA MANCHA.

By MIGUEL DE CERVANTES SAAVEDRA.

A New Edition done into English, with Notes and a New Life of the Author,
By HENRY E. WATTS.

To be completed in 5 thick volumes, small 4to. (the first two are ready), half bound vellum.
Price to Subscribers, £4; Publishing Price, £5 5s.

Vol. I. comprises the Biography, Criticism, and Bibliography.
Vol. II. comprises the First Volume of the New Translation of Don Quixote.
Vols. III.—V. will be ready during the year.
No volume is sold separately. The whole edition is limited to 250 numbered copies.

BERNARD QUARITCH, 15 PICCADILLY, LONDON.

BLACKETT'S SELECT NOVELS.

Uniform with "99 Dark Street," "The Abbey Murder," &c.

At all Bookstalls, &c., paper covers, 1s.

THE

ARGONAUTS OF NORTH LIBERTY.

By BRET HARTE,
Author of "The Luck of Roaring Camp," "Maruja," &c.

LONDON: SPENCER BLACKETT (Successor to J. & R. MAXWELL), 35 ST. BRIDE STREET, E.C.

NEW WORK BY PROF. HENRY DRUMMOND.

This day, crown 8vo. with 6 Maps and Illustrations, 6s.

TROPICAL AFRICA.

By HENRY DRUMMOND, F.R.S.E., F.G.S.
Author of "Natural Law in the Spiritual World."

LONDON: HODDER & STOUGHTON, 27 PATERNOSTER ROW.

Shortly, Third Edition, with Index, 5s.

STRUGGLES for LIFE. By WM. KNIGHTON, Esq., LL.D., Vice-President of the Royal Society of Literature, Author of "The History of Ceylon," "Forest Life in Ceylon," "The Private Life of an Eastern King," &c.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London; and 20 South Frederick Street, Edinburgh.

Now ready, price [illegible]

HAMLET. With Introduction, Emendations, Notes, and Appendix. By [illegible], M.A. [illegible] of Hamlet with that of a contemporary [illegible] of Shakespeare. [illegible] Strand, W.C.

CLARENDON PRESS NEW BOOKS.

NEW WORK BY MR. HENRY SWEET.

A HISTORY of ENGLISH SOUNDS from the EARLIEST PERIOD. With full Word-Lists. By HENRY SWEET, M.A., Balliol College, Oxford, Author of "An Anglo-Saxon Reader," "An Icelandic Primer," "A Middle English Primer," "A Handbook of Phonetics," &c. 8vo. cloth, 14s. [Just published.

A NEW WORK ON GREEK AND LATIN PHILOLOGY.

THE PRINCIPLES of SOUND and INFLEXION as ILLUSTRATED in the GREEK and LATIN LANGUAGES. By J. E. KING, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Lincoln College, Oxford; and C. COOKSON, M.A., Assistant-Master at St. Paul's School, London. 8vo. cloth, 18s. [Just published.

BY MR. J. L. STRACHAN-DAVIDSON.

SELECTIONS from POLYBIUS. Edited by J. L. STRACHAN-DAVIDSON, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Balliol College, Oxford. With 3 Maps, Prolegomena, and Appendices. 8vo. buckram, 21s. [Just ready.

PERRAULT'S POPULAR TALES. Edited from the Original French Editions, with an Introduction on Fairy Tales, &c. By ANDREW LANG, M.A., late Fellow of Merton College. New Edition. Fcp. 8vo. half-vellum, paper boards, 5s. 6d. [Just published.

Mr. Lang has found a congenial task, which he has executed with that combination of profound scholarship and vivacity of style peculiarly his own. His examination of the origin of the different tales and their variants is nearly exhaustive and full of suggestiveness." St. James's Gazette.

"Mr. Lang intends his edition as an introduction to the study of popular tales; it is admirably fitted for this purpose."—Athenæum.

NEW EDITION OF DR. BUCHHEIM'S SCHOOL EDITION OF "WILHELM TELL."

SCHILLER'S WILHELM TELL. Edited by Dr. BUCHHEIM. School Edition. Extra fcp. 8vo. with Map, 2s. [Just published.

"Dr. Buchheim, by his excellent editions of the German Classics, has done far more than any other man to forward the study of German in England and America." Westminster Review.

 ONE OF THE "CLARENDON PRESS SERIES OF GERMAN CLASSICS."

BY THE SAME EDITOR.

BECKER'S FRIEDRICH DER GROSSE. Edited with Notes and Historical Introduction by C. A. BUCHHEIM, Phil. Doc., Professor of German at King's College, London, Editor of the "Clarendon Press Series of German Classics." Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

 A NEW VOLUME OF THE "CLARENDON PRESS SERIES OF GERMAN CLASSICS."

NEW EDITION OF PROF. ROLLESTON'S "FORMS OF ANIMAL LIFE."

FORMS of ANIMAL LIFE: a Manual of Comparative Anatomy, with Descriptions of Selected Types. By the late GEORGE ROLLESTON, D.M., F.R.S. Revised and Enlarged by W. HATCHETT JACKSON, M.A. Royal 8vo cloth, 36s [Just published.

"A text-book of Zoology, in many respects the most comprehensive that has yet appeared in the English language ......A magnificent storehouse of zoological facts indispensable to the teacher and valuable to the advanced student."—Oxford Magazine.

"In concluding we acknowledge in the fullest degree the singularly painstaking and conscientious manner in which Mr. Jackson has fulfilled his task, and the signal service he has thereby rendered to zoologists. 'Forms of Animal Life' is a unique book."—Nature.

Full Clarendon Press Catalogues free on application.

LONDON: HENRY FROWDE, CLARENDON PRESS WAREHOUSE, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS:

FROM ONE GUINEA PER ANNUM.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS:

FROM TWO GUINEAS PER ANNUM.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY:

For Books exchangeable by the Library Messengers,

FROM TWO GUINEAS PER ANNUM.

ALL THE BEST AND MOST POPULAR BOOKS OF THE SEASON ARE IN CIRCULATION AT MUDIE'S LIBRARY.

MUDIE'S CLEARANCE LIST contains many thousand Volumes of Standard and other Works withdrawn from circulation, and now offered for Sale at Greatly Reduced Prices.

Prospectuses and Clearance Lists sent postage free on application.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LIMITED,

30 TO 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.

BRANCH OFFICES:

281 REGENT STREET, AND 2 KING STREET, CHEAPSIDE.

MESSRS. BELL'S LIST.

Just published, crown 8vo. 8s. 6d.

A MEMOIR of EDWARD STEERE, D.D., LL.D., Third Missionary Bishop in Central Asia, By R. M. HEANLEY, M.A. Oxon, Rector of Wainfleet All Saints, and Hon. Secretary of the Universities' Mission to Central Africa. With Portrait, 4 Full-page Illustrations, and 2 Maps.

Demy 8vo. 12s.

ENGLAND in the FIFTEENTH CENTURY. By the late Rev. W. DENTON, M.A., Worcester College, Oxford.

"Did space permit, further reference to the interesting and instructive information which it affords would be a congenial task. Enough, however, has been quoted to show that in 'England in the Fifteenth Century' a very valuable book of reference exists, which will doubtless be appreciated by the historian, the agriculturist, and the statesman, as well as by the general reader."—Morning Post.

"The book is full of interest."—Scotsman.

Demy 8vo. with Map, &c. 14s.

THE WAR of the SUCCESSION in SPAIN, during the Reign of Queen Anne, 1702–1711, based on Original Unpublished MSS. and Contemporary Records. By Colonel the Hon. ARTHUR PARNELL, R.E.

"We have seldom read so conscientious a work; and, though not without faults of method and judgment, this history of 'The War of the Succession in Spain' is infinitely the best military description of it to be found in any of the tongues of Europe. Colonel Parnell has brought into clear relief parts of the contests before unnoticed; he has thrown fresh light on its better known passages, and he has woven his copious store of facts into a work which, if not free from defects, has the great merits of research and freshness." W. O'CONNOR MORRIS in the Academy.

NEW VOLUME OF BOHN'S HISTORICAL LIBRARY.

THE LIVES of the TUDOR and STUART PRINCESSES. By the late AGNES STRICKLAND. 1 vol. small crown 8vo. with 2 Portraits, 5s.

New Edition, royal 4to. 21s.

THE ART of SKETCHING from NATURE. By P. H. DELAMOTTE, Professor of Drawing at King's College, London. Illustrated by 24 Woodcuts and 20 Coloured Plates, arranged progressively from Water-Colour Drawings by Prout, E. W. Cooke, R.A., Girtin, Varley, De Wint, and the Author.

Part X. (RI-SOL), 5s.

BRYAN'S DICTIONARY of PAINTERS and ENGRAVERS, Biographical and Critical. New and thoroughly Revised Edition. By WALTER ARMSTRONG, B.A. Oxon., Author of "Peter de Wint," "Scottish Painters," &c.

With 1,937 Full-Page Coloured Plates.

SOWERBY'S ENGLISH BOTANY. Con-taining a Description and Life-size Coloured Drawing of every British Plant. Edited and brought up to the Present Standard of Scientific Knowledge by the late T. BOSWELL (formerly SYME), LL.D., F.L.S., &c. With Popular Descriptions of the Uses, History, and Traditions of each Plant, by Mrs. LANKESTER, Author of "Wild Flowers Worth Notice," "The British Ferns," &c. The Figures by J. E. SOWERBY, J. W. SALTER, A.L.S., and N. E. BROWN.

In 12 vols. super-royal 8vo. cloth, £24 3s.; half morocco, £26 11s.; whole morocco, £30 9s.

Also in 89 Parts, each 5s., except the Index Part, 7s. 6d.

Fifth Edition, Revised, with a New Appendix.

THE BOTANIST'S POCKET-BOOK. Con-taining in a tabulated form, the chief Characteristics of British Plants, with the Botanical Names, Soil or Situation, Colour, Growth, and Time of Flowering of every Plant, arranged under its own Order; with a Copious Index. By W. R. HAYWARD. Crown 8vo. cloth limp, 4s. 6d.

BY THE REV. F. O. MORRIS.

A HISTORY of BRITISH BIRDS. With 365 finely Coloured Engravings. 6 vols. £6 6s. Offd. at £3 15s.

NESTS and EGGS of BRITISH BIRDS. With 233 beautifully Coloured Engravings. 3 vols. £3 3s. Offd. at 38s.

BRITISH BUTTERFLIES. With 72 beautifully Coloured Plates. 1 vol. 21s. Offd. at 14s.

BRITISH MOTHS. With Coloured Illustrations of nearly 2,000 Specimens. 4 vols. £6 6s. Offd. at £3 15s.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

WARD & DOWNEY'S NEW BOOKS.

Next week will be published in 1 vol. fcp. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

A NEW HUMOROUS BOOK.

THE MODERATE MAN; and other Verses. By EDWIN HAMILTON, Author of "Dublin Doggerels" &c. With 12 Original Whole page Illustrations by Harry Furniss.

Next week will be published in 1 vol. demy 8vo 7s. 6d.

A NEW AND REVISED EDITION OF GREEK FOLK SONGS. By J. S. STUART GLENNIE.

This day is ready at all Libraries.

THE LAST NOVEL WRITTEN BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE ROMANCE OF WAR"

LOVE'S LABOUR WON. By JAMES GRANT. 3 vols

The NEW NOVELS now ready at the Libraries are:-

A WOMAN'S FACE. By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "The House on the Marsh," "Scheherazade," &c. 3 vols.

MRS. RUMBOLD'S SECRET. By KATHARINE S. MACQUOID. 6s.

ROBERT HOLT'S ILLUSION. By Miss LINSKILL, Author of "The Haven under the Hill" &c. 6s

MISER FAREBROTHER. By B. L. FARJEON, Author of "Great Porter Square" 3 vols.

IDLE TALES. By Mrs. RIDDELL. 6s.

MIRACLE GOLD. By RICHARD DOWLING. 3 vols.

FOR FREEDOM. By TIGHE HOPKINS. 6s.

THE CHEQUERS. By JAMES RUNCIMAN. 2s.

12 YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON.

VIZETELLY & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

CATALOGUES SENT FREE ON APPLICATION

RECENTLY PUBLISHED MASTERPIECES OF FRENCH FICTION.

In large 8vo, beautifully printed and bound, and illustrated with 40 Charming Etchings by Paul Avril, printed in the t xt 1 s.

MY UNCLE BARBASSOU. By MARIO UCHARD. Now first translated into English.

Demy 8vo illustrated with 10 Full-page Etchings by [illegible] 7s [illegible]

THE BOHEMIANS of the LATIN QUARTER (Scènes de la Vie de Bohème) By HENRI MURGER. "The preliminary account of Murger and his [illegible] is of considerable [illegible] to the value and interest of this exceptionally well translated version of the Scènes de la Vie de Bohème " Academy

Crown 8vo with Page Illustrations by James Tissot, 6s

RENÉE MAUPERIN. By E. and J. DE GONCOURT.

M. ZOLA'S MUCH-DISCUSSED NOVEL

THE SOIL (LA TERRE). By EMILE ZOLA. With a Frontispiece by H Gray. Crown 8vo 6s.

THE NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE IRONMASTER" Price 6s.

WILL (Volonté). By GEORGES OHNET. [Shortly.

NEW VOLUME OF VIZETELLY'S CELEBRATED RUSSIAN NOVELS

UNCLE'S DREAM and The PERMANENT HUSBAND. By FEDOR DOSTOIEFFSKY, Author of "Crime and Punishment" &c. Price 5s. [Shortly.

A GARDEN of TARES. By JOHN HILL and CLEMENT HOPKINS. Crown 8vo. 6s. [Shortly.

IN HERSELF COMPLETE: a Love Story. By FRANCES FORBES-ROBERTSON. With a Frontispiece. Price 3s. 6d. [Shortly.

NEW VOLUME OF THE "MERMAID SERIES." With a Portrait from the Picture by Sir Peter Lely.

COMPLETE PLAYS of WILLIAM WYCHERLEY. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by W. C. WARD. Price 2s. 6d. [illegible] [illegible] by, with a View of Old London and the Bankside Theatre.

THE BEST PLAYS of JOHN FORD. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by HAVELOCK ELLIS. Price 2s. 6d.

VIZETELLY & CO., 16 HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN; [illegible] CATHERINE STREET, STRAND.

SWAN SONNENSCHEIN & CO.'S NEW LIST.

STEPNIAK'S GREAT WORK IS NOW READY

THE RUSSIAN PEASANTRY; their Agrarian Condition, Social Life, and Religion. 2 vols 8vo 25s.

This Work, together with TIKHOMIROV'S "RUSSIA Political and Social" (2 vols 8vo 21s), forms a COMPLETE ACCOUNT of MODERN RUSSIA, entirely superseding all previous Works on the subject.

A NEW WORK ON CANAL AND BARGE LIFE.

LIFE in the CUT. By AMOS READE. Dedicated, by permission, to GEORGE SMITH, of Coalville. 6s.

"The excellent purpose of this deeply interesting story is emphasized by the power and pathos of Mr Reade's style" [illegible] "A [illegible] piece of character sketching Every leaf is instinct with the spirit of the people in whose interests the book is [illegible]" [illegible]

NEW VOLUME OF TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE.

SIERRA LEONE; or, the White Man's Grave. By G A LETHBRIDGE BANBURY, of H M Colonial Civil Service. Demy 8vo. Illustrated, 10s 6d

IRELAND in '98: Sketches of the Principal Characters of the Time By the late Dr R R MADDEN Edited by J BOWLES DALY LL.D. With engraved Portraits and Facsimile Contemporary Prints. 8vo 9s

HISTORY of IRELAND. By Dr. R. HASSENCAMP. Translated with the Author's sanction by E. A ROBINSON 1 vol. 8vo [Next week.

DOCTORS and DOCTORS: some Curious Chapters in Medical History and Quackery With Coloured Frontispiece after Gillray By GRAHAM EVERITT 6s

THE SCIENCE of RELIGIONS. By E. BURNOUF Translated by J LIEBE With an Introduction by F J RAPSON, M A, M R A S, Fellow of St John's College, Cambridge. 8vo [illegible] 7s 6d [illegible]

[illegible]

THREE NEW THREE-VOLUME NOVELS.

1. ANNIE THOMAS'S LOVE'S a TYRANT.
2. JEAN MIDDLEMASS'S VAIA'S LORD.
3. EMILY OSBORN'S PECCAVI.

SECOND EDITION OF GEORGE MOORE'S

CONFESSIONS of a YOUNG MAN. With Etched Portrait of Author by WM STRANG [illegible] 6s

[illegible] "It is a brilliant sketch [illegible] Mr Moore has done [illegible] voll of som [illegible] Confessions [illegible] WM SHARP

NOVEL BY THE LATE CAPT MAYNE REID

THE CHILD WIFE. By the Author of "The Scalp Hunters," "Death Shot" "No Quarter" &c 6s

TWO CHORUS GIRLS. By W. HAMILTON CLARKE, Mus Bac Oxon [illegible]

A MORE EXCELLENT WAY: a Socialist Novel By CONSTANCE HOWELL 6s

ALMA; or, the Story of a Music Mistress. By EMMA MARSHALL, Author of "The Mendips" &c. 3s 6d [illegible] "A [illegible] romance" [illegible] "Very warmly to be [illegible]"

THREE NEW BOOKS ON CRICKET, &c.

1. CHRONICLES of CRICKET: Facsimile Reprints of Nyren's Cricketer's Guide, "Lillywhite's Handbook of Cricket" [illegible] with a View of [illegible] Portraits, & [illegible] Books which once enjoyed a wide-spread popularity, and which are now very rare

2. THE GAME of CRICKET. By FRED. GALE (The Old Buffer) Second Edition ready Picture boards, 2s "A very [illegible] book A cool wind blows through it from the past into the present, out of the [illegible] of ancient cricketers" — Daily News

3. SPORTS and RECREATIONS in TOWN and COUNTRY By FRED GALE Boxing—Prize Ring—Racing—Fishing Coaching, &c. 2s [This day

"IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT SERIES," NEW VOLS.

EDITED BY SYDNEY BUXTON, M.P.

1. CHURCH REFORM. By ALBERT GREY, Canon FREMANTLE, Rev. S A BARNETT, and Others. 120 pp. red cloth, 1s.
2. LOCAL GOVERNMENT. By W. RATHBONE, M.P., ALBERT PELL, and F. C. MONTAGUE, Barrister-at Law. Red cloth, 1s.
3. LOCAL OPTION. By W. S. CAINE, M.P., WILLIAM HOYLE, and Rev. DAWSON BURNS, D.D. Red cloth, 1s.

THE CONTEMPORARY PULPIT LIBRARY—Vol. I.

CANON LIDDON.—SERMONS (15). Imp. 16mo. cloth extra. gilt top, 2s. 6d.

"For splendour of exposition, for fervour of feeling, for delicacy of insight, and for strength of reason this volume might claim comparison with the greatest English sermons of any age." Spectator

The next Two Volumes will be by Canon FARRAR and the BISHOP of PETERBOROUGH (Dr. MAGEE).

THE DEMON of DYSPEPSIA; or, Digestion Perfect and Imperfect. By A. E. BRIDGER, M.D., &c. 4s. 6d.

A popular treatise on the disastrous consequences which result from an opposition to the laws which regulate the human food-supply. "Will take a prominent place among popular medical handbooks." [illegible]

CYCLOPÆDIA of EDUCATION. (In 12 Parts.) Part IV. Royal 8vo, [illegible]

SWAN SONNENSCHEIN & CO., PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

MESSRS. RIVINGTON'S LIST.

CHR. WORDSWORTH, Bishop of Lincoln.

By JOHN HENRY OVERTON, Canon of Lincoln, and Rector of Epworth; and ELIZABETH WORDSWORTH, Principal of Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford. 8vo. with Portraits, 16s.

CONTENTS:—Parentage and Childhood—School and College Life—Early Manhood and Early Travels—Harrow—Early Westminster Life—Westminster and Stanford-in-the-Vale—Convocation—The Episcopate: First Three Years—The Episcopate: Burning Questions—The Episcopate: Practical Work in the Diocese—Intercourse with Foreign Churches—Literary Work—Closing Days—Personal Reminiscences—Index.

SERMONS for the CHRISTIAN YEAR.

From the Quebec Chapel Sermons of HENRY ALFORD, sometime Dean of Canterbury. Crown 8vo. 6s.

CONTENTS:—Advent: The Coming of the Lord—Practical Use of the Old Testament—Christ the Judge—Our Lord's Forerunner—Christmas: The Christian's Christmas—God's Remedy for Sin—End of the Year: The Close of the Year—Epiphany: The Church, the Light of the World—Christ the Saviour of All Men—Miracles—Water made Wine—Christian Confidence in Trouble—Parables—The Tares of the Field—Septuagesima: Christ the Creator—Sexagesima: Love in the Details of Creation—Quinquagesima: Love in the Creation of Man—Lent: Our Lord's Temptation—The First Sinner—Christian Temperance—Fellowship with Christ's Sufferings—Christ's Cross is Christ's Glory—Christ Crucified—Good Friday: Conformity to Christ's Death—Easter: The Power of Christ's Resurrection—The Lord is Risen—Our Lord's Charge to Peter—Christ our Shepherd—The Best that has lost his Savour—The United Heart—Ascension Day: Our Lord's Ascension—Our Lord's Last Words—Whit Sunday: The Work of the Holy Spirit—Trinity Sunday: The Holy Trinity.

THE BEGINNINGS of RELIGION.

By the Rev. Dr. THOMAS SCOTT BACON. 8vo. 15s.

CONTENTS: Prefatory Note—Religion in History—Materials for this Research in the Earlier History, and its Results—Natural Religion—The True Principles and Method of the Use of Holy Scripture in this Investigation—The Primitive Religion—Language and its Origin—Primitive Words of Religion—Hebrew and its Cognate Languages—Religion after the Loss of Innocence—The Dispersion—The Patriarchs and their Age—Other Religions B.C. 2300–1800—Causes and Process of the Great Defection—Abraham to Joseph—The Exodus—Origin of Writing—Book of Moses—Ten Commandments—Other Religions B.C. 1800–1500—Israel—"The People of God": Moses to Samuel—Other Religions B.C. 1500–1000—Israel—David to Daniel—Other Religions: B.C. 1000–580—The Jews: From the Captivity to the Advent—Other Religions. 500 B.C. to A.D.—Review of this Inquiry, and its Results.

THE DISCIPLINE of LIFE.

Being Last Words of Counsel, by the Rev. REGINALD G. DUTTON, M.A., sometime Curate of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, late Preacher and Assistant at St. James's, Westminster. With a Preface by the Rev. the Hon. AUGUSTUS LEGGE, Canon of Rochester. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

CONTENTS:—Temper—Discipline—Sacrifice—Obedience—Moral Courage—Truth—Conscience—Duty—Loyalty—Self Conquest—Friendship—Impulse—Enthusiasm—Patience—Resignation—Pains-taking—Gratitude—Courtesy—Considerateness—Punctuality—Method—Prudence—Ambition—Moral Power—Sympathy—Disappointment—Worry—Monotony—Habit—Waste—Generosity—Compensation—Failure—Success.

A COMPANION to the PSALTER.

Consisting of Brief Introductions, Notes, and Meditations. Contributed as a Help to the Devotional Use of the Psalms in Daily Public and Private Worship. By the Rev. J. GURNHILL, B.A., Vicar of East Stockwith, and Diocesan Inspector for the Isle of Axholme. Small 8vo. 4s.

"We can recommend this book, both on the ground of its instructive and devotional elements."—Literary Churchman.

CHRISTIAN ECONOMICS.

By the Rev. WILFRID RICHMOND, M.A., sometime Warden of Trinity College, Glenalmond. Crown 8vo. 6s.

CONTENTS:—Conscience and Political Economy—Competition, the Law of Life—Justice, the Law of Exchange—Love, the Law of Distribution—The Blessing of Labour—The Privilege of Monopoly—The Produce of the Past—Wealth—The Economic Body—The Ethics of Division of Labour—Property—"Give me my Price"—Consumption of Wealth—Competition and Co-operation—The Practicability of the Principles of Light—Economic Freedom.

PRACTICAL REFLECTIONS on EVERY

VERSE of the NEW TESTAMENT. By a CLERGYMAN. With a Preface by H. P. LIDDON, D.D., D.C.L., Canon Residentiary and Chancellor of St. Paul's. Crown 8vo.

Vol. I.—The HOLY GOSPELS. Fourth Edition. 4s. 6d.

Vol. II.—ACTS to REVELATION. 6s.

THE WORKS of JOHN KAYE, Bishop of Lincoln. New Edition. In 9 Volumes. 8vo. Sold separately.

Vol. I.—ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY of the SECOND and THIRD CENTURIES. From the Writings of Tertullian. 12s.

Vol. II.—The WRITINGS and OPINIONS of CLEMENT of ALEXANDRIA. 10s. 6d.

Vol. III.—The WRITINGS and OPINIONS of JUSTIN MARTYR. 5s.

THE ANNUAL REGISTER.

A Review of Public Events at Home and Abroad, for the Year 1887. 8vo. 18s.

SERMONS preached before the QUEEN.

"The ARMOUR of LIGHT." By the Rev. GEORGE PROTHERO, M.A., of Brasenose College, Oxford; Chaplain in Ordinary to Her Majesty the Queen; Canon of Westminster; and Rector of Whippingham. Revised and Prepared for Publication by ROWLAND E. PROTHERO, M.A., Fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford. Cr. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

CONTENTS:—The Armour of Light—The Nativity—Numbering our Days—The Cross of Christ—The Conflict of Good and Evil—The Gathering of the Fragments—Blessing our Time—Coming to Ourselves—The Service of Sin—Launching into the Deep—Solitude—Things Old and New—Watchfulness—On your Guard—Enemies of the Cross of Christ—Forgiveness of Sin—Simplicity of Christ's Teaching—Spiritual Sleep—The Troubles of Israel.

THE FAITH of the GOSPEL.

A Manual of Christian Doctrine. By ARTHUR JAMES MASON, B.D., formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

CONTENTS: The Being and Nature of God—The Blessed Trinity—Creation through the Word—Man and his Fall—The Incarnation of the Word of God—The Atoning Work of Christ—The Risen Lord, and the Gift of the Spirit—The Characteristics of the Church—The Means of Grace—The Process of Salvation—The Last Things.

"It is for this reason that we consider Canon Mason to deserve the gratitude of all Christians for his excellent book. It is meant to furnish for Christianity that which nearly every science possesses, a convenient handbook in which the first principles of the subject are stated with sufficient fulness to place it well before the mind of an intelligent reader and with enough of proof to recommend it to his acceptance. . . . We do not think we have ever read any exposition of the Catholic doctrine of the Saviour's Person which makes so plain to every reader of intelligence and piety the spiritual importance of tenets which appear over-subtle to those who look on them from without. . . . We truly believe that no one in our time has shown better than the author of this book how deeply the Christian faith has struck its roots in every department of human nature and human experience."
Church Quarterly Review.

"We shall not be far wrong in saying that this volume will prove one of the most useful books that have ever passed through our hands. . . . We have marked a score or more of passages well worthy of quotation in these columns but where all is so excellent it is difficult to pick and choose, so we will add nothing more than a recommendation to our readers both clerical and lay, to peruse for themselves this treasure house of dogmatic theology."—Church Times.

THE ORGANISATION of the EARLY

CHRISTIAN CHURCHES. Being the Bampton Lectures for the year 1880. By EDWIN HATCH, M.A., D.D., Reader in Ecclesiastical History in the University of Oxford, and Rector of Purleigh. Third and Cheaper Edition, 8vo. 5s.

"The publication of the Bampton Lectures for 1880 is an event of real interest and significance and will probably be long recognised as such, even outside the University circles to which they were originally addressed. They are the fruit of long years of minute study of early Christian history, and they represent the conclusions of a just and flexible mind on one of the most debated and one of the most fascinating of questions. . . . Mr. Hatch's eight lectures on The Organisation of the Early Christian Churches are soon read and they are written in a clear and easy style, in general admirably fitted to attract a reader through the intricate period he has chosen to handle. At the same time every page of the book bears witness to immense preparatory labour, as well as to a temper of peculiar breadth and intelligence. . . . Mr. Hatch's book endeavours to set before us the outlines of the early Christian society as they present themselves to the purely critical and historical gaze, employing in the task the same methods and the same instruments which have yielded so rich a harvest to the modern student in other and kindred fields."
Times.

CHRIST or ECCLESIASTES.

Sermons preached in St. Paul's Cathedral. By the Rev. HENRY SCOTT HOLLAND, M.A., Canon and Precentor of St. Paul's. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

FACULTIES and DIFFICULTIES for

BELIEF and DISBELIEF. By the Rev. FRANCIS PAGET, D.D., Canon of Christ Church, Oxford, and Regius Professor of Pastoral Theology; sometime Vicar of Bromsgrove. Crown 8vo. 6s. 6d.

CONTENTS:—Introductory Essay—Part I. The Virtue of Self-Assertion in the Life of the Intellect—The Virtue of Self Assertion in the Life of the Will—The Social Instinct—The Reasonableness of Life—The Love of Beauty, in Nature—The Love of Beauty, in Art—The Love of Beauty, in Character—The Place of the Intellect—The Dignity of Man—Readiness. Part II. The Need of Healing—The Miracle of Repair—The Reality of Grace—The Transformation of Pity—The Transformation of Hope—The Records of the Past—The Force of Faith—Discord and Harmony—The Inner Life.

"Professor Paget's volume is one of the most original contributions to Christian apologetics that an age especially fertile in this kind of literature has produced."
Spectator.

AFTER DEATH.

An Examination of the Testimony of Primitive Times respecting the State of the Faithful Dead, and their Relationship to the Living. By HERBERT MORTIMER LUCKOCK, D.D., Canon of Ely. Sixth Edition, crown 8vo. 6s.

"Dr. Luckock has undertaken in this volume to deal with three questions about which Western Christendom has been much agitated, and about which, while much misunderstanding and prejudice attend them, wrong conclusions are dangerous. . . . . . It is a piece of good service, and one of good omen for the future of theology, when they are discussed, as they are in Dr. Luckock's book, with sober, calm candour and fairness, on their merits, and on the evidence applicable to them, and when a divine, not identified, as far as we know, with any party or school of theology, has the boldness—for there is some boldness in it—to give his conclusions on the evidence alone."—Guardian.

"This most valuable book will be found of the greatest help to all who desire clearly to understand and appreciate what has ever been the doctrine of the Church Universal and our own special branch thereof. It would be difficult to find a book on so weighty a subject more clearly arranged and written, and so easy to be grasped by any thoughtful reader."—Church Times.

ENGLISH ECONOMIC HISTORY and THEORY.—The Middle Ages. By W. J. ASHLEY, M.A., Fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford. Crown 8vo. 5s.

RIVINGTONS: WATERLOO PLACE, PALL MALL, LONDON.

Printed by SPOTTISWOODE & CO., at No. 5 New-street Square, in the Parish of St. Bride, in the City of London; and Published by [illegible] at the Office, No. 38 Southampton Street, Strand, in the Parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, in the County of Middlesex.—Saturday, May 19, 1888.

THE

SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,700, Vol. 65. | May 26, 1888. | [Registered for Transmission abroad.] | Price 6*d*.

THE CHRONIC ALARMIST.

THERE are various emissaries of the enemy who combine to make it very difficult to supply this country with a thoroughly well-organized naval and military force. The politician who, not in the least because he is a person of lower morality than his colleagues on the Continent, but because he is a member of the House of Commons, and his nature has become subdued to what it works in, is incapable of thinking seriously of anything but the House and the hustings, is very efficient. So is the politician of whose morality it is politer to say nothing, who is exclusively intent on the big measure which is to bear him in triumph into office. Philanthropists, perfectibility-of-the-species men, gushers, and fadmongers do a world of mischief. We hope we do not underrate their noxiousness, but still we think on mature reflection that the chronic alarmist is the greatest pest of them all. The title is not a civil one, nor is it heard with patience by those to whom it is applied. It has lately, for instance, aggravated Captain PENROSE FITZGERALD out of his old liveliness into sheer rudeness. At times it is unjustly applied to the honest and competent critic who points out that various useful things ought to be done. But, although it is irritating, and although it is misused, it is the perfectly accurate description of a recognizable stamp of man. Definition of him is not altogether easy. The chronic alarmist has this much in common with light and poetry and the English gentleman, that, though we know him when we see him, we cannot find a neat, clear, and adequate formula for him. He must be described in a more or less loose way by negatives and limitations. This is necessarily discouraging to whomsoever tries to measure and estimate him, and yet the attempt should be made; for the chronic alarmist is an important and conspicuous person who has a great deal to say, and is apt to secure a temporary hearing, to our general misfortune.

First and foremost the chronic alarmist is a person who carries the modern practice of shrieking and foaming into the discussion of naval and military matters. We do not say the vice is wholly new, but assuredly it was never indulged in to the extent it has been during the last generation. A general statement of this kind is not particularly profitable, but examples of an illustrative nature are not wanting. The chronic alarmist, for instance, comes forward at a time when the British navy is believed to be hardly equal to the work it may have to do. To say this and prove it would be the work of the critic, and much too tame for the alarmist. So he declares roundly that we could not put six ships in line of battle and have no cruisers. For proof he produces comparative lists in which foreign vessels not yet launched, or built of wood and thinly armoured, are counted, while everything on our side is dismissed as obsolete which does not contain the "latest "improvements." In this way an awful state of things is shown to exist. "Obsolete" is a very favourite word with the chronic alarmist. Guns capable of piercing all armour except the very strongest which is carried by only a very few vessels are pooh-poohed as obsolete because a newer and better gun has been invented. So it is clear that we have next to no guns. The chronic alarmist is greatly attached to certain formulas. One of them is the statement that the sufficiency of the navy must be estimated, not by the strength of a possible enemy, but by the work it has to do. When he is asked what work it can have to do except to fight the enemy, he gives no answer or a very hazy one. He is passionately fond of historical examples, and such historical examples! It is he who gravely rebukes the [illegible] politician by asking him to observe that we spent [illegible] millions a year on our navy between 1805 and [illegible], although we had no enemy at sea but a few American frigates. Trafalgar, and the incessant fighting with French cruisers in all the seas of the world, the Basque Roads, the battle of Lissa, the action at Grand Port, and the rest of it, are so old a song that they are all forgotten, neither does there remain to him any memory of the long vigilant blockades required to pen up the powerful squadrons NAPOLEON continued to keep in a condition to go to sea if the way out was left clear for forty-eight hours. Sir CHARLES DILKE is so very polite to the Saturday Review that we are sorry to have to quote an example of the alarmist historical argument from him; but there it is, and it is too good to be missed. Sir CHARLES complains that we were oversharp in our comments on his statement that only the return of NELSON from the West Indies and the battle of Trafalgar prevented NAPOLEON'S invasion. He acknowledges that CALDER'S action was the turning-point, but thinks the difference of no great importance, and even, with a sudden lapse from politeness, suspects us of not knowing that Sir ROBERT was tried by court-martial. The point of the remark escapes us, and we think the difference very considerable. It is just this, that whereas, according to Sir CHARLES DILKE'S view, invasion was averted by something like accident, according to fact it broke down before the strength of the English position. Then, too, does not Sir CHARLES DILKE also overlook a fact or two of more importance than CALDER'S court-martial? He does not say, though of course he knows, that NAPOLEON'S transports were collected by years of work, specially constructed and concentrated at Boulogne with infinite pains. Even if the British fleet had been got out of the way for twelve hours, or twelve days either, it by no means follows that those flat-bottomed row-boats would ever have reached England. The tides and currents of the Channel could not have been drawn off to the West Indies. Naval officers of the time who knew what the navigation of the Channel meant thought and said that the flotillas would have drifted helplessly about, and have run into one another. As for what would have happened if a tiresome breeze had brought a few frigates and seventy-fours down on those tightly-packed lighters, it is delightful to think of. Many thousands of Frenchmen who were to leave their bones on all the roads of Europe from Austerlitz to Moscow would have gone down in the Channel. There is at least a very great probability that the invasion of England would have been an earlier, quicker, and more decisive version of the invasion of Russia. After all, NAPOLEON was not always right. But this other side is what the chronic alarmist never once looks at. It may be safely asserted that he never once asked himself whether any nation in Europe could collect vessels enough to carry an invading army. No doubt if they had years to prepare they could build them; but could they be got together soon after a declaration of war in one port, and enough of them fitted to carry thirty thousand horses or so? For you cannot pack a horse like a bale of cotton. The question of transport is an important one; for really the savage invader could not march over the water like the ghosts of the Japanese warriors who were lately to be seen at the Burlington.

The trade of the chronic alarmist would be gone if he were compelled to look at facts and forbidden to dress up bugaboos. Stated soberly, our position at present is not creditable; but there is nothing in it so very desperate. We have men enough to garrison India and the colonies, to supply a movable army of two corps, and yet leave a force at home capable of maintaining a feeling of security, and making short work of flying expeditions of the stamp of HUMBERT'S in Ireland or the galley-slave invasion of Wales. From want of a little organization and of tools, however, this force is so unhandy that, in case of war, we could not venture to send two corps of regular troops out of the country, a[illegible] be crippled for offensive operations. Six months [illegible] work and a million could supply the necessary hooks and eyes. We have a number of fortifications in course of construction, but not finished or properly armed. A year would put that right, if well spent. We have a navy quite capable of meeting any probable combination on equal terms, but deprived of the use of some of its best ships by want of guns, and so not manifestly capable of asserting and maintaining complete superiority from the beginning of a war. This is scandalous enough; but it will not be corrected by going mad about it. Here, also, a year of work, and of no pedantry, could put things right. Even if war broke out to-morrow we should go into it as well prepared as we have been before, and, if we fought as well as in old days, could come out triumphant again. No doubt everything depends on that power to fight. If we are to believe the chronic alarmist, it is gone, and English seamen and soldiers can no longer face an enemy unless they know they have an overwhelming superiority in numbers. Now one of the principal reasons why we detest the fellow is just our conviction that he is talking craven and dangerous nonsense. In spite of him, we believe that, when the pinch comes—if it does—this cowardly howling will be quieted. The country will remember that war cannot be made without loss and suffering, that the other side will have to bear its share, and then we shall settle down to give our friend the enemy his kail through the reek. Still, this nervous talk, particularly when coming from naval and military officers, has an ugly sound. It is too like BYNG's whining letters, written when the poor man was working himself into the abject state in which he ran away from his own imaginings. Whether it may not lead up to another Minorca business and a repetition of the historic scene on the Monarch's deck we will not undertake to say. In any case it does mischief enough, by sooner or later exciting a feeling of derision, which is an invaluable help to the politicians who want to be bothered as little as may be about the defences of the nation.

THE SOUTHAMPTON ELECTION.

THE Southampton election is a grave misfortune, not only as a triumph of the Separatist Radicals, but as a proof of the incompetence and caprice of the constituencies which now govern the country. The seat is lost to the defenders of the Constitution, not because the Southampton voters desire the Repeal of the Union, but as a consequence of their utter indifference to Imperial interests and to the safety of the kingdom. Paramount importance seems to have been attached to the frivolous question of compensation to publicans; but Mr. EVANS's friends, probably without his authority, pledged their candidate to the main articles of the Socialistic creed. If a newspaper biography may be trusted, Mr. EVANS is a cosmopolitan trader, once a partner or confidential agent of the well-known American capitalist, Mr. JAY GOULD. His sympathy with the so-called Labour cause must be recent, though it may be sincere. The Southampton election has disclosed a danger which threatens not only the cause of the Union, but the continuance of the existing political system; and party government, though it has many serious defects, is not the worst result which may arise from democratic institutions. Election contests have for the last two years turned on a single issue of paramount importance. Conservatives of every shade have unanimously opposed the separation of Ireland, and the Liberal-Unionists have, as the title which they have assumed implies, resolved to suspend the assertion of their special opinions as long as the integrity of the United Kingdom is in danger. The Government, reinforced by the accession of one of the most eminent members of the Liberal party, had visibly gained in strength, and in the confidence both of temporary and of permanent supporters; and, notwithstanding the advantage which an Opposition enjoys in "bye-elections," the large majority which was returned at the general election has not been seriously impaired. The increased acrimony of contests, and the mischievous practice of importing party speakers from a distance, were inevitable consequences of the transfer of power from the middle class to the numerical majority. The admirers of popular suffrage could allege with plausibility that the new constituencies had inherited much of the political aptitude of their predecessors. The alliance of the Liberal-Unionists with the Conservatives at a formidable crisis was a movement in the opposite direction to the capricious multiplication of groups and factions which has disturbed the steadiness and continuity of Republican government in France. The agitation of the temperance fanatics at Southampton, though it was promoted in the interest of a party, has for the first time shaken and divided the Liberal-Unionists. Their local leaders found it convenient at the last moment to release their supporters from their allegiance, on the ground that the constituency cared more earnestly for a trivial and incidental issue than for the maintenance of the unity of the Empire. The question which was supposed to supersede all political controversies was not even whether the sale of alcoholic liquors should be allowed, but whether licensed victuallers should be compensated for the sudden suppression of an industry which had up to this time been as lawful as the trade of a butcher, a baker, or a shoemaker. Officious orators, including in their number a few injudicious ladies, succeeded in communicating to a portion of the populace their own frantic passion for injustice. It is true that the demagogues had ulterior objects in view; but it is not a little alarming to find that any section of the constituency is capable of treating the gravest political questions as subordinate to the desire of gratifying animosity against publicans.

The pretext for diverting public attention from questions of national policy was furnished by the Local Government Bill. There had been grave doubts as to the expediency of introducing the measure; but at first it seemed to have disarmed the opposition of the Liberal party, while it was languidly accepted, in spite of doubt and distaste, by the supporters of the Government. The Liberal leaders promised their best assistance in passing the Bill, having not yet discovered in its provisions any convenient excuse for thwarting the Government. The temperance agitators, concentrating their attention on the clauses with which they were specially concerned, were more astute than the leaders of the Opposition. It was not enough for them that the Conservative party had at last conceded the question of local option. The teetotallers insisted that the choice should be exercised in the form of a popular vote, and not by the representative body which was to control all other local affairs. Their protest commanded little general sympathy, and it seemed likely that the licensing clauses would be considered on their merits; but unfortunately Sir WILFRID LAWSON and his friends had a more formidable weapon in reserve. It seemed doubtful whether the uniform practice of renewing licences in the absence of reasonable objection was directly enforced by law. That the licensed victualler had a vested interest, generally of considerable value, could not be disputed. Parliament had stood by while every day thousands of pounds changed hands on the faith that property in public-houses would be respected in the future as in the past; but the agitators saw the opportunity of converting their enemies into victims, and the Opposition at once joined the movement which it would perhaps not have originated. The possible opportunity of placing the Government in a minority was too valuable to be neglected; but until the vacancy occurred at Southampton it can scarcely have occurred to the Gladstonian managers that the scheme of defrauding the publicans could be more than an auxiliary manœuvre. The fanatics and the intriguers came together on the matter of compensation, and from that time the unity of the kingdom was forgotten by a section of the Liberal-Unionists.

Lord WOLMER, as the official representative of the party, attempted to heal the schism by a questionable concession. With his approval Mr. GUEST, the Unionist candidate, declared that he would not vote for compensation at the expense of the ratepayers, but that the amount ought to be provided from the premiums to be paid on the part of licences. It is not known how far the compromise satisfied the morbid consciences of some of the Southampton voters. Mr. RITCHIE, in his opening speech, and in subsequent explanations, had affixed no such condition to the promise of compensation. On the contrary, he declared that, if the licence clauses, including the grant of compensation from the rates, were rejected by the House, all the clauses relating to the subject would be withdrawn, so that the existing law would remain in force. Mr. GUEST and Lord WOLMER can scarcely have been authorized by the Government to annul a promise formally made in Parliament by the Minister in charge of the Local Government Bill. It may be doubted whether they consulted the interests of the Unionist party in their unexpected pliability. The rights of disestablished publicans to the value of their undertakings has no relation to the amount of the fund which is, according to Mr. GUEST, to be their only security; but for the present purpose the rights of the licensed victuallers are less material to the controversy than the substitution of the temperance agitation for the struggle to preserve the Union. There is too much reason to fear that the precedent may be followed. Many graver issues may be raised than the dispute which engrossed an exorbitant amount of attention at Southampton. Mr. JESSE COLLINGS's Bill for creating a body of farmers at the expense of neighbouring ratepayers would authorize plunder on a larger scale than the mere confiscation of the property of publicans. If the opponents of Home Rule combine their forces with those of its promoters, they have hitherto wasted their energies. They might as well have in the first instance surrendered to Mr. GLADSTONE the direction of consciences on which no confident calculation can be founded.

The formation of factious knots and combinations in the place of parties united by some intelligible bond would tend to degrade and hamper Parliamentary government; but the tendency will operate more directly on the system of municipal government which is about to be extended to rural districts. There has been much vague talk as to the probable character and station of the members of Local Boards. Anticipations of a preference to be accorded to the gentry, and especially to experienced Justices of the Peace, have been sometimes formed and frequently expressed, perhaps in the hope that a confident prophecy might tend to secure its own fulfilment. It will not be worth while for a qualified candidate to offer himself to the choice of the ratepayers if the election is to turn on the grant or refusal of licences, or on the claim of their holders to compensation. In these elections it cannot be said that in confining their attention to the question of licences the electors will be guilty of so gross a dereliction of duty as that which must be attributed to a section of the Parliamentary constituency of Southampton. The ratepayers may think that no political issue is raised, and that public-houses and the friends and enemies of their occupiers are more interesting than any other subject which is brought before their notice. Their votes will accordingly be given, not to the ablest and most honest candidate, but to the supporter or opponent of the licensed victuallers. The most competent aspirants to local dignities will not be disposed to pledge themselves to the popular opinion, nor perhaps to any judgment on the question. Those who take a more active interest in such matters will be neither the wisest nor the most trustworthy members of the community. The danger was foreseen when the Local Government Bill was first introduced, but when once the Government had conceded the principle of Local Option, it became useless to contend against the demand. The justices form a more impartial and more competent tribunal than any district or county Committee, but it would perhaps not have been prudent to reserve to them an unpopular power when they were deprived of all share in local administration. It is, to say the least, unfortunate that half a dozen clauses in the Bill should be made the instrument of rendering the whole comparatively ineffective. Delegates from the temperance agitators, or from the brewers and publicans, will certainly not be the best possible representatives of provincial interests.

IS IT SANE?

THE Southampton election is a matter upon which Separatists may naturally plume themselves; but, perhaps, it is in no respect a greater advantage to them than in so far as it drops the curtain (or would do so, but for intelligent pulling up of that curtain here and elsewhere) on certain matters that came before. It is delightful to imagine the expression of blank horror, or by no means blank rage, which must have come over the face of any tolerably intelligent Gladstonian reader of Mr. GLADSTONE's letter to an anonymous correspondent on the subject of increasing sentences on appeal. We, with our customary generosity, but it would seem with some rashness, last week admitted that the charge of political folly, at least, could not be brought against Mr. GLADSTONE. Perhaps (and in this case we apologize deeply to his admirers) the incautious limitation of his powers itself provoked this great man on the very same day to show that there is nothing which he could not be. In a well-known passage, but with what truth we cannot say, Mr. THACKERAY tells of a Scotch lecturer who was so bent on ascribing every kind of superlative to his own countrymen, that he produced Scotchmen as examples, not only of the best poet, but of the worst. A still closer parallel occurs in one of our old English comedies—we forget which—in which the bore of the piece asserts his own pre-eminence, not only in all virtues and accomplishments, but also in certain matters not generally thought to be subjects of boasting. To judge from the letter dated "Hawarden, "May 19," Mr. GLADSTONE's frame of mind must have been something similar, or he never would have made a present to his enemies of such an extraordinary splutter of frantic folly. It would be convenient to them, no doubt, that it should be forgotten; but this it shall not be.

It will be remembered that in this matter of increasing sentences on appeal the Separatists suffered last week not one, but two, mishaps of the most humiliating and extraordinary kind. They, from their leader downwards, had exhausted the resources of virtuous and rhetorical indignation on the subject of this practice as an invention of Mr. BALFOUR (in whom, let it be observed, a correspondent of the Daily News recently discovered a special representative of the Evil One in person). Then, in the first place, a formal return was prepared showing that this last device of SATAN, this Tory trick, this everything and anything abominable, unprecedented, and nefarious, had been a constant practice under Mr. GLADSTONE's own administration. In the second place, a strong Court in Ireland, composed of judges, two of whom had been repeatedly Mr. GLADSTONE's Irish Law Officers, and one of whom, Chief Baron PALLES, has been over and over again covered with fulsome praise by the Separatists as the justest judge on the Irish Bench, decided that the practice was not only in accordance with custom, but strictly lawful, and justified by the sense as well as the words of the statute. It is impossible to conceive any situation more hopelessly ludicrous than Mr. GLADSTONE's, or one in which silence—complete and utter silence—was more obviously the only resource, unless, indeed, a politician could cease to be a politician and acknowledge himself frankly and nobly to have been wrong. Mr. GLADSTONE cannot acknowledge himself to be in the wrong on a point of conduct, because it is his first principle that on points of conduct he never is wrong; so that silence was literally his only course. Instead of being silent, he burst out, in reply to the existent or non-existent correspondent, with the wonderful deliverance referred to. He "has "censured, and he will" in the teeth of judges and of his own conduct by his own agents "continue to censure, the "practice of enlarging criminal sentences on appeal." He refers (much to the wrath, it would seem, of his supporters in the Scottish press, who would rather have had an advertisement for themselves) to something in the Scotsman, which has no special relevance, except to give him an opportunity of remarking that the article he quotes is "worthy of the "defenders of such practices"—that is to say, the practices of his own administration. And then comes the crowning sentence:—"The Government in debate gave us no intima- "tion that there were precedents for this shameful practice, "which is contrary to the plain intention of Parliament, "though adjudged to be within the words of the statute," &c. "We are now," continues Mr. GLADSTONE, "informed "that we have done the same thing; but it was without "our knowledge, and it is with knowledge of things not "directly of executive action that responsibility begins." Still Mr. GLADSTONE rejoices that "the discovery has been "made" of his own disgraceful conduct (he himself uses the word "disgrace"), and he hopes that Mr. BALFOUR will "continue his researches" into other disgraceful practices, other evil usages, so as to give new proofs of the necessity of governing Ireland "in a rational and not as now" (i.e. in Mr. GLADSTONE's own administration) "in an irrational "spirit."

If any further proof were needed of the small attention which local voters pay to general politics, it would be found in the fact that electors have been found after this letter to give votes which indirectly might place the man who writes like this in a practically irresponsible control of the affairs of England. For observe. There is no sophistry here, the sentence about knowledge and responsibility, though worded with Mr. GLADSTONE's frequent cloudy verbosity, being hardly capable of deceiving a child. Even a simpleton can understand that, if responsibility is limited as Mr. GLADSTONE wishes to limit it, it practically becomes null. Every simpleton can see that the complaint "the Government gave "us no intimation" is below the argumentative habits of a woman, and below even those of a tolerably sharp child.

A whist player at double dummy reproaching his adversary with "You never told me you had the trumps"; a prisoner in a court of justice upbraiding the Court with the sharp practice of producing his own previous convictions, would be quite dignified and logical persons compared with Mr. GLADSTONE. This is on the face of his letter. But it may just escape a careless reader that an, if possible, greater enormity and absurdity lurks in another passage. Mr. GLADSTONE alludes distantly to the judgment of the Irish Exchequer in the words "ad-"judged to be within the words of the statute." He does not say that the very persons who have thus adjudged it were persons who, under his own administration, were the Irish Law Officers of the Crown, whether they were or were not cognizant directly of the original facts. Either, therefore, Chief Baron PALLES and Baron DOWSE are men of the laxest morality ever represented on any Bench, men prepared to connive at illegality practised in circumstances which they know themselves, and offices which they have actually filled, and to justify it afterwards by throwing over it the mantle of their judicial character—a combination of rascality and effrontery almost impossible to parallel or to believe in—or else the practice in question which has approved itself to their trained judicial intelligence as a natural and proper interpretation of the law must equally have approved itself to those successors of theirs, whoever they were, who, in directing Mr. GLADSTONE'S, as it appears, blindly submissive conscience, afterwards permitted these "disgraceful practices." And, lastly, even Mr. GLADSTONE might have seen the dilemma into which he has thrust himself by the last two paragraphs of his letter. Fantastic historians have sometimes charged the great criminals of history with doing evil that good might come, with straining tyrannical systems and laws on purpose that the strain might be too great for them. Did Mr. GLADSTONE do this when he allowed this "dishonour," this "shameful practice," this "disgrace," to be perpetrated over and over again in Ireland? Or was he merely careless altogether whether dishonour, disgrace, shameful practices, marked his government or not? One or the other solution must be true; and, whichever be accepted, Mr. GLADSTONE is clearly unfit to govern. Yet he writes as one unconscious of all these consequences, even of the actual and direct meaning, without any consequence or inference at all, of his letter. We can only ask, as we had to ask once before, Is this sane?

CRICKET.

ENGLAND really is in danger. The invaders—a friendly force from Australia—seem to carry everything before them. After beating Surrey by an innings, they have taken the same liberty with Oxford and with Yorkshire. Excuses are made, just as if the affair were an election. The wicket at Oxford was more or less a bowler's wicket; but the bowlers were Mr. FERRIS and Mr. TURNER, not Mr. COCHRANE, Mr. NEPEAN, and Mr. BASSETT. Oxford is distinctly weak in bowling, as far as time has yet shown. This makes it doubly to be regretted that a pedantic standard of scholarship has caused (as is reported) an interesting freshman who can bowl to despair of entrance at Oxford, and to matriculate at Cambridge. Thebes doth his green, but not unknowing, youth engage; he'll bowl out Athens in maturer age a few weeks hence. Mr. RASHLEIGH played two excellent innings for Oxford, hit Mr. TURNER over the heads of the multitude for five, and generally maintained his reputation. But he was most inadequately supported, and Mr. McDONNELL alone scored almost as many as the University. The weakness of bowling by the banks of Isis may be gathered from the performances of a team of Gentlemen "with RAWLIN." The University began by making 294—not a prodigious score, considering the bowling against them. Mr. J. G. WALKER'S 99 was the largest score out of 190 on the other side. But in the second innings of the Gentlemen Mr. HENERY made 138 not out, and Captain FRIEND, who seldom plays in first-rate matches, got 72, while Mr. NEPEAN'S bowling was quite ineffectual, and only Mr. FORSTER distinguished himself with the ball, getting eight wickets for 119. This was very creditable, and perhaps it may be hoped that, though Oxford can depend on no one bowler, still out of her multitude one may happen to be "on his day," like Mr. BUCKLAND and Mr. TYLECOTE on former occasions.

Returning to the Australians, they were easy victors over Yorkshire. ULYETT had not the success which was his in the great match at Lord's four years ago. He did not get a wicket, and Mr. BONNOR (whom he caught so magnificently then) made 94, and hit, in that old delightful way of his, over the pavilion and all over the ground. Mr. BONNOR has not been playing like himself for some time, and has not been fielding with perfect safety at short-slip. Perhaps he is returning to his original perfection as a hitter; while Mr. FERRIS remains a wonderfully useful bat, considering he is a bowler; and Mr. BLACKHAM and Mr. McDONNELL are as dangerous as ever. The two famed new bowlers had about equal shares of the Yorkshire wickets. PEEL, Mr. HILL, PRESTON, HALL, and ULYETT batted fairly well; but Mr. JONES proved that he is a capital change bowler when his eminent companions were for a moment at a loss. Mr. TROTT, we think, will seldom prove more difficult to good bats than other bowlers with a very conspicuous twist from leg. There seems little reason to hope that the Gentlemen of England will make much resistance to the Colonists next week, especially if the present members of the Universities are engaged elsewhere, and cannot get leave to come to Lord's. Mr. WALKER, of Derbyshire, seems a useful left-handed fast bowler for the amateurs to fall back on in their need, but Mr. BUCKLAND, of last year's Oxford team, will more probably be played. Mr. NEWNHAM, of Gloucester, may also take a hand. Not much can be learned by taking a "line" as to the excellence of the Australians through their defeat of Surrey and Surrey's defeat of Notts. When they played the Australians, Surrey were out of practice, and LOHMANN had to leave off bowling, owing to an accident. His success against Notts proves that this was a great loss. But Notts, again, played Surrey without the undefeated SHREWSBURY and without ATTEWELL, a most valuable man. GUNN and Mr. H. B. DAFT played admirably, and useful scores were contributed by new men, RICHARDSON and Mr. LINDLEY. This may have more or less made up for the absence of greater names.

The owner of the greatest of cricketing names proved at Brighton, on Bank Holiday, that he is as formidable as ever. Mr. GRACE'S 218 was a splendid Bank Holiday score, and was made with but one chance. As Mr. C. A. SMITH ("Round the Corner Smith," who will play for the Gentlemen) was the most successful of his opponents with the ball, it does not look as if the Sussex bowling was very dangerous. Mr. GRACE played it with his usual patience and coolness, never hitting out except when a loose one reached him, and then hitting his hardest. His playing of HUMPHREYS'S slows was exemplary, and PAINTER showed great vivacity and brilliance. The Sussex fielding was excellent. Unluckily Mr. GRACE did not bowl more successfully than a man generally does after taxing his energies by a very long score. JESSE HIDE deserves the credit of him who does not despair of his country. His 130 was most praiseworthy, and so was the gallant stand made by the last wickets, PHILLIPS and A. HIDE. One can hardly hope, however, that, with their weak bowling, either the Western or the Southern shire will defeat the Australians.

CO-OPERATION.

THE co-operative movement has a legitimate claim to the attention and good will of economists. Its objects and its methods, whether or not they are judiciously selected, are within the competence and the right of independent members of the society. No co-operative Congress has yet copied the lawless doctrines which of late years have been annually propounded by the delegates of the Trades-Unions. The co-operators only propose to deal with their own property, and they are neither legally nor morally bound to employ the middleman whom in their distributive capacity they have largely displaced. The great changes in the conduct of retail trade which have been accomplished at Rochdale and elsewhere, though they must have been ruinous to certain classes of tradesmen, have resulted in a balance of advantage to the community. It is clearly the interest of consumers to buy goods as nearly as possible at cost price, and consequently the founders of the system have been followed in their enterprise by imitators belonging to the upper and middle classes. The stores which supply the wants of many thrifty households are still in fact as well as in name more or less genuine instances of co-operation. It is true that in another aspect they are merely joint-stock Companies, sometimes paying liberal dividends to their shareholders. The real co-operative principle is the simplification of distributive machinery by the appropriation to the consumer of the difference between wholesale and retail prices. It is natural that the practitioners of a convenient and profitable doctrine should seek to disguise from themselves the wholesomely selfish process of buying in the cheapest market. The speakers at the late Dewsbury meeting dilated on the transcendental merits of dispensing with the costly services of middlemen. Ill weeds, especially of the rhetorical order, grow apace, and the barbarous phrase of altruism has descended from its authors, the French Positivists, into co-operative speeches, not to mention leading articles in newspapers. There is, in truth, no altruism, or otherness, if the word means preference of a neighbour to oneself, in membership of a Rochdale store. If the success of the scheme had depended on disinterested philanthropy, it would long since have resulted in bankruptcy. Love for others is a praiseworthy corrective of some of the defects of human nature; but the desire to save sixpence in half a crown is a much more powerful motive.

For some years past the experiment of co-operation has arrived at a stage in which it makes no further progress. Mr. Neale, Mr. Thomas Hughes, and other benevolent promoters of the system make eloquent speeches in commemoration of their former triumphs and in sanguine anticipation of future victories which seem never to be achieved. There is no doubt that distributive co-operation or the substitution of concert for competition in the supply of general wants has been in many places successful. It is only surprising that the example of Rochdale has not been universally followed. The carriage has run easily down hill, and now it fails to overcome an adverse gradient The preachers of the co-operative creed have never hesitated to assert that co-operation is as well suited to productive industries as to the purchase of the necessaries of life. Year after year they boast of some petty attempt to exemplify their theories; but they have never yet demonstrated by argument, or proved by actual trial, that it was possible to revolutionize either the natural laws which affect capital or the tendencies of human nature. Mr. Neale's frequent appeals to the virtue of altruism were in truth an involuntary confession of defeat. An economic organization which is not founded on self-interest must inevitably fail; and thus far it has been impossible to prove that workmen could permanently co operate in industrial undertakings with advantage to themselves. Mr. Hughes stated that a Co-operative Society at Dewsbury had, by some stroke of good luck, become possessors of a patent which, as he said, was likely to make the fortunes of its owners. If the expectation is realized a score or a hundred of artisans will become joint proprietors of a considerable sum of money. Whether they seek new investments or increase their holdings in the present undertaking, it will be for their interest to conduct business as cheaply as possible. The shareholders in a nominally co-operative factory will perhaps have divergent interests. The larger shareholders will, like other manufacturers, wish to reduce the cost of production to the lowest standard, especially when they come into competition with private capitalists. Other members of the same community will gain more by high wages than they will lose by low dividends. If the richer shareholders can obtain better incomes elsewhere, they will withdraw their money from the undertaking. That the prospect of overcoming such difficulties as these is not brilliant may be inferred from Mr. Neale's pitiful appeals to the unselfish principles of altruism. Several other speakers used the same objectionable word in preference to an English equivalent, probably because they only half understood it. The old-fashioned language of political economy was less pedantic, and it corresponded more nearly with the realities of life.

Nothing appears to have been said at the Congress as to the success of the co-operative cotton mills which have been established in some parts of Lancashire. These undertakings are naturally regarded with jealous dislike by those Trade-Unionists who attribute the depression of industry mainly to over-production; but, if the speculation succeeds, the owners have no need to trouble themselves with the objections of strangers. It may be inferred from the silence of the principal speakers that the cotton mills are not at present enjoying any considerable success. It is probably impossible to dispense in the conduct of manufactories with brokers, with buyers, and with other middlemen. Any man can appreciate cheapness in the commodities which he buys for daily use; but productive industry requires the exercise of skill, and therefore the means of providing remuneration for experts. There appears, as might be expected, that there is a difficulty in finding markets for products. Some of the speakers at Dewsbury proposed to supply the want by establishing a federal relation, as they called it, between distributive and productive co-operating Societies. In this instance also the phantom of altruism was invoked for the purpose of solving an embarrassing problem. It is absurd to appeal to the disinterested generosity of men who are bent on procuring a livelihood for themselves. If the co-operators are asked to prefer the interests of others to their own, they may reply that they were told the enterprise would involve profit, and not sacrifice. The advantage to be derived from the supposed federation must consist in the greater cheapness of the manufactured commodity, or in the high price which is commanded by the producer. In either case there would seem to be no gain which is not counterbalanced by loss on the part of one of the parties to the transaction. The distributive store has no motive for buying from the co-operative factory—unless, indeed, the shareholders in both undertakings are the same. On neither side is there an opening for altruism or gratuitous benefaction. When Co-operative Societies come into collision with Trades-Unions they are sometimes required to practise a compulsory form of altruism. Co-operative artisans or workmen are not allowed to receive lower wages than other members of the same trade, though as partners they can outbid competitors at their pleasure. The Trades-Unions managers sometimes treat the co-operators with affable condescension, but, on the whole, they maintain a distant demeanour.

Much irritation was expressed against one member of the Congress who read a paper for the purpose of advocating the mutual independence of productive and distributive organizations. The offending heretic will probably on future occasions keep his dissent to himself. But he may find consolation in seeing how even an unpopular argument eventually takes the form of a fulfilled prophecy. Productive co-operation will certainly fail if it depends on a kind of protective or preferential tariff to be established by the more prosperous distributive undertaking. Another disadvantage which must press on associations of workmen with little or no capital consists in their inability to contend against bad times. It is possible that the combination of the employer with the workman may tend to encourage soundness and efficiency of labour. If Co-operative Societies acquire a reputation for honest workmanship, some of the obstacles to their success will have been removed. One or two of the Dewsbury speakers denounced with natural indignation the "sweating" system, which has lately excited so much attention. He thought that it would be desirable to exhibit a higher kind of produce as a contrast to the cheap articles which are made by native and foreign workmen in the lowest state of destitution. The proposal was not perhaps deliberately made, and the contrast which was to be displayed would supply no new information. It is greatly to be regretted that neither co-operative industry nor any contrivance of the kind will provide a panacea for poverty. It is scarcely more useful to invoke the interference of customers who would decline to pay excessively low prices for goods. The region of Utopia which is devoted to trade is as easy to regulate as any other part of the same country; but the laws which work smoothly as long as all the conditions of property are satisfied fail to meet the case of practical evils It is for the general advantage that all plausible experiments should be tried. They will certainly not succeed if they rely on altruism; but co-operation has done much, and its possibilities are perhaps not yet exhausted. It is pleasant to find that there are still sanguine projectors in the world. One of the speakers at the Congress foresaw a time in which Parliament would represent only groups of thriving co-operative associations.

CENTRAL ASIAN DEMONSTRATIONS.

THE Odessa Correspondent of the Daily News, who has often shown himself to be well informed, and whose paper is not suspected of "Jingo" tendencies, telegraphed on Tuesday last that South Russia was full of rumours, especially among the military and official classes, of approaching Russian movements against Afghanistan. The Correspondent, while asserting that there is no special preparation visible in at least the army of the Caucasus, thinks that a "demonstration" on the Russian part is not at all unlikely. It is, of course, quite possible that these rumours may only be the reflection of the various reports of disturbances on the Afghan-Russian frontier, but they are certainly worth taking into account. At the same time, Professor VAMBÉRY, whom, though he may be called prejudiced, no one will deny to be exceptionally well informed, renews his warnings and points (it must be confessed, and can be confessed here without any twinges of conscience) to the number of times in which on this subject he has shown himself to be a veritable CASSANDRA of the other sex. Yet, again, it is positively stated that the Russian Government, which is not troubled about trifles, has knocked on the head the reviving commerce of Sebastopol by issuing orders for the exclusive reservation of the harbour there for military purposes. Although this, following as it does on the action recently taken at Batoum, may not amount to a similar reservation of the whole eastern coast of the Black Sea, since new ports are apparently available, it is a step in that direction. And it is by no means sufficiently understood in England that the railways now completed on both sides of the Caspian make the Black Sea not, as it was thirty years ago, merely valuable to Russia for acting against Turkey, but valuable also for acting—it is unnecessary to say against whom—in Further Asia.

All these rumours of wars may, of course, be put down as so much mere "panic"; and, for our part, we have always deprecated, and shall always deprecate, anything of the panic kind. But among the various new readings which have been put upon old words in our time, the identification of preparation and panic is surely one of the oddest. Professor VAMBÉRY'S letter above referred to contains, curiously enough, very much the same suggestion as one which was printed in these columns before his letter left Buda-Pesth—namely, the appointment of more and more trustworthy English agents on the frontier, so that really prompt and valid information may be obtained. The Hungarian savant is anxious especially for English agents at Herat and Candahar, whether the AMEER likes or not. This, however, is obviously a matter which must be left to the Indian Government and the AMEER to settle between them. The well-known objections to Professor VAMBÉRY'S proposal as it stands have been put clearly enough by Mr. GEORGE CURZON in a letter to the Times; and the same writer has pointed out the substitutes, also known, which exist at present. Mr. CURZON is certainly right in remarking that the Candahar agency, at least, is unnecessary. For our part, we do not quite see why, as the stay of the English Frontier Commission for years rather than months created no difficulty for any one, and as Russian agents are constantly in force on the frontier itself, some kind of agency, either sedentary or itinerant, should not be kept up between or in the respective neighbourhoods of Khoja Saleh and Maruchak. Objections on the part of Russia would have no locus standi; and if the AMEER'S authority has not been injured by the RIDGWAY mission, its English officers and its Indian sowars, it is difficult to see how it could be injured by agencies of the proposed kind. The present arrangement is of doubtful advantage to any one, and of no advantage at all to any one but a determined evil-doer. The constant false or exaggerated reports as to disturbances on the frontier create an uneasy and unfriendly feeling in both the European countries concerned, and it would not appear that the AMEER himself is by any means as well served in the matter of intelligence as he might be. But it is quite possible that the actual stationing of an English agent or resident in Herat itself might do more harm than good; and in any case the requisite information, both there, at Candahar, and elsewhere, could be provided as it is at present, but more fully and exactly, in another way.

The renewal of these disquieting rumours makes the Australian agitation about the Chinese particularly unfortunate; for, though it is the opinion of some persons that China will never be of much use as an ally, no one but a lunatic would deny that, in case of a serious quarrel with Russia in Central Asia, it would be better to have the Celestials as friends than as enemies. Although the recent and still continuing operations of Indian troops on the Thibetan border were absolutely necessary, and have been carried on with the greatest possible respect to Chinese sensitiveness, the traditional policy of the Empire is too much opposed to any such things for them not to have been regarded with some disquiet at Pekin, and the Chinese can hardly be expected to make full allowance for the extremely anomalous and ticklish relations of Great Britain to her colonies. It may be very well seen at Pekin, when all is said and done, that the Australian excitement is nothing but a Trades-Unionist movement against Chinese cheap labour. Still, this is one of the peculiarities of a colonial empire, especially when the colonies are allowed to enjoy practically unchecked the most irrational and the most tyrannical form of government, that of universal suffrage. We must make the best of it. Fortunately, whatever may be the wishes of some lunatics at home, the region on which we chiefly depend for resisting the attacks of Russia is in a happier state than that of democracy. The Indian Empire is still directed by what should be, and for the present very fairly is, the wisdom of the wise few, not the folly of the foolish many, and its resources can, therefore, be disposed of for the good of the whole people, and not for that of a class. These resources have for some time now been most carefully prepared, developed, and arranged with a view to the coming struggle, and, with firm backing from home, they ought not to prove unequal to the contest.

But this firm backing is absolutely necessary, and it may almost be said that, unless a suspicion of its being absent is entertained in Russian quarters, no attempt is likely to be made to disturb the peace. After the conduct of the larger part of one political party in reference to Ireland, it is, of course, useless to place any reliance on pledges. But it is at least well to point out that, with the exception of a very few Russian advocates, a somewhat larger, but still small, party of peace-at-any-price men, and of course the Irish disloyalists, every section of every English political party, is bound to resist the further advance of Russia. There is now no quibble possible about summer pastures and winter pastures, about Old Sarakhs and New Sarakhs, about the question whether Khoja Saleh is Khoja Saleh or something else convenient to Russia at the moment. The delimitation business had, as our readers know, in our opinion uncommonly few advantages; it had perhaps this one, that it made further backing out, except as backing out without any attempt at concealment, thenceforward impossible. It is, indeed, quite conceivable that "demonstrations" will be attempted, and for this simple reason, which might be obvious to any but simpletons. Vast and damaging as have been English concessions to Russia since the time, but a very few years ago, when we might have kept her at distance, it is undoubtedly true that in an actual war at this moment—a war on the great scale—she would strike for India at great disadvantage, and we could parry at great advantage. But with every step in advance her disadvantages and our advantages vanish, and it is therefore of the most vital interest to her to get these steps over without a war—to stalk India, in short, till she is within easy range. It is, we say, nearly certain that the stalking process will be tried, and it will be Englishmen's fault if it succeeds. Whatever may be the boasts of the Russian military party, and however much may have been lost already by permitting the overthrow of the independent Turcoman Khanates and tribes, and the completion of the Transcaspian railway, it is nearly certain that Russia will not go to actual war on her present basis if she can help it, or unless as a necessary step in consequence of her determination to go to war elsewhere. This last rag of advantage we are, if we have any sense at all, bound to keep; and we lose it if we permit demonstrations to advance the Russian frontier in Afghanistan any further southwards.

IN MALWOOD CHASE.

SIR W-LL-M H-RC-RT. MR. CH-MB-RL-N.

MR. C. (looking round him). 'Tis indeed a most interesting spot. So it was here that—

Sir W. H. (with animation). That stone is supposed to mark the site of the very oak-tree off which the arrow glanced. I have nearly made out the positions of the two men to my satisfaction, but not quite. I am not entirely satisfied about WILLIAM'S.

Mr. C. (absently). No? Ah, I dare say not!

Sir W. H. But I think I can place Sir WALTER.

Mr. C. (suddenly aroused). FOSTER?

Sir W. H. No; TYRRELL. Why, CH-MB-RL-N, you're dreaming.

Mr. C. (pulling himself together). Well, it really would look like it. This lovely afternoon and my excellent lunch have begotten in me a disposition to reverie. My thoughts had wandered—no great distance, indeed, but still to quite a different WILLIAM.

Sir W. H. Oho! not RUFUS, eh?

Mr. C. (smiling). Not in the least! I have never seen a sign of it. His warmest friend would not pretend that he ever showed a trace of it.

Sir W. H. (good-humouredly). My dear CH-MB-RL-N, your jokes are in advance of your Latinity. WILLIAM RUBER might possibly mean "blushing WILLIAM," but "rufus" is never used, to the best of my belief, except for the colour of the hair.

Mr. C. Which, as I just now observed, shows in your case not a trace of red. My dear H-RC-RT, you're a perfect Sir ANDREW AGUECHEEK in the gratuitous fitting on of caps. But why offend the genius of the Forest with our stupid political chaff? Let us agree to taboo even the slightest reference to politics.

Sir W. H. With all my heart. Especially as we are supposed to have met for a political purpose.

Mr. C. Just so; whereas?

Sir W. H. Whereas—well, of course, the mutual attraction of each other's society, and—

Mr. C. Come, H-RC-RT, don't be too modest. Add your own genial determination not to quarrel with old political associates. There is something very attractive in your readiness to forget our points of difference—points on which you are known to feel so strongly—and to remember nothing but our ancient comradeship.

Sir W. H. Thank you, CH-MB-RL-N. Yes. Whatever people may say, I flatter myself I have always known how to distinguish between men and their opinions.

Mr. C. Whatever people may say? Do you mean to say, then, that—well, well, there are people who will say anything. Why, it's your forte. In spite of the complete change in Mr. GL-DST-NE's opinion you recognized him as your chief in a moment.

Sir W. H. Ah! but I pride myself more on recognizing the Unionists as my friends with their present opinions.

Mr. C. Pardon me. Our old opinions; which were yours.

Sir W. H. My dear fellow, you must know that that only makes it the more difficult to keep up the intimacy.

Mr. C. You mean that there is always a certain embarrassment in meeting a man who has married one's divorced wife. No doubt that is the case to some extent in England; but hardly so, I think, in countries where divorce is more lightly considered. Your own connexion with your political creed, H-RC -RT, was always regarded, if you will excuse my saying so, as a sort of Indiana marriage, and people would not be very much surprised, I expect, at seeing the separated couple come together again. Nor, I fancy, are you yourself unwilling to encourage that belief. Hence it is that—(pauses)

Sir W. H. Hence it is that what?

Mr. C. I was going to say, only it would be so very improper a remark from a guest—I was going to say that it was owing to this willingness on your part that I am now enjoying an afternoon at a spot which the tragic death of your ancestor—let me see, he was your ancestor, wasn't he?—has for ever consecrated.

Sir W. H. Dear me! Are people putting that construction on your friendly visit?

Mr. C. Not so much on the visit, I think, as on the invitation.

Sir W. H. But surely we divide the responsibility, don't we? Do not the same people say that, unless you yourself had some political object to gain by accepting the invitation, you would not have accepted it?

Mr. C. Ahem! no; not so many people. At least, I think not.

Sir W. H. What! Not when you have sent up that ballon d'essai from Birmingham in the very week when you have come to stay with me?

Mr. C. I don't quite know to what you refer.

Sir W. H. How stupid of me! Of course you don't. You never read the articles in the Birmingham Daily Post, do you?—I mean after the paper has gone to press?

Mr. C. Oh! I understand. You are speaking of the "Sketch of Unionist Policy" which has just been put forward by that most respectable organ. Yes, I have read that—after the paper went to press; but you will excuse my saying that I am still unconscious of any peculiar relevance in your last remark.

Sir W. H. Yes? We are to regard it, then, as a mere coincidence that your National Councils scheme, and all the rest of it, has re-emerged at the very moment when you are honouring me with a visit? There was no intention on your part to provoke a little newspaper gossip about—about—

Mr. C. About another round table—a rustic round table to be placed for us under one of these noble oaks? My dear H-RC-RT, what in the world should I gain by arousing expectations only to disappoint them? We know perfectly well what the Round Table of last year really meant, and we can neither of us have any object in wheeling out that absurd piece of furniture again. The comedy was well enough for once, but I am not aware that there has been any demand for its repetition.

Sir W. H. No; but for the benefit of the actors, eh? Come, my dear fellow, I think a little more frankness between us two would be as well. You wish to keep open the door of reconciliation with the Gladstonians. I don't wish to close it absolutely between myself and the Unionists. Isn't that a fair account of the matter, and are we not both wise in our generation?

Mr. C. (smiling). Perhaps; but I can't pretend to your wisdom in one respect. You have far surpassed me in the forethought of your preparations for a highly probable future.

Sir W. H. As how?

Mr. C. In your choice of this excellent spot for your retirement.

Sir W. H. Ah! CH-MB-RL-N, I would gladly exchange it for your hobby. I have none. Let me advise you, my dear friend, to stick to your floriculture. You don't know how soon you may want the solace, or for how long. But here we are at home, and I dare say you would like a cup of tea. Let us go in.

THE IRREGULARITY OF REGULATORS.

SOMEBODY once advertised a work "Sur l'Incommodité des Commodes," and Mr. THOMAS TOD STODDART writes about "that inconvenient convenience, a landing net." The Irregularity of Regulators has also attracted the notice of American citizens. Among Anglo-Saxon communities there has always been a tendency to "take the law into their own "hands." The law "comes in two in their hands," as housemaids declare that porcelain does, and law is at present quite fragmentary in Indiana, especially near New Albany. The White Caps are a highly moral secret Society who beat to death, or nearly to death, every one whose private or public conduct they do not admire. To tell the truth, many of the persons whom the White Caps whip with hickory rods appear to deserve some punishment. But it is usually thought a smaller evil that men and women should go unwhipped than that they should be condemned, unheard, by a self-constituted court. In part of Indiana life is no more secure than in parts of Ireland. In both countries moralists and patriots are their own judges, juries, witnesses, policemen, and executioners. This, of course, spells anarchy; and in Indiana, as in Ireland, it is hard for the law to reach the patriots and moralists. "To obtain evidence against "the Order, or one of its members, is impracticable; to "convict a White Cap by any ordinary process of law "declared to be absolutely impossible." "The Order has "become a terror to the people." This was written about South-Eastern Indiana, not about Kerry; and it may soon have to be written about places nearer home. Somebody, in all human societies, must be, as the Scotch clergy pray, "a terror unto evildoers." Is that somebody to be an amateur, working his own will in the dark, or is he to be the magistrate? In Indiana he is the moral amateur. He and his friends in Crawford County gave forty lashes (each brings blood) to the wife of PETER DENTON. They informed Mr. DENTON (who appears to have been an interested spectator) that she was whipped for "conduct "unbecoming a virtuous woman." Who is to decide what that conduct is? The moral amateur, editing a journal of espionage in London, or armed with a revolver and a hickory whip in America, is the only person who can settle the question. He has the right to create offences, to try them in secret (the accused being unrepresented), and to punish them. Suicide is a more pleasant alternative than submission to such Regulators. They whipped WILLIAM TONEY for being intemperate and "tough." The tougher TONEY was the better, as they gave him a hundred, much as Mr. PUMBLECHOOK was given a dozen on the occasion when his mouth was stuffed full of flowering annuals. GOODMAN received a beating for being a "drunken brute" who made his family support him. People who attempt to corrupt electors are also to be beaten. A well-known novelist, incapable of guile and withdrawn from the political arena, was once accused of being "the principal briber at "the Evesham election." Near New Albany they would have given him a hundred lashes "on sight" and found out his innocence later. "The provocation that calls for "such summary punishment ranges from chicken-stealing "to adultery." The rural town of Corydon has been patrolled by hundreds of armed White Caps, who suspected that the public accounts were crooked, and who were prepared to "clear out the town":—

Ah, Corydon, Corydon, quæ te dementia cepit!

Mankind is eternally relapsing. This organization of White Caps is exactly a revival of the Mumbo Jumbo brotherhood which MUNGO PARK found among the negroes. Disguised blacks came into the villages at night, with all manner of mummeries, and whipped women whom they accused, as the White Caps accused Mrs. PETER DENTON. In New Guinea and the neighbouring islands the secret judicial Society is called "Duc-duc," and its members go about dressed like Jack-in-the-Green. We find that the best if not the only thing to do with White Caps, Moonlighters, and their kind is to shoot them on sight. A few shootings will be avenged, as in Ireland; but nothing else, nothing but plucky personal resistance, will restore the confidence of a district. Of course, if people prefer a life of terror, they can have it, and they do prefer it in South-East Indiana and other parts of the habitable globe nearer home.

IRELAND.

LESS attention, we should imagine, than was looked for by its author or authors has been attracted by the recent article in the Birmingham newspaper regarded as the inspired exponent of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S views. This comparative indifference is not difficult to account for. In the first place, there is nothing new in the views themselves; and, in the second place, there is no particular significance in their re-statement on Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S behalf at the present juncture. The public knows all about the purchase scheme which is to vest Irish lands in newly-constituted county authorities, and is to pay their vendors in land debentures, which are not to be guaranteed by the State and yet are to be as good value as if they were. That is to say, the public knows all about the asserted advantages of this scheme, and nothing at all about the—apparently magical—means whereby these advantages are to be secured; and the article in the Birmingham Daily Post leaves the knowledge and the ignorance of the public alike unaffected. Perhaps there is in the latest statement a little more particularity on the subject of the "land bank" which is to be created for Ireland than was the case with former expositions of the Birmingham programme; but we can hardly say that the additional light thrown upon the plan is of a dazzling intensity. The "land bank" has a nice substantial "immovable" sound; and may possibly give the dispossessed Irish proprietors some confidence in the solvency of the debtor to whom they are to look for compensation. These debentures will be at least "as safe as the bank" which issues them, and the reassuring associations of that phrase may perhaps work wonders. All we can say is that wonders will have to be worked if the alternative of virtual confiscation by the compulsory tender of depreciated securities as payment for Irish lands is to be avoided by those who, like Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, so loudly proclaim their resolve not to pledge the credit of the nation to the discharge of a national obligation of honour. In the other features of the "Sketch of Unionist Policy" there is even less pretence to novelty of any kind. The "large and liberal expenditure on "public works, drainage, rivers, harbours, fishery appliances, "railway extensions, &c." is not even a specially Chamberlainian or even Liberal item in the policy of the Unionist party. It was foreshadowed in the Commission promised by the present Government in their first Session of office, and it is, and always has been, understood that practical effect will be given to this policy at the earliest possible opportunity. As to the old proposal of Provincial Councils, which has now been engrafted by its author on a projected Local Government scheme for Ireland after the model of Mr. RITCHIE'S measure, it offers even less material for remark. Cui bono is, indeed, the only observation which suggests itself on the proposal considered in its abstract or academic aspect. The only thing which could give it actuality and importance would be the concurrence of its revival with some political juncture which should seem to invite an early attempt on the part of somebody or other at the realization of the plan.

This, however, is the very element which is most conspicuously wanting to it. The manifesto of the Birmingham newspaper is à propos of nothing, unless it be some personal objects of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN which can only be conjecturally assigned. There is assuredly nothing in the political circumstances of the hour to warrant its promulgation. The mere proposition that the "time is fast coming when "Liberal-Unionists, pledged as they are to remedial "measures, must show that they have a positive as well as "a negative policy for Ireland," is hardly sufficient to show the necessity of putting forward an elaborate scheme of local government for Ireland during the Whitsuntide recess of a Parliamentary Session, the remainder of which will be entirely occupied with the settlement of a scheme of local government for England. The "time" of which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S organ speaks is not coming so fast as all that; nor must such excessive emphasis be laid on the temporal adverb or the companion proposition that a policy of Irish reform must "shortly" be "added to the support "given by the Liberal-Unionists to the steady and fairly "successful enforcement of law and order." We must, at any rate, decline to interpret "shortly" as "next Session," so far as one particular "Irish reform" is concerned. A steady and fairly successful enforcement of law and order for twelve months affords no sort of basis for the proposal to make a large grant of local administration, and thereby of political power, to the very persons in whose despite and against whose furious resistance this steady and fairly successful enforcement of law and order has had to be carried out. The Government, indeed, would be discrediting their character for steadiness, and doing their best to throw away their success, by entertaining any such proposal. Surely the commonest common sense must show the imprudence of re-arming a disarmed enemy who has neither had time nor opportunity, nor has evinced the slightest desire, to become a friend. It would be an act of folly, to which the Government cannot possibly be expected to commit themselves for the sake either of obliging a faithful ally or of silencing a troublesome follower. They cannot consent to wreck their work in Ireland because Mr. CHAMBERLAIN thinks it desirable to propitiate Radicalism in the constituencies, or because Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL promised "simultaneity" in English and Irish local government, and resents the disrespect which, he thinks, is about to be offered to a word of six syllables which has had the honour of being added by him to the vocabulary of politics. With Tory Democrats, however, their own party ought to know how to deal; it is Radical-Unionists who seem to need reminding that the primary purpose and main merit of the alliance between the two English parties on the question of Irish policy were to obviate the necessity for, or rather to remove, the temptation to just that sort of swaying and seesawing between firm government and so-called remedial legislation which has been the curse of Ireland, but which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN still seems to regard as the ideal method of treating it in the future.

Perhaps it would be as well for all Unionists, whether Liberal or Conservative, to be content with one thing at a time. The work of restoring law and order in Ireland is, as Mr. CHAMBERLAIN says, going on very satisfactorily; but it is not yet completed, and we prefer to wait till it is before laying out any plans for the future. If things continue, however, in their present course, we shall, no doubt, see the work brought speedily to accomplishment. So far as present appearances go, the discomfiture of the Parnellites by the last blow which has been dealt at the cause of disorder is as profound as ever. Every effort which they make to throw it off serves merely to emphasize and draw attention to it. The latest of these efforts—that of the meeting of the Dublin Corporation, convened by Mr. SEXTON for the purpose of endorsing the resolutions adopted by the Irish members the other day at the Mansion House—was almost pathetic in its impotence. At the beginning of the proceedings a message despatched by Archbishop WALSH from the Irish College at Rome was read to the meeting, and the meeting painfully "made believe to believe" that its contents were satisfactory. Having received it, the Lord Mayor of DUBLIN probably had no choice as to reading it to the Corporation; but Mr. SEXTON, who is at least an intelligent man, must have been acutely conscious of its terribly disappointing character. All that the ARCHBISHOP said was that "it "might be useful to assure the Municipal Council of "Dublin in his name that all apprehensions of political "interference of the Holy See in Irish affairs are absolutely "groundless. The cause of Ireland has nothing to fear "from LEO XIII. Accept my most distinct assurance on "that point." Alas! that is not the point on which Mr. SEXTON and his friends want distinct assurances. They do not need to be told that the POPE has not definitely enrolled himself as a member of the Unionist party, or that, if Mr. GLADSTONE were to come in again and introduce another Separatist Bill, no Papal anathema would be levelled against him. All that they know; but that, unfortunately, is all that Dr. WALSH says. He does not, and he cannot, say anything to mitigate the force of the fatal condemnation which the Holy See has pronounced on the immoral means employed for the furtherance of "the cause of Ireland." And, since he cannot do that, the Parnellites know very well that that cause, instead of having "nothing," has everything, to fear from LEO XIII.

POOR MALIETOA.

IT is to be feared that the gentleman (or lady) who has contributed a brief in several columns and two divisions to the Times on the side of King MALIETOA LAUPEPA of Samoa, in his case against the German Government, will not do his or her Royal friend much good. About Samoa we and the Americans may care a little, but for poor MALIETOA no great interest will too probably be felt. Yet the brief is worth reading, if only because it presents us at the beginning (with a little help from the compositor) one of the most pleasing pictures we have seen for some time. There is, it appears, a worthy family in Samoa whose important duty it is to look after the "scared myths of the "people." What scares a myth—the prospect of being triced up to the sun and getting dozens of interpretations by Canon ISAAC TAYLOR, or the fear that it may be reduced to its proper place by Mr. ANDREW LANG? This worthy family divides its labours in an admirable manner. The boys repeat the prose and the girls the poetry. The old people supply the comment; but this can only be done in public when the king comes to that island. At other times the people are left to guess at their myths and exchange them with one another—a system of barter which, it seems, leads to the form of competition called adulteration. For this a check has been provided. When one Samoan thinks that another is palming off a sophisticated myth he says, "Give me its solo," and a solo is "a poetic composition "which contains references, somewhat occult, to the leading "events of the myth, and which is supposed to settle any "disputes." Who explains the somewhat occult references? Perhaps the old people, who "have the prerogative of ex-"plaining the meaning of the various allusions of the "poetic lines," and do it at length, adding long screeds of comment to single lines of myth—just like a State Paper historian with his rivulet of text and ocean of note. How happy the folklorists would be if they could all be State-aided emigrants to the "largest island of the Manu'a cluster "of Samoa," where this wild nightmare goes on all the time—a consummation most devoutly to be wished.

To return to King MALIETOA LAUPEPA. His history is worthy of the country of scared myths. One STEINBERGER, an enterprising and romancing bagman, came to Samoa in order to identify the interests of his firm with the fiscal arrangements of the Samoan Government. Without the help of an old man from the Manu'a cluster we find this line from the solo somewhat occult; but there is no doubt that STEINBERGER, by diplomacy and other methods, made MALIETOA LAUPEPA King and himself Prime Minister. LUPUA was dethroned. Then MALIETOA found out that STEINBERGER had been saying the thing which was not touching missions from the U.S. Government, and so on, as bad as PIP. So the virtue of MALIETOA rose in wrath, and he packed his Prime Minister off. Then they objected, and MALIETOA was upset, and he also objected, and they had a merry mill, and he broke all their heads, and remained in possession. It is like a sophisticated myth or a solo of occult references, but the upshot is clear. MALIETOA was King, and was duly recognised by England, the United States, and Germany, which all made treaties with him, and promised one another not to annex his country. It seemed as if there was to be peace, and the Samoans were to be allowed to wither away quietly like the Hawaiians. But King MALIETOA was destined to come to grief through Germans. The Germans came, they made a treaty with him. He said he did not want any treaty, particularly not that treaty, and wrote a letter about it to the German EMPEROR. It was no use. The German squadron turned up. Officers landed and put up a target in the principal street, and shot at it with bullets to the annoyance of the Samoans. Then they served out Hamburg brandy and made the Samoans drunk, so that one of them broke a German nose. After which outrage there was, of course, nothing for it but to depose King MALIETOA and make another king—which was duly done. This is the story as told by the King's friend in the Times, and, if it is somewhat like the poetic composition called a solo in the occult nature of its references, it does not thereby differ very widely from other briefs. As to the exact merits of the case, we shall suspend judgment with a placid conviction that King MALIETOA has gone the way of LUPUA, whom he contrived to upset with the help of the unveracious STEINBERGER. As regards Samoa itself, the important thing would be to learn whether the setting up of a king who is a tool of the Germans is to lead to an occupation of the islands by them. If so, the United States and England may have something to say—and especially the United States. As for ourselves, we seem, to judge from Sir J. FERGUSSON'S answers to questions in the House, to have decided that it is wiser not to worry the Germans by indiscreet inquiries.

A LESSON TO COSTERMONGERS.

WE know of no reason why a costermonger should not obey the law and respect the convenience of his fellow-citizens using the public thoroughfares, or why, if he obstinately refuses such obedience, he should be encouraged and rewarded by an officer whose duty it is to protect the rights of the public and to administer the law. It seems, however, that on both these points Mr. MONTAGU WILLIAMS has the advantage of us. He knows of some reason, or at least we must assume so, though he did not disclose it, why RICHARD SNELLGROVE was justified in obstructing foot-passengers in Battersea in defiance of a lawful order to desist from so doing; and he has also, in gremio magistratus, some ground satisfactory to himself for rewarding RICHARD SNELLGROVE'S resistance to the order with a donation out of the poor-box. Yet it must be admitted that these secrets of Mr. MONTAGU WILLIAMS'S judicial mind are hard to penetrate. To judge from the case as presented to the Court by the representatives of the Battersea Vestry, an ordinary unmagisterial observer would have said that the defendant's conduct differed only for the worse from that of his competitors in street trading, and that they may imagine themselves to have possibly some cause of complaint as regards the favour which has been shown him. The Vestry, Mr. YOUNG said, took action owing to the determination of the costermongers to stand in the main thoroughfare, thus causing considerable annoyance and compelling people to walk in the roadway. They were directed to transfer their barrows to the side streets, and "all those who lived in the parish had consented to do so; "but a few others, of whom the complainant was one, in-"sisted on maintaining their former position." As they gave false names and addresses, they could not be summoned; and the Vestry had, accordingly, to proceed against them summarily, under the powers of 57 Geo. III. c. 29, sec. 65, by seizure of their barrows. The complainant's barrow had been thus seized, and he took out a summons in consequence against one of the street inspectors for its recovery. This summons Mr. MONTAGU WILLIAMS was reluctantly compelled to dismiss on a technical point. But his sympathies appear to have gone out strongly towards the man who thus insisted on a privilege of obstruction which most of his fellow-traders had obediently resigned, and which was, no doubt, of enhanced value to the contumacious costermongers on that account; and, having ascertained that SNELLGROVE had rendered himself liable to a charge of 10*s*. as costs in connexion with the seizure of the barrow, Mr. WILLIAMS gave SNELLGROVE 10*s*. out of the poor-box, described the Act of Parliament and the action taken under it as "cruel and disgraceful," urged the advisableness of proceeding against the costermongers by summons, which he had been already told was impracticable, and suggested that the complainant should proceed against the Vestry for detaining his barrow. We should add that the donation from the poor-box was given to enable SNELLGROVE to buy more flowers, and that it was expressly stated by Mr. YOUNG that he was offered his flowers back again, and had refused.

It is to be hoped that the well-conducted costermongers of Battersea will not have their attention too pointedly drawn to the case which has been thus disposed of at the Wandsworth Police Court. These good fellows are at present a little behind their age, and it is greatly to be hoped, so far as the Battersea public is concerned, that they may continue as long as possible in their state of old-fashioned innocence. When it was pointed out to them by the local authorities that these open-air markets were a nuisance to the inhabitants of the district, and that it must be removed to a less crowded thoroughfare, they adopted the obsolete course of submission. So ignorant were they of the latest and most approved methods of attracting the sympathy of persons in authority, that they obeyed a lawful order. It is really delightful to find such sacred simplicity in these days among any class of men. SNELLGROVE, who is evidently a student of contemporary politics, and has carefully and intelligently watched the tactics of Irish cottiers, Welsh farmers, Scotch crofters, and others—and possibly also noticed the peculiar characteristics of Mr. MONTAGU WILLIAMS—has gained a truer insight into the "conditions of his environment." He calculated that by defying authority, by allowing his property to be seized, and by taking proceedings for its recovery before a magistrate who has brought the art of "playing to the gallery" to an astonishing pitch of perfection, he might be fairly certain to "score." And scored he has. He has got an advertisement from—or a joint advertisement with—Mr. MONTAGU WILLIAMS, and ten shillings out of a fund which can hardly, on any view of it, have been intended for such cases as his. It is to be hoped that the law-abiding costermongers will not learn the too obvious lesson of the case; or the Battersea Vestry are likely to have trouble on their hands.

THE BARCELONA EXHIBITION.

UNIVERSAL Exhibitions are not matters on which much remains to be said. The coming French one has a kind of interest, because we all want to know whether the next revolution will happen before it is open or after, or while it is going on. But this interest is extraneous, and, as it were, illegitimate. For the rest, the thing will be a big show, and that is nearly all there is to be said about it. The Barcelona Exhibition is in a happier position; for, in its way, it is a new thing. A Spain in which enterprising gentlemen form bold plans, and, not only form them, but go roundly to work to carry them out, is not the Spain we have known for long. Now this is what has happened. Some months ago certain Catalan gentlemen thought it would be a good thing to have an exhibition in the town of Barcelona. Instead of dreaming about it and writing magniloquent articles to show that it could be done, and ought to be done, they actually set to work and did it. In old times there would have been the talk, and then a postponement of work until to-morrow. Finally, it would have been decided that, in fact, it was as good as done, and no more trouble need be taken. Perhaps it would have been begun, and left in the middle because of "falta de recursos," which is the fatal Spanish equivalent of the old disease called "faute d'argent" by a great doctor. In this case none of these things happened. The scheme was conceived and put into execution with a speed worthy of the United States. When the opening day came the Exhibition was not ready—no Exhibition ever is—but it was far enough advanced to allow of an opening ceremony. After this we expect soon to hear of express trains crossing through Spain at the rate of thirty miles an hour; to be told that use is being made of the canal of Aragon, which was begun by CHARLES V. and was unfinished a few years ago; and to see the Spanish fleet adding new horrors to the life of English First Lords of the Admiralty. All this may happen, and more, if the Spaniards can only keep up the pace for five years or so.

The opening ceremony, too, was a novelty in its way—so much happened to make it striking. No parade on any similar occasion can have been more brilliant and picturesque than the naval display in Barcelona harbour. Upwards of sixty warships of all nations are rarely collected together, and the Barcelonese may reflect with pleasure that they have seen what few have seen. Then the presence of all those squadrons was an outward and visible sign to Spaniards that their present ruler is one whom all the world delights to honour. If they are wise, too, they will look on those ironclads and meditate on the happiness of a people which is not interested in the Eastern question, which has a frontier no one dreams of attacking, which does not lie in the road of any army, which can afford to take no notice of what Russia does in Bulgaria or what France would like to do anywhere. There arose a little cloud out of that splendid review. It was discovered that the English, Austrian, and Italian squadrons could not be even said to be going to cruise together without wounding the susceptibilities of a "friendly Power." To the Spaniards what does it matter who cruises with whom? They can eat their bread with joy, and drink their wine with a merry heart—they have plenty of both and good—they can let their garments be always white, as they like to do in hot weather most wisely. The snarling of friendly Powers at one another's heels does not affect them. As far as they are concerned, all these foreign fighting ships have collected only to honour the QUEEN REGENT, and her solemn opening of the Exhibition gave all Europe an opportunity of noting the return of Spain to a position of respectability. It is a pleasing scene. All Spain needs to do now is not to take the new hotel for a model. This building, needed to entertain the rush of visitors, is to be run up in a few weeks without foundations. Now, the Spanish bricklayer and stonemason are clever fellows, and know their business as well as most, and the climate is dry. Still, buildings without foundations are dangerous, and for our part we politely but firmly decline to take rooms in that "hottl.." It is to be hoped that the recent peace and prosperity of Spain are not a temporary show affair also run up for the occasion. England has no reason to wish they should be, but much the contrary.

THE ROYAL WEDDING AT CHARLOTTENBURG.

MANY things concur to render the Royal marriage which has just been solemnized at Charlottenburg an event of peculiar interest to Englishmen. The common kinship of the contracting parties to our own Royal house would of itself, indeed, have sufficed for this; for the nation could not, in any case, have looked with indifference upon a union between two grandchildren of the QUEEN. But the steadily growing cordiality of our political relations with the German Empire, added to the deep sympathy which is felt in this country for the afflicted EMPEROR and his devoted wife, have undoubtedly much enhanced the warmth of the feelings with which the marriage is regarded in this country. The young couple themselves, moreover, have claims of their own upon English regard. The bride may be not inappropriately considered as the heiress of the sentiments which her mother universally inspired in the national mind, and as standing in the place of one of the most beloved of the daughters of England too early lost. And to a race as proud of their history and achievements as Englishmen are or used to be, a touch of romance is unquestionably added to the person of the Princess IRENE by her name, and by the event which it commemorates. As to the Prince, he is a sailor, with the reputation of being a good one; he has learnt his seamanship, if not exactly in a British school, from a British master; and he has already seen his share of service afloat. It is needless, therefore, to say that he is the possessor, other things being equal, of the best passports which a young Prince of any country can have to the good will of the English people. Even the German congratulations of the bride and bridegroom can hardly under the circumstances be more sincere and cordial than our own.

In every mind, however, here or abroad, the supreme interest of the ceremony will centre in the pathetic situation upon which it breaks as with a transient gleam of sunshine. The figure of the stricken EMPEROR must attract and rivet many an eye which would pass lightly over those of the bridal pair. Happily at this moment there is a slight improvement in his condition, and it is possible to forget for a while the hours and days of terrible anxiety through which his family and subjects have passed. But that, we fear, is all that can be said. His astonishingly firm bearing and demeanour during the ceremony was to a great extent probably responsive rather to the state of his mind than to that of his body; and even the most optimistic of the very favourable reports which have been circulated as to the state of his health is not such as to justify any confident hope of his final recovery. But it may possibly [illegible] shadow, though even on that point it would be rash to speak with too much confidence, a more or less considerable prolongation of his life; and any respite, even if it be only reckoned by months, will be a gain to the country and to the world. In the meantime the solemnization of this marriage ceremony is not only in itself an indication of happy augury, but is one of those which often actually assists in the restoration of the patient's health.

MR. WHISTLER'S TEN O'CLOCK.

MUCH of the matter contained in Mr. Whistler's brilliant lecture has become to a considerable extent common property, and we can hardly suppose that there are many to be found among those who enjoyed the privilege of hearing him deliver it dull enough to have forgotten either the significance or the fashion of the sentences now before us. Nevertheless, he has done well in publishing it in pamphlet form. He will by this means secure a larger audience; and it is good, moreover, that important truths, however patent they may be, should be remorselessly hammered into the understanding of a public which, for the most part, divides its time between hopeless apathy and silly hysterics, but which in either state is slow to hearken to good counsel and to profit by it. The follies and stupidities against which Mr. Whistler's satire is directed are in the main as rampant now as they were when he first spoke, and it is not much to the purpose to note the fact that one or two of the most trivial among them have either modified their outward garb or been relegated to the more obscure circles of the suburbs. For one instance alone, the professional æsthetes—who, while they endured, formed a rather unexpected and mildly interesting variety of the genus Chadband—have been driven by the force of circumstances to betake themselves to other methods in their search after the various muffins which they seek to abstract from the enfeebled grasp of an exhausted community. But the dilettante, the ignorant and pretentious critic, the grossly incompetent teacher, and the half-skilled mechanic trading under the name of artist are always with us; and this being the case, we have often longed that some of Mr. Whistler's sentences could be printed on hoardings and in railway stations, hoping that "le peuple avec son gros bon sens" would seize upon those points that the cultured masses persistently ignore. For it must, unfortunately or not as the event may prove, be conceded that these same masses have persistently displayed their inability to judge of any question of art, either from the artist's point of view—which was not to be expected of them—or which might have been expected of them from the ordinary standpoint of common sense. But Mr. Whistler has himself shown us how this their incapacity has come about. "The people have been harassed with art in every guise, and vexed with many methods as to its endurance." Neither have Mr. Whistler's utterances been taken to heart by those who stand self-elected within the holy of holies. The dilettanti of painting and literature have failed to grasp the truest of his sayings, which must of necessity remain impenetrably hidden from all such as are physically and mentally unable to recognize the perfection and style of his best work in art. His productions afford insecure and treacherous ground for the feet of the hunter in search of the gratification of his own vanity and the plaudits of less knowing friends. The would-be admirer is certain to commit himself before long by expressing an equal measure of delight in the presence of some formless and umbrageous smirch, undistinguishable to the troglodyte from the most exquisitely balanced scheme of dainty colour that he has ever given to the world. It is therefore most desirable that Mr. Whistler should address himself to a wider public. Most admirably he dwells upon the truism that "art happens." No environment can in the long run make or mar it. Yet there is not here set forth, as a careless reader might suppose, any argument against the existence of public studios, in which the initial difficulties of the beginners may be got over. Such institutions may and do save many an artist from years of avoidable and fruitless effort; but they must not be such self-styled "schools" as those to whose existence we have allowed ourselves to become accustomed, where life studies are corrected after the model has ceased to sit, or in which a multiplicity of cooks are suffered to convert what might prove wholesome broth into a deadly pash. Mr. Whistler approaches more debatable ground when he treats of the combinations of untoward circumstances which have landed us in our present pass. The question of supply and demand in matters of art is in a practical world full of difficulties, and is, as he insists, most assuredly incapable of solution by jabber about "leading the artistic life," or the employment of kindred phrases by misguided people, who think it their duty to live in houses which they do not like, and exhaust their minds and muscles in unavailing struggles with coal-scuttles of abhorrent form to compel them to yield their contents. In the sense in which Mr. Whistler employs the phrase it may be true that "there never was an art-loving nation." But that "there never was an artistic period" is absurd saying, which he himself disproves in a most conclusive fashion. The weak point in his lecture is to be found in his conception of the artist as a being wholly apart from other men, living an isolated life totally uninfluenced by his environment. This statement will not bear examination, and Mr. Whistler's picture of the primeval artist making merry with his stick and his gourd is pretty but not convincing. Neither can his theory that suddenly "there arose a new class, who discovered the cheap, and foresaw fortune in the facture of the sham" be admitted. The spread of trade and consequent distribution of wealth has developed a race chiefly remarkable for moneyed vulgarity; hence the demand which has been most ably supplied for works in which all that is most loathsome has been lovingly and thoughtfully wrought up to the desired pitch of revolting hideousness. Hence, this wholly modern phenomenon that men, capable of becoming fairly reputable and successful linen-drapers, have, foreseeing that there was money in it, given themselves over to the production of the art commodity or Academy picture, and, while they bleat with futile hypocrisy of giving their best energies to the advancement of art, prey in shameless security on the fat juices of the unprotected stock-broker. As the lecturer points out another grievous thing came to pass when men of great literary ability made the discovery that pictures were convenient pegs whereon to hang their eloquent discourse, and that many alluring sentences could be penned concerning them. In their eyes "a picture is more or less a hieroglyph or symbol of story . . . the work is considered absolutely from a literary point of view"; and on the unhappy day when they secured the ear of the public, the tribe of pictorial illustrators sprang into flourishing existence—incompetent craftsmen who, striving to transfer the passionate vision of the poet from paper to canvas, produce a meaningless and wanton medley of ugly colour and incorrect form, as discordant and ungracious and as potent to create dismay as ever was the quivering shriek of the uprooted mandrake.

It would be an ill deed to mar the general effect of Mr. Whistler's writing by quoting detached sentences from it. His pamphlet must be read straight through or let alone; and it will amply repay careful reading even at the hands of those to whom his matter is already familiar. This much must be conceded to him, that he has perfectly fulfilled his aim. On the other hand, it must be granted that his aim is not the highest, or his view of the subject in hand by any means the widest. The strict limitations of his art make themselves sharply felt in every word that he utters—but within these limitations he reigns supreme. The mistress of his choice is, without doubt, one of the most fascinating and delicate of spirits, compact of bright caprice and wayward charm, dwelling lovingly by the water's brink at the hour of mystery and tender beauty—but certain to be not often missing at that other hour—"l'heure de l'absinthe" on the city boulevard. Such as she is he will, for her sake, endure no other—neither can he conceive of any other vocation than that of becoming her high priest; to filling that office worthily he has devoted all his fiery energy and incomparable skill. There is an unmistakable ring of genuine passion and heartfelt love in the following sentence, which, in spite of our good resolutions, we cannot abstain from quoting, with one trifling alteration of the text:—

> When the evening mist clothes the riverside with poetry as with a veil, and the poor buildings lose themselves in the dim sky, and the tall chimneys become campanili, and the warehouses are palaces in the night, and the whole city hangs in the heavens; and fairyland is before us—then the wayfarer hastens home; the working-man and the cultured one, the wise man and the one of pleasure, cease to understand, as they have ceased to see, and Nature, who, for once, has sung in tune, sings her exquisite song to [Mr. Whistler] alone . . . .

who, we may add, possesses the supreme faculty of preserving it to us as no other artist can. It must, however, be added that he is far from being alone among great painters in his incapacity to tolerate whatever fails to supply him with the materials for which he instinctively seeks, for narrowness of judgment has almost always proved the enforced result of that concentration of endeavour without which no single achievement can be perfectly compassed. His witty, unsympathetic, though in some instances approximately just, attacks upon schools of art, which are essentially alien to his intelligence, have therefore no surprise for us, and may indeed be welcomed for the germs of truth which they contain. This great doctrine, which requires to be worthily enforced in England more than in any other country on earth, he has preached to good purpose, that the conditions under which great works of art may be produced are always with us, and that the riches of art are inexhaustible.

HOW TO LOSE AN ELECTION.

WE deal elsewhere with the unfortunate shilly-shallyings of the Liberal-Unionists in the matter of the Southampton election; and there is the less need to say more about this that nobody is likely to lose more by those shilly-shallyings than the Liberal-Unionists themselves. They are not precisely the strongest party in the present welter of English politics; and, if it is established that they cannot be depended upon, why then, in the eloquent language of Captain Marryat's schoolmaster, it will "end in a blow up"—for them. But, though nothing can be more foolish than to attempt, like the Times and some other Unionist journals, to minimize the importance of a defeat in a large town almost at the centre of the Unionist stronghold, the South of England, there is a good deal more to be said on the matter from a purely local point of view. We have been endeavouring for months, and almost for years, to force on the consideration of the leaders of the Unionist party that in local management lies the secret both of success and of failure. It may, perhaps, be necessary (as an amiable dignitary of the Church has found fault with us for using in a purely Pickwickian—that is, literary—sense a phrase about "perishing everlastingly") to protest beforehand that we mean nothing improper by the following quotation. But a person who has given some attention to political matters for many years in England says, in our hearing, "My dear Sir, local voters at a bye-election do not care a —— for the Union, or for Gladstone, or for anything else of the kind." And while reproving the choice of his expressions, we are inclined to think that, except in certain waves of popular sentiment such as, in different senses, occur about once in six years, and certainly occurred in 1874, 1880, and 1886, he is right. What the party managers in Southampton may have to say to the following remarks we do not pretend to know; but we are pretty sure that, small details excepted, they cannot find fault with our accuracy in matters of fact.

In the first place, Southampton has never been a Tory stronghold. It was till recent years regarded as distinctly Liberal; as late as 1880 two Gladstonians were returned; and the Tory majority at the last election was not four per cent. of the whole voting constituency. In fact, it was like Coventry, distinctly "unsafe." For this there were many reasons. As often happens in country towns, of what may be called medium size, and of considerable (for their size) commercial activity, with no dominant influence of resident gentry or old-established private mercantile firms, two great corporate interests influence most of the working-class votes. These are the Docks and the South-Western Railway. In the present election the successful candidate represented the Docks and the unsuccessful the Railway. Any Southampton man, even if he had not been on the spot, could pretty nearly have foretold the result. Although it has sometimes, in the good old days, carried elections by sheer force, the South-Western has never been popular in its first terminus, and of late it has been more unpopular than ever. Many of our readers may have read in the Times that the election "turned on Didcot," and may have wondered what on earth this meant. What it meant is simple enough. A few years ago Southampton was stirred to its peaceful entrails by the tidings that the long monopoly of its railway tyrant (which takes about half as long again to reach it as the Great Western and the Great Northern do to reach Swindon and Peterborough, places at the same distance, or nearly so, from London) was going to be broken up. A Company, backed by the Great Western itself, was about to run a line through Newbury, already connected with Didcot and the North, to Winchester, and by an independent line to Southampton, thus giving a straight course to Liverpool, to the North, to Bristol by fast trains, and so forth. The foolish lovers of the picturesque drew long faces over the proposed obliteration of the most picturesque feature of what used to be not long ago, and still is to some extent, one of the most old-fashioned and remarkable sea-fronts of any town in England. The knowing ones winked their wicked eyes and shook their hoary heads and prophesied that it would never come off. The inhabitants of Southampton invested their money. The fears of the first and the hopes of the third class proved equally vain; and only the second chuckled. The line struggled to Winchester, and then, either for want of traffic, or because the great Companies adjusted their differences, or for any other reason, did not struggle any further. But it may well be believed that, as a correspondent of the Times vouches in one case, more than one voter, more than a hundred probably, thought of his vanished "Tenner," and determined to vote, for whomsoever he voted, not for a director of the South-Western Railway. Which the party managers might have anticipated.

Again. The present rector of the mother parish, or at least the principal church of Southampton, is Canon Basil Wilberforce. Canon Wilberforce, like his elder brother Reginald, but not like the Bishop of Newcastle, has carefully avoided the display of any tittle of the great intellectual power which his father, Bishop Samuel, showed. But he has inherited some share of what the Bishop would not have utterly detested us for calling his "gift of the gab," and he has (which is much to his credit) worked most diligently among the poor of his parish, which, with its districts, includes most of the poor of the town. Moreover, like other persons who have velleities of prominence with no intellectual power to obtain it, he has identified himself with all the crack-brained fads of the time. Especially he has made himself a "Temperance man," and for long years he has done his utmost to stir up the strange dregs of fanaticism on such points which exist in Englishmen. He has met with such success that, unless local gossip lies more than local gossip is wont to lie, employers of labour have actually given sober and steady workmen the choice of taking the pledge or starving. It is easy to say that a local firebrand of this kind does not count. It does count; and as a proof we may quote what with singular naïveté the Daily News correspondent, rejoicing in this victory, says:—

A prominent Conservative strung across the High Street from his house to his neighbour's a large streamer bearing in red letters the words "Welcome Guest." As the sanction of the Mayor had not been given to this it was a contravention of the by-laws, and Canon Wilberforce made an official request for an order for its removal as a possible inducement to disturbance, saying he was confident that, if it was not taken down by the owner, two hundred men would come from the Docks and do it for him. Its removal, at first refused, was insisted on, and the request was ultimately complied with.

That is to say, to put the dots on the i's, an English gentleman by birth and an English clergyman by position threatens (for this is what it comes to) that a body of roughs shall come to tear down a perfectly harmless political emblem, if it is not by a quibble removed legally. Canon Wilberforce has evidently learnt something from his uncle's fellow-priests in Ireland, and his own friends the Nonconformist screw-workers in Wales.

Now this is disgraceful enough, of course, but the disgracefulness of it is not what we are aiming at. The point is that, without better preparation than was made, it was madness to spring an election on a constituency in such a state. The Separatists appear to have managed very well. Taught by their disastrous failure at the next Hampshire borough, Winchester, where a few months ago they imported Irish spouters by the dozen only to be soundly beaten, they carefully avoided running the election on anything like a Home Rule line. They worked the dislike to the South-Western, the Didcot grudge, and the Temperance folly almost exclusively, relying otherwise on a sisterhood composed of the usual Amy Manders and Mrs. Batesons, of "Mrs. Wilfrid Blunt" (as the Pall Mall Gazette writes), and of the wife of the now elected member, of whom we at least shall say nothing uncomplimentary. Southampton, being an amiable town, is very subject to these feminine graces. Nor would it appear that anything was gained, while something was certainly lost, by the suddenness of the election. The stupider sort of electioneerers always believe in this kind of cunning, but it never answers. "Mrs. Wilfrid Blunt's" husband probably gained several hundred votes at Deptford, though he did not gain the seat, by his absence; and Mr. Evans, even if he had not been able to telegraph that he was bringing several more steamboat fleets to Southampton without the inconvenience of being subject to heckling on that subject, probably lost nothing by his. Indeed, he must have gained; for, as a man of business, he cannot be a serious Home Ruler, and it might have been awkward if he had been forced to confess the fact.

We have gone into these details merely for the purpose of founding a general conclusion upon them, or rather a fresh application of the general conclusion which we have so often enforced. And that conclusion is twofold. First, it is—except at general elections in a time of excitement, and sometimes even then—hopeless to contest a seat under the present extended suffrage on a merely imperial and general platform. Secondly, the local party managers need continual consultation on the one hand and continual control on the other from head-quarters. What is meant by this last caution can be easily explained. It is not sufficient for the heads of the party to consult this or that local wirepuller, and say "Who is your man?" They ought to go further and inform themselves, independently of the local wirepullers, if possible, what are the questions which excite most interest locally, and what is the attitude or connexion of the candidate on or with these questions. They ought to make sure that the constituency has been well prepared, and that there is no fringe of waverers which can be influenced by a pulpit spouter or a street Duchess of Devonshire. They should never precipitate an election unless they are satisfied on these points, and never hesitate even to precipitate one when they are satisfied. It may be said that all this is superfluous and degrading trouble. We have only to answer that the present state of the electorate may receive as many hard adjectives as anybody pleases. We could add harder if we chose. But we have to deal with it as it is, and not as it is not, and any supposition that it is as it was sixty, thirty, even three years ago, can only result in utter disaster. We have made what those who talk of "Mrs. Wilfrid Blunt" would probably call "a Frankenstein," and we must treat him Frankensteinishly.

THE STORY OF THE LONDON POLICE.

III.

THE merest casual observer cannot fail to have noticed the striking change which has come over the Metropolitan Police within the last ten or twelve years. Organized as a purely civil force, our constabulary has of late been metamorphosed into a semi-military body, with certain points of resemblance to the police of Germany and Russia. In times of great excitement it is not unusual to see the Berlin mounted police lay about them with their cutlasses. This was particularly noticeable during the memorable Einzug—the triumphal entry of troops in the spring of 1871, after the conclusion of the peace with France. The scene of this outrage was Unter den Linden; the heinous offence of the people, that of pressing forward to catch a glimpse of the Emperor William and of the present Kaiser, just returned from France laden with honours. Our mounted patrols, referred to in the superior officers' reports to which we have already alluded, are not unlike the horse police or gendarmerie of Berlin and St. Petersburg. We might prefer the model set by [illegible] the Spanish "Civil Guards," admittedly the most [illegible] body of mounted gendarmerie in the world. Some of our mounted police, it is true, leave little to desire as regards their bearing in the saddle, and they have had of late ample opportunities of showing what they are made of.

The London police are subjected—and, we are bound to add, sometimes rightly so—to the most hostile criticism. But when we come to consider from what source the force is necessarily recruited, we are bound to confess that it is little short of marvellous that, invested as they are with authority of a most important character, they should exercise their powers in so singularly a judicial and temperate manner. Of course they have their faults—of course they have their weaknesses. Who has not? One of the most dangerous of these faults is the inherent tendency implanted in the constable's mind to "swear up to the mark." As to this the famous John Townshend, giving evidence before a House of Commons Committee in 1817, said:—"I have, with every attention that man can bestow, watched the conduct of various persons who have given evidence against their fellow-creatures for life and death, not only at the Old Bailey but on the Circuits. I consider officers as dangerous creatures, who have it frequently in their power (no question about it) to turn the scale, when the beam is level, to the other side. He swears against the wretched man at the bar; and why? Because that thing (nature says profit) is in the scale; and, melancholy to relate, but I cannot help being perfectly satisfied, he has been the means of convicting many and many a man. I have always been of opinion that an officer is a dangerous subject of the community." Things have happily changed for the better since the celebrated Bow Street runner gave this evidence; but the tendency we have referred to still remains, and always will remain, under the present condition of affairs.

It is a common ground of complaint against the police that there have been, of late years, far too many undiscovered murders —some of them apparently of the simplest character. It is only fair, however, to remember the saying of Edgar Allan Poe, that the difficulties of tracking out a crime are increased in exact proportion to the apparent simplicity of the circumstances. Every detail adds to the chance of finding the true clue. In many cases the details are so scanty that the chances of success must necessarily be extremely small; and it is most unfair to blame the police if luck does not help them to sift mysteries which, without its aid, are absolutely insoluble.

RACING.

WELL-WISHERS to the turf ought to feel satisfaction at observing that the new race-meetings with their enormous stakes have not, except in one or two instances, ruined the old ones. Some little time ago Chester races seemed doomed, and the meeting went down hill until it had become a mere parody of what it had been in former days. This month, however, it revived in a wonderful manner. The attendance was excellent; the racing was good of its kind; and although the field for the Cup consisted of only a dozen, it was the largest that had started for that race for as many years. The fact that 9,000 telegraphic messages were sent from Chester on the Cup day showed that a keen interest must have been taken in the race, for only about 200 more telegrams were despatched from Epsom on the last Derby day. It was satisfactory to see the Chester Cup won by a horse that had trained on till he was seven years old, and was giving weight to all his opponents, two or three of which were of a very fair class. Hitherto Kinsky had been generally looked upon as only a "miler," but he can evidently stay, at any rate over a twisting course. It was the prettiest race for the Chester Cup that has been seen for some years.

The important meeting at Kempton Park on the Friday and the Saturday made the week's racing a very heavy one. Mr. Vyner's Derby candidate, Crowberry, came out for and won the Grand Prize. Much as he was liked, he was not made first favourite, as he had to give 16 lbs. to Mr. Houldsworth's Neapolis, a colt by Springfield out of Napoli, that had never run in public before, but had the reputation of having been highly tried with Briar-root, the winner of the One Thousand. Neapolis is a well-made colt, with good shoulders and strong loins and quarters. He got a capital start, kept in a forward position throughout the early part of the race, and took the lead at the bend. Crowberry, on the contrary, made a waiting race, gradually improved his position from the bend, made his effort inside the distance, and won by a length from the favourite. The immediate effect of the race, so far as the Derby was concerned, was to send Crowberry from 14 to 1 to less than half that price. We dealt with the Jubilee Stakes last week. As a rule, the race which precedes a great handicap or other important race is a very minor affair. This was not the case before the Jubilee Stakes, as its immediate forerunner was the Great Breeders' Produce Stakes, which was worth 1,654*l*. This race was won easily, by three lengths, by the favourite, "Mr. E. Wardour's" Present Alms, a colt that had begun his career by losing two races, and had then won a race on each of two successive days at Newmarket.

Present Alms's victory took place on the Saturday at Kempton. On the following Tuesday the Newmarket Second Spring Meeting began, and we again had Present Alms a hot favourite, or rather a much hotter favourite. It was for the Dyke Plate, and, although he was giving from 13 lbs. to 16 lbs. to everything in the race, 5 to 2 was laid on him. He jumped off in front the moment the flag fell and made the running as far as the rails. On entering them a chestnut filly called Gulbeyaz, that had started at 10 to 1, came up to him, soon got the best of it, and won very easily by a length. The winner, who belongs to Lord Durham, is a beautiful filly by Bend Or, being full of quality combined with ample substance. In the opinion of some critics she is the best looking two-year-old that has been out this season; others consider her a trifle too long in the back; at any rate, she was a cheap yearling at 430 guineas. It would have been well if this had been the only severe reverse which befel the backers. Unfortunately, Lord Londonderry's filly Wenonah, who had won the Mostyn Two-Year-Old Plate at Chester in a canter by four lengths after starting only third favourite at 7 to 1, now came out for a hundred-pound sweepstakes, and odds of nearly 3 to 1 were laid on her; but, to the consternation of the plungers, the filly finished last instead of first, and the race was won by Mr. Lefevre's Hautbois, by Flageolet out of the One Thousand winner, Hauteur. The race of the day was the Payne Stakes, and it was much regretted that the Derby colt Galore was not to be opposed by a better field. Indeed, the form represented by his five adversaries was of a miserable description, and he had only 3 lbs. extra to carry; so to start with 3 to 1 laid on him, and to win in a common canter by three lengths, was no feather in his cap under the circumstances. Nevertheless, he rose several points in the Derby betting after this performance. Probably his increased favouritism for the great race was owing rather to the satisfaction which he gave in the paddock, and his style of going, than to his victory over such a field. Lord Randolph Churchill won another race with his black two-year-old filly, L'Abbesse de Jouarre, by Trappist. She won the odds that were laid on her easily, at last, after she had been unexpectedly pressed for a time by Mr. D. Baird's Clodpole, a great, overgrown, but very promising colt by Springfield, that his owner purchased at the Royal Paddocks last year for 520 guineas. If he keeps well, he is likely to improve very greatly on the form he showed in this race.

On the Wednesday Mr. Benzon's racing stud was offered for sale, and good prices were given for some of the lots. A couple of promising two-year-olds—Barkham, by Foxhall, and Hazlemere, by Galopin—were bought in at 3,100 guineas each. Genuine bids of 3,000 were made for both of them. Last year they had cost 1,500 and 1,100 guineas. Carrasco, a four-year-old with questionable forelegs, for whom Mr. Benzon is said to have given several thousands, pleased the buyers so little that he was bought in for 390 guineas. Guadiana, who had cost 1,750 guineas, only made 175; but, as she has become a bad roarer, it was wonderful that she should fetch so much. The two-year-olds sold well, as one dozen of the dozen and a half which Mr. Benzon had purchased last year from Mr. Peck at 8,000 guineas now made 7,910 guineas. To show the risks of horse-buying, we may observe that Captain Machell purchased one of Mr. Benzon's two-year-olds for 1,000 guineas, and sold it afterwards at a profit to Mr. Leopold de Rothschild. The very next morning the colt split his pastern at exercise, putting a stop to all hopes of his winning races for some time to come. The same morning, another two-year-old, Lord Londonderry's Verdigris, the winner of the Hyde Park Plate of 500*l*. at Epsom, did the same thing. The racing on the Wednesday was of moderate interest; but there were some fine finishes, especially for the Breeders' Plate for two-year-olds, the first favourite, General Pearson's beautiful and powerful chestnut filly Carmine, winning by a head from Mr. Abington's British Prince, a colt of some promise, but scarcely of the highest class. Carmine, however, ran in such excellent style, and with so much gameness, that she was afterwards sold to Mr. Valentine—it was said for 2,000 guineas.

Backers began badly on the Thursday by making Baron de Rothschild's Prudence first favourite for the Flying Handicap, as the battle lay entirely between Sweet Alice, Braw Lass, and Franciscan, who ran an excellent race, Sweet Alice winning by a neck from Braw Lass, who was only a head in front of Franciscan. The winner's victory was the more provoking to backers because they had plunged upon her for the first race of the meeting, when she had been beaten in a canter by half a dozen lengths, by Prelude. Not for the first time did the public lose their money by backing Financier, when they made him first favourite for the All-Aged Selling Plate. He was absolutely last, and the race was won by Lord Penrhyn's Primrose Dame. The unfortunate Financier had won four races as a two-year-old, and, at one time, it was supposed that he was very smart; but he soon took to losing races, and as a three-year-old he never won any; on the contrary he lost six in the course of the season. This year he has already lost three, and so disgusted was his owner with his last performance that he sold him after the race for 25*l*. Mr. Combe's Maxim, who had run well for the Jubilee Stakes, was brought out against Lord Fitzwilliam's Spring Jack for a Plate of 200*l*. The pair had run together last autumn for a Plate of the same value, when Maxim had beaten Spring Jack by a neck, the race being won by Whitefriar. In both cases they were meeting at weight for age. Six to four was laid on Maxim, who won this time in a canter by fifteen lengths, his opponent having been pulled up. Nine horses came out for the Newmarket Handicap. It was generally thought that the 5 lbs. extra which Theodore had earned by the Great Cheshire Handicap would be too much for him, and Shillelagh was made a better favourite. Seven horses were backed at prices varying from 3 to 1 up to 8 to 1, and even the two other starters were backed at 10 and 12 to 1. Very rarely are all the candidates in a handicap of as many as nine horses so much fancied, and it proved the excellence of Major Egerton's work, so far as theory was concerned. In practice it was not so evenly balanced a handicap as had been expected, as Theodore won easily by four lengths from The Baron, who finished a long way in front of Jersey Lily. A great blunder was made by backers over a Selling Plate for two-year-olds. They laid odds on Dovecot, who ran only fourth, the race being fought out between three horses, against each of whom 12 to 1 was laid. Sir T. Lennard's filly Ringlet, the first of the stock of Lord Falmouth's Ringleader to run in public, won by a head from Agnes Hewitt, who was only half a length in front of Symphony. The last race of the meeting, the Exning Plate of 500*l.*, brought out a very fair field of ten, and it was won by the first favourite, Lord Durham's Gulbeyaz, the winner of the Dyke Plate on the Tuesday.

On the Friday, at Windsor, the May Plate of 700*l.* only attracted five two-year-olds, not one of whom had won a race. Odds were laid on Mr. Abington's Isleworth, who had cost 1,200 guineas as a yearling, on the strength of a reported private trial, while 10 to 1 was laid against Mr. Quartermain East's Kaikoura, who won by ten lengths. On the following day Captain Machell won the St. George's Plate of 500*l.* with the two-year-old, Fair Marion, whom he had purchased three days earlier at Mr. Benzon's sale for 1,550 guineas. She won by a head from Aristos, who had a 7 lbs. allowance, and by half a length from the Duke of Portland's Deschamps, the winner of a race at the Newmarket Second Spring Meeting.

Manchester races began on Wednesday. The opening of a Club Stand and lawn is a decided improvement to that meeting. Lord Penrhyn's Noble Chieftain, for whom he had lately given 3,100 guineas, was easily beaten, for a stake of 100 guineas, by the plating gelding, Lobster. On the other hand, Mr. J. O'Neill's The Rejected, who was commonly considered a dear purchase at 1,450 guineas last December, almost repaid his purchase money in stakes alone, when he added the Salford Borough Handicap of 984*l.* to the 400*l.* that he had won at the Newmarket First Spring Meeting. There was a very fine and close finish between The Rejected, True Blue II., and King Monmouth. This trio jumped off with the lead when the flag fell, and held it to the end. The disappointing Florentine had been the first favourite, but only ran sixth. Between this performance and his defeat for the Jubilee Stakes at Kempton, after starting second favourite, he must have cost his backers a fortune already this season; nor will they have forgotten that he failed them three times, when first favourite, last year. We began this article by noticing the venerable Chester Meeting. Another time-honoured meeting came off this week at Bath. The racing may not have been of its former importance, but the attendance and the weather have been all that could be wished.

DRAMATIC RECORD.

IF melodrama must be played, it is a great thing to find pieces of the variety which, if not entirely, at least to a considerable extent, differ from the set type. The Ben-my-Chree—an adaptation of Mr. Hall Caine's novel, The Deemster—does not make a particularly good play, its deficiencies being an absence of light to mitigate the persistent shade, a poverty of humour, and that want of real dramatic vigour which must always be felt when plots are founded upon the peculiar customs of isolated people, and not upon the broad and eternal emotions which are common and comprehensible to all civilized humanity. When playwrights deem it essential to add an abstruse "Author's Note" to their playbill, explaining and defending the action of their characters, they make a confession of weakness. The Canon Law of Purgation, the Oath of Compurgation, the powers respectively of the Civil Court of the Barony and of the Ecclesiastical Court in which Manx bishops acted as judges and juries, are all important subjects to the student of jurisprudence; but they require to be very carefully handled when the plot of a drama turns upon them. There is, for instance, a humourous side to the proceedings of some of the chief personages in this new play. The Deemster, a prominent Justice of the Peace, and the Governor, who somewhat resembles a Chairman of Quarter Sessions—the Local Government Bill has not yet destroyed old associations—do not seem to know their powers. They represent, not exactly the cause of vice—but, at any rate, the side with which the audience does not sympathize. The Bishop, on the other hand, aids the cause of hero and heroine, and it is quaint, if not absolutely comic, to see how, when the disagreeable people seem to be having things all their own way, the Bishop arises, and, after making a few pungent remarks about the powers of the Church Courts (concerning which the Deemster's knowledge appears to be, under the circumstances, reprehensibly small), proceeds to circumvent the tyrants. The Bishop, so to speak, always seems to have a trump card up his sleeve. Far be it from us to hint that his lordship does not correctly interpret his rights. The accuracy of the law is vouched for by Sir James Gell, Attorney-General in the Isle of Man, and he is an authority. Our contention is that plays which turn on such complications as these have in them an element of feebleness.

The characters of Ben-my-Chree have also too strong a tendency to assume the familiar shape of melodramatic personages. We do not find precisely that well-nigh invariable figure, the hero who has been accused of a crime he never committed; but Dan Mylrea, the good Bishop's son and the nephew of the harsh and vindictive Deemster, is a very near approach to this type. He is, in fact, made responsible for what is not his crime; for, though it is true that he kills Ewan Mylrea, the Deemster's son, his sweetheart Mona's brother, and his own cousin, Ewan falls not only in fair fight, but in a combat which he has provoked and insisted upon. Ewan has seen his sister's bedroom window open and a man escape from it; he has recognized Dan, and he draws inferences which are incorrect, though perfectly natural; so, avoiding action and consequent scandal for the moment, Ewan waits till Dan returns next day from a fishing expedition, and, obliging him to fight a duel with knives, is killed. Thereupon Dan meets the fate of melodramatic heroes in general. His cousin Mona has likewise a familiar part to play, for every melodramatic Jack has his Jill, married or maiden; while the Governor of the island, Mr. Harcourt, assumes the inevitable features of the villain of the play, persecuting the lovers for the old reason that he adores the heroine. Heroes of melodrama always have a faithful low-comedy friend; here he is in Davy Fayle. The audience is induced to cheer for the sympathetic characters and believe in them because of the enthusiasm they create on the stage, and Dan has his attendant crowd of devoted fishermen; in short, in all essentials the old lines are followed, though the fact is disguised so well under an essay on the Law of Purgation, and so forth, that we have admitted the existence of variation from the conventional lines.

Mr. Hall Caine's novel is to a great extent a study of character, but the play is one of incident and emotion. It is briefly indicated that Dan Mylrea has been wild and wilful; except, however, that he relates an ugly story about his passionate slaughter of a couple of oxen that were beaten in a ploughing match, he really does nothing that a hero of melodrama may not do. A leading incident of the piece, the fight upon the cliffs between Ewan and Dan, is very effectively managed, and here Mr. Wilson Barrett exhibits with considerable skill Dan's gradual abandonment of restraint under the taunts and insults of his adversary. We do not remember having seen Mr. Barrett do anything better than this. The scene of the inquest is made somewhat impressive by its novelty. It is held on a spot among the mountains, presided over by the Governor and the Deemster, who take their seats on a rock above the crowd; for all which there is doubtless authority. The Bishop, whose characteristic points we have described, sits by making no sign while witnesses give, or refuse to give, evidence against his son. In spite of her father's threats, Mona will not speak; but suddenly Dan himself appears and confesses his crime. The Deemster is about to take action—whether to pass immediate sentence of death or not Sir James Gell perhaps only knows—when the Bishop arises, and in a manner which might very easily have become ludicrous in the hands of a less practised and expert actor than Mr. John Maclean, motions Deemster and Governor to descend from their pedestal, which they do with no particular dignity; whereupon he mounts the mound, and, claiming supreme power as the only Baron of the Isle, proceeds to pass sentence on his guilty son. He is doomed to be an outcast placed beyond the pale of all human sympathy. The sentence has been described as one of ruthless boycotting, and the incident is made really striking by the earnestness of Mr. Maclean as he solemnly addresses the throng of islanders grouped below him. This, it will be perceived, leads the way to another effective scene, when Dan is found in a lonely fastness of the mountain. Here he has lived, cut off from all human intercourse, till the faithful Davy, regardless of the doom he incurs, tracks his master out. But what follows is feeble in the extreme. We are invited to suppose that the Governor, whose passion for Mona has been described, gives the unhappy girl the disagreeable choice between marrying him and being accused of unchastity; and it is further assumed—indeed asserted—that her father acquiesces in the abominable business; and this is trying our credulity rather too severely. The Bishop, however, is equal to the occasion. He will permit Mona to take the Oath of Compurgation; if she swears she is innocent, and her accuser cannot prove her guilt, heavy penalties fall upon him; and this she does swear; moreover, Dan appears to confirm her asseveration, though by so doing he invites a death sentence which by these odd laws no one can repeal. Does Sir James Gell, we wonder, support this view? If the Bishop has power to bind, has he not power to unbind? If not, can he not lay the case before his monarch with the very strongest recommendation of pardon? We feel, in fact, that Dan's condemnation to death for doing this virtuous action is simply a trick to impose upon us, and therefore we are not in the least afflicted. However, Mona dies of the disease which is always fatal to heroines when their death is considered desirable by the dramatist, Dan is cast for execution, and the wicked Governor is led off to prison by the Bishop's commands.

Points of the acting have been already indicated. Mr. Wilson Barrett is better than usual, less given to pose and preach, more natural, and therefore more effective. Mr. Maclean is very good, and Mr. George Barrett no doubt would be if he had the chance, but his part is a poor one. Miss Eastlake probably carries out the author's intentions. There is no fault whatever to be found with her; only of late years we have seen her in the direst and most unmitigated distress so very frequently that the [illegible] has ceased greatly to move us. Surely Mr. [illegible] the Deemster's cruelty? The scenery is [illegible] moderately well painted, [illegible] of it.

At the Lyceum there has been a [illegible] which does not well exhibit the resources of Mr. Henry Irving's theatre. Admitting, as we cordially do, that interest attaches to whatever Mr. Irving undertakes, we are constrained to add that, except perhaps as Werner—a part which can scarce be made tolerable by the art of man—he has seldom been seen to so little advantage as now in Robert Macaire. We will spare readers variations of the familiar essay on Frédérick, which is almost inseparably associated with the Auberge des Adrêts, and come at once to the English Macaire. It seems to us that he strikes a wrong key when he makes his first appearance. He and his wretched little satellite, Jacques Strop, are too preposterously shabby and ragged. Macaire's crownless, battered old hat, the absurdly patched trousers or tights, the torn coat, exceed the limits of farce. Strop is, if possible, worse. He looks as if he had borrowed his attire from a scarecrow. Surely such beggars as the pair seem to be would not be admitted to a decent tavern. Macaire might be ludicrously shabby without going beyond the bounds of reason. His manner is almost as extravagant as his clothes. There is no doubt much genuine humour in the rascal's assumption of superiority and consequence; but this would be none the less diverting if his air and aspect were not so utterly incongruous. The constant reference to Strop as "my noble and illustrious friend" is really irritating in its stupidity, and Strop's tricks, such as getting under the table during the breakfast with the gens-d'armes, are too poor for any theatrical entertainment except a harlequinade. We are among the most ardent of Mr. Irving's admirers, but cannot disguise from ourselves the fact that this farce is beneath his dignity, or help feeling a little ashamed of ourselves for laughing at it when, as sometimes happens, his keen sense of humour irresistibly occasions mirth. There is one very striking and beautiful point in Mr. Irving's performance, the moment when he speaks to his son whom he admires, and who does not know him; but this, like the death scene, is too far from the key in which the part as a whole is set. Mr. Weedon Grossmith as Strop has only to look timid, to start in affright at the sound of the creaking snuff-box with which the robuster villain cautions him to put as bold a face as possible on threatening occurrences, and to submit to the kicks and buffets which Macaire showers upon him. The other personages of the play are shadows. There is something almost humiliating in the task of an actor who has to do such work as is here allotted to Sergeant Loupy—to sit at breakfast and take no notice when, at a reference to prison, Strop tries to run away or to secrete himself beneath the tablecloth.

Mr. Calmour's Amber Heart is based upon rather a pretty idea; and, considering what a trifle it is, it may be said that the author has not constructed it badly. Miss Ellen Terry plays the part of Ellaline in a way which shows that her sympathetic feelings are deeply enlisted on behalf of the girl who throws away the talisman which guards her from the pangs of love, and so permits these pangs to make inroad into her heart; till at length, when she has tasted the bitterness of unrequited affection, the amulet is recovered from the lake into which she has flung it, and her insensibility returns. There is a grace and poetry about Miss Terry's interpretation which at times makes us almost forget how slight the piece is and dissipates a growing tediousness. A poetical play should be something more than pretty; and, besides, it should be poetical. To describe "eventide" as "dewy" shows a treading in the beaten track, and there are other phrases as far removed from what may now be permitted to pass as poetry. We do not want to condemn Mr. Calmour harshly. He has, at any rate, provided Miss Terry with a part which enables her to display some of her most charming attributes, and to do this is to do much. The expression on Miss Terry's face which gives occasion for the line "Her smile is far more piteous than tears" is an inspiration. The whole, however, is unsatisfying. Mr. Alexander very skilfully falls into the spirit of the trifle in his performance of the troubadour Silvio. His polite indifference to Ellaline's fervid protestations is very well conceived. Mr. Hermann Vezin of course gives to Coranto's utterances all the significance of which they are capable. That is not a convincing speech, by the way, in which Coranto reminds Silvio that to him who stands upon a high cliff the men at its foot seem pigmies; and it is perhaps because he feels its emptiness that Mr. Vezin in his delivery reminds us somewhat too strongly that he has gained reputation as an elocutionist.

The Don at "Toole's Theatre" continues its run with remarkable success. Mr. Cautley, replacing Mr. Gardiner, plays the hero lightly and excellently. His singing of the much-loved "Viva la Compagnie" is capital. The other parts in the cast "remain as they were," but have gained force and insight. It will be curious and amusing to see what the two Universities think of "The Don" in loco.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE AND THE NEW TAXES.

THE publication last week of a memorandum by the Board of Inland Revenue explanatory of the new stamp duties applicable to the Stock Exchange caused a flurry of excitement for the moment, which, however, has almost entirely disappeared. It will be in the recollection of our readers that the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget speech announced the imposition of a duty of 1*l.* per 1,000*l.* upon the issue of new capital, whether by new or by old Companies; the imposition, likewise, of a sixpenny stamp duty on contract-notes, and the imposition of a shilling per cent. upon foreign shares, stocks, and bonds. Very little interest was excited by the imposition of the new tax upon the issue of capital, and the interest in the new taxes upon foreign shares and bonds is limited almost to the arbitrage dealers—that is, the dealers who buy abroad for sale in London, or vice versâ. The chief interest last week was excited by the imposition of a sixpenny stamp duty on contract-notes. Heretofore a penny duty covered every contract-note, no matter how many securities might have been dealt in, or how large the sums expended. Henceforward a sixpenny stamp will have to be affixed to every contract-note, and every security bought or sold is to be regarded as a separate contract-note. Consequently, if ten different securities are dealt in, they may all be recorded in the same contract-note, but the note must bear ten different stamps, or their equivalent, of sixpence each. Further, a sixpenny duty upon every transaction is required when transactions are "continued." As our readers know, purchases and sales upon the Stock Exchange are usually effected for the following settlement. If, however, the buyer is not then prepared to pay for what he has bought, or the vendor is not prepared to deliver what he has sold, the transaction is continued till the following settlement; and these various continuations may go on, settlement after settlement, for any length of time, a sum being paid by the buyer or seller, as the case may be, for continuing. The transaction is usually recorded as a sale and purchase. For example; A. B. buys one hundred shares for the next settlement, and wishes to "carry over" then till the following settlement. His broker on settling-day remits to him a contract-note, in which one hundred shares are entered first as sold for the immediate settlement, and then as bought for the following settlement. This being so, the sixpenny duty would be payable twice on each settlement; so that, if a speculator buys for next settlement, he has not only to pay the sixpenny duty on every transaction now entered into, but he has to pay a shilling duty for the same transactions when the settling-day comes, and at every subsequent settlement until the transaction is finally closed he will have to pay another shilling. The members of the Stock Exchange were at first apprehensive that this increase of taxation would have the effect of checking business; but the fear is now generally regarded as ill-founded. Speculators, it is argued, will not be deterred by so small a duty from operating, when, in fact, they risk every day in their transactions hundreds, or it may be thousands, of pounds. The real objection to the tax is that it is uniform; it falls quite as heavily upon the very small investor or the small speculator as upon the very largest operators in the market. It would probably be replied by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, so far as the small speculator is concerned, that it is desirable to put obstacles in his way; he is not a person who can well afford to gamble, and if he is deterred by taxation from engaging in risky business so much the better for himself. There may be some force in this, although we might retort that it is not the business of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to shape his taxation for the purpose of making people virtuous and prudent; but in any case the reply does not cover the case of the small investor. The small investor who may have only a hundred pounds or so to invest has to pay as heavy a duty as the man who invests a hundred thousand; and the same remark applies to the duty upon foreign shares and bonds. We can hardly regard as serious the argument of the arbitrage dealers that so light a duty will materially injure business; but it is undoubtedly an objection that a share which is selling for only, let us say, ten pounds, is taxed as heavily as a share selling for one hundred pounds, provided the two are of the same nominal amount. It is clear that in this case the taxation of the first share is ten times as heavy as the taxation on the second.

Perhaps one of the reasons why interest in the new taxation has so greatly subsided is that business upon the Stock Exchange is less active than it has been for nearly three years. A couple of months ago the conversion of the Three per Cents led to a great deal of business. Many holders of the Three per Cents were unwilling to accept a lower rate of interest. They sold their Three per Cents, therefore, and bought securities that would give them a little higher, or at least an equal, return. This led to a very rapid rise in sound investment securities, and to a very considerable shifting of investments, and the general expectation was that the shifting of investments would go on for a considerable time. Those who sold Colonial bonds and railway debenture and preference stocks, it was argued, would buy something else. They were tempted to sell only by the high prices to which their old holdings had risen, and they would now invest in some other security not regarded as quite so safe, but which would give them a slightly higher return; the persons who sold these securities would in their turn have to look out for some other investments that would give a higher, or at least an equal, return; and so the shifting of investments would go on until it gradually reached the more or less speculative classes of investments, and then, ultimately, the simply speculative would be affected. The argument appeared sound, but, nevertheless, the expectation has not been realized. Investment business has become smaller and smaller, and the rise in securities that was so marked just before Easter has come to an end. Partly this is due to the fact that prices are already so high that many intending investors are keeping their money idle, in the hope that they may be able to buy on more advantageous terms; and they are strengthened in the hope because of the political state of the Continent. If war breaks out prices of all kinds will certainly fall, and even if war does not break out scares may occur which may lead to a lower range of prices. Another reason

THE SALON.

I.

THERE appears to be a very general agreement among the Parisians that the Salon is this year below its usual level in interest and technical excellence. That this is true in some respects is undeniable, seeing that, in addition to such inveterate absentees from the exhibition as M. Meissonier and M. Gustave Moreau, we miss this time such leading men as MM. Puvis de Chavannes and Elie-Delaunay, to say nothing of M. Besnard, M. Béraud, and M. Rochegrosse. Among the distinguished foreign painters for whose work we are accustomed to look we seek in vain for the charming Northern impressions of the Scandinavian M. Kroyer, or the naturalistic Bible-scenes of the Prussian Herr Fritz von Uhde. Altogether, the important Franco-Scandinavian section of Parisian art is seen to less advantage than usual; while the Americans who seek, as regards matters artistic, to transform themselves into Frenchmen are at least as strong as on former occasions. England, too, is unusually well represented by Mr. Orchardson, Mr. Jacomb Hood, Mr. Alfred Parsons, Mr. Onslow Ford, and others. Notwithstanding all the lacunæ just indicated, the Salon cannot fairly be said to fall below its immediate predecessors in absolute technical excellence; indeed, the general level of merit in this respect may be said to be more than equal to that recently shown; though some few works which would not find a place even in our own galleries have, under existing regulations, crept into the exhibition.

French art to a higher degree than any other takes colour from passing events and from general movements—literary, political, and artistic. Victor Hugo, M. Pasteur, and even General Boulanger have had their day as popular subjects for portraiture, and they are not superseded by President Carnot. One peculiar feminine type seems this year to have especially caught the limners' fancy, and that one remarkable rather for swarthy and expressive ugliness than for the more usual attractions. Subjects partaking of the visionary, the mystical, the enigmatic are in high favour, and have partly superseded, though without banishing, hospital scenes and the usual representations of physical horror and of the female form divine. The great mural decorations —most of which this year, as last, are destined for the new Sorbonne—again form one of the most striking portions of the show, and in these the spirit and the technical system of M. Puvis de Chavannes almost everywhere show themselves. M. François Flameng contributes "Suite de la décoration de l'Escalier de la Sorbonne," a huge triptych in which are represented in a fashion half realistic, half historical, and wholly decorative, typical events in the history of the Sorbonne during the Renaissance. Surely in dealing with important incidents such as these, in a work executed for the State, it is not absolutely necessary to show that they serve as a mere transparent pretext for arrangements of line and colour! The views of old Paris, which form the background of the whole, are by far the most successful part of the decorative scheme. Yet another and a still huger portion of the same ensemble is M. Benjamin Constant's "L'Académie de Paris; les Lettres; les Sciences." He, at any rate, is not a Chavanniste, and as an oil-painter he is remarkable for the deep and well-controlled splendour of his colour; yet somehow, in seeking to introduce, for his present purpose, brighter and more sharply contrasted harmonies, he has made his decorative scheme a striking, but at the same time a harsh and crude, one. His allegorical figures in the two wing of the triptych, relieved against bright summer foliage and seen between reddish marble columns, have neither much significance nor, to make up for this deficiency, a supreme rhythmical harmony; while the gigantic figures of the doctors of the faculties, grouped in the central division, in their bright-hued but ill-assorted robes, have in them a dangerous element of the grotesque. Yet the whole is, notwithstanding these drawbacks, a surprising example of French skill and French facility; it would be pretty safe to prophesy that it will obtain the Prix d'Honneur of the year. M. Guillaume Dubufe's apotheosis of Alfred de Musset, Lamartine and Victor Hugo, called "Trinité Poétique," is a symphony, and a very monotonous and ill-coloured one, in dark cerulean blue; it contains in a high degree of intensity that element of pompous vulgarity which is so characteristic of much of the art of the Third Republic. Yet another vast tripartite work is M. Léon-Commerre's "Le Printemps; le Destin; l'Hiver." Among the loveliest of all the purely decorative canvases is M. Raphaël Collin's "Fin d'Eté," which is to adorn the parlour of the Rector of the Sorbonne. The scene is an exquisite one of flowery meadow and woodland, in which move, under a mild sky of tempered blue, airily-clad nymphs, laden with summer spoils or sporting in the grass. The tone of the whole is that of a deadened opal—a warm and pale hue, enveloping and harmonizing myriads of local tints. This painting is surpassed in striking effect, though not in subtle charm, by M. Duez's large and masterly decoration, "Virgile s'inspirant dans les Bois," which reveals to us the Mantuan dreamily advancing in a solemn wood of huge pines, through the branches of which—filling nearly the whole canvas—are seen glimpses of bright blue sky and tender green foliage. We will not ask too curiously how the red and mauve poppies at the bard's feet have sprung up in such a forest, since these supply just that accent which is indispensable to save the colour-scheme from monotony. We may mention here M. Cazin's large and beautiful landscape with figures, "La Journée faite," in which he appears to have undergone very strongly the all-penetrating influence of M. Puvis de Chavannes; the unsubstantial but well-placed figures might have been painted by the author of the "Pauvre Pêcheur," while the landscape has all M. Cazin's own charm. The picture, which has the drawbacks of its merits, is one of the most poetical and genuinely pathetic works in an exhibition in which qualities such as it possesses do not abound. Among imaginative works proper the first place may be accorded to M. Albert Maignan's "Les Voix du Tocsin." Above a dimly-perceived city, enveloped in smoke and flame, swings furiously in mid-air the huge bell, clustering round and issuing from which are nude forms, chiefly male, typifying the voices and expressing every phase of rage, terror, and despair. The main idea is a very fine and original one, worthy of the author of the beautiful "Matilda with Virgil and Dante" at the Luxembourg. Admirable, however, as is the technical skill displayed in its embodiment, the meaning of the painter-poet is not perfectly or altogether appropriately expressed. These magnificently drawn but over-solid nudities, seen in the most difficult and contorted attitudes, suggest less the embodied voices issuing from the terrible alarm-bell than fine models carefully posed in painful positions, and reproduced with consummate skill together with an added dramatic expression which proves the possession by the painter of much imaginative power. M. Chartran's "Vincent de Beauvais et Louis XI." should be remarked as a happy combination of the historical method of representation with the grey atmospheric colouring proper to the higher modern decoration. A very striking and original, if thoroughly French, version of the often-rendered episode of David's combat with Goliath is supplied by an American painter, Mr. William Dodge; his version of the vanquished giant has novelty as well as virile power and dramatic force. Yet another young American, Mr. Julian Story, shows a great advance upon former efforts in a vast canvas, "The Black Prince before the body of the King of Bohemia." Rarely has M. Bouguereau been more happily inspired than in his "Le Premier Deuil," a grand pyramidal composition, with Adam—a noble figure—holding across his knees the dead Abel, while Eve kneels sorrowing at his side. The work has not perhaps great intensity, but it has style, perfect balance, consummate draughtsmanship and composition; the sombre landscape-background, too, though opaque in execution, has great appropriateness. The master's other contribution is a "Nymphe," of the usual type, leaden-hued, but of exquisitely just proportions. The Academi M. Boulanger has supplied in "esclaves à vendre" what is for him a canvas of unusual charm. These two last-mentioned painters are the favourite butts of the intransigeants of modern French art; it is well, however, that they should exist and keep their heads above water, if only as a corrective and barrier to a revolutionary impetuosity which would deny the past as well as help the future. An extraordinary tour de force has been accomplished by M. Henner in his "St. Sébastien," in which two holy women robed from head to foot in black are seen tending the martyred saint, whose superbly modelled nude form shows ghastly in a pale localized light, which is not sufficiently accounted for. The painter's triumph, however, is in the manner in which, by means of a subtle balance of values, he has relieved against a sky of the most tempestuous blackness the still more sombre robes of the women. A portrait-study of a girl is both garish and untrue in local colour; it is, indeed, quite unworthy of M. Henner's fame. Another veteran of established reputation—M. Hébert—shows a return to former excellence in the curiously named "Aux héros sans gloire," showing an ideal figure of sombre and mournful aspect, seen in the act of placing flowers on a marble tomb in the foreground of a dense wood. This enigmatical painted elegy is rendered with a certain affectation of ultra-refinement which has always been the besetting sin of the artist; but it has, nevertheless, a real ideal grace, and at the same time a sincerity which cannot be denied.

A large work by M. Agache, entitled "Enigme," attracts great attention, and is among the works which have been acquired by the State. It portrays on a rose-coloured background, partially ornamented with Egyptian hieroglyphics in gold, a female figure of stately beauty and downcast mien, draped from head to foot in diaphanous black veils, through which peeps forth a scarlet under-robe; she holds in her hand huge scarlet poppies, some of which lie also on the steps which she slowly descends. Here is probably no very profound or real mystery to unravel; but the colour-combination is original and happy, and the work altogether, notwithstanding a strong flavour of the vulgarity of the studio, a striking one, which it may be possible to dislike, but not to pass over. M. Detaille, who has made his reputation as a somewhat dry and harshly precise delineator of modern French military life, seeks to appear this time in a new or, rather, a modified part; he sends a vast composition, "Le Rêve," in which is shown, with the artist's usual exactness of representation, a battalion of the French infantry of to-day bivouacking unsheltered in the open country. All lie prone on the bare ground, wrapped in the deepest sleep, while above in the skies passes a shadowy cortège, seen by them in their dreams—a glorious but unsubstantial army, which seems to be that of the First Republic. Somehow, however, the methodical painter is entirely uninspired by a subject so calculated to fire a Frenchman, and he accordingly leaves the beholder cold and unconvinced. Far superior is the power of evocation shown by the modest draughtsman Raffet in his well-known lithography, "La Revue," and he has succeeded in suggesting with limited means that spirit of imaginative military ardour which the child of the latter part of the century appears to have lost with so many other illusions.

THE GLASGOW EXHIBITION.

THAT Glasgow, the centre of Scotch industry and commerce, should be the seat of a great local and international Exhibition must prove of much interest to all classes. It says much for the modesty of our fellow-countrymen on the other side of the Tweed that, in these days of exhibitions, with all their wealth and enterprise, they have not shown any haste in putting before the world the proofs of their unrivalled progress. It is no exaggeration to say that Scotland, considering its limited area, its small population, and its somewhat scanty resources and hard climate, has made by far the most rapid progress of any community in Europe. It has long held, and still holds, the foremost place in the arts of agriculture; it represents the best school of shipbuilding, and possesses one of the largest mercantile fleets; while in the industrial arts, in chemical and other manufactures, it is, on the whole, unsurpassed. In these days the story of such an advance, of such energy and enterprise, carries with it a moral, for all this has been attained, not by the efforts of Scotchmen only, but through the stimulus of the partnership their country enjoys with ours, in that union which means a full share of the resources—natural, commercial, industrial—of the Empire with all colonial possessions and dependencies.

The Scotch have earned for themselves a reputation for being among the best of business-men. The result of their efforts, as shown in the organization of the Glasgow Exhibition, goes far to confirm this as a truth. They have allowed themselves plenty of time to devise and carry out their plan; they have not been chary of expenditure. As a natural result their Exhibition, in the matter of completion at the appointed time, puts all previous Exhibitions to shame. We do not mean to say there are no signs of unfinished work; but that, as a whole, taking into account the gigantic dimensions of their undertaking, the result, with all its varieties of representation, is fully effective, and in harmony with the purpose proposed.

In an Exhibition definitely devoted to the progress of industry in all its developments, it is gratifying to find that not only is prominence given to fine art in all its branches, but also that a special gallery is devoted to the too much neglected art of sculpture. In a gallery of this, not of course so spacious as that of painting, which has its British collection as well as foreign loans, but ample for the purpose, there are no less than one hundred and seventy examples of sculpture by foreign and British artists, many of high repute. The names of Chantrey, Thornycroft, Boehm, Woolner, Onslow, Ford, Leighton, Nelson Maclean, Stirling Lee, Bruce Joy, Tinworth, Poynter, Auguste Rodin, G. Argenti, Jean Gauterin, O. Andreoni, Auguste Bartholdi, and Dalou are among those whose works are exhibited. That men of high endowments and aspirations should give themselves up to an art so little encouraged in comparison with its worth shows how deep is their interest in its capability of excelling all other productions of its kind. Painting is easy of execution, and therefore becomes a drug in the market; sculpture, to be grand and effective, like Mr. Thornycroft's "Teucer"—which is here—which ranks with "The Athlete" of the Vatican, and, with it, surpasses the "Apollo Belvidere," as many think, demands such genius for its conception and execution as scarcely appears in a century.

In Courts 8, 9, and 10 is exhibited the interesting series of chemicals, on the improved production of which our advancement in manufacturing skill so greatly depends. The aniline colours are well represented by Messrs. Bayer & Co., German manufacturers, with houses in Manchester, Bradford, and London; the Newcastle Chemical Works make a good show of the various soda products; Messrs. White & Co., of Glasgow, are strong in their chromium compounds, for which they have a world-wide reputation, and have enjoyed the monopoly; the firm of Garroway, of Glasgow, among other chemicals, exhibits borax, a substance which is little in use compared with the great part it is destined to play, especially as a disinfectant; while the Alkali Works of Messrs. Muspratt & Co., of Liverpool, are well represented. But what one misses in the Exhibition is examples of the wonderful series of soda and potash productions of Stassfurt, the salt-mines of which form the saline contents of a dried-up sea. The great house of Tennant is of course represented, but not in the important instance of iodine, of which they have long been the chief, almost the sole, manufacturers. It would have been agreeable and instructive to have seen a large exhibition of chemical apparatus and of philosophical instruments. Nothing is so needed as a museum of those delicate contrivances through which research is carried out. The manufacturers of these are men of the highest scientific attainment, such as Frauenhofer and Ruhmkorff. As Sir Humphry Davy truly said, it is on the perfection of our instruments that all discovery depends.

An Artisan Section (Court 19) will be amusing to many visitors, if only for its extreme variety, beginning with models of seven steamships, and ending with carvings in wood by tenants on the Lovat estates, under the instruction of Miss Frazer, of Lovat, with over two hundred curiosities between. There are models of passenger-steamers, of yachts, herring-boats; of engines of every shape and kind, agricultural, electro-motor, locomotive; of pumps, of fern-cases, of ploughs, castles, washing-machines, writing-tables, revolving albums, conservatories, and everything else one can think of for his wants, movements, journeys, amusements, indoor and out, by night and by day. But what is more surprising is the Women's Arts and Industries. These, but for the needlework, which in variety is more than an ordinary mind can grasp, include the most masculine productions, and offer a new claim to women's rights. Here we have carved furniture, china figures, bookbinding, locks, keys, bolts, nails, chains, leather driving-gloves and gauntlets, carved oak panels, engraving, copper-plate printing, tea-tables, brass-work, blotting-books, boots and shoes, circulars, periodicals, hygienic clothing, art furniture, flower-pots; though it must be allowed that embroidery and lace predominate. We can only wish that so much lovely and useful work was paid for in proportion to the long labour bestowed upon it.

There are many other points of interest of which, in a limited space, it would be impossible to give any adequate idea. There are sections setting forth the progress made in mining and metallurgy, in sanitary science and aeronautics; in agriculture and horticulture: in ironmongery and cutlery; in furniture and decoration; in education and physical training; in music and musical instruments; in fisheries, in textile fabrics, in pottery and glass, in paper manufacture and printing. To foreign exhibits some fourteen courts are devoted, and these consist for the most part in varieties of ornamental industries from France, Austria, Germany, Denmark, and Italy. There is also a large court entirely set apart for machinery and deserving a notice in itself.

But we must not forget to mention one of the most important industries of all—the wonders of the shipbuilding art—which are variously represented in miniature in the Main Avenue by exquisite models of ocean liners, of screw and paddle-steamers of all kinds, of steam-yachts and sailing schooners, of despatch-boats, dredgers, and tugs. In addition to these, there is a very fine collection of nautical instruments and appliances, such as chronometers and binnacles, compasses, sounding machines, foghorns, sextants, telescopes, and binoculars. This section will have an additional charm for the vast numbers who are keenly watching the movement that has sprung up for the strengthening of our national defences.

Altogether, the Glasgow Exhibition must be pronounced a striking success. The buildings are constructed on a bold and large scale; the grounds are spacious and picturesque. The little river Kelvin running through them, its gondolas and boats, its sloping lawns, the handsome building of the University rising to the south, the Bishop's Castle and the various tasteful kiosks, the dining-rooms, the Indian Tea-rooms, the Ceylon Rooms (a model of a Kandyan structure), not to forget the indispensable Switchback and Fairy Fountain—all these have their separate merits. They lend an air almost of enchantment to the place, such as few who are acquainted with the poorer districts of Glasgow would suspect. That the enterprise will be productive of much good we are sure. The Exhibition itself must serve to quicken trade, and, like the old and now suppressed fairs, help to bring to the notice of the public many an industry, without the baneful intervention of the middle-man. It will do even more than this. It will serve as a pleasure-ground to thousands of the cheerless and overworked poor, and give new life to a city whose industrial population is among the most overcrowded of any in the United Kingdom.

REVIEWS.

DENTON'S ENGLAND IN THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.*

THIS volume has that melancholy interest which belongs to a book which the author does not live to see published. Mr. Denton died "whilst the last few proof sheets were in his house awaiting revision." The work is complete in itself, but it was its author's design to follow it up with a companion volume, sketching the ecclesiastical state of England in the fifteenth century. For this the materials had been collected, but only a few pages were actually written. A perusal of the volume now published, which deals with the civil condition of England in the same century, will make every reader regret the loss of its ecclesiastical yokefellow.

Like most modern students, the author, though he has traced with care and interest the life of the fifteenth century, does not regard it lovingly or admiringly. He evidently looks upon it as a period of relative or even positive retrogression, culminating in a state of disorder and lawlessness which necessitated and justified the Tudor dictatorship. As far as we have observed, he attributes nothing but evil to the Hundred Years' War. Yet it might be urged on the other side that, in certain stages of a people's growth, it is worth while to pay even a heavy price for the awakening of a sense of vigorous and masterful nationality; and it can hardly be denied that, with all its attendant evils, the Hundred Years' War did foster this feeling of nationality in Englishmen. Mr. Denton, moreover, does not seem to have gone very deeply into the causes of the war. It is treated too much as if it came by spontaneous generation; and, in particular, its dependence upon the Scottish question is overlooked. The Bishop of Chester has given the weight of his historical authority to the opinion, which was also held by Green, that it was the assistance given by Philip of Valois to the Scots which determined Edward III. to war. If this view is admitted, it is no longer "somewhat difficult," as Mr. Denton avers, "to understand, or at least to state the real grounds" of the contest. It is the more strange that he should have omitted to trace its connexion with the Scottish war, because he is fully alive to all the other evils which the latter wrought. Indeed, his fearless and unconventional handling of the Great Scottish Myth is, in these days of national disintegration, positively refreshing:—

* England in the Fifteenth Century. By the Rev. W. Denton, M.A., Worcester College, Oxford, Author of "Servia and the Servians," "Montenegro; its People, and their History," "The Christians in Turkey," "Record of St. Giles, Cripplegate," &c. London. George Bell & Sons. 1888.

> The total defeat of the English army by the Scottish hosts under Bruce at Bannockburn was the source of long misfortune to England and of the most terrible calamities that ever befell Scotland. It arrested the prosperity of England; it destroyed the growing liberties, the civilization, and the material wealth of the crown and people of Scotland. It gave over the conterminous frontiers of the two countries to endless and savage warfare. . . .
>
> At the moment when, unhappily for both countries, an English nobleman, availing himself of provincial prejudices, raised, with the help of the highland clans, the standard of rebellion against Edward, the people of Scotland were advancing materially and intellectually on a par with those of England, and were enjoying an amount of freedom and prosperity such as they never again possessed. . . .
>
> No defeat, however crushing, ever proved half so injurious to any country as the victory of Bannockburn did to Scotland.

One would not willingly dash the happiness of the Duke of Argyll when, according to his Grace's own account, he stands upon the field of Bannockburn and shouts for joy. But to Englishmen one may recommend the opinion here set forth, as having, if not the whole truth, at least a great deal of truth in it. Holding these views about Scotland, Mr. Denton naturally has a warm admiration for the character and statesmanship of Edward I., and regrets, as indeed we all well may, that the great King did not live to incorporate Ireland with England.

To deal with these high questions is, however, not the main object of Mr. Denton's work. It is to produce, by the bringing together of facts from various sources, and by inferences and deductions from them, a picture of the social condition of the country. On some points the views here taken demand notice. Social optimists will find comfort in the conclusion "that the condition of the labourer in husbandry was far worse at the close of the Middle Ages than it is now." In opposition to the commonly accepted opinion, and indeed to the statement in the preamble of the "Statute of Labourers," the author holds—on scarcely sufficient grounds, as it seems to us—that that measure was not, in truth, occasioned by the Black Death. Wages, he tells us, had been rising before that pestilence; and the measure of 1349 was framed to prevent what he calls "the natural rise of wages," though he admits that this rise was due to earlier pestilences. Another point on which he controverts a now usual opinion, is with regard to the supposed beneficent action of the monasteries in mitigating poverty. The extant accounts of monastic houses, he says, do not bear out this notion. In the fifteenth century "the conventual orders were in very many instances heavily encumbered with debt"; and even when not thus crippled, those religious houses which, as was often the case, drew their income from distant parishes, "gave little or nothing to the poor of the parishes in which they stood." The action of the guilds as organized charitable institutions he hardly, so far as we have observed, takes into account. His remarks on the enclosures which towards the end of the fifteenth century excited such bitter discontent and opposition are interesting and judicious. He does not yield to the modern tendency to a sort of sentimental Socialism on this subject, for he sees that the enclosures were "a decided gain to agriculture"; but he also sees the evil wrought by the neglect during the process to consider the rights of the small tenants. There is probably much truth in his remark that the changing of arable into pasture land was due, not so much to the increase in the price of wool as to the exhaustion of the soil by long-continued and unscientific corn-growing. The attention which up to the beginning of the fourteenth century had been paid to marling the ground h... declined during the times of war, pestilence, and famine which made up a large part of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Altogether, the passages relative to the agricultural crisis which followed the Wars of the Roses are well worth reading; and they are illustrated by an interesting letter, of which the original is preserved in the archives of Magdalen College, Oxford. It is from the Vicar of Quinton, in Gloucestershire, to the President of the College, earnestly praying that some College land in or near his parish may be let to the under-tenants instead of to a single farmer. "I remember, sir," writes the Vicar (whose spelling we modernize), "that ye said my lord bishop in his last days and also your Mastership since my lord deceased did stand in manner of a wavering mind whether it were more expedient to the welfare of your place to have one man to your tenant or the tenants of the town. Sir, saving your reverence and your discretion, after my simple reason methinks it is more meritory to support and succour a community than one man, your tenants rather than a strange man, the poor and innocent for [instead of] a gentleman or a gentleman's man" (so in the original as here printed in an appendix, but in the text it is quoted as "a gentleman's gentleman," which has a more modern sound). The Vicar, while admitting that the single farmer will probably give the most, tries to make out that in the long run the many tenants will be the more advantageous. He beseeches that they may have the land for "xxx'i," offering, good man, to throw into the bargain his own grey horse, apparently by way of [illegible]:—"I sall gyf yow to yowr plesure lyerd my horse." The letter has no date of year, but there is evidence to place it between 1486 and 1504.

There are many minor points of interest, of which we will only mention one. In the section on "Manor Houses" we learn that a north-easterly aspect was the one most sought after by early builders. The south wind was condemned as "sickly," and the west as "blustering." "A south-west blow on ye," says Caliban when he curses. On the other hand, primitive wisdom pronounced the north wind to be a "preventive of corruption," and the east wind was held to bring serene weather. The horrors of the east wind were apparently as yet undiscovered or disregarded.

JAPANESE CHILDREN.*

THE realities of Japanese life—we are speaking of the life of twenty years ago—were very different indeed from the pictures usually presented in the books of the day, written for the most part by visitors, or, if by residents in the Reedy Land, by residents who had no personal experience whatever of the Tokugawa régime. That life had a picturesque and, to unlearned eyes, a simple exterior; but, behind the pomp and circumstance of the daimio, the swagger of the samurai, and the apparent contentment of the hyaksho and chonin (peasant and artisan), diversified by innumerable festivals of a more or less Buddhistic tinge, lay the grinding tyranny of custom, minute and tedious, from which none escaped. The lord of a province was a puppet in the hands of his Council, who condemned him to fill up his life with the performance of endless and meaningless ceremonial duties; the clansmen were bound by a rigorous routine they were only too glad to leave behind in becoming ronins or masterless men; the farmer, merchant, and workman sought safety from their multitudinous oppressors in a cringing servility, and bowed literally the brow in the mud at the dreaded cry of Shta ni iro (Down with you, fellows) as each petty official or samurai who had the right to ride a horse passed along the street. The foreigner of early days who saw the glitter of the cortège, the colour and variety of the popular festival, who heard the laugh and chatter of the street when no great man happened to be passing by, and felt a new delight in the quaint productions of the Japanese craftsman, saw also the execution ground of Shinagawa, listened to stories told with bated breath of ferocity and oppression, and witnessed the dull monotony of the changeless daily life of the peasant and artisan. But the foreigner, resident or visitor, whose acquaintance with Japan dates from the Restoration, or from a later time, has known nothing of the misery and immobility of the Shogunate, and has heard much of the glory and simplicity of the days when long processions of the feudal nobles kept the highways closed, and aniline dyes, tall hats, and French boots were curios to the people of Dai Nippon. To this ignorance in large measure may be traced that singular idealization of Japan and her ways and works which forms so marked a feature of contemporary Western life, and thrusts hideous travesties of Japanese art amid modern surroundings, to the great contentment of dealers in counterfeit curios and commercial collectors delighted at the continual increase of an ignorant public on whom to palm off their mistaken purchases.

But if latter-day residents know little of the life of ächtes Japans they know still less of its child-life. The book before us gives a description of child-life in Japan which is not untrue, but which deals only with its superficial and less distinctive aspects. The domestic life of a people is not easily got at—what do we know of the life of a French élève, for instance?—and in eastern countries less easily than elsewhere. Ten or twelve years ago, when the author was a resident in Tokio, there were fewer opportunities of observing child-life than there are now; but, on the other hand, that life, year by year, loses more and more of whatever distinctive character it may have possessed. To the new civilization the world of men in Japan has almost wholly succumbed, the world of women is in process of succumbing, the child-world will be the last to yield. But yield it must, and the process once begun will be more rapid with children than with their seniors, for, after all, the world throughout, their resemblances are greater and their differences less than those of their fathers and mothers. No doubt the Japanese lad with his bare shaven poll and tags of hair, his awkward wooden pattens, or slovenly sandals, and his huddled garments, presents a very different appearance from his Western compeer; but at bottom he is much the same—as fond of dabbling in mud and dust, of alternately petting and persecuting animals, of roaring when he cannot get what he wants, and as little friendly to book or slate. Nevertheless, in some important points he does differ, not in himself, but in his conditions of existence. In her book the author gives the roseate view only of the Japanese doji; but in truth, so far as the foreigner sees him—and, as we have said, of the domestic interiors of the middle and upper classes of Japan hardly anything is known even now—he is a sadly neglected being, clothed in dirty, baggy rags, ill-kempt, and dirty, for the normal Japanese never uses soap. He lives a life of careless ease, but which to a Western child would appear monstrously tame. The young samurai must have found life almost too dreadful; for he began the ceremonial mill-round almost as soon as he could walk, and wore a sword, or had it borne for him by an attendant, before he was in his teens. He was, however, treated as a Waka-kimi (young master), and no doubt relieved the monotony of his existence by now and then kicking his kerai (retainer) and pulling his sisters' hair. There is, or at all events was, no "social intercourse," as Americans say, in Japan; nothing but extremely formal visits at stated times, and the children of a house had, for the most part, simply themselves to rely upon for amusement. Nothing in the least resembling cricket, or football, or tennis, or paper-hunts, is possible to the Japanese boy; he knows nothing of athletics, of the charms of bird-nesting even he is ignorant, and it may be doubted whether he ever climbed a tree or cleared a fence or jumped a ditch for the pleasure of the thing. In all this he is no worse off, however, than the French boy, whose one amusement some thirty years ago seemed to be the not exciting one of balle au mur. Let us see with Mrs. Chaplin Ayrton's help and that of the pretty woodcuts which adorn her book, quaint but not unfaithful, though somewhat flattering portrayals of Nipponese children and their ways—those who want to know more about them should turn over Hokusai's albums—what modes of killing time were at their disposal. They are not many, for the share allowed them at such festivals as that of Shogwatsu (New Year) is mainly of a ceremonial character, and their festivals are both reduced in number and shorn of their former interest. What will replace them we know not—ere long Japan will be without a creed of any kind, without traditions, and without other than official festivals. The Restoration has more effectually divided new from old Japan than the Revolution has parted the France of departments from the France of provinces. Looking on the hatted and booted Japanese of to-day one seems to have dreamed of the men in casque and armour of less than a generation back, carrying two swords in their belt and a bow and a quiver full of arrows over their shoulders. However, it is doubtless a good thing they have gone, seeing what went with them. But to return to the children. In the Nenchu Koji and other books of the kind a number of games of a partly ceremonial character and not very exciting are mentioned which have entirely disappeared. Battledore and shuttlecock is still played, but the extraordinary dexterity of the Chinese, who, using their heels as battledores, will keep up the shuttlecock for an indefinite time, is not witnessed in Japan. Top-spinning is a favourite diversion, and kite-flying is an amusement indulged in by young and old, but after a much more elaborate fashion than is practised in Western countries. A Japanese author tells us that kite-flying is "intended to make boys open their mouths to expel the feverish humours, and develop the yang principle," and says much the same of battledore and shuttlecock, discrediting the explanation that the latter game is a spell against mosquitoes, based on the fact that the shuttlecock (usually made by sticking feathers in the hard fruit of the mokurenji, a species of Celtis), once had the form of a dragon-fly which feeds upon mosquitoes. In the towns the children have mainly to content themselves with raree shows, the clever exhibitions of toy-sweetmeat makers, the tricks of mountebanks, and itinerant singers, story-tellers, and dancers. They have also several sorts of backgammon and chequers for winter evenings and summer nights. Dolls are common enough, but they are mere effigies, originally of dignitaries of the Mikado's Court, not used by girls to play at mother with. Girls, indeed, seem to have no particular games; but they were taught the sammisen (sort of banjo) and the art of making flowers out of paper, in which they often showed marvellous taste and dexterity. The great day for boys was the 5th of the fifth month. They were presented with a set of toys representing the furniture of a daimio's procession, and if a son had been born during the year a great paper fish was flown banner-wise over the porch of the house. The fish was a carp, and was emblematic of manly strength, the carp being supposed to be able to swim against a rapid current, and even ascend cascades. The idea is a Chinese one; nearly all Japanese ideas, indeed, are Chinese at bottom. Various card-games, too, were played at New Year's time. In one of the best a number of cards had proverbs written on them each beginning with one of the letters of the Japanese alphabet. A similar number had pictures illustrating the proverbs. The cards were shuffled and dealt, then the proverbs read out, and those who had the answering pictures discarded; the game being won by the player who first got rid of all his cards, and the holder of the last card being the loser, who, if a boy, had his face streaked with ink, if a girl, her hair adorned with a wisp of rice-straw.

* Child-life in Japan and Japanese Child Stories. By M. Chaplin Ayrton. With many Illustrations by Japanese Artists. New and cheaper edition. London: Griffith, Farran, & Co.

On the whole, however, the amusements of Japanese children must be pronounced tame. They lack, as the stories printed in this volume lack, invention and point, give no opportunity to strength or skill, and too often are mere trivial imitations of the ceremonial practices that bound their seniors' lives in a round of tedious and monotonous etiquette. The stories in question are prettily told and quaintly illustrated, and though not particularly interesting, are, in Cervantean phrase, ejemplares of the mental pabulum of Japanese children.

GEOLOGY.*

THE first instalment of this work, which appeared in 1886, has already been noticed in these pages. In the present volume Professor Prestwich has completed his labours by giving to students the fruit of his ripe experience as a stratigraphical geologist. The book, indeed, may be regarded as the completion of his work as a teacher, for its appearance is coincident with his retirement from the chair of Geology in the University of Oxford, which he has so ably filled for the last fourteen years.

It might have been thought that Dr. A. Geikie's full and excellent Text-book of Geology, and the bulky volume forming the second part of the new edition of Phillips's Manual of Geology, the work of that accomplished palæontologist, Mr. Etheridge, had left little room for a third text-book on a similar scale. Yet, as we pointed out in our notice of the first instalment, Professor Prestwich had given to his book a character of its own, which fully justified its publication, and would make it acceptable to a large class of students. This statement may be repeated yet more emphatically in regard to the present volume. It fills a place which has not been exactly occupied by either of the above-named volumes. That of Mr. Etheridge is a great storehouse of facts and details, collected with patient assiduity, and sifted with critical care, but it is more suited for the teacher than for the learner, its contents have to be macerated in the mental "crop" of the parent bird before they can be assimilated by the fledgling in geology. The stratigraphical portion of Dr. Geikie's volume also presents some difficulties of its own to the learner. As a summary of information, terse, and careful, it is unequalled; and the abundant references with which its pages are furnished make it an invaluable guide to the advanced student who is desirous of consulting the original sources, or of minutely studying special questions of stratigraphy. But a criticism has been made, which is not wholly without foundation, that the author has occasionally written too much in the spirit of an advocate who has been retained to defend the work of official geologists against the criticisms of presumptuous amateurs. Moreover, in this part of Dr. Geikie's book that literary skill which is usually not its least excellence is less conspicuous than elsewhere. Probably this is due to the fact that so large a portion of his life has been spent in Scotland, where the fossiliferous rocks not only occupy proportionately a far smaller area, but also are much more incomplete as a series than in England. Hence we note sometimes the usual defects of a summary—a tendency to degenerate into a catalogue of details and a little want of that light and shade which help the student in forming a picture which is imprinted on his mind. That some inequality of treatment should exist in any important text-book of geology has now become almost inevitable. The science has advanced of late years with such rapid strides and in so many directions, very diverse one from another, that accomplishments as varied as those professed by the proverbial Greek are needed in an author if he is to handle every branch of geology as a master. Thus in several parts of his first volume it was evident that Professor Prestwich was no more than the careful and conscientious compiler. In this second volume, however, he is on ground which to a far greater extent he has made his own, for it would be difficult to find any one better qualified than he for writing a manual of stratigraphical geology. Almost his first contribution to science related to the Carboniferous series; his papers on the various groups of the Tertiary period will be for long reckoned among geological classics; while his earlier investigations into the water supply of London and his later work as a Professor at Oxford have made him familiar with the most typical representatives of the Mesozoic strata of England. Besides this, in the course of his researches he has had to follow many of the English formations across the Straits of Dover, and thus counts among his personal friends many of the leading geologists of Western Europe.

It is possible, of course, for one who has been led into lines of investigation slightly different from those of the author to find a few blemishes even in the volume before us. In the present state of geological science we must all plead for mutual forbearance. Professor Prestwich, for instance, evidently is not quite at home in writing on the Archæan series, carefully as his compilation has been executed. Hence too much prominence has been given to the subdivisions which were proposed some years since by Dr. Hicks, two of which have been shown to rest on over-hasty generalization from incomplete knowledge, and should accordingly now be mentioned simply as matters of history, not retained as if still of classificatory value. In like way the arrangement proposed by Dr. Sterry Hunt for the Archæan rocks of North America is quoted without any indication that part of it has been repudiated by several careful investigators of Canadian and American geology, and has not been allowed to pass without protest even on this side of the Atlantic. Again, in dealing with the Trias Professor Prestwich seems hardly to have kept abreast with the literature of the subject, or to write as one who has been enabled from personal investigations to appreciate the arguments in cases of controversy. The sandstones and conglomerates of the Lower Trias of Central and Northern England are assumed by him, almost tacitly, to be of marine origin; and no intimation is given of the physical difficulties which, as it has been shown, exist in this hypothesis, or of the analogies which have led some recent authors to regard them as being in the main fluviatile deposits. It would also have been well, in indicating the southern limits of land-ice in Britain during the period of its greatest extension, to have added that some authorities dispute the inferences drawn from the facts, and place it many miles further north. Professor Prestwich, also, in his speculations as to the origin of chalk and flint, appears to be not quite at his ease, and to be too much influenced by a theory of chemical precipitation, which indeed was in high favour in the days of his youth, but is now, with good reason, as we think, generally held to be improbable. The book, in short, more than once is influenced by a spirit of scientific "conservation," which, though often useful as a protest against "extremist" views, is apt to exercise a debilitating influence.

* Geology: Chemical, Physical, and Stratigraphical. By Joseph Prestwich, M.A., F.R.S., F.G.S. Vol. II.—Stratigraphical and Physical. Oxford: The Clarendon Press. 1888.

But these, and a very few still more trifling blemishes, are after all little more than rare shadows which throw into higher relief the general excellence of the work. Let us turn, in conclusion, to the more welcome task of indicating a few of its distinctive characteristics. As has been intimated, the description of the various formations is singularly lucid, the author bringing out with unusual clearness the points, whether physical or biological, on which the attention of the student should be concentrated. Very good, also, is the description of foreign equivalents of British groups of strata; it is condensed without being dry; it is brief, but is sufficient and suggestive. The summaries of the life history in the great periods of geological time, the characteristics of the dynasties in the animal world which have risen, ruled, and vanished in their turn, are admirably executed, and will be invaluable guides to the student, who can ascertain from the perusal of a very few pages the exact state of our present knowledge concerning the genealogical tree of the living denizens of the earth. No less valuable, also, are the comparative tables of formations, where those of England are correlated with the equivalent deposits in Belgium, France, Germany, and Switzerland with North Italy. Further, the classified lists of formations in India and the adjacent territories, in North America, in Australia, in New Zealand, and in Southern Africa, to each of which are attached brief notes of the characteristic fauna and flora of the several subdivisions, appear to us excellent both in plan and in execution. In type, paper, and press-work generally this volume, like the former, leaves nothing to be desired. The woodcuts scattered liberally throughout its pages are generally good, though some few are hardly worthy of their companions. But in addition to this the book is enriched by sixteen plates drawn on stone by Miss G. Woodward. These depict some of the fossil invertebrates most characteristic of the different epochs of geological history. It is enough to say that the selection of these is as judicious as the execution is excellent, so that on this account the volume will be especially helpful to the student. It also contains a very useful map, representing the regions at present covered with snow and ice, the limits of floating bergs, and the probable extension of ancient glaciers. But its most distinctive feature is a geological map of Europe. For this we are indebted to Messrs. Goodchild and Topley, who have compiled and drawn it under the general direction of the author. Though of comparatively small size (about 22 inches by 18), the formations are so judiciously grouped, and the system of colouring adopted is so clear, that the records of the most interesting chapters in the physical history of Europe can be studied with an ease and apprehended with a facility which are hitherto without a parallel. This map alone would secure for the book a cordial welcome from students, even if it had no other claim for recognition.

But, as it has many and yet more important merits, Professor Prestwich may be heartily congratulated on the completion of his self-imposed task. It was obviously one so arduous that he might well have shrunk from undertaking it, because it would seem to demand all the vigour of the middle period of life, and it is no small triumph to have closed it successfully, after the significant epoch of threescore years and ten has been left well behind. His reputation as a geologist was already so high that it had become easier to diminish than to augment it by further work; but this new success has been achieved, and many friends will echo our wish that not a few years of learned leisure may yet remain for its veteran author.

A "SPECIAL" ON HIS TRAVELS.*

MR. W. BEATTY-KINGSTON, "Commander of the Imperial Order of the Medjidieh, &c. &c. &c.," is a representative of a fast-decaying art—the art (or should it be the manufacture?) of special correspondence. This may appear a paradoxical assertion to make in an age when newspapers are cheaper, better, and more numerous than ever before, but it is none the less true. The electric wire has superseded the special correspondent, even as the newspaper itself, plus the telegraph, has to some extent superseded the ambassador. Oddly enough, it is the same agency which has both made and unmade the journalistic emissary, whose rise and fall may be said to date from "l'année terrible." Europe could not and would not wait for "letters" descriptive of the momentous events of '70; the post was all very well for the opening incidents of the war—the "baptism of fire," the reconnoitrings of both armies on either side of the many-coloured Saar, and the mobilization of the legions of France and Germany—but when the conflicting hosts met on the Speickerenburg, at Gravelotte, and at Beaumont, when those military tragedies were followed by the terrible "Schlacht bei Sedan" and the capitulation and imprisonment of an Emperor, nothing less than "full telegraphic details" would assuage the thirst of the natives for immediate information of what had happened; and when, after four or five days' interval, the tortoise-like post brought in reams of additional particulars of this and that battle, the public, sated with the leading facts, which had already been placed before them, merely skimmed the acres of type, or more often "took them as read." Mr. Kingston, whose two entertaining volumes are remarkable for their sustained spirit and plentiful humour, has been long enough in the business to see the revolution which the last seventeen years have worked in the department of daily journalism which numbers him in its hierarchy; and, although he by no means poses as a laudator temporis acti, he could not have sat down to pen this interesting story of his European wanderings without feeling sadly conscious that the "good old times" of Special-Corresponding have gone, never to return. Narratives fashioned upon the model of A Wanderer's Notes (a sufficiently modest title, by the way) are not seldom disfigured, sometimes even rendered ridiculous, by the constant appearance of the writer's figure on the scene. Mr. Kingston cannot be reproached upon this score. He keeps in the shade of the coulisses as much as possible, and is frequently, if anything, a little too much absorbed in his quality of historian. Like graver authors possessed of the courage of their opinions, Mr. Kingston has his likes and dislikes. He is pleased with Heligoland, even to the extent of praising it as the "miniature home of the virtues—a maximum of morality to a minimum of territory," and earnestly recommending it to the attention of our autumn tourists; but he is terribly severe upon Holland—perhaps because his "entry into the capital of the Netherlands was scarcely so triumphant an affair as I could have wished; yet it was not without a certain dignity." He admits that "the Dutch are renowned all over the world for their somewhat meticulous cleanliness" (whatever that may mean), yet observes that if he "had an enemy upon whom he might be permitted to practice vengeance at once the most lingering and deadly that the ingenuity of a fiend could devise," he thinks (only thinks, though) that he "would condemn him to lifelong travelling about Holland in the steamers provided to that end by Companies" whose names he will not essay to spell. Mr. Kingston's repugnance to the Dutch themselves extends to the Dutch river steamers, and not only to those tubby craft, but to the scenery. "Scenery, quotha!" he bitterly remarks; "it is no worse than melancholy—so utterly null—that the most joyous temperament must succumb to its baneful influence upon the spirits." He even falls foul of the harmless inoffensive windmills, has "ceased to wonder at Don Quixote's onslaught' on them, and asks, "What man with a touch of artistic feeling in his nature would not, after traversing Holland, laugh a grim laugh of savage enjoyment if he heard that they had all been razed to the ground—to the water" he "should say; for it is but little ground they have to stand on in the Low Countries, save where, as in Rotterdam, they wave their wings, like pre-Adamite dragon-flies, in the middle of a crowded thoroughfare." The Rotterdammers, thankful for small mercies, will, we are sure, be pleased at even so slight a compliment as this. Then, "dear me!" says the still bitterly aggrieved "Wanderer," "what a lot of water there is in Holland! The whole realm is a huge aquarelle!" He "feels so bad" with regard to the water that he descends to a pun, hinting that, as "The Pays-Bas must be the region of rheumatism; their capital, with the aid of a little Cockneyism, might appropriately be called The Ache." As with Mr. Dick and his memorial, so with Mr. Kingston and the Dutch windmills—they are never out of his head. There is Dortrecht, at which you arrive when you have quitted "the crawling train for the filthy steamer"—"Dortrecht, a quiet little town, &c."; but Mr. Kingston "would not have any one think that it is short of windmills, oh! dear no, quite the contrary." Worst of all, however, is the unkind assertion that Holland "is chiefly composed of slop." The satirist does not even spare Schevening, "spelt," as he facetiously remarks, "in three ways":—"The place, when I first made its acquaintance, possessed a very respectable sea, one or two large hotels . . . . a long brick promenade, and no end of sand. . . . Were not extreme opinions out of fashion, I think I should feel tempted to aver that Schevening is the very dullest place out, except, perhaps, Sandwich on a hot day, John o' Groat's in a Scotch mist, and the town of Lille at any and every time!" Another page is headed, "Dutch torments," but we had not the heart to continue the perusal of the indictment, our own idea of Holland being so very different from Mr. Kingston's. Ostend ought to be greatly obliged to the "Wanderer" for his flattering notice of the place, and more particularly of the costumes of the fair baigneuses, from which Mr. Jan Van Beer, or some member of his happy family, might easily paint one of his quaint anatomical studies. But Blankenberghe gets almost as badly snubbed as Schevening. Our author proceeds to Liége, which "appeared to me to possess one institution, in its way, quite unrivalled in Europe." This sounds well for the Liégeois, but it is only Mr. Kingston's artful method of leading us on, for he proceeds, more scornfully than ever, if that were possible:—

But then its way was an exceptional one—namely, the absolute non-fulfilment of the promise contained in its title, and of the [illegible] for which it was called into existence, and that was the Garden of Acclimatization. . . . . The only thing it had succeeded in acclimatizing—and that imperfectly, for it was very bad—was Vienna beer. As for the sparse, melancholy, and attenuated illustrations of natural history confined miserably within its limits, all that could be said about them was that their arrangement was a triumph of incongruity—that sort of systematic antithesis, or series of anomalies, that would have caused the virtuous Buffon to blaspheme, and driven Cuvier to seek eternal oblivion in the family water-butt.

* A Wanderer's Notes. By W. Beatty-Kingston. 2 vols. London: Chapman & Hall. 1888.

The vein of pleasant irony running through the volumes will greatly tend to recommend them to most people, for the satire, even when grimmest, is never unkind, and serves as a sauce piquante to the heavier chapters, albeit there are very few indeed of them. Arrived at Berlin, Mr. Kingston was doubtless tempted to be didactic, for he knows the Kaiserstadt au fond; he avoids prosiness, however, and tells us a great deal about military matters and soldier life which will be new to nine out of ten readers. Very agreeable, too, are the chapters painting with Meissonier-like minuteness the life of Homburg, Baden-Baden, Ems, and Spa of twenty years ago, in the old gambling days, when the "hells" of those notorious resorts were most appropriately named, for most of the scoundrelism and blackguardism of the world congregated at "the tables" of MM. Blanc and Benazet, who got their final marching-orders in 1872. With Eastern Europe Mr. Kingston is almost as well acquainted as with West Hampstead, and the abundant information concerning the moral and material progress made by Roumania and Bulgaria of late years deserves, and will probably secure, careful perusal at a moment when the war-storm seems about to burst once again. Mr. Kingston sketches all he sees lightly and gracefully, and with no little humour. To say that he is seldom dull might be to pay him a dubious compliment. We can safely say, however, that most people will laugh heartily over his stories and enjoy his descriptions of many familiar and unfamiliar places and people. Once take up the book and you are bound to go on with it, and when you have finished the "Notes" the chances are that you will want to begin them again from the beginning.

THE GOTHS.*

TO tell the "Story of the Goths" as it should be told demands a minute and critical knowledge of some of the obscurer parts of history, the power of writing with spirit as well as with scientific exactness, and a considerable acquaintance with philology. Short as the book before us is, it contains many things that prove it to be the work of a scholar fitted in every respect for the work he has undertaken. Among the philological matters of which Mr. Bradley treats are the signification of the name Goths, which he derives from a word found only in compounds, such as Gut-thiuda, "people of the Goths," and signifying "the (nobly) born," the derivation of the Runic alphabet, which, in common with Dr. Isaac Taylor, he traces to a corruption of the old Greek alphabet, and the character and value of Wulfila's Gothic Bible. He begins his story with the division of the Goths, while settled on the northern shore of the Black Sea, into Thervings, or Visigoths, and Greutungs, or Ostrogoths; notes the curious coincidence that these latter names, West Goths and East Goths, "continued to be appropriate down to the latest days of Gothic history"; and gives a rapid sketch of the wars of the Goths with the Eastern Empire until their overthrow by Claudius at Naissus. The importance of this battle is well pointed out. Had the Goths been victorious, the South of Europe would have lain at their mercy, and "many ages of civilization would in a great measure have been blotted out." When the day of their triumph came they had already accepted Christianity, and were to some extent civilized, and they appear as the "saviours of the Roman world" from degradation and misgovernment. After bringing down Ostrogothic history to the end of the period of Hunnish sovereignty and to the birth of Theoderic, the "child of victory," on the day of his uncle's triumph over the Huns, Mr. Bradley follows the relations between the Visigoths and the Roman Emperors, describes the folly of Valens, who allowed the Goths to enter the Empire, and then "let them be goaded into rebellion," and gives a spirited account of their victory over him at Hadrianople. After this calamity, the only hope of saving the Empire lay in the policy of "unreserved confidence" adopted by Theodosius, whose "seeming rashness was the truest prudence." The effects of his wise policy were wiped out by the short-sighted conduct of the Roman Government under his successors. For a while the successes of Alaric were checked by the victories of Stilicho; it again seemed possible that the Visigoths might become useful allies of a Roman Emperor, and again, after the death of Stilicho, the Romans wantonly provoked them. Rome received their answer when, to quote Gibbon's words, "at midnight the Salarian gate was silently opened, and the inhabitants were awakened by the tremendous sound of the Gothic trumpet." Conquered as Rome was, she nevertheless gained a victory over her barbarian conquerors; for Atawulf declared that he was "convinced that the Goths were too rude and lawless to be capable of ruling the world"; he sought an alliance with Honorius, and the ceremonies observed at his marriage with Galla Placidia signified the power that Imperial Rome exercised over his mind. Difference of religion was, however, an endless and fruitful source of discord between the Goths and the Romans, and the Visigothic kingdom, which took in Spain and nearly all Gaul south of Loire and west of the Rhône, was weakened by theological hatred. The Goths were Arians, their Gaulish subjects Catholics, and though the Goths were generally tolerant, the Church in Southern Gaul fell into a state of disorganization under their rule, and "this excited the bitterest indignation both in the kingdom itself and among Catholic Christians in all the neighbouring lands." In spite of the mediation of Theoderic the Ostrogoth, Clovis took advantage of the Arianism of the Visigoths, made war on them as heretics, and drove them out of nearly all their Gaulish dominions. Mr. Bradley's account of the life and reign of Theoderic is excellent as far as it goes. The subject has been so thoroughly worked by Mr. Hodgkin that it is probably impossible to add anything to what he has written on it. At the same time, it is a gain to have his conclusions presented in a short and popular form, and by an author who has evidently studied the Variæ diligently on his own account. In the remarks on Theoderic's policy of religious toleration some notice should have been taken of the power of the Roman Church, and of the political influence that the theological disputes of Constantinople exercised in Italy, and more emphasis might well have been laid on the nature of Theoderic's blunder, which arrayed all the might of the Church in opposition to the Gothic rule and on the side of the Emperor. The long war which began with the siege of Naples by Belisarius, and ended with the extinction of the Ostrogothic nation, is admirably told. A necessarily brief record is given of the somewhat obscure history of the Visigothic kings of Spain, and the volume ends with a notice of the last traces of the once mighty nation of the Goths.

* The Story of the Nations—The Goths. By Henry Bradley. London: T. Fisher Unwin. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1888.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION.*

THE proposition that no scheme of national education is complete unless it embraces the teaching of handicrafts is prominently considered in all three of the interesting volumes before us, despite certain modifications of view which are in each instance the result of experience rather than of tenacious faith in theory. Mr. Leland and Professor Woodward alike urge the importance of industrial art or science training in Government schools, and their books are records of practical experience. Though Mr. Leland is principally concerned with the development of industrial art instruction, and Mr. Woodward's scheme of manual training is chiefly scientific, the tendency of both books is the same. They revolutionize the pedagogic ideal of education. Their aim is the fuller equipment of the young for the competitive struggles of life. Their method is uncompromisingly objective. They would train the eye and the hand by practical acquaintance with technical means, mechanical appliances, and so forth, instead of merely cramming the youthful brain with facts and figures drawn from books. Mr. Leland is not more convinced of the exceeding value of object lessons than Mr. Woodward is of the advantages that spring from the collateral instruction of class-rooms and workshops. Miss Margaret Smith's excellent translation of Herr Seidel's discourse on industrial instruction introduces a remarkable work to English and American readers. Herr Seidel is something more than a theorist, steeped in the ideas of Rousseau, Jean Paul, Pestalozzi, Froebel, Rosmini, and other educational apostles, and he is altogether free from the dogmatism of a reformer with a theory of his own. He has long been an observer—and, as his book shows, an enlightened observer—of the practical outcome of public education in Europe, whence the movement in England and America in favour of technical education has directly sprung. If he makes no reference to English or American activity in this direction, it is—and Mr. Woodward acknowledges as much with respect to his own country—because Germany, France, and other Continental countries were first in the field. Herr Seidel is chiefly occupied in this little book in combatting objections to industrial instruction in primary schools. He concludes with an eloquent panegyric of labour, but he is careful to distinguish between the labour of little hands in the course of training and that of adults in the markets of the world. Though we are told he was first attracted to educational problems by the writings of Karl Marx, he approaches the subject from the standpoint of his own experience as teacher, and not wholly from that of the Socialist or economist. It is clear from his supplementary résumé that Herr Seidel's advocacy of hand labour in schools is inspired by the strongest conviction of its preparative virtue as a means towards development and a safeguard against idleness, "the beginning of all crimes." He does not regard the introduction of manual labour in schools with favour wholly, because, as Karl Marx says, it will increase the "productiveness of the community." The phrase is liable to serious misapprehension when used in connexion with this subject. It is one of the commonest objections to industrial training in schools, when such training goes hand in hand with the practice of handicrafts, that competition with certain trades or arts is excited that may prove dangerous. Herr Seidel declares that this can never arise while schools are schools and factories remain factories. No school in which manual instruction is given can compete with the manufactory, with its skilled workmen and machinery. Any attempt to push the legitimate uses of industrial training beyond the true sphere of education would be "in no way educative, but, like factory labour, would be stupefying in its effects." Mr. Woodward writes in the same spirit of the aims of the Manual Training School, connected with the Washington University, at St. Louis, Mo. "We do not claim to teach trades," he says; "everything is for the benefit of the boy. He is the only article to be put upon the market." He repeatedly observes that there is no competition, attempted or possible, between the workshops of the school and manufactories, machine works, and so forth. Each of the three divisions of the school is occupied daily with one hour of drawing and two hours of shop work, while a minimum of three hours is devoted to mathematics, literature, languages, and science, with "enough private study," as Mr. Woodward rather vaguely remarks, "to learn those lessons." The Manual Training Schools in America, of which the St. Louis school is a type, are therefore much more than preparatory to technical institutes. The result aimed at is certainly not mean. "The cultured mind, the skilful hand"; this is their motto.

* Practical Education. By Charles G. Leland. London: Whittaker & Co. 1888.

The Manual Training School. By C. M. Woodward. Boston: Heath & Co.

Industrial Instruction. By Robert Seidel. Translated by Margaret K. Smith. Boston: Heath & Co.

The moral of these volumes is one, and sufficiently obvious. No scheme of technical education can be productive of large and beneficent results to the nation that is not based on elementary training. It must begin with primary schools and continue, not supersede, the first objective training of youth. When bad times and the disconcerting progress of science overtook our laggard farmers, it was seriously suggested that the Royal Agricultural Society should set about the business of teaching farmers how to farm profitably. Quite recently it was proposed to establish training colleges for intending emigrants, in order that they should not land on foreign shores entirely destitute of chemical knowledge and the handling of implements. This would be an excellent scheme, if those to benefit by it were children, which is precisely what agricultural emigrants seldom are. Mr. Leland tells the story of a very great artist, who, when complimented on his skill, remarked, "I began to draw at fourteen; and every day of my life I realize the fact that I should draw twice as well if I had begun at seven." There may be something in this of the self-depreciation of genius; but there is no doubt about the truth of Mr. Leland's corollary. "From seven to fourteen years of age a certain suppleness, knack, or dexterous familiarity with the pencil or any implement may be acquired which diminishes with succeeding years." And so it is with memory and the perceptive faculty, in proof of which Mr. Leland has much to say concerning his own experience when director of the Public Industrial Art School at Philadelphia. As becomes its title, Mr. Leland's book will be found extremely interesting to teachers, for it is almost entirely founded on practice. Its educational scheme owes very much to Froebel, it is true; but, while Mr. Leland supports it by much wholesome evidence of good fruit, as well as persuasive reasoning, he is keen to detect the faults of the Kindergarten system. There is great force in his remark on the monotony of certain mental exercises or "games" in Kindergarten schools, which have too much of drill or discipline in them to be really recreative and pleasing. Mr. Leland's fundamental aim is to develope the power of learning. Before learning children should acquire the art of learning. And if the ready reader should assume that this is rather the teacher's province, and nothing but the art of teaching, a few pages of the book will soon convince him that Mr. Leland's ideal teacher is not to be picked up in the street or in any Board School.

Naturally, Mr. Leland devotes considerable space to his introduction into American schools of the minor arts and industries, and he has much to say of the marketable nature of the art work produced. He is not at all shy on the subject of competition with the manufacturer and shopkeeper. There is, he thinks, and there ought to be, such competition. He declares that home-made art can rival machine-made work even in price, and he makes certain statements with regard to the metal work of the schools of the Home Arts and Industries Association that ought to render middlemen uneasy and manufacturers agog to reply. But art in Mr. Leland's schools is productive, it would appear, of nothing but beautiful things and fit. It is far above the German brooms and brushes, the Swiss toys, the wooden platters, the straw rugs, and other humble articles of industry mentioned by Herr Seidel. Mr. Woodward's volume is admirably illustrated by diagrams and plans. It comprises a brief but clear sketch of the Manual Training School movement in America, and a full account of the course of study and method of administration pursued at the St. Louis establishment. No one who cares for the cause of technical education can afford to overlook so interesting a record of an interesting experiment.

HISTORY OF AMERICA.—VOL. VI.*

ALTHOUGH this volume of Mr. Winsor's History is in no way inferior to its predecessors either in accuracy or in the critical treatment of authorities, the inconveniences attendant on his plan of historical co-operation are more apparent than they have been before. What we have here is not a history of the American Revolution so much as a series of papers on different phases of it, and this piecemeal method of writing history, which answered well enough when applied to voyages of discovery or the domestic affairs of the various colonies, is ill suited to a subject that requires comprehensive and orderly treatment. While the work of each writer generally leaves little to be desired, the volume as a whole fails to satisfy us. Some subjects of extreme importance receive very inadequate notice. Little, for example, can be gathered, and that only with much labour, as to the feelings with which the mass of the inhabitants of the various colonies regarded the revolutionary struggle at different periods. Financial matters are almost wholly neglected, and the reader is left to find out from other sources how money was raised to meet the expenses of the war, though lack of funds was one of the most serious difficulties that confronted the leaders of the revolutionary party. The scanty notice that is given of the fluctuations in the value of the currency, and the prevalence of questionable or decidedly dishonest dealings in money, merely comes in as a sort of introduction to the account of Arnold's disgrace. While the details of each campaign are recorded with a minuteness that is sometimes tedious, the alliance with France is only mentioned allusively. As the next volume is, we see, to be devoted to the diplomacy of the war, it will no doubt receive due attention there, but it exercised so marked an effect on the events of the war, that it should certainly not be altogether separated from them in a "Narrative History." And this is by no means the only case in which the arrangement adopted here strikes us as clumsy and confusing. For the purposes of cartographical illustration it may be convenient to treat the two campaigns on the Hudson in a single article, but to follow Washington's movements until his retreat into New Jersey, then to give the whole story of the campaign in the North, and after recounting such a decisive event as the Convention of Saratoga, to call the reader back to the winter of 1776, is not the way in which the history of the war should be written. Again, in the paper on the "War in the Southern Department" we are told that "in the early autumn D'Estaing, who after leaving Newport had been cruising with some success in the West Indies, now turned northerly." This is the first mention that we have of D'Estaing, and the reader has to go through more than a hundred pages before he finds out who D'Estaing was or what brought him to Newport. The volume opens with a temperately-written paper by Mr. Chamberlain on the causes of the Revolution and the events that immediately preceded it. His arrangement, however, strikes us as somewhat faulty, and we cannot agree with all he says. Although it suited Franklin and others "to take high prerogative ground," the doctrine that the colonists were "the King's subjects" in any other sense than the inhabitants of Great Britain, and were, in virtue of their relationship to the Crown, in any way exempt from the authority of Parliament, is utterly vain. There is no evidence of such exemption either in their charters or their history, nor was it within the power of an English sovereign to place any number of his subjects outside the dominion of Parliament. The "alleged necessity" for taxing the colonies was not a mere pretence. Troops from England had not only been used in the war with France, and later for the protection of the colonists, who had shown some unwillingness to defend themselves against the Indians, but were needed in order to strengthen the Executive and to enforce the observance of the commercial laws. No doubt these laws were as a whole prejudicial to the interests of the colonies, though, as is frankly allowed here, they afforded them some compensating advantages. Still, whatever may be thought of them, it was clearly the duty of the supreme Government to check the lawless disregard of them that had become prevalent during the late war. But, like the people of the mother-country, the Americans had no love for a standing army, and greater prominence should have been given to the influence of this feeling on the progress of discontent. In common, we imagine, with a good many other people, Mr. Chamberlain thinks that the Riot Act rendered it unlawful in any case for soldiers to fire on a mob without the order of a civil magistrate, and he astonishes us by announcing that Burke was "not acting in good faith" when he brought forward his resolutions condemning the policy, or rather lack of policy, pursued by Lord North's Administration with respect to American affairs, on the ground that some one or other observed that he was acting not so much for the good of the colonies as in the interests of the Opposition. Mr. Chamberlain ought to know that Burke's good faith is not to be impugned on the strength of observations of this sort, and would do well to learn what is implied by government by party. The editor's narrative of the early events of the war is fairly interesting, and his critical essay exhaustive and admirably illustrated. It is followed by a rather unsatisfactory paper on the "Sentiment of Independence." The author—who, by the way, believes that an English bishop is a "lord both spiritual and temporal"—says that "it is rarely when so large a measure of the responsibility for bringing about a signal revolution in the great affairs of a nation can, as in this instance, be charged upon an individual, and that was his Majesty George III." To this remarkable sentence the editor appends a footnote, pointing out that the King was not individually responsible for the outbreak of the war. This is well enough; but Mr. Winsor should not have printed the author's foolish remarks on this subject in the text of a work for which he is responsible.

Major-General Cullum contributes an excellent account of the * Narrative and Critical History of America. Edited by Justin Winsor, Librarian of Harvard University. Vol. VI. The United States of North America. Part I. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1888.

"Struggle for the Hudson," and adds some sound criticisms on the mistakes committed by Howe and Burgoyne. In his accoun of the Northern campaign he warmly defends Schuyler from the unfavourable judgment pronounced on him by Mr. Bancroft, and contends with good reason that he prepared the way for Gates's success by baffling Burgoyne, who was already in great difficulties when Schuyler was most unfairly superseded. He devotes a long note to the breach of the Convention of Saratoga, and decides that "neither party was scrupulous in carrying out its obligations." We are unable to see that Burgoyne's hesitation, which, after all, came to nothing, as to finally signing the Convention, or his hasty remark when complaining of the ill-usage of his troops, or such trifles as the non-surrender of the cartouch-boxes, in any degree justify the refusal of Congress to allow the troops to embark. General Cullum allows that the resolution of Congress was "disingenuous and contrary to the principles of international law," and it is a pity that he tries to find excuses for it by endeavouring, as we think most unsuccessfully, to show that it was provoked by the conduct of the British. The causes of Burgoyne's failure are clearly exhibited. Even if Lord George Germaine had not added to his other iniquities by neglecting to order Howe to co-operate with the army in Canada, it would have been almost impossible for him to have done so effectually; for the bases of the two armies were separated "by four hundred miles of wild, hostile, and thinly populated country." Burgoyne had no adequate means of provisioning his troops, and his army was often on reduced rations; he made more than one serious mistake in tactics, and when he might have followed up his early successes by pressing vigorously on a "demoralized foe," gave the Americans time to recover confidence. In his chapter on the "Struggle for the Delaware,' Mr. Stone takes up the story of Washington's operations at the moment of his retreat through New Jersey, when the fortunes of the colonists were at their lowest ebb. He shows how by the exercise of extraordinary skill and courage, seconded by Howe's inactivity, Washington succeeded in proving that the cause of the rebels was not hopeless; for, though they were defeated at Germantown, "the moral results of the battle were in their favour," and he describes the deplorable condition of the army at Valley Forge, and the attacks made upon Washington by a jealous faction among the other generals, who contrasted the small apparent results of the Southern campaign with Gates's success in the North. A few details are given of the gaieties in Philadelphia during the British occupation, and the narrative is brought down to the evacuation of the city and the failure of the attempt to cut off Clinton's rear-guard at Monmouth. Besides adding a valuable note on the sources of information, Mr. Winsor relates and examines the story of Arnold's desertion and the execution of André. That André's execution can be defended by the rules of war is, of course, generally allowed; indeed, as far as technical grounds are concerned, the only point that can be urged in his favour is that he was not aware until too late that Arnold was bringing him within the enemy's lines. As we have, in an article to which Mr. Winsor does us the honour to refer, already discussed the question whether Washington acted in a manner worthy of his high character in delivering over this gallant young officer to a shameful death, we shall not return to the subject. We must, however, express our regret that Mr. Winsor has thought it seemly to end his note with the remark that "the power to face death with a calm and graceful courage may, indeed, be mated with the moral lightness that belongs to an intellectual popinjay and a debased intriguer." If he does not mean these epithets to apply to André, the sentence is simple bunkum; if he does, it proves that he is incapable of fulfilling one of the first duties of an historian. Mr. Channing, who writes on the "War in the Southern Department," points out how far Clinton and Cornwallis differed as to the plan of operations, considers that Cornwallis is not to be held responsible for the fortification of Yorktown, and acquits both Clinton and Admiral Graves of negligence in delaying to relieve him on the ground that the fleet had suffered so severely in the recent encounter with De Grasse that it could not put to sea until the damage had been repaired. The chapter on the "Naval History of the American Revolution" is confined to notices of privateers, such as Paul Jones and Wickes, and of the few ships that were fitted out by Congress. While privateers sailing under the rebel flag undoubtedly did much harm to English commerce, every attempt the Americans made at combined naval action was completely unsuccessful; and until a French fleet came to their assistance their naval operations had no effect on the progress of the war. The border warfare of the whole period, from the outbreak of Pontiac's rebellion to the Peace of Versailles, is separately treated by Mr. Davis, who makes it perfectly clear that the rebels were the first to employ Indians in the war, and that they would undoubtedly have employed them far more largely than they did if they had been able to bring them over to their side. The maps and plans with which this volume is liberally supplied add greatly to its value, and are of much service to the reader. At the same time, some of the fac-similes of proclamations and the like that are given in the narrative portions of the work interrupt the text in a rather annoying manner.

WILLIAM III.*

AMONG Mr. Morley's commissioners for the purpose of biographizing "Twelve English Statesmen," no one, perhaps, has a subject more clearly marked off and mapped out beforehand than Mr. Traill has had with William the Deliverer. Almost the only possible danger in this direction was that to which Mr. Freeman has partially succumbed in his dealing with the other William—the danger of bestowing too much space on the early and non-English years of his hero. But a writer practised, like Mr. Traill, in more periods than one of history, and more branches than one of literature, is exceptionally free from this risk. He has kept the general purpose and purport of the series steadily in view, and prefacing only so much as was necessary to put the reader in a proper position to judge, has devoted himself mainly, if not wholly, to his title-subject of William III. as an English statesman.

To only one class of persons—the devotees of Macaulay per fas et nefas—is his dealing likely to be other than satisfactory; and that, alas! cannot be helped. It is now a well-established rule, broken in no single instance, that whenever a patient, intelligent, and impartial student comes to rehandle in detail a subject which Macaulay has treated, he has to fall foul of that very brilliant and singularly untrustworthy person. No matter what the subject is—Bacon, Dryden, Claverhouse, Marlborough, William, Impey—the result is quite sure to be the same. The newcomer may rashly and remorselessly shock and upset Macaulay's conclusions, or he may delicately and gingerly remove them and put others in their places, protesting all the while that he thinks Macaulay a greater writer and a greater historian than Gibbon and Thucydides rolled into one, or he may (which is rather Mr. Traill's way) indicate, without either hard or soft language, where Macaulay is wrong. But so long as he is honest and competent the actual result of his investigations is sure to be generally the same. He will find, and he will have to let his readers know, that Macaulay's probably unique combination of the qualities and defects of the special pleader and the rhetorician has made his estimates, whether favourable or unfavourable, constantly untrustworthy, and sometimes, though no doubt not intentionally, yet positively, deceptive. Mr. Traill's contribution to this extensive and as yet unfinished work is a remarkably useful one, for the precise reason that it is quite uncoloured by any kind of passion, even the passion of the counter-advocate. Although he writes pretty obviously as a Tory in most points, he does not display the least leaning to Jacobitism; he is thoroughly convinced that "the Revolution settlement" was the right settlement for England, and his estimate of William's character is decidedly favourable, and, as regards the Deliverer's political honesty, almost enthusiastic.

He speaks accordingly with the greater authority when he points out that the sublime and areopagitic foresight and wisdom of the founders of the above-mentioned settlement is a "Whig legend"; and that the discovery of rigid Party government as rapturously made by Macaulay and nailed down, if not exactly to day yet to year—the years 1693-1695—is a mare's-nest and an anachronism by about half a century. On this latter point the facts are too clear to admit even of discussion. On the former, though Mr. Traill is quite right as against Macaulay and the legend-mongers, we are inclined to think that even he has been rather too merciful to this second B. R. or Blessed Revolution. While pointing out that all the actual parties were illogical and unconstitutional in their contentions, he omits to point out that the very Convention itself was, as a constitutional body, without a leg to stand on. The analogy with its predecessor the Convention which invited Charles II. from Breda will not hold for a moment. Nobody regarded this earlier Convention as a Constituante; the King was there ready made; it had only got to invite, to welcome him, and to receive his already authoritative acceptance and approval of its acts. The later Convention had not only no authority to assemble, but it had none to separate or to transform itself into a Parliament, for the necessary Royal assent was only given, and could only be given, by an authority which the Convention itself had created—an authority which, according to the most obvious rules both of law and of logic, could be in no sense superior to that of its source. Further, such vague and shadowy authority as the Convention did possess, derived from the previous Congress of the members of Parliament, was hopelessly flawed by the exclusion of just those persons who were in a sense representative—the members of the Parliament of James II. All this does not, of course, make against the "settlement" viewed as a coup d'état (which it was in fact, though not in form or origin), perfectly lawless in origin, but beneficial in consequence; nor does it make against Mr. Traill's milder, but not wholly dissimilar, view of it as "a dispute of preferences between alternative candidates for the throne." On the contrary, it illustrates still more forcibly an excellent sentence of his own:—"All our great constitutional precedents are the parents of principle rather than its offspring; we deduce our theories from accomplished facts, themselves determined by no theoretical considerations, but by certain practical exigencies of the moment."

Another excellent test-passage is that in which Mr. Traill deals with the Glencoe business and Macaulay's singular excuse for William. The matter is so complicated that probably no absolutely certain result as to all points of it can ever be arrived at. But Mr. Traill's supposition that William did entertain, as almost any seventeenth-century commander would have entertained, the idea of the Macdonalds being extirpated as a military necessity, though he certainly did not entertain the idea of the treacherous scoundrelism actually committed, is certainly more reasonable than Macaulay's supposition that one of the most businesslike of rulers first signed general death warrants without looking at them, then "forgot" to inquire into the matter when the Scotch Parliament actually set inquiry on foot, and, lastly, took no steps to punish Dalrymple for what, if this theory be accepted, was a most atrocious and insolent abuse of the King's confidence and the King's power. And in the same way the various questions requiring treatment are handled throughout—that is to say, with a perfect absence of prejudice, and with that faculty of judging evidence which the historians of special periods and special persons in our day display perhaps less often than any other quality. The general narrative is also good, and though Mr. Traill does not pretend to deal with military matters with any extreme minuteness, his handling of them is judicious and thorough. He is, we think, quite right in holding that in the wars which were ended for a time by the peace of Ryswick, William was distinctly out-generalled, though he is not ungenerous enough to draw the moral that "the little gentleman in black velvet" is sincerely to be thanked for having let in a better commander to conduct the final struggle. But, though he does not do this, he does take occasion, and we are very glad of it, to denounce and expose the modern delusion of Radicals and historicasters, that the efforts of William and of Marlborough were productive of no good to England. Of all the historical events of the last three hundred years, three things have done most, have done indeed almost everything by themselves, to make the greatness of England; and these three things are—the struggles with Spain during the sixteenth century, and the struggles with France at the beginning and end of the eighteenth. Of the various heroes who conducted these on the English side, Mr. Traill has had to do with the least personally engaging. It is true that William's inviolable honesty (at least as to his bargain with the English people and Parliament) and his steadfast heroism enable one to regard him, if not exactly with admiration, at any rate with respect, and Mr. Traill has skilfully availed himself of this. Indeed he is rather kind to the unquestionable ingratitude and duplicity of William's conduct towards his father-in-law before the actual landing at Torbay. But, on the whole, his estimate and sentence are just as well as generous; and his summing-up is worth quoting as an excellent piece of historical writing:—

* Twelve English Statesmen—William the Third. By H. D. Traill. London: Macmillan & Co. 1888.

Nor in what has been written in criticism of the Whig legend would I for a moment be suspected of undervaluing the debt which Englishmen owe to William of Orange. It is not necessary to exalt him into a divinely inspired progenitor of the British Constitution in order to recognize fully the greatness of the services which he rendered to it. He was not "Father of the Constitution" in the sense in which the poet is the father of his poem, or the philosopher of his theory; but assuredly he was so in the sense in which we say that a child has found a "second father" in an upright guardian, who, while not, it may be, comprehending his character, or in sympathy with his spirit, or foreseeing his future, has yet been his vigilant protector through the perils of childhood, and has accounted for his patrimony to the uttermost farthing. That William stood in this relation to our modern English polity thoughout his too short reign, and that he loyally discharged its obligations, is indisputable. The virtues which enabled him to do so were mainly three, which are essential to all good and faithful guardianship, whether of children or constitutions—the virtues of good sense, self-restraint, and honesty. And the greatest of these three is honesty. William's practical wisdom always told him the moment when to yield in a struggle with his Parliament; and when that moment arrived his naturally passionate temper never failed to answer to the rein. But even at those moments there would often have been an evil alternative open to him, from which the fundamental integrity of his nature always turned aside. He scrupled not to use all the arts of political "management" which were sanctioned by the lax morality of his day; he exerted his prerogative freely to gain his ends; but he knew that the compact between him and his people was that in the last resort the will of the people should prevail, and this compact he never attempted either to violate or to evade. Here he was as emphatically a Re Galantuomo, a "King Honestman," as was Victor Emmanuel himself.

"Hos ante effigies majorum pone tuorum, Præcedant ipsas illi, te consule, virgas."

Rulers who have earned this name may justly rank it, if only for its rarity, above every other title of honour—even though, themselves the creators or regenerators of nations, they can look back upon the splendid achievements of the Counts of Nassau, or the long ancestral glories of the House of Savoy.

If we add a short phrase of happy irony from an earlier passage—

Fate made William of Orange a Whig hero, and in arranging his preliminary condition ordained also by inevitable sequence his exposure to some measure of the polemical resentments which his votaries have never failed to concentrate upon themselves.—

we shall have shown to some extent the goodness of the manner in which Mr. Traill has set forth matter unusually sound and good.

GEORGE EDMUND STREET.*

It is well that a record should be published of the life and work of an architect of such eminence as the late Mr. Street; and we cannot but think that the author of the volume before us has been well advised in restricting his pages as much as possible to an account of his lamented father's public career. The private life of Mr. Street was marked by events which brought upon him a somewhat larger share of personal sorrow than falls to the lot of every one. These passages are but briefly detailed. With his success as an architect, and his gradual rise to the head of his profession, his biographer is much more concerned, and his many faithful friends will welcome this memorial of one who deserves to be recalled with warm regret. The seven years which have passed since his sudden death have thinned the ranks of those who knew him best and loved him most. But enough remain to recommend his career as one worthy to be studied by the younger members of his profession. The example he set of thoroughness in his work deserves to be widely known. His "infinite capacity for taking pains," coupled with an eye for beauty of form and line, gave him the best chances of success; and, though the largest of his works are not the greatest, it must be allowed that it is where external interference, not any fault of the architect, marred the original designs. Street was probably one of the most indefatigable workers who ever lived. His biographer quotes a passage from his diary showing what he got through on three successive days. One of them is as follows:—

Design for reredos for York Minster. Ground plan for new church at Barnsley. Wrote to Mr. Roe with estimate for the completion of Christ Church, Dublin. Altered design for altar-cloth, St. Paul's, Rome. Drew large gates and railings, Marlborough College.

Some great men show their ability in finding and directing others to do their work. This was especially the case with a very eminent architect a little the senior of Street. His pupils were many and served him well, while they rapidly acquired skill in design. But it was not Street's way. Whatever issued from his office had gone through his own hands, and bore the impress of his own mind, and no one else's. Whether this is well or ill we cannot undertake to say. It had at least two drawbacks. The first was, that the pupils and assistants obtained less practice and knowledge than if there had been more entrusted to them; and the second was still more serious. The architect himself was worn out. He was only fifty-seven when he died of a second attack of paralysis, brought on by private sorrow, no doubt, in some degree, but chiefly by incessant labour, prolonged through whole days and into the small hours. Like many other men of delicate artistic perceptions, he was very fond of music, and had he not turned architect would assuredly have been a remarkable painter. His sketches were often finished pictures, and the rapidity and ease with which he drew were only exceeded by his accuracy. One of his friends had a photographic album, on a large page of which she had put Mr. Street's photograph. One day while chatting in the middle of the family he drew on this page with pen and ink the picture of an old village inn, the signboard being the G. E. Street's Head. His son reports of him on a sketching tour that, after travelling by train all night, he would begin drawing on a bitter spring morning with his pencil as steady and as agile as in midsummer. "He drew just as well and firmly whether he supported his book on his knee or merely held it in his hand as he stood." His advice to young sketchers always turned on the importance of self-reliance, and he never carried indiarubber.

Two things must be taken into account in estimating the merits of Street's great building, the New Law Courts. One is the constant and unnecessary interference of members of the Government with the design. The other, Street's failing health, and the final removal of the master's hand when the building was approaching completion. Compared with the only other two great Gothic secular buildings of our time in London—the Houses of Parliament and the St. Pancras Hotel—it stands very high both in picturesqueness and suitability to its purpose. Scott's Hotel shows us what he would have liked to do at the India Office, and, bad as the present building in Whitehall is, it might, we see, have been worse. The Palace of Westminster is designed on Classical, not on Gothic, principles. The New Law Courts, with much originality in detail, are essentially mediæval in treatment. Street entered on his work imbued with Gothic feeling and Gothic fervour; and had he not been thwarted and mortified, and the best features of his design nipped off, one by one, we might have had a worthy building at Temple Bar, one which might have solved for us the question between Gothic and Italian, which still remains unsettled.

Street's life very nearly "synchronized" with the rise, culmination, and decline of what is known in history as "the great Gothic revival." He describes in a lively letter the turn of the tide in the Institute; and his remarks, few and not ill-natured, on Sir William Tite give us a clue to the real bearings of the whole controversy. In 1841, when he began to study, Palladian architecture was dead. The prominent architects of the previous generation had, unfortunately, taken to "Grecian," of which it was not possible to know much at the time. Hardwick and Burton were men who would have succeeded in any style, and their comparative success in "Grecian" had a fatal effect on the old Italian, or Palladian style of Wren and Inigo Jones. It is quite possible that the mathematical or archæological difficulties which beset the path of the student of the so-called Grecian style turned the minds of the new school towards Gothic. Proportion was thrown to the winds, yet the old superstition about balance remained; and while Thompson of Glasgow was on the point of revealing a phase of Greek architecture which would have satisfied the requirements of the picturesque and classical schools equally, the "great Gothic revival" burst upon us. The Exhibition of 1851 and the Manchester Exhibition of 1857, with their attempts at modern imitation of the great thirteenth-century models, and their manifestation of the wonderful works of the pre-Raphaelite brotherhood, did much to foster the Gothic revival. On the top of the tide which flowed in for some twenty years we most frequently meet with the names of Scott, Street, and Burges. Of these Scott showed the least signs of original artistic genius, and Burges showed the greatest; yet the race was not to the swift nor the battle to the strong. Scott seldom came into competition with the other two, who were in fact his pupils; but Street repeatedly distanced Burges, who was heavily handicapped by his short sight. Scott suffered, but in a minor degree, from the same disadvantage; and Street, who had the eye of a hawk, or who, as Ben Jonson said of John Stow, had "most monstrous observation," no doubt, when anything was in competition, had much the best of it. But, except in few cases, and those, as it happened, cases of considerable prominence, Street avoided competitions. He took warmly to "restoration," and did many things of which he afterwards repented. His son is rather inclined to draw a veil across some of these atrocities; but it is known that during the last few years of his life Street sympathized with the objects of the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings. He strongly disapproved of the Vandalisms perpetrated at St. Albans Abbey; and had probably learnt in his long experience that it is not possible to restore a church or any other building to the condition in which it stood so many years or centuries ago; while the greatest part of its historical or picturesque interest would be sacrificed in making the hopeless attempt.

* Memoir of George Edmund Street, R.A. By his Son, Arthur Edmund Street. London: Murray. 1888.

In his eighth chapter Mr. Arthur Street details the course of the long controversy about the New Law Courts, and his narrative is characterized by great moderation and fairness, considering the way things were managed, especially by Mr. Ayrton, who "professedly rega.ded and spoke of architecture as a trade of the same dignity as the market-gardener's." From February 1866 to February 1874, when at last the contracts were signed, Street was worried by every kind of great and little annoyance that could be put upon him. He "was the subject, more or less continuously, of bitter and personal attacks by the self-elected upholders of the canons of art," and was not supported as he should have been by the Office of Works—where, indeed, he received little countenance or encouragement. The petty delays caused by Mr. Ayrton's false and unreal attempts at economy were very costly. Prices were going up every day; the interest on the value of the site was accumulating rapidly. The rates and taxes on the empty land amounted to 9,500*l.* a year. Still Mr. Ayrton continued and protracted the controversy. Even long after work was begun a strike caused many months' delay, and, as Mr. Arthur Street justly observes, the amount of actual physical and mental work which the architect underwent in the execution of his task must have been a severe strain even to so robust a constitution. "My father," he says, "was constantly harassed day and night by his efforts to get the work through without a stoppage. He was successful, but it cost him his life."

We may remark, in conclusion, that this very interesting biography is badly in need of a table of contents and of chapter headings, and may note among the omissions that it contains no account of the church of St. Philip and St. James at Oxford. There should have been some notice of this remarkable building. Mr. Arthur Street does not apparently understand heraldry—an odd omission in the education of a Gothic architect—and in his first chapter speaks of a monument whereon "the arms of the Streets and Austens are quartered," when he should have said "impaled." These are small matters. The Memoir of George Edmund Street is a very charming book.

TENNYSON AND BROWNING.*

THE first volume of the convenient new edition of Browning's works contains Pauline and Sordello. When, in 1867, Mr. Browning, for the first time, included the former among his collected works, he did it in some sort under compulsion, being satisfied that, if he neglec ed to reprint it himself, some one at least of the existing transcripts would receive the honours of type at other hands. He then issued it without changing a syllable, and introduced it with "an exculpatory word" to the effect that "it was a "crude preliminary sketch," made at a time when good draughtsmanship and right handling were beyond his power. Now, twenty years after, to leave it still unaltered has seemed intolerable, and "the helplessness of juvenile haste and heat" has been crutched and controlled by the aid of experience. Solecisms have been removed, metre mended, phraseology strengthened, and to the long prefatory quotation from Cornelius Agrippa is appended a footnote in square brackets emphasizing the fact that it refers to and implies, not the fragment which is now Pauline, but the non-existent whole of which Pauline is actually a part. Some of the alterations consist in the breaking up of the piece into shorter metrical paragraphs, and there are many metre-mendings like the following;—

> As on the works of mighty bards I gazed,

for

> As I gazed on the works of mighty bards, which is certainly (as George says of the beer in the Old Curiosity Shop) "more flatterer than it might be." Elsewhere the replacing of

> For ever by those springs and trees fruit-flushed, by

> For ever 'neath those garden-trees fruit-flushed, corrects an original slip of the pen. There is not much in the way of actual addition, except that a broken line consisting of the single word "Smiling . . ." is made up by the addition of "Oh, vanity of vanities!" which can scarcely lay claim to great novelty as an utterance. At the same time a comparison of the parallel texts shows that the revision has been close and thorough. Whether it will have the effect of extending the study of this curious mental record beyond the inner circle of Browning students, to whom, we gather, it has always presented more than the average amount of "wild and whirling words," is matter of opinion. But, as Mrs. Sutherland Orr points out in her admirable handbook, while admitting it to be "the one of Mr. Browning's longer poems of which no intelligible abstract is possible" (rather an unwise phrase, by the way, to fling among the Philistines!), it contains much that throws a light upon the individuality of the poet himself. For example, there is the fine passage at page 14 beginning "I am made up of an intensest life"; there are the references to Plato which illustrate his early studies; and there are the tributes to Shelley, an invocation to whom as the "Sun-treader" concludes the fragment. The mention of Mrs. Orr reminds us that the other piece in the volume can scarcely now present its first asperities to those who, seeking for something craggy to break their spirits upon, take Sordello in combination with her skilful summary. But why are the old characteristic headlines omitted? And if "metre-mending" is to be the order of the day, surely one might plead for some readjustment of the curious line at page 288—

> Like the chine of some extinct animal—which only the most indulgent vocal coaxing can utter rhythmically.

Those who recall the appearance in 1864 of the plain green volume containing Enoch Arden, Aylmer's Field, Sea Dreams, Tithonus, the Northern Farmer, and the welcome to that gracious "Sea-kings' daughter from over the sea" who has since celebrated her silver wedding, will perhaps lament the unfamiliar arrangement which, careless not only of chronology but time-honoured association, pairs, in the fifth volume of Lord Tennyson's Works, the first-named poem with the In Memoriam of fourteen years before. But publishers take little count of the sentimental grievances of elderly persons in the forties who loved their Laureate when he was not yet a lord. They would probably bid them console themselves with better type, and Mr. Stodart's delicate vignette after Whattey of the little old-fashioned Clevedon church, between its rounded grass-grown cliffs, where, "by that broad water of the west," sleeps the body of Arthur Hallam:—

> And then I know the mist is drawn
> A lucid veil from coast to coast,
> And in the dark church like a ghost
> Thy tablet glimmers to the dawn.

How well one remembers words, epithets, stanzas in that wonderful measure of which so many "have got the seed!" By-and-bye will come the "copiously annotated" edition, whose readers will know all about the "bar of Michael Angelo," the "sea-blue bird of March," and the old cruces of the early students, perhaps even about > him who sings

> To one clear harp in divers tones;

although it has (we believe) been stated, "on the highest authority," that no such person exists. But will they ever read In Memoriam as we did—"we that are very old," as Steele says—will they ever watch with Enoch

> The blaze upon the waters to the east;
> The blaze upon his island overhead;
> The blaze upon the waters to the west:
> Then the great stars that globed themselves in Heaven,
> The hollower bellowing ocean, and again
> The scarlet shafts of sunrise—but no sail—

as watched we, to whom these poems of well nigh a quarter of a century ago have grown part of our experience and our expression? Let those who follow read them better; at least we read them first.

* The Poetical Works of Robert Browning. Vol. I. Pauline—Sordello. London: Smith, Elder, & Co. The Works of Alfred Lord Tennyson. Vol. V. Enoch Arden and In Memoriam. London: Macmillan & Co. 1888.

THE STORY OF CREATION.*

TO compress Darwin and Spencer and something more into 240 pages is a task for which few are competent and fewer still would care to attempt. This is what Mr. Clodd undertakes to do in the little volume before us; and, judging by the result, probably no one could have done it better. It is a service for which many serious people will be thankful, both among those who are inclined to accept Darwinism and those whose attitude to the new gospel is hostile. Not many have the time, even if they had the requisite training, to steer their way through the many volumes in which Darwin and Mr. Spencer have elaborated their systems. Yet it is absolutely necessary for every one who desires to be abreast of his time to have some clear, if elementary, knowledge of the theory of the universe which is connected with the names of these two potent thinkers and writers. Mr. Clodd, then, who is already known to many by his attractive and simple Childhood of the World, seeks in this new volume to trace the development of the universe from its elements on the lines of evolution. It is not necessary for us here to discuss the merits of the doctrine as an explanation of the origin and course of things; our business is simply to show what Mr. Clodd has done and how he has done it.

* The Story of Creation: a Plain Account of Evolution. By Edward Clodd. London: Longmans & Co. 1888.

After a brief introduction Mr. Clodd treats in the first chapter of the Contents of the Universe, which he tells us are Matter and Power, and in the present state of our knowledge no one can gainsay him; nor need the most orthodox fear to accept the position as a starting-point. The origin of Matter and the origin of Power are unthinkable without a cause. The real nature of Power is as much a mystery as the origin of Matter; all we can say about it is that it is invariably accompanied with motion of some kind. Mr. Clodd insists on the doctrine of the Indestructibility of Matter, and explains with great clearness Mendeleef's beautiful grouping of the elements, and the "periodic law" in which they are embraced. He points out that it is many years since Prout formulated the theory that the atomic weights are all multiples of the atomic weight of hydrogen, "the primordial element, the materia prima, from which the others are formed by successive condensations." But it is Mendeleef who has been able to adduce something like scientific proof as to the common origin of all the elements.

With Mr. Clodd's statements about Matter it would be difficult to find any fault; but when he comes to deal with "Power" it seems to us as if his usual clearness and grasp had been in abeyance. We all know the trouble that most writers—except Professor Tait—get into when they use the terms Force and Energy. Mr. Grant Allen endeavoured to get rid of the ever-recurring difficulty by using the term Power for the one activity which is at the bottom of all forms of motion, and deciding to call one set of results Force, and another set Energy. Mr. Clodd has unreservedly followed Mr. Grant Allen, and, as expounded by him, the new application of the terms seems to us quite arbitrary, and to make confusion worse confounded. "Force," according to Mr. Clodd's conception, "is that which produces or quickens motion, binding together two or more particles of ponderable matter, and which retards or resists motion tending to separate such particles. Gravitation, molecular attraction, or cohesion, and chemical attraction, or affinity, are given as examples of Force. "Energy," again, "is that which produces or quickens motion separately, and which resists or retards motion binding together two or more particles of matter, or of the ætherial medium." Mr. Clodd then refers to kinetic and potential energy, giving examples—a stone on a roof or a mountain, a clock wound up, &c., having potential energy, which becomes kinetic when the stone falls and the clock goes. The persistence of Force and the conservation of Energy are grouped under a common phrase, the Indestructibility of Power. Attraction between masses, or gravitation, is classed under Force, and of course includes the attraction between the moon and the earth. But the attraction between a falling stone and the earth is kinetic energy. Supposing, then, the stone fell from the moon, or, let us say, a bit of the moon itself fell, would that still be kinetic energy or only force? Again, "Attraction between atoms" is force, but "atoms rushing together to form molecules" is kinetic energy. Is not this really a distinction without a difference? We hope Mr. Clodd may be induced to revise this section for a new edition, and reduce it to the simplicity and clearness of the rest of the book.

After a chapter on the "Distribution of Matter in Space," Mr. Clodd deals with the geological record and the past life-history of the earth. This is an admirable chapter, in which the gradual development of life upon the earth from lower to higher forms, from that doubtful creature Eozoon Canadense up to man, is traced with an articulation and clearness that must convince any open-minded reader. The judiciously selected illustrations to this chapter are a great help, and include that insoluble crux to anti-evolutionists—the series showing the development of the horse's foot. The longest chapter in the book is that on present life-forms, in which the cell-theory is clearly expounded, and the analogies and difference between plants and animals explained. While Mr. Clodd shows that the two have much in common, and probably have a common origin, he cautions the uninformed reader against imagining that the animal is derived from the plant, that the one is a highly developed form of the other. These, however, are points which are brought out in detail in the second part, where Mr. Clodd shows that plants and animals are developed collaterally from a common centre. The first part is a succinct and trustworthy statement of the facts of creation on evolutionary lines, so far as investigation has gone. The whole is summarized, so far as life-forms are concerned, in a tree-like diagram, the root of which is protoplasm-plus-chlorophyll.

The second part of Mr. Clodd's volume is headed Explanatory, and here he endeavours to show how the facts of the first section are accounted for on the principles of evolution. The problem to be solved is thus succinctly and clearly stated by Mr. Clodd:—"Given Matter and Power as the raw materials of the universe, is the interaction of Power, under its two forms of a combining force and a separating energy, upon Matter sufficient to account for the totality of non-living and living contents of the universe?" The limits within which science feels herself competent to deal with the problem are so stated as to leave beyond an infinite field for conjecture. "Of the beginning, of what was before the present state of things, of what will follow the end of it, we know nothing, and speculation about it is futile. Science is concerned with the universe as we find it; the mobile vehicle of ordinary succession, the Evolved or Unfolded, das Werden, as the Germans say, or the Becoming; not less wrapped in mystery because we describe it as a mechanical process, and do not fall back upon unknown agencies or assume unknown attributes of Matter or Power to explain it." The starting-point of science on the lines of evolution is thus stated:—"Since everything points to the finite duration of the present universe—for what it now is it once was not, and its state is ever changing—we must make a start somewhere. And we are therefore compelled to posit a primordial nebulous, non-luminous state, where the atoms with their inherent forces and energies stood apart from one another."

On this basis, then, and within these limits, Mr. Clodd traces the evolution of the universe, and more especially the evolution of our own system, and our own earth in particular with all that it supports. His aim is to expound the views adopted by advanced evolutionists, and in this task he is completely successful. The only serious leap which he is compelled to take is from the inorganic to the organic, from dead matter to living forms, and here it is that moderate evolutionists will be inclined to part company with Mr. Clodd. He himself is evidently convinced that there has been no break in evolution; that when Matter and Power were launched on their career they were endowed with unlimited possibilities of development, and from that moment no interference whatever has been necessary to accomplish any of the manifold results which constitute the universe with which we are familiar. At the same time Mr. Clodd admits that the origin of life is a profound mystery; no more profound, however, than the origin of crystals, or the origin of water. "It does not seem, after all, such a far cry from the crystal to the amœba as from the amœba to Plato and Newton." Still, "the gulf between consciousness and the movements of the molecules of nerve-matter, measurable as they are, is impassable; we can follow the steps of the mechanical processes of nerve-change till we reach the threshold which limits the known, and beyond that barrier we cannot go. We can neither affirm nor deny; we can only confess ignorance." It is not our business here to discuss these insoluble points; we can only say that Mr. Clodd states the position with perfect fairness and clearness, and it is difficult to see how any one who accepts the doctrine of evolution can admit any break in continuity between the inorganic and the organic. As to the place in which life originated, Mr. Clodd, with Buffon and some of the best modern authorities, is inclined to locate it in the polar regions; "as the globe cooled these regions would be the earliest to reach a temperature under which life is possible."

In the chapters on the Origin of Life-forms and on the Origin of Species, the cell-theory and other somewhat abstruse doctrines are explained with welcome clearness, while in a subsequent chapter the proofs of the derivation of species are marshalled with convincing force. In these chapters the theories connected with the name of Darwin, and the data on which these theories are based, are brought within the comprehension of any one of average intelligence, so that ignorance of what "Darwinism" and "Spencerism" are is henceforth inexcusable; and it is wonderful how common such ignorance is, and how widely accepted are the grossest misrepresentations of what is meant by "natural selection" and the "survival of the fittest."

The chapter of greatest interest to the general reader will no doubt be that on Social Evolution. Here problems have to be faced which bring the hard-and-fast evolutionist, who has a firm belief in the beneficial results of Nature's unfeeling methods, to a standstill. Mr. Clodd's explanation of the evolution of mind is a natural outcome of what has gone before. It is when he comes to deal with the evolution of society that we are introduced to problems which seem at first sight to require the help of extra-scientific factors for their solution. If Nature's method of the suppression of the unadaptable, the unfit, the weak, is the method which makes for progressive evolution—shall we say for "righteousness"?—then what about the outcome of the most advanced stages of evolution? What about our hospitals, our insane asylums, our doctoring and coddling of our weak progeny, our efforts to raise the unsuccessful and the wretched, Nature's castaways, who, if she had her way, would be allowed to go to the wall? On the other hand, are we ourselves not part of Nature's material, and is not the entire conduct of life of higher humanity in accordance with her promptings? It may be; but at the same time there seems here to be a wide opening for those who maintain that there is an element to be taken into account undreamed of in evolutionary philosophy. If we were to take pattern from Nature's method of work, the method followed by Spartan selectionists long ago, how large a proportion of our progeny would "not be reared," including our Newtons, our Popes, and our geniuses generally; for is not genius after all an abnormal or morbid development, which would become impossible in a perfectly sane or healthy race? These and similar questions are suggested by Mr. Clodd's thoughtful treatment of the problems of social evolution. The fact is, as he points out, we may follow Nature's methods and yet retain our humanity; there is no reason why we should not allow those feelings which are among the noblest outcomes of evolution to have free play; yet all the more, on this very ground, it seems to be our duty to take measures to prevent the transmission of [illegible]. With all our precautions many succumb in the struggle for existence. "It is computed that more than seven hundred millions of human beings are every century pounded back to nothingness without knowing that they ever lived, to which have to be added the vast number that die in early childhood, and the wholesale destruction of communities by wars, pestilences, famines, and catastrophes." If Mr. Clodd means by the seven hundred millions per century that "are pounded back into nothingness" the still-born, surely he takes an exaggerated estimate; seven million still-born children per annum is a percentage surely far in excess of reality. Mr. Clodd goes on through successive sections on the evolution of society, the evolution of language, the useful arts and sciences, evolution of morals, and evolution of theology, to illustrate the action of the great principle in the highest stages attained by Nature's noblest product, on earth at least. To any one wishing to have a succinct and intelligible, as well as attractively written statement of the doctrine of evolution and the results of its application to the universe, we commend Mr. Clodd's book without hesitation.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE death of M. Charles Monselet removes from the ranks of French men of letters a writer of the most amiable talent and personality and of great literary taste, though not perhaps of any very strong or original genius. Born sixty-six years ago, M. Monselet belonged to the same generation exactly as Baudelaire and as M. de Banville, and was, if we are not mistaken, a friend of both. Indeed, though he was not much known by his own writings in England, every one who has read a little miscellaneous French must remember friendly references to him by other writers. He was a poet and a dramatist in his way, as well as a tolerably fertile poetical and dramatic critic; and he also wrote novels, no one of which can exactly be said to have "made fortune." But his true department was miscellany writing, especially in ways a little out of the common run. He more than any one else directed, now more than thirty years ago, attention to the curious, and for some half-century quite neglected, work of Restif de la Bretonne, and in his subsequent Oubliés et Dédaignés he practically founded that fancy for the eighteenth century out of which the brothers Goncourt and others made more reputation than he did, but which no one cultivated with greater taste and absence of charlatanry. He was also quite the best gastronomical writer recently living, and, though no single original work of his is very likely to live, he will always hold a place in the memory of literary students.

There have been many books by foreigners on English education, and they have not, as a rule, been flattering, precisely because they have almost always looked at the thing from a pedagogic instead of an educating point of view. M. de Coubertin's volume on English Public Schools and Universities (1) takes quite the opposite line, and the author, though he protests that he is no "anglomane," blesses us altogether, or very nearly so. This is because he regards education as a thing for training men, not making machines. In his pleasant accounts of Oxford, Cambridge, Eton, Harrow, Westminster, &c., it would, no doubt, be possible for experts in each case to trace a few trifling errors; but, on the whole, the picture is as accurate as it is flattering, and might make our modern pedagogues pause in their anxiety to destroy exactly the characteristics which M. de Coubertin admires. The one thing that he professes himself unable to understand is not a little amusing. He offers "10 schellings à qui expliquera pour quel motif les étudiants de Cambridge piquent une tête dans une urne argentée entourée d'une serviette blanche." We will trouble him for that half-sovereign. The magic explanation is TRING. Yes; but he retorts, "S'ils boivent, pourquoi boire si lentement?" Why marry thus. If you try to drink quickly out of a large cup, you will, as M. de Coubertin will find if he experiments, pretty certainly send the liquid in a wave over your chin, neck, and shoulders. But is it really possible that they have no cups in France? Now we come to think of it, we never saw one there.

The writer who calls himself "Joseph d'Arçay" (2), and who has already published certain rather vulturine reminiscences, now devotes a book to M. Thiers, of whom he was, it seems, a kind of connexion by marriage. If anybody wants a little very small scandal (such as that Thiers's birth and his parents' marriage were chronologically related much in the same way as similar events were in the case of Susannah Shakspeare, that he did not give his own mother as large an allowance as he ought, that his mother-in-law was a "petite bourgeoise parvenue," and so forth), he can read this book. For our part we should say that such tittle-tattle throws no new light on Thiers's well-known faults and weaknesses, and certainly does not in the least obscure his great qualities.

It is a pity that M. de Bonnières, who has no small ability, should let himself be carried away by the detestable habits of "Society journalism" (3). To describe Baudelaire as "an Englishman born at Marseilles" is altogether luminous and happy. To say that Mlle. Clémence Royer dresses badly and smokes, or that M. Léon Say is fat and has dropping cheeks, appears to us—vulgar. M. de Bonnières is fairly often in the better vein; unluckily he is sometimes in the worse.

The Essays and Fantasies of "Arvède Barine" (4) are varied, well written, and not without originality. Not a few of their subjects are English, and rather out-of-the-way English, too; for we certainly should not have expected a paper on Mark Rutherford in a French book.

M. Emile Blavet's reprinted chroniques are now well known, and are undoubtedly good of their kind. Some interesting things will be found in the present volume, notably an account of "Marcellin," the famous founder of the Vie parisienne itself (5); but we should like it better if it had not on its cover a mâle and a female Parisian grinning horribly.

Even Frenchmen, who have comparatively few books of travel, must, we should think, be getting tired of books on the United States. M. Moreau's (6) has no very distinct features, except that it is rather ill-tempered.

Dr. Lagrange's book (7) on the Physiology of Exercise is exceedingly careful and good; especially the part dealing with courbature—a thing for which, oddly enough, the most athletic country in the world has no complete single name.

A reprint of the late M. Albert Duruy's (8) articles on the French army at the date of the Revolution is made more interesting by a very well written life of the author from the pen of his brother George.

(1) Education en Angleterre. Par P. de Coubertin. Paris: Hachette.
(2) Notes inédites sur M. Thiers. Par Joseph d'Arçay. Paris: Ollendorff.
(3) Mémoires d'aujourd'hui. Par Robert de Bonnières. Paris: Ollendorff.
(4) Essais et fantaisies. Par Arvède Barine. Paris: Hachette.
(5) La vie parisienne, 1887. Par "Parisis." Paris: Paul Ollendorff.
(6) Aux Etats-Unis. Par F. F. Moreau. Paris: Plon.
(7) Physiologie des exercices du corps. Par F. Lagrange. Paris: Alcan.
(8) L'armée royale en 1789. Par A. Duruy. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

WHEN the world is of one mind as to what is meant by evolution, and what is implied by the vague phrase religious thought, it will be possible to pronounce definitely on the argument and conclusions of Professor Joseph Le Conte's Evolution and its Relation to Religious Thought (Chapman & Hall). As it is, there is much likelihood of the author's interpretation of evolution and its relation to religion being assailed on both sides. Briefly put, Mr. Le Conte's book is an attempt to show that the teachings of evolution are generally misconceived. Evolution does not "destroy the possibility of all religious belief by demonstrating a pure materialism." There are many excellent people who fondly yearn for the reconciliation of science and religion, and find it soothing sweet to follow Professor Henry Drummond. They will sympathize with Mr. Le Conte's aims, and possibly derive consolation from his book. For our part, we confess to remaining as unmoved as a Puritan who had witnessed some courtly pageant of Pleasure reconciled to Virtue. Two parts of Mr. Le Conte's book are devoted to an exposition of evolution, its laws and evidences. A third division unfolds the author's views on the tendencies of evolution and its relation to religion. Of the first portion, the scientific demonstration, it is unnecessary to say more than that Mr. Le Conte is an ardent evolutionist, and his statement is clearly put and of fair exactitude. At page 19 we have a diagram that gives a rough representation, by curving lines, of the evolutionary scale in the geological periods. As each organic class becomes dominant in the various periods the point of culmination rises successively higher, in Molluscs, Fishes, Reptiles, and so forth, and proportionately declines. Man alone does not so decline, but crowns the scale still ascendent. Now, the good evolutionist may well marvel why man is not subject to the law that governs all other organisms, seeing that he is derived through them. Moreover, Mr. Le Conte declares (p. 294) that the spirit of man was "developed out of the anima or conscious principle of animals." He refrains from formulating the next evolutionary phase or pointing out the inevitable successor to man. He does not dot out man's declination and his successor's line of ascent, because "certain it is that with man there begins an entirely new form of evolution," and "certain it is that with man evolution is transferred from the organic to the social plane, from the material to the psychical." By this arbitrary process the obvious difficulty we have indicated is evaded. Nor does Mr. Le Conte's subsequent excursion into the field of ethics reconcile us to his strange abandonment of the position. For this, it seems to us, is what his abrupt transition from the scientific standpoint amounts to. And here we may leave him with the evolutionists. He himself suggests an excellent reason why the religious person should not be greatly perturbed by the supposed conflict of religion and evolution. After declaring that the whole inductive basis upon which the modern theory of evolution has arisen was laid by Agassiz, he commends that eminent geologist for rejecting evolution because he considered it antagonistic to more certain truth—e.g. "the existence of God." "There is something to us supremely grand in this refusal of Agassiz to accept the theory of evolution" (p. 45). Now if Agassiz was justified in refusing to build on the foundation he had laid, the religious person, of whatsoever creed, is justified in rejecting the so-called evidences of evolution. If it was admirable in Agassiz by so doing to refuse the position of "leader of modern thought," it is admirable conduct also in any Christian of scientific proclivities to resist the temptation of posing as a terrible evolutionist in his little circle. But, says Mr. Le Conte, Agassiz made a mistake in thinking evolution led to materialism (p. 45); and if he had been a greater man he would have risen superior to the "universal mistake of his age." But in that event Mr. Le Conte would not have written the present volume.

Every one knows the value of a good memory, though many there be who know not how to preserve it. Twenty-two rules, framed to this desirable end, are given in the second and practical portion of Mr. F. W. Edridge-Green's Memory: its Logical Relations and Cultivation (Baillière, Tindall, & Cox). They are somewhat hard to master, but will repay study if the illustrative matter appended be carefully followed.

Sacred Song (Walter Scott) is a comely volume of selections from poets, past and present, edited by Mr. Samuel Waddington. The term "religious verse" in the title-page fairly accords with the nature of the anthology. The selection is wide in range, and representative of every description of poetry that may be justly said to possess the lyrical quality of inspiration. There is also a goodly proportion of poetry that is neither devotional nor hymnal, that is rather of a philosophic or meditative cast. Perhaps it scarcely accords with the editor's ruling, which excludes merely popular hymns, to present so slight a gathering from Crashaw, Vaughan, and Herbert; poets little read, it is true, but of the first rank in sacred song.

The two volumes of A History of Scotland, chiefly in its Ecclesiastical Aspect (London and Edinburgh: Grant), by M. G. J. Kinloch, are rather readable than valuable. The author writes like a lady and a good Catholic; she has consulted great numbers of authorities, and made great quantities of quotations; she is a devout believer in Mary Stuart, Sir William Wallace, Robert Bruce, and other uncovenanting heroes; and she covers the years between the introduction of Christianity and the death of James VI. in capital style and at a far better pace than might have been expected. But her capacity is scarce equal to her good will. She has not the historical mind; her grasp of facts is loose and hesitating; of those great streams of tendencies which mould the destiny and shape the character of a nation she does not appear to so much as suspect the existence, she is altogether addicted to the substitution of details for results and the sentimental treatment of heroic individuals. This being the case, it will be seen that those who take up her History will learn little from it of the growth and development of either Scotland or the Church. They will find, however, plenty of amusing reading, a vast amount of curious quotation, and—though the English is sometimes inexact and not often really expressive—not a little easy and pleasant narrative.

In Pursuit of a Shadow (Trubner & Co.) is the lively record of "A Lady Astronomer"; a diary full of keen observation and animated comment, descriptive of a voyage from Hull by way of Christiania, Stockholm, St. Petersburg, and Moscow to Kineshma, in the heart of Russia. The traveller's intent was to spy the solar eclipse of last August. The result was disappointing. There was a fleeting glimpse, a mere peep, at the coronal light, and that was all. Not a shadow of this grief, however, falls on the bright pages of this little book. It is full of pleasant things, pleasantly recorded.

Mr. Herschau Liscomb is one of the right sort of sportsmen who would preserve, not exterminate, big game. With this object, and also as a guide to Anglo-Indians, he has compiled a capital little book entitled Astór, Kashmir Territory (Mussoorie: Mafisilite Printing Works). Mr. Liscomb's "Journal of Sport and Travel" ought to satisfy the most inveterate hunter that Astór, the land of the Dards, is the true sportsman's paradise. Even the bear cuts something of a figure in this spirited account of adventure and big bags, of thrilling tracks after the ibex and the markhor. The envious shooter may find his way to Mr. Liscomb's paradise without difficulty with the help of this handbook and its map. When there let his motto be sport, not slaughter.

Martin Revel, by Edith Hill (Wyman & Sons), is a rather colourless story about an unfortunate young man whose knowledge of the world is extremely limited, and whose temper is truculent. He is very properly punished for want of tact and heat of temper. And that is all that the reader desires. Mavis, by M. Bramston (S.P.C.K.), seems to have been written to illustrate the evil of the mariage de convenance. It is not particularly impressive.

Among our new editions we have Mr. Hall Caine's The Deemster (Chatto & Windus); The Wizard's Son, by Mrs. Oliphant (Macmillan & Co.); a third revised edition of Dr. John Macpherson's valuable descriptive handbook, The Baths and Wells of Europe (Stanford), and Mr. Charles Lunn's The Philosophy of Voice, sixth edition (Baillière, Tindall, & Cox).

We have also received Wordsworth's Prelude, annotated by Professor A. J. George (Boston: Heath); Geology for All, by J. Logan Lobley, F.G.S. (Roper & Drowley); Lesson Pegs (Relfe Brothers); Seaside and Wayside, by Julia M'Nair Wright, "Native Readers" series (Whittaker); The Mysore Gold Mine, by "A Permanent Shareholder" (Effingham Wilson), and an Illustrated Guide to Geneva ("Tribune de Genève" office).

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

NOTICE.—On and after the 2nd of July next all ADVERTISEMENTS intended for insertion in the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed direct to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT, SATURDAY REVIEW OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW may be obtained in Paris every Saturday of Mr. J. G. FOTHERINGHAM, 8 Rue Neuve des Capucines, and of Messrs. GALIGNANI, 224 Rue de Rivoli.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW Bill of Contents will be forwarded every Friday Evening by post, prepaid, to any Newsagent in Town or Country on application to the Publisher.

Nearly all the back Numbers of the SATURDAY REVIEW may be obtained through any Bookseller, or of the Publisher, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,700, MAY 26, 1888

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION,
West Brompton, Earl's Court, and West Kensington.

PATRON.
HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF ITALY.
HON. PRESIDENT.
HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE CROWN PRINCE OF ITALY.
DIRECTOR-GENERAL.
JOHN R. WHITLEY, Esq.
PRESIDENT OF THE ENGLISH RECEPTION COMMITTEE.
COL. J. T. NORTH.
PRESIDENT OF THE ITALIAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.
CAV. L. BONACINA.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
The most valuable and varied COLLECTION of ITALIAN SCULPTURE and PAINTINGS ever exhibited.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
Magnificent DISPLAY of ITALIAN INDUSTRIES.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
THE HUNTING TENT, &c., of H.M. the late KING OF ITALY.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
SCENES FROM ITALY—ROME IN LONDON.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
Roman Market Place, Roman Forum, Colosseum, and Palace of the Cæsars.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
VESUVIUS AND BAY OF NAPLES.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
Capri Blue Grotto, Temple of Vesta, Borghese Garden.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
Italian Government NAVAL EXHIBITS.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
VENETIAN LACE-MAKERS.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
ALPINE SWITCH-BACK RAILWAY.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
ITALIAN RESTAURANT, and National Dishes.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
ITALIAN CONCERTS, Neapolitan Mandolinists.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
THE SCOTS GUARDS BAND, by permission of Colonel Stracey.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
Open 11 A.M. to 11 P.M. Admission to the Exhibition, 1s.

THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.
Applications for Season Tickets to be made to VINCENT A. APPLIN, Esq., Secretary. Single Season Tickets, £1; Double Season Tickets, admitting Gentleman and Lady, 30s.; Season Tickets for Children (under 16), 10s.

JOURNALISTIC PARTNER WANTED with £500. Well-established Weekly Paper. The fullest particulars given to principals or their solicitors only.—Address, 606, Saturday Review Advertisement Department, 33 Southampton St., W.C.

TO TRUSTEES and Others.—Four-and-a-half per cent. on FREEHOLD RENTALS, in the City of London—namely, £1,800 per annum in one collection, secured on commanding CORNER PREMISES, covering an area of nearly 10,000 square feet. Let on lease to a world known Mercantile Firm. Reversion to increased Rent and other improvements at end of present Lease. Price £40,000.
For further particulars apply to Messrs. NORTON, TRIST, & GILBERT, Land Agents and Surveyors, 62 Old Broad Street, E.C.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.
JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.—Sold by all Stationers throughout the World.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C.—The COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. The YEAR CLOSED with a DEFICIT of OVER £6,000. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond, 49 Charing Cross, S.W.
ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

FRY'S
J. WYBRANTS OLPHERTS, M.D., says: "I find it the most agreeable beverage of the kind I have ever tasted, delicious both in flavour and odour."
PURE CONCENTRATED
E. BUCKNILL, M.D., says: "Your Pure Concentrated Cocoa is so extremely nice that I have ordered it for family use."
COCOA.

STRUVE'S
BRIGHTON SELTZER WATER.
PREPARED FROM THE WORLD-RENOWNED SPRING OF THE
ROYAL GERMAN SPA, BRIGHTON,
And supplied uninterruptedly to Royalty by Royal Warrant of His late Majesty King William IV. and H.M. the Queen-Empress Victoria.
OF ALL CHEMISTS AND WINE MERCHANTS THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY.
Carriage Paid on Six Dozen and upwards.
ROYAL GERMAN SPA, BRIGHTON.

FISHER'S
GLADSTONE BAG.
Catalogues post free. 188 STRAND.

Mr. C. B. HARNESS, Consulting Medical Electrician and Inventor of the world-famed Electropathic Belt, may be consulted daily free of charge, personally or by letter, at the ELECTROPATHIC ESTABLISHMENT of the Medical Battery Company, Limited, 52 OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W. (corner of Rathbone Place). All in search of health should call to-day, if possible, or write at once. Thousands of testimonials. Note only address, as above.

EDUCATIONAL.

VICTORIA UNIVERSITY.
An ENTRANCE EXAMINATION in ARTS (introductory to the Faculty of Medicine) will be held in Owens College, Manchester, University College, Liverpool, and Yorkshire College, Leeds, on Monday, June 18, and following days.
A PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION (introductory to the Faculties of Arts, Science, and Law) will be held in Owens College, Manchester, University College, Liverpool, and Yorkshire College, Leeds, on Thursday, June 14, and following days.
Notice (in writing) of intention to be present should be sent in on or before Thursday, May 31, to the University Registrar, from whom conditions of entrance and further particulars as to these and other Examinations can be obtained.
Manchester. A. T. BENTLEY, M.A. Registrar.

CLIFTON COLLEGE.—CLASSICAL, MATHEMATICAL, and NATURAL SCIENCE SCHOLARSHIPS. NINE or more OPEN to COMPETITION at MIDSUMMER 1888. Value from £25 to £50 a year, which may be increased from a special fund to £90 a year in cases of scholars who require it.—Further particulars from the HEAD-MASTER, or SECRETARY, The College, Clifton, Bristol.

RADLEY COLLEGE—SIX SCHOLARSHIPS (of the value, four of £50, one of £30, one of £20), tenable for four years, will be offered for competition by Examination, commencing June 6, 1888. Candidates must be under fourteen on the 1st January, 1888.—For further particulars, apply to the WARDEN, Radley College, Abingdon.

HEIDELBERG COLLEGE, Heidelberg, Germany.
Preparation for Army and all Exams., also for Commercial Life. For particulars address the PRINCIPALS.

FETTES COLLEGE, EDINBURGH.—A number of OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS, varying from £60 to £20, will be open for Competition in July, to Boys between Eleven and Fifteen.—For particulars apply to HEAD-MASTER.

CHELTENHAM COLLEGE.—The ANNUAL EXAMINATION for SCHOLARSHIPS will be held on July 17 and 18. Six Classical and Five Mathematical Scholarships of value ranging between £80 and £20, and tenable for three years, will be awarded.
Candidates must be under fifteen and over thirteen on July 1. Also a CHORAL SCHOLARSHIP, in value not less than £50 per annum, is offered for competition to boys (under twelve on July 1) who possess and desire to cultivate musical talent.
For further details apply to the SECRETARY, the College, Cheltenham.

LANCING COLLEGE.—The EXAMINATION for OPEN EXHIBITIONS will be held on June 29 in London, and at Lancing, Clifton, and Exeter.—For particulars address Dr. SANDERSON, Lancing College, Shoreham.

BRUCE CASTLE, near TOTTENHAM.
Head-Master—Rev. W. ALMACK, M.A., St. John's Coll., Camb., and Old Marlburian.
BOYS worked as Private Pupils for any Class or Pass Examination.
In Lower School preparation (if required) for any public school.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—An EXAMINATION to fill up VACANCIES on the Foundation and Exhibitions will begin on Tuesday July 10. For particulars apply to Rev. the HEAD-MASTER, Dean's Yard.

RUGBY SCHOLARSHIPS and Places on the Foundation.
Examination begins Tuesday, June 11.

BOYS' SCHOOL.
BELL FARM, Clewer Hill, WINDSOR.—SCHOOL for SONS of GENTLEMEN, to prepare for Eton and other Public Schools. Greek, Latin, French, Mathematics.—Apply to Miss HIBBURD.

OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS in NATURAL SCIENCE, of the value of 125 Guineas and £60, are awarded annually, in October, at ST. THOMAS'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL, Albert Embankment, S.E.
For particulars apply to the Medical Secretary.
W. M. ORD, Dean. R. W. REID, Vice-Dean.

A CAMBRIDGE WRANGLER, assisted by an Oxford Graduate, is desirous of meeting with a COMPANION PUPIL Reading for the University.—Address, H. S. ROMER, Great Malvern.

MUSIC.—Mrs. CAREY (Pupil of the late Mr. Lindsay Sloper) will give LESSONS on the PIANOFORTE (Charles Hallé's School), Elementary and Advanced, at Pupils' own residences or at schools. Terms moderate. Address, care of N. Vert, 6 Cork Street, W.

"SECURUS JUDICAT ORBIS TERRARUM."
APOLLINARIS.
"THE QUEEN OF TABLE WATERS."
The filling at the Apollinaris Spring during the year 1887 amounted to 11,894,000 bottles.

FINDLATER'S WHISKIES.
BEST OLD IRISH and BEST ISLAY MALT 41s. per dozen bottles.
Are the production of the Old-fashioned Pot Stills, matured and mellowed by age only.
Note the bronze green label, with Trade Mark, a "Stag's Head."
33 WELLINGTON STREET, Covent Garden, and 219 BROMPTON ROAD, S.W.

THE ST. PAULI
LAGER AND PILSENER BEERS.
For Prices
Apply to THE ST. PAULI BREWERIES COMPANY, LIMITED,
6 GREAT WINCHESTER STREET, LONDON, E.C.;
H. PORTWAY, 9 PARK VIEW TERRACE, BRADFORD,
And 3 CLARENCE STREET, MANCHESTER;
Or GRISCHOTTI & CO., 163 WEST GEORGE STREET, GLASGOW.

FREEHOLD BUILDING GROUND, CITY OF LONDON, IN THE NEW APPROACH TO BILLINGSGATE MARKET.
THE COMMISSIONERS of SEWERS of the City of London will meet in the Guildhall of the said City on Tuesday, June 12, 1888, at Half-past One o'clock precisely, to receive TENDERS for taking on BUILDING LEASES for a term of Eighty years several plots of very valuable FREEHOLD GROUND, between Botolph Lane, Lower Thames Street, and the new street extension to Billingsgate Market.
Further particulars, with conditions and printed Forms of Proposal, may be had on application at the Office of the Engineer to the Commission in the Guildhall.
The Commissioners do not bind themselves to accept the highest or any proposal.
Persons making proposals must attend personally or by a duly authorized agent on the above-mentioned day at Half-past One o'clock precisely, and the parties whose offers are accepted will be required to execute an agreement and bond at the same time.
Proposals must be endorsed on the outside "Tender for Ground," and be delivered in addressed to the undersigned before One o'clock on the said day of treaty.
Sewers' Office, Guildhall, HENRY BLAKE,
May, 1888. Principal Clerk.

NOW READY, price One Shilling.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE.

JUNE, 1888.

CONTENTS:

THE LAST SPAN—READY TO JOIN. Frontispiece. From a Drawing by A. B. Frost.
THE BUILDING OF A RAILWAY. THOMAS CURTIS CLARKE. With Illustrations from Drawings and from Photographs and Prints furnished by the author.
A LONDON LIFE. In Four Parts. Part I. HENRY JAMES.
CORYDON—A PASTORAL. THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH.
THE STORY OF A SAND-PILE. G. STANLEY HALL.
SIR LAUNCELOT. L. FRANK TOOKER.
HOSPITAL LIFE. A. B. WARD. With Illustrations.
THE COMFORTER. JULIA C. R. DORR.
FIRST HARVESTS. Chaps. 18-20. F. J. STIMSON. (To be Continued.)
DESPONDENCY. A. LAMPMAN.
THE TORCH-RACE. HELEN GRAY CONE. Illustration from a Drawing by H. Siddons Mowbray.
CARDINAL NEWMAN. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL. With 2 Portraits.
AN EVENING FANTASY. WILLIAM A. LEAHY.
LALOR ABBOO SINGH. GEORGE H. JESSOP.
SOME GENTLEMEN IN FICTION. ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

LONDON: FREDERICK WARNE & CO., 15 BEDFORD STREET, STRAND.

Monthly, 6d.

ATALANTA.

Edited by L. T. MEADE and ALICIA A. LEITH.

Contents of the JUNE Number:

BALLADS OF ALL COUNTRIES. Ireland. Kincora. Frontispiece by J. C. Staples.
THE WHITE MAN'S FOOT. Serial Story. Chaps. V. and VI. GRANT ALLEN. Illustrated by J. Finnemore.
GIRLS WHO WON SUCCESS. I. Lady Butler (ELIZABETH THOMPSON). SARAH TYTLER. With Portrait and Four Studies by Elizabeth Thompson.
DON: THE STORY OF A GREEDY DOG. F. ANSTEY. Illustrated by J. C. Dollman.
OUR ENGLISH SCHOOLS OF ART. III The Herkomer School JOHN C. STAPLES. With 10 Illustrations by Students of the School, and a Monograph by Prof. HERKOMER, A.R.A.
THE FIRST OF JUNE. Poem. H. E. HAMILTON KING. Illustrated by Finest Wilson.
THE LADY OF THE FOREST. Serial Story. Chaps. XVIII.—XX. L. T. MEADE. Illustrated by J. B. Yeats.
A LETTER TO THE RATS. Illustrated by PALMER COX.
"ATALANTA" SCHOLARSHIP AND READING UNION:—
IX. CHARLES KINGSLEY. THOMAS HUGHES.
NOTES ABOUT BOOKS. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL.
EMPLOYMENT FOR GIRLS. Shorthand. Miss REYNOLDS.

LONDON: HATCHARDS, 187 PICCADILLY, W.

NOW READY, price 1s.

MURRAY'S MAGAZINE

For JUNE.

RULING SOUTH AFRICA. By Sir CHARLES WARREN.
COUNTY GOVERNMENT BILL. By the EARL OF POWIS and others.
JACK'S FATHER. (Concluded) By W. E. NORRIS.
A HIGH-SCHOOL GIRL'S REPLY TO MISS KINGSLEY.
FLITTERMICE. By Professor LLOYD MORGAN.
THE SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY. By W. M. ACWORTH.
A LADY'S HOLIDAY IN IRELAND. (Concluded.) By I. L. BIRD.
A COUNSEL OF PERFECTION. (Concluded.) By LUCAS MALET.
OUR LIBRARY LIST—Index to Vol. III.

London: JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street.

Now ready, price 1s.

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY for JUNE.

CONTENTS:

Miser Farrel's Bequest. I.—II. J. P. Quincy.
To Cawdor Castle and Culloden Moor. Julia C. R. Dorr.
Finalities. Edith M. Thomas.
Yone Santo: a Child of Japan. XXII.—XXV. E. H. House.
The Literary Career in France. Theodore Child.
A Wayside Calvary. Graham R. Tomson.
The Discovery of the Rocky Mountains. Francis Parkman.
The Queen behind the Throne. Ellen Terry Johnson.
The Despot of Broomsedge Cove. XI.—XII. Charles Egbert Craddock.
L'Eau Dormante.
A Southern Planter.
Recent American Fiction.
Cable's Bonaventure: A Prose Pastoral of Acadian Louisiana—Queen Money—Bellamy's Looking Backward—McAnally's Irish Wonders—Crawford's Marzio's Crucifix.
Aubrey De Vere's Essays.
The Contributors' Club.
Fault-Finding as a means of Happiness—Commencement Day: A Bit of Word History—Infant Morality.
Books of the Month.

London: WARD, LOCK, & CO., Salisbury Square, E.C.

At all Libraries.

LETTERS FROM DOROTHY OSBORNE TO SIR W. TEMPLE.

Price One Guinea.

This day. SECOND EDITION. This day.

"The pleasantest book imaginable."—Saturday Review.
"A charming series of letters."—Scotsman.
"Few books so well worth reading."—Daily Telegraph.

At all Libraries.

LETTERS FROM DOROTHY OSBORNE TO SIR W. TEMPLE.

GRIFFITH, FARRAN, OKEDEN, & WELSH, LONDON.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

NOTICE.—The Publishers of the MAGAZINE OF ART are pleased to state that, having projected a Permanent Fine Art Record of the leading Pictures of the Year exhibited at Burlington House, they have received the most gratifying support from the President and Members of THE ROYAL ACADEMY, and have consequently prepared containing carefully executed Reproductions of Pictures and Sculpture by leading Exhibitors. Price 1s.; or post free, 1s. 3d.

ROYAL ACADEMY PICTURES, 1888,

 The Work is uniform in size with the MAGAZINE OF ART, and every effort has been made to do the fullest justice to the merits of each Work of Art given.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED. And all Booksellers.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW VOLUME OF THE NEW AND UNIFORM EDITION OF THE

COMPLETE WORKS of ROBERT BROWNING.

Ready this day, small crown 8vo. 5s.

"PARACELSUS" and "STRAFFORD."

This Edition will consist of 16 Volumes, small crown 8vo. A Volume will be published Monthly.

Ready this day (Sixpence), New Series, No. 60.

THE CORNHILL MAGAZINE

For JUNE.

Containing, among other Articles of interest, THE EAVESDROPPER, Part II. OUR DISTRICT SCHOOLS NOTES BY A NATURALIST: The Badger and the Fox IN A GERMAN EMIGRANT SHIP—A LIFE'S MORNING, by the Author of "Demos," "Thyrza," &c. Chaps. 11 and 12; &c. &c.

ANOTHER SHAKESPEARIAN DISCOVERY.

See THE EAVESDROPPER:

An Unparalleled Experience.

By JAMES PAYN, Author of "By Proxy," "Lost Sir Massingberd," &c.

Fcp. 8vo. price One Shilling. [Ready next week.

Now Volume of Smith, Elder, & Co.'s Popular Novel Series.

Ready this day, crown 8vo. 6s.

THE GAVEROCKS. By the Author of "Mehalah," "John Herring," &c.

New Vols. of Smith, Elder, & Co.'s Popular 2s. & 2s. 6d. Series.

DEMOS. By GEORGE GISSING, Author of "Thyrza," "A Life's Morning," &c. Fcp. 8vo. boards, pictorial cover, 2s.

MEHALAH. By the Author of "John Herring," "Court Royal," &c. Fcp. 8vo. limp cloth, 2s. 6d.

JOHN HERRING. By the Author of "Mehalah," "Court Royal," &c. Fcp. 8vo. limp cloth, 2s. 6d.

COURT ROYAL. By the Author of "Mehalah," "John Herring," "The Gaverocks," &c. Fcp. 8vo, limp cloth, 2s. 6d.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE.

EDWARD STANFORD'S PUBLICATIONS.

FOR THE TOURIST SEASON, 1888.

NORWAY.—The HANDY GUIDE to NORWAY. By THOMAS B WILLSON, M.A. With Maps and Appendices on the Flora and History of Norway, Fishing Notes, and Photography. Second Edition, Revised and enlarged. Small post 8vo. cloth, 5s.
"Thoroughly adapted for its purpose."—Globe.

BATHS and WELLS of EUROPE; with a Sketch of Hydrotherapy and Hints on Climate, Sea Bathing, and Popular Cures. By JOHN MACPHERSON, M.D. Third Edition, Revised. With a New Map. Post 8vo. cloth, 6s. 6d.
"Dr. Macpherson's well-known and excellent volume."—Athenæum.

GLOUCESTERSHIRE: Hill, Vale, and Forest. By R. N. WORTH, F.G.S., Author of the "Guides to Devon, Somerset, Wilts, and Dorset." (New Volume of Stanford's Two-Shilling Series of Tourist's Guides.) Fcp. 8vo. with Map and Plan of Gloucester Cathedral, 2s.

SOMERSETSHIRE.—TOURIST'S GUIDE to SOMERSETSHIRE: Rail and Road. By R. N. WORTH, F.G.S., Author of "History of Devon," "West Country Garland," &c. Third Edition, with Map and Plan of Wells Cathedral. Fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s. (Stanford's Two-Shilling Series of County Guides.)

HAMPSHIRE.—TOURIST'S GUIDE to HAMPSHIRE, including the ISLE OF WIGHT. By G. PHILLIPS BEVAN, F.S.S., Author of the "Guides to the Channel Islands, the Wye, Surrey, and Yorkshire." Third Edition, with Map and Plan of Winchester Cathedral. Fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s. (Stanford's Two-Shilling Series of County Guides.)

STANFORD'S

TWO-SHILLING SERIES OF TOURIST'S GUIDES

Includes, in addition to the above:—

BERKSHIRE. By E. WALFORD, M.A.
CAMBRIDGE. By A. G. HILL, B.A.
CHANNEL ISLANDS. By G. P. BEVAN.
CORNWALL. By W. H. TREGELLAS. Fifth Edition.
DERBYSHIRE. By Rev. G. C. COX. Third Edition.
DEVON, North. By R. N. WORTH. Fourth Edition.
DEVON, South. By R. N. WORTH. Fourth Edition.
DORSET. By R. N. WORTH. F.G.S.
ENGLISH LAKE DISTRICT. By H. I. JENKINSON, F.R.G.S. Fifth Edition.
ESSEX. By E. WALFORD, M.A.
KENT. By G. P. BEVAN, F.G.S. Sixth Edition.
LONDON (Tourist's Guide Through). By the Rev. W. J. LOFTIE, B.A.
LONDON (Round About). By the Rev. W. J. LOFTIE. Fifth Edition.
NORFOLK. By WALTER RYE. Third Edition.
SUFFOLK. By Dr. J. E. TAYLOR, F.G.S.
SURREY. By G. P. BEVAN, F.G.S. Third Edition.
SUSSEX. By G. F. CHAMBERS. Fourth Edition.
WARWICK. By G. P. BEVAN, F.G.S.
WILTSHIRE. By R. N. WORTH, F.G.S.
WYE (The) and Neighbourhood. By G. PHILLIPS BEVAN, F.S.S.
YORKSHIRE (North and East Ridings). By G. P. BEVAN. Fourth Edition.
YORKSHIRE (West Riding). By G. P. BEVAN. Fourth Edition.

LONDON: EDWARD STANFORD, 55 CHARING CROSS, S.W.

TOURIST'S CATALOGUE of best MAPS and GUIDE BOOKS sent post free for Penny Stamp.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

NEW VOLUME NOW READY.

THE BADMINTON LIBRARY.

Edited by the DUKE OF BEAUFORT, K.G. and ALFRED E. T. WATSON.

BOATING.

By W. B. WOODGATE.

With an Introduction by the Rev. EDMOND WARRE, D.D.

And a Chapter on ROWING at Eton, by R. HARVEY MASON.

With 10 Full-page Illustrations, 39 Woodcuts in the Text, after Drawings by Frank Dadd, and from Instantaneous Photographs, and 4 Maps of the Rowing Courses at Oxford, Cambridge, Henley, and Putney.

Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

RE-ISSUE OF THE GREVILLE MEMOIRS IN EIGHT MONTHLY VOLUMES.

A JOURNAL of the REIGNS of KING GEORGE IV., KING WILLIAM IV., and QUEEN VICTORIA. By the late CHARLES C. F. GREVILLE, Esq. Clerk of the Council to those Sovereigns. Edited by HENRY REEVE, C.B. D.C.L., Corresponding Member of the Institute of France. (8 vols.) Vols. I.—VI. Crown 8vo. 6s. each.

HISTORICAL REVIEW of the LEGISLATIVE SYSTEMS OPERATIVE in IRELAND from the INVASION of HENRY II. to the UNION (1172-1800). By the Right Hon. J. T. BALL, LL.D., D.C.L. 8vo. 6s.

PROSPERITY or PAUPERISM? Physical, Industrial, and Technical Training. Edited by the Earl of MEATH (Lord BRABAZON). 8vo. 5s.

"The subjects of which these papers treat are so deeply interesting to national well-being that we trust a wide circulation will be found for the book. It is on the right lines." Inquirer.

SOCIAL ARROWS: a Series of reprinted Articles. By the Earl of MEATH (Lord BRABAZON). Second Edition. Crown 8vo. price One Shilling, boards; 5s. cloth.

CONTENTS: Open Spaces—Associations for the Benefit of Young Men, Women, and Children—Over-Population: its Evils and Remedies—The Cause of the Overworked Shop-Assistant—Some Social Wants of London—The Duty of the Church in respect to Recreation and Literature—The Need of National, Industrial, and Technical Training—An Appeal to Men of Leisure—An Appeal to Men of Wealth.

WORKS BY MRS. DE SALIS.

SAVOURIES à la MODE. Eighth Edition. Fcp. 8vo. 1s.

ENTRÉES à la MODE. Fourth Edition. Fcp. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

SOUPS and DRESSED FISH à la MODE. Second Edition. Fcp. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

SWEETS and SUPPER DISHES à la MODE. Fcp. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

OYSTERS à la MODE; or, the Oyster and over One Hundred Ways of Cooking it; to which are added a few Recipes for Cooking all kinds of Shelled Fish. Second Edition. Fcp. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

DRESSED VEGETABLES à la MODE. Fcp. 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Now ready, price Sixpence.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE—JUNE.

CONTENTS:

EVE. By the AUTHOR of "JOHN HERRING" &c. Chaps. 42-46.
AN ORCHID FARM. By FREDERICK BOYLE.
ETON: 1836 TO 1841. By C. T. BUCKLAND.
THE LOST CONSCIENCE. From the Russian of CHTCHÉDRINE. Translated by Miss M. WRIGHT.
THE SAINT'S MOTHER. By E. NESBIT.
THE OLD NAVAL SONG. By W. CLARK RUSSELL.
IN THE WOODLANDS. By the Rev. M. G. WATKINS.
UNCLE PIERCE. (Concluded.) By CHARLES BLATHERWICK.
AT THE SIGN OF THE SHIP. By ANDREW LANG.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

THE HENRY IRVING SHAKESPEARE.

NOTICE.—The Third Volume of THE HENRY IRVING SHAKESPEARE, Edited by Henry Irving and Frank A. Marshall, and Illustrated by Gordon Browne, price 10s. 6d., will be published on Wednesday next.

LONDON: BLACKIE & SON, 49 AND 50 OLD BAILEY.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

A SEASON in SUTHERLAND. By JOHN E. EDWARDS-MOSS. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. [In a few days.

A NEW BOOK BY MR. HENRY JAMES.

PARTIAL PORTRAITS. By HENRY JAMES, Author of "The Europeans," "French Poets and Novelists," &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

The Scottish Leader says:—"Some of Mr. Henry James's masterpieces are to be found among his sketches and short stories; while his strength in the domain of subtle and suggestive criticism was strikingly demonstrated a few years ago in his volume on 'French Poets and Novelists.' So far as style and method are concerned, this book of 'Partial Portraits' may be regarded as a companion to that delightful work."

SECOND EDITION, REVISED AND ENLARGED.

THE ART of CONVERSATION, The PRINCIPLES of. By J. P. MAHAFFY. Second Edition. Cr. 8vo. 4s. 6d.

The Guardian says: "The result is a book which has abundance of shrewd remarks."

The Nation (New York) says:—"Independently of these general questions which must be touched upon of necessity in a volume of first principles, Mr. Mahaffy's dissertation is a very practical and useful one. His treatment is light but thorough, and he pursues his subject with unflagging spirit through all its compass. Host and guests may equally learn from him."

NEW NOVELS AT ALL LIBRARIES.

BY HENRY JAMES.

The Reverberator. By HENRY JAMES, Author of "The American," "The Europeans," "Daisy Miller," &c. 2 vols. Globe 8vo. 12s. [Ready June 1.

BY THOMAS HARDY.

Wessex Tales: Strange, Lively, and Commonplace. By THOMAS HARDY, Author of "The Woodlanders" &c. 2 vols. Globe 8vo. 12s.

The Morning Post says: "The legends, superstitions, and local customs of the south-west of 'Agricultural England' are woven into a series of tales by Mr. Hardy with the artistic ability that is found in all his writings.....His pictures are never those of an artificial Arcadia; but, identifying himself as it were with the genius of the woods and fields, he knows how to poetise without sacrificing truth......Every one of these tales come up to the standard which is naturally expected from their author."

By W. E. NORRIS.

Chris. By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "My Friend Jim" &c. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 21s.

The Saturday Review says:—"'Chris's' story is simple, and owes its charm partly to the fascination of the girl and partly to the author's graceful, humorous, bright, delicate manner of telling it."

The Morning Post says:—"The author's charm of manner has never been more apparent than in this his latest tale."

BY MRS. OLIPHANT.

Joyce. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of "The Second Son," "Hester," &c. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s 6d.

The Times says:—"'Joyce' exactly suits Mrs. Oliphant's powers and methods, and consequently there is in 'Joyce' more sterling pathos, more truthful study of human nature in its nervous phases than we have found in her work for some time past......'Joyce' shows Mrs. Oliphant at her best."

The Morning Post says: "The story is an excellent example of Mrs. Oliphant's rare skill and artistic power."

POPULAR EDITIONS OF RECENT NOVELS.

Paul Patoff. By F. MARION CRAWFORD, Author of "A Tale of a Lonely Parish," "Zoroaster," "Marzio's Crucifix," &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

The Saturday Review says:—"Altogether 'Paul Patoff' is one of the freshest and most original books that have been published for some time."

The New Antigone. A Romance. Crown 8vo. 6s.

The Times says:—"A daring outline and fine workmanship give this novel a claim to more than ordinary attention......Few more dramatic situations could be conceived, and it is unnecessary to peruse the story further to illustrate the genuine power and originality of the author. We have spoken of fine workmanship; and 'The New Antigone' is full of evidence that we stand in the presence of a finished author......He has a command of elegant metaphor, a brilliant imagination, and a genius for subjective analysis."

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE

No. 344. For JUNE. Price 1s. contains:—

1. THE REVERBERATOR. By HENRY JAMES. XI.—XII. (To be continued.)
2. THE LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB. By AUGUSTINE BIRRELL.
3. CAPRI. By WILLIAM WORDSWORTH.
4. A MENACE TO NATIONAL UNITY. By B. R. WISE (late Attorney-General of New South Wales).
5. TWO SCHOOLS OF ART.
6. A VISIT TO THE MONASTERY OF RILO. By T. W. LEGH, M.P.
7. THE ALCALDE OF THE SIERRA NEGRA. By W. F. HUBBARD.
8. A BROTHER OF THE COMMON LIFE.
9. AFTER MANY DAYS.
10. GASTON DE LA TOUR. By WALTER PATER. (To be continued.)

ERIDGE CASTLE is the OLD ENGLISH HOME described in

THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE

For JUNE. Profusely Illustrated, price 6d.; by post, 8d. The Number contains:

1. SOLITUDE. By DAVIDSON KNOWLES. Frontispiece.
2. GLIMPSES OF OLD ENGLISH HOMES. IV. ERIDGE CASTLE. By ELIZABETH BALCH. Illustrated.
3. THE MEDIATION OF RALPH HARDELOT. Chaps. 31-33. By Prof. W. MINTO.
4. PAGODAS, AURIOLES, AND UMBRELLAS. Part 1. By C. F. GORDON CUMMING. With Illustrations.
5. COACHING DAYS AND COACHING WAYS. "The York Road." Part 1. By W. OUTRAM TRISTRAM. With Illustrations by Herbert Railton and Hugh Thomson.
6. LIL: A LIVERPOOL CHILD. Chap. II. (Concluded.) By AGNES C. MAITLAND.
7. ET CÆTERA. By H. D. TRAILL.

MACMILLAN & CO., BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

CHAPMAN & HALL'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

TO BE PUBLISHED IN JUNE.

BY T. WEMYSS REID.

THE LIFE OF THE RIGHT HON. W. E. FORSTER.

By T. WEMYSS REID.

2 vols. demy 8vo. with Portraits and Illustrations.

BY PERCY FITZGERALD.

THE CHRONICLES OF BOW STREET POLICE COURT.

By PERCY FITZGERALD.

2 vols demy 8vo. with numerous Illustrations.

YACHTS OF TWO NATIONS.

AMERICAN AND ENGLISH YACHTS:.

Illustrating and describing the most famous Yachts now sailing in American and English Waters.

WITH A TREATISE UPON YACHTS AND YACHTING.

By EDWARD BURGESS.

Oblong folio, illustrated with 50 beautiful Photogravure Engravings.

NORWEGIAN SKETCHES.

FISHING IN STRANGE WATERS.

By EDWARD KENNARD.

Illustrated with 30 Sketches, printed by the Automatic Engraving Company.

BY A. MAUDSLAY.

HIGHWAYS AND HORSES.

By A. MAUDSLAY.

With numerous Illustrations.

A GIRL'S LIFE EIGHTY YEARS AGO:

Selections from the Letters of

ELISA SOUTHGATE BOWNE.

With an Introduction by CLARENCE COOKE.

Fcp. 4to. illustrated with Portraits and Views.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE BROKEN VOW."

THE CHILD OF STAFFERTON.

By Canon KNOX LITTLE,

Author of "The Broken Vow."

Crown 8vo.

HOLIDAY RECREATIONS; AND OTHER POEMS.

By ALEXANDER SKENE SMITH.

With a Preface by the Rev. Principal CAIRNS, D.D.

BY PROFESSOR JOSEPH LE CONTE.

EVOLUTION AND ITS RELATION TO RELIGIOUS THOUGHT.

By JOSEPH LE CONTE,

Professor of Geology and Natural History in the University of California.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GREATER BRITAIN"

THE BRITISH ARMY. By the Author of "The Present Position of European Politics." Demy 8vo. 12s.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MONARCHS I HAVE MET."

A WANDERER'S NOTES. By W. BEATTY-KINGSTON, Author of "Music and Manners" &c. 2 vols. demy 8vo. 24s.

BY FREDERICK HAWKINS

THE FRENCH STAGE in the EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By FREDERICK HAWKINS. 2 vols. demy 8vo. with Portraits, price 30s.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "CONSTRUCTIVE ETHICS."

STUDIES NEW and OLD. By W. L. COURTNEY, M.A., LL.D., of New College, Oxford Crown 8vo. 6s.

BY ERNEST RENAN.

HISTORY of the PEOPLE of ISRAEL till the TIME of KING DAVID. By ERNEST RENAN. Translated from the French by C. B PITMAN Demy 8vo. 14s.

BY ANDREW A ANDERSON.

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS in a WAGGON: Sport and Travels in South Africa. By ANDREW A ANDERSON With Illustrations and Map. A New Edition Demy 8vo. 12s.

BY CAPTAIN THE HON D. BINGHAM.

THE BASTILLE. By Captain the Hon. D. BINGHAM. 2 vols. demy 8vo with Illustrations, 32s

BY BARON E MANDAT GRANCEY.

PADDY at HOME ; or, Ireland and the Irish at the Present Time, as seen by a Frenchman. Fourth Edition. (Ninth Thousand) 2s.

A FRENCH PROPHECY

DOWN with ENGLAND. Translated from the French. Crown 8vo. 1s.

FROM THE RUSSIAN.

THE "RUSSIA'S HOPE"; or, Britannia no longer Rules the Waves Showing how the Muscovite Bear got at the British Whale Translated from the original Russian by CHARLES JAMES COOKE Crown 8vo. 1s.

COPYRIGHT EDITION.

THOMAS CARLYLE'S WORKS.

Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL are now issuing at a CHEAP RATE, in a popular form, a complete Edition of CARLYLE'S WORKS.

The volumes are handsomely printed and bound in cloth, and published at ONE SHILLING each.

Are now ready—

SARTOR RESARTUS 1 vol. with Portrait of Thomas Carlyle.
FRENCH REVOLUTION. A History. 3 vols
PAST AND PRESENT. 1 vol
ON HEROES AND HERO-WORSHIP, AND THE HEROIC in HISTORY. 1 vol.
LIFE OF SCHILLER, AND EXAMINATION OF HIS WORKS. 1 vol.
OLIVER CROMWELL'S LETTERS AND SPEECHES. 5 vols. With Portrait of Oliver Cromwell.

Are now ready—

CRITICAL AND MISCELLANEOUS ESSAYS 7 vols.

To be followed by—

LIFE OF JOHN STERLING.
LATTER-DAY PAMPHLETS.
HISTORY OF FREDERICK THE GREAT 10 vols.
WILHELM MEISTER. 3 vols.
TRANSLATIONS FROM MUSÆUS, TIECK, AND RICHTER. 2 vols.
THE EARLY KINGS OF NORWAY; Essay on the Portraits of Knox.

CHARLES DICKENS'S WORKS.

THE CABINET EDITION.

NOW PUBLISHING.

To be completed in 32 vols. small fcp. 8vo. marble paper sides, cloth backs, with uncut edges, price EIGHTEENPENCE each.

Are now ready—

CHRISTMAS BOOKS.
MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT. 2 vols.
DAVID COPPERFIELD. 2 vols.
OLIVER TWIST.
GREAT EXPECTATIONS.
NICHOLAS NICKLEBY. 2 vols.
SKETCHES BY "BOZ."
CHRISTMAS STORIES.
THE PICKWICK PAPERS. 2 vols.
BARNABY RUDGE. 2 vols.
BLEAK HOUSE. 2 vols.
AMERICAN NOTES AND PICTURES FROM ITALY.
EDWIN DROOD; and other Stories.
THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP. 2 vols.
A CHILD'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.
DOMBEY AND SON. 2 vols.
A TALE OF TWO CITIES.
LITTLE DORRIT. 2 vols.

To be followed by—

UNCOMMERCIAL TRAVELLER.
MUTUAL FRIEND. 2 vols.
HARD TIMES.
REPRINTED PIECES.

CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED, 11 HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

Printed by SPOTTISWOODE & CO., at No. 5 New-street Square, in the Parish of St. Bride, in the City of London; and Published by WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, No. 38 Southampton Street, Strand, in the Parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, in the County of Middlesex.—Saturday, May 26, 1888.

THE

SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,701, Vol. 65. June 2, 1888. [Registered for Transmission abroad.] Price 6*d*.

GERMANY AND FRANCE.

THE reasons, or at least the symptoms, of the uneasiness which, after a temporary lull, has been again exhibited during the last week as to the prospects of European war are three. There is the tightening of the frontier regulations between Alsace-Lorraine and France; there is the TISZA speech; and there is, according to M. DE BLOWITZ, a terrible gun, the best in the world, which has powder that "neither explodes nor smokes," but which "shoots its "bullet with perfect directness several thousand metres." The gunpowder which neither explodes nor smokes is due to the great LEBEL; the gun which has abolished trajectories altogether is the invention of the great TRAMOND. TRAMOND and LEBEL between them have placed France, or rather replaced her, in her natural position at the head of the universe. Germans and Austrians know it. Money must be had to get something to cope with the fearful wildfowl of TRAMOND-LEBEL. Scares must be had in order to get money. Hence, according to the most amusing, if not the most serious, representative of combined politics and journalism, the present disturbance. Persons who, unlike M. DE BLOWITZ, do not exactly see how powder can propel a bullet without, at least in one sense, exploding may be less confident of this simple explanation. Undoubtedly the modern competition of improved armaments has sometimes seemed likely to become something like a mania, or at least like an endless game of brag, in which the players never show their hands at all. But, in fact, there always comes a point when they do show; and then armaments, though an important, are a subordinate, matter. It was not the needle-gun, but what was behind it, that conquered in 1866; and it was not the mitrailleuse, but what was against it, that conquered in 1870.

The French irritation as to the Hungarian Premier's speech is not likely to be lasting, but has no doubt for the time a good deal of reality in it, more perhaps than seems to be quite understood by all newspaper correspondents. For some years past there has been a kind of flirtation between a certain section of Frenchmen and a certain section of Hungarians, the most curious symptom of which was a quaint pilgrimage of gens de lettres, not perhaps quite vanished from the memory of newspaper readers. Mme. ADAM and other persons then convinced themselves that Hungarians hated Germans desperately, loved France very much, and were themselves as near being Frenchmen's equals as the arrangements of immutable destiny make it possible for any people to be. To have all this pleasant dream disturbed by a polite but decided intimation from a Hungarian Premier, and a popular Hungarian Premier too, that Hungarians had better have nothing to do with a certain French ceremony is of course painful, if only for the moment. It is painful, not merely to those Frenchmen who are decided devotees of the Revolution legend, but even to others who, with an amiable, if not very logical, patriotism, try to pride themselves equally on JOAN of Arc and the Septembriseurs, on Saint LOUIS and SAINT-JUST. No harm is likely to come of this, and it is just possible that some good may come of the reminder from two persons and two places so different as Lord SALISBURY and M. TISZA, London and Buda-Pesth, that the Revolution legend is a legend, and nothing more. Neither of these distinguished politicians, no doubt, intended to give a political lecture, or gave one; and the polite explanations of Count KALNOKY and M. TISZA himself were a matter of course. But indirectly, and owing to the clumsy sensitiveness of the other side, they have called attention to facts known to every historical student except a few confirmed crotcheteers. These facts are, first, that the so-called blessings of the French Revolution are in some cases mythical, in others had nothing to do with the Revolution, and in all might have been attained in infinitely better ways; secondly, that the chief certain result of the Revolution itself was the sterilizing, with no hope as yet of recovery, of French political capacity for a full century. That such reminders should at once extinguish the cult of '89 in France is not to be expected; but it is a good sign that some French protests have been apologetic, and that a distinction has been attempted to be drawn between the Conquête Jacobine of the later and the bastard constitutionalism of the earlier revolutionary time. This we say is good; for when men begin to argue in this way they may come before long to ask themselves whether the state of things represented by the butchery of September is much less happy in its representative than that distinguished by the mobbing to death of the helpless Invalides of LAUNAY.

Enough of this, however; it can be taken up again when the models of the Lanterne, which are doubtless being prepared, come to actual exhibition. The German frontier matter is, if not more interesting, somewhat more serious. For the new regulations amount not merely to a distinctly unfriendly act, but to something like a confession of weakness, in that respect following a similar confession, the awkwardness of which was noted here at the time of the Emperor FREDERICK's accession proclamation. Semi-official newspapers in Germany have been instructed or permitted to admit that "the feeling of the French population in the "provinces continues to mark the extreme point of national "hatred towards Germany." That is not the kind of statement likely to discourage or lessen the feeling which has made such an impression on the persons it was intended to impress. The new passport arrangements make sojourning in, or even passing through, Alsace-Lorraine nearly as troublesome as sojourning in Austrian Italy during the most annoying days of the METTERNICH régime; and they have led to the dislocation of the most important through train services in France. They are described by the German intelligencer as "only one of the internationally justified "means which we apply in order to promote the historical "process of the re-Germanization of those German countries, "and their deliverance from their connexion with France." Alas! so many people in the past have endeavoured to "promote historical processes" only to find that historical processes promote themselves quite independently of interference. And re-Germanization, too!—we do not like that "re." Restorations are proverbially unlucky; the wise man who cannot afford silver never has his spoons re-plated; and there are at least two opinions about the value and durability of re-covered umbrellas. In historical processes of evolution, as in others, you may get some better, or worse, future; but you will not get back the past.

The wisdom, however, of the German excuses, or even of the German proceedings, is less a matter of interest than their probable results. These results, if not for the moment very important, can hardly be other than an increase of temperature in the present quite sufficiently hot ill-feeling between the two countries. Such a measure as is proposed secures, by the very endeavour to prevent it, the continuance of Alsatian-Lotharingian hankerings after France. The political condition and the state generally of France are not at this moment so prosperous that a man should, out of free will, desire to become a Frenchman, even for the inestimable privilege of wielding a TRAMOND-LEBEL rifle, which smokes not neither explodes, but sends its bullets perfectly direct. But forbid him to become a Frenchman, take precautions which show that you are desperately afraid of his becoming a Frenchman, and of course he will instantly burn to be one. On the other hand, reprisals, not official, but unofficial, in France are not a little to be feared. Uncompromising devotees of the Republic assert that Germans in France have never been and are never molested. We can only say that this assertion is in direct contradiction to the evidence of well-informed and impartial observers on the spot, and that the present state of things is certainly not likely to act as a sedative to the French voyou, who, if not the most dauntless, is certainly the most brutal, and probably the most excitable, variety of rough known. And it is further to be remembered that since England began to construe magnanimity in the new fashion there is not a country in the world which insists on the civis romanus doctrine to the same extent as Germany. All the coolest critics of the state of European uneasiness which has now existed so long have agreed that, though the great causes of dissension may continue harmless, some popular outbreak may at any moment kindle a blaze extinguishable only by war. The more irritation there is between France and Germany, the more danger there is of such a blaze, which will hardly be quenched by pride in the Tramond-Lebel rifle on the one hand, or by fear of it on the other.

PRIVILEGE FOR LIBELLERS.

THE letters to the Times of Mr. Justice STEPHEN, Mr. WHORLOW, and a verbose person signing himself "An "English Barrister," come opportunely to remind the House of Commons and the country of what the former is being asked to do, and has to a great extent done, with an amount of complaisance only to be explained on the ground of inexcusable negligence. The modest proposal which the House of Commons has sanctioned in principle to the extent of going into Committee without a word of discussion upon the Bill designed to effect it is, in three words, that newspapers should have an absolute right to report verbatim anything which anybody chooses to say at any public meeting. There are other equally audacious proposals in the Bill, but this is the one upon which the controversy principally turns, and about which Mr. WHORLOW, his patrons, and their instigators, are probably most in earnest. On this point it will be almost enough to state the substance of the proposed change in the law, the objections to it pointed out by Mr. Justice STEPHEN, and the replies made to his objections.

The present law is that a report of what was said at a public meeting, lawfully convened for a lawful purpose, is privileged, if it is fair and accurate, and if its publication was for the public benefit. It is proposed to substitute for this a provision that any report shall be privileged if it is a fair and accurate report of what was said at a public meeting, whether or not such meeting was lawfully convened, or for a lawful purpose, and whether the publication of the passage complained of was or was not for the public benefit. The use which may be made of this is obvious. Any reporter carrying his pencil and note-book into the park on Sunday might easily collect in an hour a column or two of hideous slanders against individual members of the aristocracy and the public generally. These slanders in themselves do not do the least harm to their victims, because neither they nor any one to whose good opinion they are sensitive ever hear of them. If they did harm, a great part of them—such as baseless accusations of immorality which is not criminal—would not be actionable, because of having only been spoken and not written, and because such slanders are not recognized as wrongful by the law in the absence of special damage. Under the existing statute any mischief occurring from their publication in the press is remediable at the expense of the person who caused it—the editor with an appetite for scandal. Under the proposed law that remedy would be taken away. The report would be fair and accurate, and the meetings are as public as anything can be. The reporter would earn enough to make his afternoon profitable, and the report would be privileged. It would be impossible to prove malice, because the editor would publish the report not necessarily in order to injure the persons libelled, but primarily in order to satisfy the low curiosity of his readers and fill his own and his proprietor's pockets. The victims would, therefore, have no redress whatever, and the man who had profited by doing them a horrible injury would go on his way rejoicing. Some discussion has been raised as to what is a public meeting. There is no difficulty about it at all. A meeting is where two persons or any larger number come together. If that meeting takes place so that any person who likes can join it, it is public. If a slanderer meets a reporter in the middle of Hyde Park and addresses him in a fairly loud voice, there is a public meeting. It is proposed to enable newspapers to report with impunity—so long as the report is fair and accurate—any slander he may, under those circumstances, choose to utter.

It is not necessary to dwell at length upon the objections to such an alteration of the law. It is, however, instructive to observe the replies to them offered by the "Honorary "Secretary to the Libel Law Reform Committee" and the "English Barrister." The former contends, in the first place, that a pothouse gathering of irresponsible slanderers is obviously not "a public meeting." This is nonsense. It is obviously a meeting, because the people meet, and is obviously public if any passer-by is free to come in. If the promoters of the Bill had intended to privilege reports only of election meetings, town meetings to consider social or political questions, or the like, it would have been perfectly easy to define the sort of public meeting to reports of the proceedings of which privilege was intended to be given. They could have inserted provisions that so many people must be present, that such and such notice must have been given of the intention to hold the meeting, and so forth. But they did nothing of the kind. They used the widest words they could in order to make the privilege as wide as possible. But the main argument, used alike by Mr. WHORLOW and the "English Barrister," is that editors of newspapers would not be so wicked as to publish anything which was not for the public benefit, and that therefore they ought to be set free to do so. "Why "assume, too," he asks in the tone of injured innocence, "that the Press of this country is simply waiting for a "loosening of the reins to rush headlong into a wholesale "and objectless dissemination of scandalous libels"? If the word "objectless" is struck out of this question, on the ground that the dissemination of sufficiently scandalous libels is always profitable and therefore never objectless, the answer to it is plain enough. Because "the Press of this "country" includes newspapers of widely different sorts. There is the Morning Post, which belongs to the introducer of Mr. WHORLOW'S Bill, and which no one suspects of being especially scandalous. There was also—we select a defunct example in order to avoid offence—a newspaper called the Bat. Its editor, having suffered one term of imprisonment for a gross libel on a private person, is now enjoying a Continental sojourn, which enables him to avoid service of a warrant issued against him for another gross libel on another private person. It is perfectly notorious that there are newspapers, the dissemination by which of scandalous libels is checked—so far as it is checked—simply and solely by the provisions of the law. Let any one who thinks those provisions of no avail read one number of any ordinary newspaper published in the United States, where the law of libel is practically a dead letter, and judge for himself whether Mr. Justice STEPHEN'S forebodings of the degeneration of the press into a "purveyor of scandalous gossip" are not amply justified. Mr. WHORLOW is in this dilemma. Either nobody wants to publish libels consisting of reports of slanders uttered at public meetings, in which case his Bill is superfluous, or somebody does, in which case it is pernicious. Nobody who gives careful attention to the Bill itself need remain in doubt as to which branch of the alternative is true.

The "English Barrister" further insists at enormous length that the original law of libel was the same as that of slander, and that the remedy for libel is founded on malice, and not on the damage to the plaintiff, who ought therefore always to be obliged to prove malice affirmatively. As to the first of these contentions, it is enough to say that, by his own admission, libel has been distinguished from slander ever since the accession of CHARLES II., and that he does not propose a reversion to what he chooses to consider the earlier practice. As to the second, he is simply wrong, as he might have discovered by reading a judgment of Sir JAMES MANSFIELD in the old case of THORLEY v. Lord KERRY, upon which alone he relies for his first proposition.

Another thoroughly objectionable clause in the Bill is that which gives absolute privilege to every report of everything said and done in courts of justice. Mr. Justice STEPHEN points out the absurdity of enacting such a provision at the very moment when Parliament in its wisdom is seeking for means to curtail the liberty now enjoyed by newspapers in the reporting of matters which used to be considered "unfit "for publication." Mr. WHORLOW replies that his Bill can very well be amended or qualified by a "few words" to the effect that the "absolute privilege" is not to be an absolute privilege. It is difficult to discuss patiently the proceedings of people who draft proposed Acts of Parliament in this happy-go-lucky style. In a similar spirit has Mr. WHORLOW's draftsman conceived the splendidly audacious clause requiring every plaintiff who happens to be a poor man to give security for costs unless he can affirmatively satisfy a judge in chambers that he ought to be allowed to go on without. Why in cases of libel more than in any others? There is ten times as much extortion practised on railway, tramway, and omnibus Companies by plaintiffs who cannot pay if they lose, and with whom it is, therefore, often the best policy to make terms, as there is on owners of newspapers. No doubt railway Companies who break their customers' bones would be delighted to stop them from suing unless they can give security for costs. Why not they, just as much as other defendants? Will any member of Parliament kindly make the proposal, and see what Sir ALGERNON BORTHWICK, and the other respectable members who have backed Sir ALGERNON's Bill, will say to it? Almost every line of the Bill provokes destructive criticism, but the question of reports of public meetings is the most important. There is reason to believe that the proposed alteration of the law in this particular originated in a manner not universally understood, and that if it were carried out we should see results which the ostensible promoters of it do not expect and—to do them justice—would by no means appreciate. But it must not be allowed to pass in its present form, or anything nearly resembling it.

OUR NAVAL POSITION.

ANY ONE who wishes to see in a convenient form the exact difference between the persons whom we propose to continue to call the critic and the chronic alarmist can hardly do better than compare Admiral HORNBY's speech on the "Defence of Merchant Ships in Case of War" with well nigh anything (except the very similar address of Admiral COLOMB) recently said by naval officers on the condition of the navy. These gentlemen are naturally vehement, as their predecessors in the last century were naturally censorious according to RODNEY. When they speak about the navy it is with great zeal and manifestly honest conviction, but unfortunately also with a looseness of assertion and a lavish employment of generalities which make their comments as barren as the north wind. They are amply kept in countenance by other gentlemen on shore. Pace the St. James's Gazette, there are many dismal pictures drawn of the defenceless state of the country, and much wild talk goes on about it. There is folly in being scared because some of HER MAJESTY's ships are "obsolete," if only on the ground that some vessels of foreign Powers are in the identical position. It is silly to talk of 25- and 35-ton Woolwich guns in words which would be an accurate description of an 18-pounder carronade; and it is done. Worse than talk of this kind—which, after all, deals with matters of detail—is the nervous craven spirit shown in so much of the "chronic alarmist" writing and talking. Not one, but a round score, gentlemen on that side seem habitually to take it for granted that the enemy will be our superior in sense and courage; that he will be everywhere at once, and will always succeed; that the disabilities which weigh on us will not weigh on him; and, worst of all, that the people of this country are so sunk in spirit as to be unable to bear the strain of a disaster. It is right to prepare against such a misfortune, unquestionably; but it is equally right to take it for granted that, if it did happen, it would be borne manfully. At least, that is not the worst way of preparing to behave properly at a crisis; it is certainly better than doing your best to establish a funk before the bowling has even begun. We seem to have seen in contemporary evening prints doleful pictures of the English people going mad at the first blow. If that is to happen, the game is up. We are doomed to defeat, even though Great Britain were suddenly to acquire the powers of the island of Laputa. No wealth of weapons is in the long run of any avail to cowards and fools. Unhappily it is true that panics have been needed to stimulate our War Office and Admiralty, but it is not the whole truth. To complete the statement, it is necessary to add that they have been followed by reactions of disgust and fatigue, which have done more than proportionate mischief. Much of the neglect of the navy was undoubtedly due to the reaction against the absurd panic set going by Sir E. REED when the Russians launched the boasted Peter the Great—now a floating workshop and avowed failure. After that "sell" people would not listen to any more about the subject.

Admiral HORNBY's contribution to the general discussion is wholly free from the usual vague generalities. It is a thoroughly business-like attempt to settle a practical question. Given that we were at war with the next strongest navy in Europe, how many cruisers would be needed to protect our commerce, and where ought they to be stationed? This is the problem which Admiral HORNBY undertook to consider. His examination is almost equally valuable whether we accept his figures or not. Sir GEOFFREY would not himself assert that they are final. He knows, and took care to point out, that the introduction of steam has so greatly altered the conditions of war as to make it somewhat unsafe to argue exclusively from old experience. We can only discuss probabilities. But the Admiral has done excellent service by setting the example of leaving general declamation aside, and we trust his example will be followed by other officers. After some reasonable amount of discussion we may then attain to as accurate a knowledge of our needs as it is possible to possess without actual experience of war. There is one part of his speech which might well serve as a text for any competent writer who wished to contribute to the public instruction. It is the passage in which the Admiral comments briefly on the effect the use of steam is likely to have on naval warfare. As he showed, its influence will certainly be to shorten cruises and localize war. The Admiral takes, among others, the question of the protection of our trade on the line, or in the South Atlantic, against an enemy starting from Goree. He points out how the absolute necessity of renewing their coal will compel our cruisers to return at brief intervals to port; and, therefore, we shall be compelled to keep three vessels with their headquarters at Sierra Leone, in order that two may always be on a given cruising ground. This is only one example of what will be taking place all over the world, and must be allowed for in estimating the number of cruisers we may need. In future no admiral or captain will dare to go further from a safe port than his coal will take him back. Admiral HORNBY, who was dealing with one question only, and in a somewhat confined space, could do no more than touch on the question of the influence of the need of coal, and it will stand longer treatment. We see no reason why it should be an unpleasant subject for Englishmen. If need of fuel will tie down our cruisers, it will have exactly the same effect on the enemy. He also will have to return to port for coal, and, as he has fewer ports and they are more scattered, he will have the further to go and be the less able to keep the sea. No future BAILLI DE SUFFREN will be able to run down to Acheen before the monsoon, and lie hid for months in a quiet bay, collecting wood and water till the weather allows him to come to sea again. He will have to take care to make for a place where there is coal. We have more ports and more coal than anybody, and therefore hold the best hand of trumps in the game, according to the new rules. The necessity of keeping to his point probably accounts for the Admiral's omission to deal with what seems to us by far the best method of protecting our commerce in distant seas—by the capture, namely, of the enemy's ports. It would surely be better in every way, easier, cheaper, and safer, to go and take Goree at once than to keep cruisers painfully patrolling in front of it. Here, again, is an opportunity for the naval essayist. Might he not show how the best possible use to be made of the armed merchant ships would be to fit them as transports, fill them with soldiers, and employ them as flying columns to co-operate with war ships in clearing out the hornets' nests? All the experience of the old war is in favour of this view. In spite of our unquestionable superiority at sea, it was found impossible to prevent privateers and cruisers from annoying our trade in the Indian Ocean until a series of combined expeditions had mastered the Dutch and French islands. Perhaps as good a way as another of keeping hostile cruisers quiet would be to begin the war by a thorough sweep out of their hiding-places, after the fashion of the vigorous cruise of Sir R. HOLMES against the Dutch on behalf of the Guinea Company. This resource would not be quite so available on the enemy's own coast; and in the Channel, no doubt, we shall always be compelled to rely on the blockading fleets and cruisers as of old—with an occasional interlude in way of attack on a port. Cherbourg lies very handy for the purpose.

It is unquestionably true that our power to take these or any other measures to defend our commerce depends on the number of our ships and guns. Whether we have enough of either is not such an easy thing to settle, for it depends on the strength of the enemy. The work the navy has to do is to defend our commerce, and must needs be greater or less according to the numbers of the assailants. If we require, as Admiral HORNBY thinks, 185 cruisers, all of over 16 knots speed, it must be because the enemy has vessels enough of the same speed to cruise on all our five-and-twenty stations at once, and supply reliefs to his cruisers. Is there any such enemy? If not, what smaller number will do? Perhaps by carefully working on the same lines as Admiral HORNBY we may arrive at some conclusion. For the present nothing seems to be proved except that we could certainly find employment for more—even many more—swift cruisers than we possess. Much has been done within the last three years to add to the strength of the navy; but it has not been so strengthened as to be manifestly equal to all calls. Even as regards the guns it ought not to be forgotten that 238 were delivered in 1887; some of them had to be strengthened, it is true, but the work is being steadily done, and before the end of the year several of the new heavy guns will be delivered. After all Germany also is re-arming and will find it a long job. Lord GEORGE HAMILTON was perfectly justified in making the most of the energy recently shown in construction. Much has been done, and he has shown a very real desire to put the navy on a proper footing. Still the obvious sincerity of his administration only makes it the less easy to understand why he does not either give his reason for thinking that enough is being done, or else come forward and ask for the means to do more.

ROSS NEIL.

MISS HARWOOD, who has just died somewhat suddenly, did not long survive her father, Mr. PHILIP HARWOOD, late editor of the Saturday Review, whose career and characteristics were discussed in these columns on the occasion of his decease in December last. His accomplished daughter was known to the world of readers—beyond literary and artistic circles—as ROSS NEIL, the author of poetical dramas that are rightly held in high esteem by the judicious. To this disguise Miss HARWOOD continued faithful. All the volumes that comprise Miss HARWOOD's dramatic works, issued by Mr. ELLIS, by whom much poetry and good has visited an unworthy world, bear on their title-pages the name ROSS NEIL. The name is as familiar to the student of modern poetry and the contemporary stage as the dark slate-blue binding favoured by the Bond Street publishers. ROSS NEIL's first volume appeared in 1871, and was instantly accepted as the production of a poet—a poet, moreover, with a decided dramatic capacity. The book contained two plays founded on history, in the treatment of which the author's strong predilection for romance and the method of the romanticists was clearly divulged. In Lady Jane Grey the engaging freshness of ROSS NEIL's handling of a much-handled theme is notable indeed, and the same quality distinguishes the companion play, Inez; or, the Bride of Portugal. This last, under the title of Loyal Love, was produced only last August on the Gaiety stage, with Mrs. BROWN-POTTER, Mr. WILLARD, and Mr. KYRLE BELLEW in the cast. If the results were not altogether encouraging, it is only fair to recall the general disapproval of the acting version of the original play. In 1876 were published the charming fairy drama Elfinella—subsequently produced at the Princess's—and Lord and Lady William Russell. ROSS NEIL's second volume (1874) comprised three plays, among them the effective drama on the well-known legend of ROBERT, King of Sicily (The King and the Angel), a subject suggested to the author by a rather curious passage—curious, as criticism, we may say—in LEIGH HUNT's Jar of Honey from Mount Hybla. A fourth volume appeared in 1879, and a fifth—Andrea the Painter, &c.—in 1883.

No one who studies the whole sequence of these delightful plays can fail to be struck by the unfailing gift of pure and limpid fancy which was prominent in the author's poetic endowment. Nor is the imaginative faculty, though less frequently called upon, less distinguishable in scenes of tragedy. The blank verse of ROSS NEIL, facile and elegant for the most part, is peculiarly individual in the later plays. The lyrics are at times exquisitely bird-like in spontaneity, and now and again serve the dramatic purpose with a felicity that is magical in effect. We are the more sensible of the loss sustained by poetic literature through the author's death because it is her last volume which we regard as the highest and truest expression of her gifts, both as poet and dramatist. Finis coronat opus is a reflection that comes with a sense of tardy mitigation of loss. That playwrights in these days are seldom poets, and still more rarely literary artists, is a matter it were vain to deplore. In the best of all possible worlds managers might do well with Claudia's Choice, and a theatrical public purged of base yearnings for spectacle and farcical romping might rejoice in the exquisite fancy and refined humour of Pandora. Even now there are some few and sluggish signs of a turning tide. But the wise ask not for signs, nor is it meet occasion here to discuss vexed questions of the relations of literature and the stage. The divorce of poetry from the drama is an old and troublous matter; the divorce of both, when presented in rare conjunction, from the stage may move the regrets of some few; but it touches not fastidious managers. For all this, sharing the exile of the poetic drama of our day, the plays of ROSS NEIL will continue to appeal to a goodly audience, and not vainly.

CRICKET.

THAN Mr. BONNOR opening his shoulders no more noble spectacle is offered by Aryan man. Visitors to Lord's on Tuesday afternoon had this sight to console them for being nearly frozen. After playing Mr. SMITH and Mr. GRACE with discretion, Mr. BONNOR suddenly conceived a violent desire to hit every ball of Mr. RADCLIFFE out of the ground. He did not always succeed in doing more than reach the ropes; but the ball which flew over the flag on the left of the pavilion, and the other which alighted among the members, proved that Mr. BONNOR has not only an ideal—he can attain it. In some respects it was a pity that Mr. KEY, with the sun at his back, misjudged a lofty catch near the ropes. If he had held it, the chances are that the match would still not have been finished, for the bowling of the Gentlemen in the second innings was far from being formidable. But about a hundred of Mr. BONNOR's 119 would not have been made. He had other pieces of luck in the long fields, and may have owed them to the icy wind which froze the fielders' fingers. But he has often let off British batsmen at short-slip, and a good deal of consideration in this way was courteously repaid to him. His innings was a beautiful display of relentless hard hitting.

The match could not in itself be very interesting, as the Derby Day enforced a closure. What the judicious had prophesied weeks before came true; the Australian bowlers were mastered on a good wicket at Lord's. Yet the chief Australian bowlers, Mr. TURNER and Mr. FERRIS, got all the ten wickets in a score of 490. The score of the Gentlemen might probably have reached 700 if they had not been anxious to get the Australians in and to try to win the match. Probably, if the proposed new rule had been law, the English Eleven would have declared their innings over, with several wickets to fall. As it was, Mr. SMITH, Mr. BUCKLAND, Mr. ROLLER, and others of the later wickets had apparently orders to hit at almost every ball, and so bring the innings to a close. In pursuit of this policy Mr. SMITH made some very fine strokes on the off side. This recklessness offered the only chance of winning, and when the Australians got in for the second time they had to make 320 to save a defeat by a single innings. They had still 107 to make when time was called, and they had only lost one wicket, Mr. BONNOR's, while the defence of Mr. BANNERMAN and Mr. JONES appeared impregnable. Thus the Gentlemen can only be said to have secured a draw slightly in their favour, for we know what the Colonial bowlers can do when runs are to be kept down in the last innings. However, the affair was more auspicious than had been expected, especially when we remember that no man of the present University elevens was able to play at Lord's. Mr. NEWNHAM hardly justified his selection, and Mr. BOWDEN, who kept wicket very well, had no chance of scoring. The honours on the English side were, of course, with Mr. GRACE, whose 165 against such excellent bowling outshines his great score at Brighton. Mr. SHUTER also played excellently. Mr. READ was lucky in getting his 109, for Mr. BLACKHAM was hardly so quick and sure behind wickets as usual. As for the English bowling in the first innings, Mr. SMITH proved as successful as he sometimes did in earlier days for Cambridge. On the whole, the moral of the match is that wickets may be too good for any bowling

Yet only last week BURTON, a slow bowler, got rid of a Yorkshire team for forty-three runs at Lord's.

The flag of Surrey has been lowered at Leicester, but Surrey played, of course, without Mr. READ, Mr. KEY, Mr. SHUTER, and Mr. ROLLER. Oxford made a very poor exhibition against Lancashire, who, thanks to Mr. NAPIER and Mr. STEEL, had just managed to defeat the Australians. Mr. NAPIER, however, did not play against the University. Mr. NEPEAN proved much more useful with the bat than with the ball, and Mr. RASHLEIGH remains the most trustworthy Oxford batsman. Apparently, the Oxford bowling is very weak. Cambridge, on the other hand, find in Mr. FORD a most valuable ally to the freshman Mr. WOODS, and they have beaten Yorkshire by four wickets. The success would have been more important if Yorkshire had not just been defeated so easily by Middlesex. Still, the constant merit of Mr. WOODS and Mr. FORD is of good omen, and Mr. KEMP appears to have recovered his former skill, and to be again the batsman of 1886.

THE CHANNEL TUNNEL.

IT seems that a meeting, probably of persons judiciously selected, has been held in St. James's Hall, for the purpose of affirming the expediency, and even the necessity, of Sir EDWARD WATKIN's Channel Tunnel. The resolutions to that effect which may have been passed derive their all importance from the approval of the scheme which has, not for the first time, been elicited by the promoters from Lord DERBY. Mr. GLADSTONE expressed the same opinion when the Chairman of the Tunnel Company lately opened a railway in North Wales which in his judgment was locally advantageous. Since that time Sir EDWARD WATKIN has at least agreed to waver in his political allegiance; and indeed he has proved his devotion to his leader by proposing that the Local Government Bill should be extended to Ireland. Mr. GLADSTONE's reasons for supporting his plan of the Tunnel are scarcely worth examining, because he would probably regard with indifference any danger which might be threatened by the proposed communication with the Continent. If Mr. GLADSTONE were suddenly to discover that a French protectorate of England would be unobjectionable, the indignation which he might provoke would scarcely be mingled with surprise. A few years ago he described the "silver streak" of the narrow seas as a sufficient security against foreign invasion. It is now proposed, either through mere levity or for the purpose of winning half a dozen votes, to convert the streak of water into dry land, which would render possible the passage of armies. It is much more surprising that a serious statesman, such as Lord DERBY, should retain the opinion which some other eminent persons formed when the project of a Tunnel was suggested several years ago.

It is difficult to believe that Lord DERBY can have been misled by Sir EDWARD WATKIN's attempts to disprove the grave dangers of abandoning an insular position. The whole policy of England has been founded on the assumption that, as long as the navy commanded the seas, an invasion would be either impossible or too dangerous to be undertaken. It is because the silver streak is there that the European system of universal military service has never been introduced into this country. The Tunnel would at once deprive England of its best line of defence and render it necessary either to buy off an invader or to place the whole population under arms. The chief promoter of the Tunnel has often ridiculed an imaginary process which has not been apprehended by any rational opponent of the project. It would, as Sir EDWARD WATKIN has frequently explained, be easy to close the Tunnel to an army marching to the conquest of England. Whether even for this purpose the necessary precautions would be taken depends on the balance of Parliamentary factions. If there were a question of blowing up the northern end of the Tunnel, protests might be made by public meetings at St. James's Hall or elsewhere by denouncing premature interference with the course of trade. Such a measure would be described as a wanton provocation in time of peace, and when war broke out it might possibly be too late; but it may be admitted that a narrow passage might, either by military force or by mechanical means, be rendered inaccessible to an enemy. The mode in which the Tunnel would be used by an invading army would be of a different nature.

During the recent controversy on the naval and military preparations which are required for the safety of the country, all experts have agreed that an enemy might possibly succeed in landing an army, on the South Coast, strong enough to march upon London. The consideration which would make an enemy hesitate to try the experiment would be the difficulty of effecting a retreat. The tidings of an accomplished invasion would bring an overwhelming naval force into the Channel for the purpose of preventing the enemy from communicating with his base, or returning to the Continent. Enormous damage might be done if the enemy could not be met by an equal force; but the invader would incur a serious risk of ultimate surrender. NAPOLEON himself, though he was prepared, if he had crossed the Channel, to cut himself loose from his base, was perhaps deterred from making the great venture by the fear of a naval blockade which might have rendered retreat impossible. His most sanguine hopes went no further than the scheme of commanding the Channel for a few days. After that time he was well aware that the fleets must retire to the French ports from which they were to have issued. The silver streak had not only to be crossed, but to be recrossed; and it is doubtful whether such an operation would be more practicable now than three-quarters of a century ago; but the enemies of England would feel deeply grateful to Mr. GLADSTONE if he had, under the influence of political motives, abolished the silver streak.

An army landed on the coast of Kent might, if it were not strong enough to attempt both enterprises, have good reason, if the Tunnel had been made, for preferring a siege of Dover even to an advance upon London. The English end of the Tunnel might be the more valuable possession, because it would lead to the occupation of the capital, with all its boundless wealth. The shore end would probably have been blown up as soon as the invasion became certain; but the French have engineers who would be perfectly capable of re-opening the passage in a week. Sir EDWARD WATKIN cannot contemplate the final and irreparable sacrifice of the work which he deems indispensable, and the removal of a temporary obstruction would be as easy to a hostile occupier of the site as to a lawful owner. When the Tunnel was once restored, the communications of the invader would be not only safe, but unassailable. Half a million of trained soldiers might be despatched at pleasure for the conquest of London and of England. No attempt has been made to disprove the imminence of danger, if the naval defences of the country were, as Mr. GLADSTONE and Sir EDWARD WATKIN propose, wholly suspended. It may be added that a successful siege of Dover is not the only mode of obtaining possession of the Tunnel. Treason would be possible as well as the exertion of superior force; and the same results would follow from any process by which the English end of the Tunnel might pass into hostile possession.

The alleged commercial necessity of the Tunnel is absolutely fictitious. At the best the trade with France might possibly be facilitated; but the countries beyond would still be more cheaply accessible by sea. The French Legislature might at its pleasure, and without the cost of a single franc, confer much greater advantages on English traders than any benefit which would result from the Tunnel. If it suited French policy to encourage the Tunnel vote, the tariff might perhaps be manipulated for that purpose; but on any occasion or pretext, however frivolous, the duties might be raised against English producers. If a Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to raise a few thousands of pounds by an extra tax on bottled wines, the French Government would, as of late, cultivate popularity by threatening retaliation; and the traffic by the Tunnel would accordingly be impeded. The anonymous orators of St. James's Hall chose to assert that the necessity of breaking bulk prevented English traders from competing with foreigners on equal terms. It had formerly been supposed that the insular position of England was peculiarly favourable to mercantile intercourse. It cannot be denied that the shareholders of the South-Eastern Railway might profit by the prolongation of their line to the opposite shore of the Channel. No other industrial undertaking is likely to share the advantage which might be purchased at the cost of national ruin.

LIGHT VERSE AND COMIC VERSE.

AN enormous quantity of "light," or "drawing-room," verse is written at present. The reason is not difficult to find. The knack of verse-making with readiness and ease has become common; the imitation of various foreign forms and metres has increased the facility. Meanwhile the "makers" are conscious that they have nothing very deep, or moving, or important, to say. There seems to be no harm in their industry, unless we are to regard verse as a kind of holy vehicle, not to be profaned to purposes of amusement and bantor. This theory seems to be held by some critics, of whom it may suffice to say that such powers of rhyming as they possess would be better employed on trivialities than on grave topics. It is worse to fail in epic and serious lyric or narrative than to succeed in triolets, though we are far from imagining that the aforesaid critics would succeed in anything.

But, while light verse is common, and while the camp-followers of Mr. AUSTIN DOBSON are a cheerful set of stragglers, comic verse is very rare indeed. Probably no man has ever chuckled heartily and visibly over Mr. DOBSON'S or Mr. LOCKER'S pieces; they may win a smile, they do not provoke an explosion of mirth. Mr. CALVERLEY, on the other hand, made his readers laugh, and BON GAULTIER made them laugh yet more heartily. So did INGOLDSBY; but the manner of INGOLDSBY, though easily imitated, always misses its effect in the hands of the servum pecus. Since Mr. CALVERLEY'S death, in fact, we can hardly recall a single writer of comic as distinct from mere "society" verse. But such a "maker" has appeared in Mr. ANSTEY, the author of Vice Versâ. He was not a writer to whom one looked, perhaps, for skill in verse; but he possesses it in a degree scarcely less than Mr. GILBERT, whose Bab Ballads, of course, should never be forgotten when funny poems are in question. Mr. ANSTEY has found a new field, and in Burglar Bill (BRADBURY, AGNEW, & Co.) he tills the field with amusing industry. Always inclined to satire, he mocks the amateur reciter. He produces poems in all the moods of that terror of drawing-rooms. He has the touching domestic note, the dialect note, the chord that resounds to the sorrows of beasts and birds, the sporting chord, the sea-going or shipwrecking note—in fact, toute la lyre. Perhaps the example of the "Melodramatic Weird" (using "weird" as an adjective) is the most ingenious of all, or not the least ingenious. There is a touch of SHERIDAN LE FANU in the description of "The Conscience Stricken":—

> Two slippers wrought in faded wools hid his ungainly feet,
> And he danced a grisly polka-step all down the silent street.
>
> [You might just indicate this, if you think you can do so in a sufficiently ghastly and impressive manner; otherwise—don't.

The stage directions just hit off the idiotic reciter and his methods, with his attempts at "maiden archness," and other difficult effects:—

> A drifting sand had veiled the moon, and sicklier she shone
> As he began, "You never knew, methinks, my uncle John?
> A better, aye, a bulkier man this earth has hardly seen,
> He was the first that over burst a 'Try-your-weight' machine."
>
> [A melancholy pride as you mention this.

As usual, Mr. ANSTEY delights in comic predicaments which border on the tragic, as when the young lady cannot answer her lover's proposal because

> (In a confidential aside)
>
> Like a limed bird her fluttering tongue is clogged with caramel.

The parody of the sporting poem is exquisite, the very names of the horses—"Polonia's Pride," "Trombone," and "Golden Crock"—are happily chosen, and the satire is that of Dandy Dick, put short. The cruise of Nuremberg NOAH in the steamship Puffin is a splendid parody of all the terrific Lifeboat poems that appear, like Mr. ANSTEY'S own poems, in Punch; while the author seems to be laughing at himself in the mock pathos of "Positively the Last Performance." The stage directions throughout are only too good, and the result will be the reverse of what Mr. ANSTEY seems to desire. His burlesques will be recited everywhere, for a while, instead of their serious models. We may get as tired of Burglar BILL as of that eternal pointsman whose baby occupied the permanent way in the track of the express, like the infant TELEMACHUS in front of the plough of ODYSSEUS. The pointsman was more consistent than the son of LAERTES. But reciters will find a difficulty here:—"As you come on there should be a general suggestion in "your manner that you are supposed to be the director of "an itinerant Cat and Canary Troupe." "A Coster's Con"version" is not in very good taste, and might be omitted, with some better piece to take its place, in a new edition. If there are no poets who can move us with serious verse (and nobody but Mr. LECKY has been moved much lately by divine and recent minstrelsy), at least it is something to find in Mr. ANSTEY "a merry bard." He only aims at a very flitting folly; he cannot expect to last like THACKERAY; but while it lasts the fun is good. But reciters will be revenged, and the new comic poems will be hackneyed by their assiduities.

THE TRANS-CASPIAN RAILWAY.

THE opening on Sunday last of the furthest branch for the present of the railway somewhat vaguely called Trans-Caspian is, of course, an excellent opportunity for journalism of the pictorial kind. MACAULAY, who, to judge from an early Cambridge skit of PRAED'S, must have invented the fashion in his boyhood, would have revelled in sentences about "Samaria and Samarcand" (Samaria would have done as well as anything else); and the kind of journalism referred to is more than indebted to MACAULAY for its tricks and manners. We shall not ourselves endeavour to compete with it in flourishes about the "city of TAMERLANE" or in reminiscences of the Arabian Nights. The simple and sober facts are quite sufficiently important. Nor, indeed, has the particular terminus now reached, except for purposes of appeal to the imagination—on the spot, it is true, as well as elsewhere—much to do with the matter. The really serious part of the task of the Annenkoff Railway, as it is sometimes, and not unjustly, called, was performed in the main when the line reached Merv, and still more when it reached the Oxus. At the former point Russia came into full possession of uninterrupted means of transit by rail (except by a brief steamer junction-link) from every one of her arsenals and recruiting grounds in Europe to her rallying point and basis for the famous march on India. At the second point she joined a second line of communication, not so rapid, but still more convenient, not only northward and westward, but also southward and eastward, by means of river and lake steamers. England, also, has a railway terminus looking towards Central Asia, and somewhat nearer to the actual debateable ground, the probable battle-ground, of Afghanistan than Russia's. But, whereas her terminus is reached, as has been said, direct from Europe, ours connects itself only with Indian sources, and in order to send any reinforcements by it to the cockpit of Asia the long journey to Kurrachee or Bombay must be completed by sea precisely as of old. The actual military value of the Trans-Caspian line is, like most things in this world, matter of dispute. Reasonable people may hesitate almost as much to accept the picture of a Russian mobilization in force on the Afghan frontier effected by the Trans-Caspian railway in a few days as they hesitated to accept the pessimist views of some considerable Russian authorities in the other direction. We shall content ourselves with repeating an argument which we have more than once urged, but which we may put in a new form. The respective advantages of Russia and England for a fight in Afghanistan, as differentiated by this railway, are very much what the respective advantages of France and England would be, supposing that there were war in Navarre, and that the French could send men and material straight by rail from Paris, while England had to send both round by sea to Lisbon or Corunna, and then through the peninsula by train. If any one thinks this no advantage to France, then he may think the other no advantage to Russia.

It is, however, natural that a good deal should be said about other uses and other purposes of the railway. No doubt it has other uses, if not exactly other purposes. As it could never have been made but for Russian conquest in the very recent past, so it may be taken as certain that it would never have been made except in the hope of more Russian conquest in the not very distant future. Still, waggons will carry peaceful goods as well as warlike goods, and the Trans-Caspian waggons, no doubt, do so. We are not greatly disturbed at the effect which this may produce on Indian trade. It is a kind of competition which must have been anticipated sooner or later, and which is not of itself very dangerous. But it seems that some busy and perhaps honest fanatics of the scheme hope for extensions hither and thither, for the joining of "Calais and Calcutta," for a peaceful meeting of English and Russian civilization, "exchanging the clasp of the iron hand" (that is the proper claptrap, we believe), and so forth. If such an idea were possessed of a little more sobriety itself it might be soberly pointed out in return that Afghanistan and the No Man's Land about the Himalayas are not like Turkestan and the Khanates, for the most part level desert; that England is not like Russia, in the happy position of being able to expend any number of millions with no check except military advice or despotic fancy; and that, as Russians themselves admit that a Tashkend branch (it is odd that there happens to be nothing to conquer in that particular direction) would not pay, so much more, also, would not a Merv-Herat-Cabul-Candahar system pay. It is, however, hardly necessary to take things of this sort seriously. That considerable advantage might accrue to England from the construction of a very different system of communication—that is to say, of the long-talked-of line across Syria to the Persian Gulf—is indeed perfectly arguable. And it may be observed that in previous cases, where long lines of railway communication have been thrown in this way across continents, the opening of rival and parallel routes has had a tendency to follow. But however obliging it may be of Russians to suggest the convenience of sending by the Trans-Caspian English officers and English soldiers to India in times of peace, we are inclined to postpone the consideration of those advantages for the present. International courtesy is a charming thing. But we hardly think that Russia can have built, even so cheaply, the Trans-Caspian railway out of pure good nature and desire to save English troops the long and troublesome transport by sea.

There is, however, one matter which deserves, in close connexion with what has been said, attention as close. In the very natural and pardonable exhilaration which attends the completion of a considerable national feat and the acquisition of a considerable national advantage, certain Russians have spoken much more openly than has been usual with them of the designs of Russia in a quarter to which we have ourselves recently invited Englishmen to pay some heed. England is told that all may be very comfortable between her and her almost neighbour provided this and that is permitted. And among the this and that are included a considerable extension of Russian influence in Persia, and, sooner or later, access for Russia in some way or other to the Persian Gulf. Now it is necessary to point out, and at prudent intervals to insist, that this is just the one thing which no English Ministry, unless it was under an even more fatal delusion than those which prompted or permitted the abandonment of the Khanates themselves and of Independent Turkestan, could consent to. Mr. GLADSTONE, of course, is personally capable of anything in relation to matters which he does not understand and in which he takes no interest. But to take an extreme case, and to suppose that the junior member for Northampton became Prime Minister, in which case, of course, gratitude would induce him to offer the Foreign Office to his colleague, we hardly think that even a BRADLAUGH-LABOUCHERE Ministry would open the Persian Gulf to Russia, unless, of course, their Irish allies demanded this sacrifice of Empire unrelentingly. To permit such an access would always have been insane; but since the completion of the Trans-Caspian railway it would be of an almost impossibly obvious insanity. For by so doing the last possibility of independent access by land from the Mediterranean to India would be finally and irrevocably cut off. The commercial no less than the military results of the cessation of the state of things which makes the Persian Gulf an English lake are very easily to be understood, and very well worth the investigation of every Englishman whose notions of politics do not stop at his own rates and taxes, or at the prevention of his thirsty neighbour from the crime of quenching thirst. And to every such Englishman the fresh conditions which this completion of the Trans-Caspian Railway have introduced into this question ought to give it a new interest, while they at the same time considerably simplify the study. There are few "nevers" in politics, but it may be fearlessly laid down that Russia never can obtain an outlet from her Asiatic territories southward to the sea until the British Empire lies prostrate for its enemies to cut up. This was always clear to well-informed politicians; General ANNENKOFF is to be thanked for having made it clear to almost any one.

THE NATIONAL PORTRAITS.

THE alarming, though quite unsupported, rumour to which we referred some weeks ago, and which Sir AUSTIN LAYARD in a letter to the Times of Tuesday refers to more distinctly, that the collection of national portraits is to return to South Kensington immediately, has at length roused a show of opposition. Sir A. LAYARD's letter was partly answered the next day by the publication of a brief but pithy petition to Lord SALISBURY, praying that a permanent home may be provided at once. There is no reference to the question of site, and the document, which is extensively signed by all kinds of eminent people, consists otherwise of little more than the words mentioned above. Another memorial is being got up in the House of Commons, and we trust that the move thus made may lead to good results. Mr. SMITH has appointed Tuesday, 5th June, to meet the Trustees, and we have reason to believe that the objections to the South Kensington site, but especially to the South Kensington inflammable sheds, will be fully set forth. There is, just now, a most suitable site to be had. It is close to the Foreign and India Offices, close also to the headquarters of the Trustees in Great George Street, not far from Westminster Abbey, and equally accessible to the visitor from the East or the West End of town. The British working-man, who was expected to take such an interest in the portraits when they were sent to Bethnal Green, has disappointed the expectation and refused to avail himself of the privileges offered him. It is not likely he may be more disposed to go to Westminster; but it is absolutely certain that he will not go to South Kensington. This is a fact which has been demonstrated over and over again; while a visit to the National Gallery in Trafalgar Square will convince the most sceptical that he is quite willing to go there, even in his working clothes. In any case, there is no object in leaving the collection at Bethnal Green, while many weighty reasons exist against taking it back to South Kensington. Another reason for building at Westminster is that the site is at present vacant, or nearly so, and must be "eating its head off" in rates. Other places have been mentioned, but this is by far the most convenient in every way. We have pointed out the appropriateness of the Tower of London as a home for the collection, and there is plenty of room there for the erection of a gallery; but Westminster is still more appropriate, and there is no lack of vacant space.

The Director of the National Gallery of Ireland, in Dublin, has formed a collection of portraits of eminent Irishmen and others connected with that island; but there are strong objections against any similar conjunction in Trafalgar Square. Naturally, portraits are not always—perhaps we should say not often—good pictures. Some of the most fashionable portrait-painters have been but poor artists. We talk of REYNOLDS and GAINSBOROUGH, but against them must be put a host consisting of such men as HUDSON and BRIGGS. KNELLER probably painted as many eminent people as either VANDYCK or LELY. Sir FRANCIS GRANT certainly did so. The Director of the National Gallery must think of the art of a picture first. It would be a great pity that the question of art should trouble the Director of the Portrait Gallery. Moreover, the requisite space is wanting in Trafalgar Square; for, though the barracks still exist there, we must hope that at some future time the pictures will oust the soldiers, and the sooner that time comes the better. The memorial to the Government will have had at least one good effect. It will have called attention to a matter of serious importance—one which should, as the memorialists well and truly say, be settled "without any further delay." Unfortunately, however great the speed with which the objects of this petition are carried out, there must elapse many months, including a winter season, before the collection is properly housed. In the interval it is difficult to say what should be done with it. One thing, however, is very clear; it should not be sent back to run the risks of fire at South Kensington.

IRELAND.

WE are glad to perceive that the Irish Unionists have laid to heart the stimulating counsels addressed to them a few months ago by Mr. GOSCHEN, and have taken an important public step towards the promotion of the political alliance which was then so eloquently recommended to them. The meeting recently convened by the Liberal Union in Dublin was intended to include Irish Unionists of all political colours, and the character of the response to the summons gives us every reason to believe that the league between parties for the defence of the Union will be as firm and harmonious in Dublin as it is at Westminster. The meeting in the Molesworth Hall was not only large and enthusiastic, but it seems to have been as happily varied in its political composition as could be desired. To say that it was representative of all the professional and commercial strength and repute of the local community is only the same thing as saying that the invitation of the Irish Liberal-Unionists was successful in inducing the supporters of the Union among the professional and commercial classes of the Irish capital to demonstrate the overwhelming strength which they have always possessed. Parnellism has never really secured the countenance of more than an infinitesimal fraction of those Dublin citizens who have anything to lose by misrule and intelligence enough to foresee it. The mischief hitherto has been that an overwhelming majority of men of these classes have been content to abide in their armchairs—or, to be more just, perhaps in their offices, counting-houses, chambers, and consulting-rooms—and merely send their good wishes to the Unionist cause; whereby their more active and wholly unscrupulous opponents have been emboldened to represent them as secretly favouring the Separatist cause. A few such gatherings as that which was addressed last Tuesday by Mr. WODEHOUSE and Mr. CRAIG SELLAR will render this assertion so conspicuously absurd that even the Separatists perhaps will be glad to let it drop.

The speeches of the two English guests were vigorous and to the point, and that of Mr. WODEHOUSE in particular is to be welcomed as indicating the view of all the sounder and steadier portion of the Liberal-Unionist party in Parliament on the question of extending local government to Ireland. To this section of Lord HARTINGTON'S followers, no doubt the great bulk of them, as to their leader himself, the line so indiscreetly taken up—to give it no worse description—by Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL does not in any wise commend itself. On the contrary, we find, and we rejoice to find, this representative Liberal-Unionist entreating his Dublin audience not, "for heaven's sake, to be drawn "into any pedantic regard for identity and simultaneity." "What analogy is there," he very pertinently asked, "between local elective centres in England and those in "Ireland, where every new power would be used to advance "Home Rule and to obtain a national Parliament and "Executive?" And he concluded by adjuring his hearers not to accept the good results of Mr. BALFOUR'S firm administration as "reasons and excuses for the introduction "of new local arrangements in Ireland, which would destroy "the good done, lose the ground won, plunge the country back "again into the cauldron of disturbance and disorder, and "leave the loyal party in Ireland without adequate protection "against the National League." Plain speech of this sort from Liberal-Unionists may perhaps set a much-needed example to a certain order of so-called Conservatives—those, to wit, who are never easy except when actively bidding, or seriously meditating an active bid, against the Gladstonians in respect of what is very unaptly called "remedial legis-"lation" for Ireland. As a matter of fact, Ireland could take no better remedy for the worst of the diseases from which she has suffered for the last dozen years or so than that which Mr. BALFOUR is so patiently and, thus far, so successfully administering to her; and those who are already beginning to talk of changing the treatment for the mere sake of "dishing" the rival practitioner by appropriating one of his nostrums ought to be sternly discouraged. Decentralization of a certain kind may very well be tried in Ireland. There is plenty of room for it, as Mr. CRAIG SELLAR pointed out—and as every business-like Englishman used to admit until he saw the unfair use which was being made of his admission—in connexion with the system of private Bill legislation. Irishmen have undoubtedly a right—as, of course, have Scotchmen, and, for the matter of that, English provincials also—to demand such a change in this system as will save distant localities the trouble and expense of representation at Westminster, in order to obtain Parliamentary sanction for any local work; but this specific grievance is separable with perfect ease from the general demand for extended powers of local government in Ireland, and the former can and should be treated without any reference to the latter. The House of Commons might well employ itself next Session in devising some such new arrangements as were suggested by Mr. CRAIG SELLAR for localising inquiries into the subject-matter of private Bill legislation; but that is something very different from the rash experiment for which "Tory Democracy," in emulation of a certain section of Radical Unionists, appears just now to be hankering.

The resolution adopted by the meeting of Irish Catholic prelates at Clonliffe College is another heavy blow to the Campaigners; while the endeavour of the Parnellite party on the Cork Municipal Council to rival the not too impressive protest of the Dublin Municipality against the Papal Rescript has had an absolutely ludicrous issue. A special meeting of the Council was to have been held the other day for the purpose of endorsing the Dublin Mansion House resolution; but only eight of the fifty-six members who compose the Council attended, and as it requires fifteen to constitute a quorum, this business for which the meeting was summoned could not be transacted. The MAYOR announced that a secret meeting of the Roman Catholic members of the Council privately convened by him had been held that morning, at which the resolution passed by forty members of Mr. PARNELL'S Parliamentary party had been adopted. At the last Council meeting Alderman SCOTT had reminded the MAYOR that he could only convene a section of the Council in his private capacity, and this view having been confirmed by legal advice, the MAYOR proposed to summon the entire body. Subsequently, however, it was decided to resort to the original idea of confining the meeting to the Roman Catholic members, "lest Alderman SCOTT should attend, and by his "opposition provoke the Catholic members into using "language in reference to Monsignor PERSICO and the "POPE which they would afterwards regret." The private meeting was accordingly held by the MAYOR "in his private "capacity," and the conclave being, in Masonic language, "tiled in," we can only presume that nobody said anything either about Monsignor PERSICO or the POPE which he has since regretted; though, on the other hand, as the unreported proceedings cannot possibly influence any one, we must also conclude that nobody has said anything on which he can very proudly congratulate himself. To complete this truly comic story, we should add that afterwards, when the above-mentioned public meeting of the Municipal Council was actually held, the dreaded Alderman SCOTT did not put in an appearance at all. He was one of the forty-eight members of the Council who absented themselves; so that, if in the result no opinion on the Papal Rescript has been had from the Corporation, the MAYOR can still reflect with pride that, if such an opinion had been obtained, it would have been unaccompanied by regrettable language.

In the meantime even the two or three agitators who still carry on the nefarious game are constantly making clumsy admissions that it is lost. Mr. O'BRIEN, for instance, "paid an unexpected visit" the other day to Glensharrold, a remote district in West Limerick, and addressed the DELMEGE tenantry, who, having been refused a reduction of 51 per cent., adopted the Plan of Campaign last autumn. Evictions were successfully carried out on this property at that time, and, as more are now threatened, no doubt the tenantry require keeping up to the mark. But Mr. O'BRIEN had not a very encouraging "way wid him." He told them that "undoubtedly a heavy blow had been "struck at their combination by the letter of the Bishop of "LIMERICK"; and he went on to say that that letter "gagged and shackled" the local priest, Father AMBROSE, and "deprived them of his guidance." Priests like Father AMBROSE, he admitted, might be silenced and bound by their superiors, but all the world knew their sympathies; so that "he did not fear for the Campaigned estates, but "rather for those tenants who had not adopted the Plan." But, if the tenants who have not adopted the Plan will hesitate to do so because their priests stand aloof, the tenants who have adopted it are likely to waver in their adherence to it for the same reason. And, indeed, Mr. O'BRIEN'S intimate consciousness of this fact is perceptible enough in his uneasy endeavours to persuade the world that he and his associates hardly feel the blow under which their whole organization of fraud and terrorism is so manifestly reeling.

THE EDGWARE ROAD FIRE.

THE fatal fire in Edgware Road was unhappily distinguished by a painful novelty. Part of the loss of life, if not all, may be directly attributed to the fault of the Fire Brigade—not, indeed, to any want of zeal or courage on the part of the men, but to apparently defective organization and unreadiness. Otherwise the disaster belonged to a well-known type [illegible] it has been proved over and over again that the nar[illegible] and lofty business houses now so common in all parts of London burn with the most dreadful rapidity. Their staircases and lifts serve to let up a draught which carries the flames from story to story. It is obvious that the longer a staircase is the more liable it is to be cut by the flames. When the upper story is inhabited, the occupants are almost certain to be shut in if the fire has gained head; and even when they are warned at the beginning their only chance is to rush out at once. The dismal story of the five women who were burned is one of a long series. In many cases within the last few years a delay of a few minutes to put on clothes or save a piece of property has been enough to deprive some unfortunate person of a chance. Only the nerve and good sense of a French dressmaker prevented the loss of life from being much more serious. As a coroner's inquest will be held, it is early to express any opinion as to the cause of the fire. Whether it was due to the throwing away of a lighted match or not, it is however perfectly clear that the spread of the flames was extraordinarily rapid, and is one more proof of the dangerous character of so many hundreds of London buildings.

The question how to remove such a source of danger has been often put, but never thoroughly considered. It is obvious that an attempt to enforce internal structural changes, which would practically necessitate the rebuilding of a considerable part of London, at a cost of millions, would be doomed to instant defeat. Neither is it probable that any internal changes would suffice. The remedy may be best sought for in the supply of an outside staircase. There are various difficulties in the way, no doubt—some of them structural, others due to considerations of convenience. It would be necessary to see that the staircase did not become a roosting-place for tramps, or supply the burglar with an extended field of operations. At present he is forced to make his entry by the ground-floor, and would be greatly aided if he were able to reach the upper stories comfortably. But these obstacles to the use of the exterior staircase could be overcome by due arrangements; and in new buildings, at least, this chance of escape might be supplied. The failure of the Fire Brigade is a smaller matter, and easier to remedy. It happened because the fire broke out just while the men were removing the fire-escapes from the night to the day post. As it was the first day of the summer routine, the removal was made an hour earlier than is the rule in winter. This in itself was a cause of confusion and its indirect evil effects. Several men were necessarily told off to trundle the fire-escapes from their night to their day station, and were therefore not available for the general work of the Brigade. Obviously this story suggests several considerations. Is it necessary that the fire-escape should occupy different places by day and by night? If so, is it necessary that the hours of removal should vary in summer and winter? In any case, is it right that an appreciable part of the Brigade should be told off to trundle the fire-escape along? To the second question, we imagine most people will answer "No" at once. Londoners do not make much difference in their hours of getting up between summer and winter. The first question is more complicated. There are places in London at which a fire-escape would be an obstruction to traffic during the day, and would yet be excellently placed at night. The front of the Exchange is such a place. But surely the night and day station should be the same whenever it is possible. The third question is really another in disguise. It is the inquiry whether the Fire Brigade is strong enough. On this point our opinion—and we should imagine the opinion of all who have looked into the matter—has long been made up. The Brigade is not strong enough. Ten months ago, when the fire at WHITELEY'S broke out, it is notorious that all the fire-stations of London, even to the south of the Thames, were swept to collect engines. While the fire was at its height, the whole London Fire Brigade was collected in the neighbourhood of Queen's Road. If another fire, such as this last at Messrs. GARROULD'S, had broken out, there would have been no force at hand to deal with it at all. Captain SHAW has called attention to the weakness of his Brigade repeatedly, but no serious attempt has been made to strengthen it. The Edgware Road fire ought to compel some attention to the subject. The story shows clearly that the Brigade cannot spare men for routine work (which we will suppose for the moment to be necessary) without weakening itself to a very serious extent. Obviously the mere shifting of ladders from one place to another ought not to leave the stations shorthanded. That it should do so is, however, not the fault of the Brigade, but of its paymasters. Whether errors in organization which might have been avoided have not had something to do with the Edgware Road disaster is a question which does touch the credit of the Brigade. It will be a subject of inquiry in the coming inquest, and for the present we may abstain from noticing accusations which have not been checked. There will certainly be no wish that the decision should be adverse to a force which has always done its work with gallantry and, for the most part, with judgment.

THE GORDON BOYS' HOME.

THE second annual meeting of the Council of the Gordon Boys' Home, presided over by the LORD MAYOR on Tuesday at the Mansion House, heard and adopted what most people must consider a very satisfactory report of progress from the secretary, Colonel BEATY-POWNALL. The funded capital amounted to 32,685*l.* on the 1st of April last, showing an increase of 800*l.* in the year. The subscriptions for the year were 1,772*l.*, against 1,115*l.* for the previous fifteen months; and the sum of 12,724*l.* represents the total receipts during the year. The LORD MAYOR paid a well-deserved tribute to the good work already effected by the school and home. Sir HARRY VERNEY was convinced that the institution was being administered in the spirit that General GORDON would have desired. Lord THURLOW, General HIGGINSON, and others among the influential persons present were equally agreed that the aims of the Gordon Boys' Home merited the warm support of the public, and only required to be known. The new buildings at Chobham are, according to the Report, practically complete and in full occupation. Provision is made for the necessary staff and a number of boys collected from the homeless waifs and strays for whom GORDON'S heart and purse were always open. For the present the number is limited to 160. But it is felt that no memorial worthy of GORDON'S name should stop here. The Council appealed for funds to maintain the Home and develop the scheme. Ample testimony from many quarters demonstrated the large amount of good done and the yet larger amount that was attainable. Altogether, we have never known a better cause, nor one better pleaded.

And here the matter might have rested, with the Report, in the hands of all sensible people, to bear good fruit. But the carping voice of a baseless remonstrant is heard from a Correspondent in the Standard. Cause and effect, all philosophers allow, are intimately related, though the process of causation may sometimes be difficult to follow. Nothing but confusion must come of any attempt to discover a logical sequence between the Report of the Gordon Boys' Home and the wonderful and cavilling letter of an "Annual Subscriber to the G. B. H." The professional grumbler, though sometimes a notable bore, is generally a harmless person. He is easily known, and his grievances are discounted. The "Annual Subscriber," who writes from the Athenæum, declares he does not cavil at any of the statements in the Report. He only wants to know how it is possible that the G. B. H. can be said to be conducted as GORDON would have approved when there is no mention of a church or chapel in the Report. And he qualifies his remarks by convenient phrases, such as "so far as I "know" and "as I presume." When he presumes there is no church in the neighbourhood of Chobham he is presuming indeed. Still more does he presume when he asserts that GORDON would have rebuked the Council for not providing church or chapel before all else. Are not dormitories, workshops, gymnasia, swimming-baths, essential to a Home and school for homeless boys? Apparently the "Annual Subscriber" would have started with a memorial church and then appealed for assistance from the public. But that would be no better a way of establishing a Home than the "Annual Subscriber's" way of promoting the interests of an institution that claims the sympathy and support of the whole country. If he is doubtful whether the Report represents "sober facts" or mere "swagger," why does he not run down to Chobham and inspect? If he thinks a church or chapel needed he might possibly endow chapel and chaplain, or at least head a new list of donations for this end. Now is the time for good examples. Being what he describes himself, this "Annual Subscriber" can have no desire to injure the institution he promotes, though his letter may easily prove mischievous, and is certainly a strange backing of friends.

LONDON HOSPITALS.

THERE have lately been two letters in the Times, in small type and modest places, which concern most Londoners more than they probably think. The subject of both is the condition and management of the London hospitals. A very considerable majority of the inhabitants of this city are directly or indirectly concerned in the condition of these institutions. Most Londoners can never hope to secure good medical help and proper nursing except in hospitals. Many more, who might perhaps rely on family help, have to live by the side of others less fortunate. Only a minority could hope to be properly nursed at home, not only with comfort to themselves, but with safety to others. The hospital is, or ought to be, on proper terms, the resource of the majority. It follows that the condition of the hospitals is a matter of general interest. Of the two letters in question, one makes a statement as to their condition which, unless it is utterly unfounded, is serious. The other describes an attempt to conduct an hospital on what seems a very sensible principle. The first, by Mr. W. HENRY KESTEVEN, asserts that there have been too many new hospitals started within the last nine years, whereby the subscriptions of the public have been split up among too many houses, so that most, if not all, are in pecuniary difficulties. He also declares that many who are able to pay abuse the power of going into an hospital for nothing, and implies that the authorities permit the abuse out of their natural desire to be able to say they have treated the greater number of patients. It is, of course, impossible to decide out of hand what amount of truth there may be in a general statement about the condition of a large and varied body of public establishments, but there is nothing intrinsically improbable in Mr. KESTEVEN's statement. It is known that the number of hospitals has increased, and the constant appeals made for help show that most of them are confessedly pressed for money. The second letter is by Sir E. H. CURRIE. It briefly states the fair success of an attempt to conduct the Metropolitan Hospital in Kingsland Road, E., on what he rightly calls provident principles. The managers of this establishment seem to have aimed at securing the subscriptions of the workmen's medical clubs. The nature of these bodies and the good they do is known. A number of workmen subscribe a small weekly sum. Out of this a retaining fee is paid to a doctor, who in return attends the members of the club. The Metropolitan Hospital secures these subscriptions, as we gather, attends the members of the club as out-patients, or in serious cases receives them as in-patients.

These two letters, taken together, show the existence of an abuse, and its obvious remedy. It is a misfortune that the number of hospitals should be increased unless they are properly supplied with funds. It is also utterly wrong that people who can pay even a little should avail themselves of the gratuitous treatment which ought to be given to the very poor only. Nothing can be more proper than that the number of paying wards in London hospitals should be increased, and that people who can pay for the use of them should not be allowed to use the others. At the same time the adoption of the "provident system" should be extensively advocated. Its advantages for the working class are obvious; but there is another, and a large class, of Londoners who would equally benefit by its wider use. This is the great class of poorly paid clerks of both sexes (for there are now many women engaged in this work), and of shopmen and shopwomen. Tens of thousands of them live in lodgings in which, in case of serious illness, they cannot hope to be properly nursed. For them the certainty of being able to obtain proper treatment in a hospital on decent terms would be an immense gain. The payment of two or three pounds a week which is charged in a paying ward is a heavy burden for people whose earnings fall short of a hundred a year; but the payment of a small regular subscription would be well within their means. How much the extension of the system would be for the good of all London will be obvious to any one who remembers that infectious fevers are largely propagated by the difficulty, or rather the impossibility, of properly isolating patients in crowded lodging-houses. Like other national interests which it is hardly necessary to specify, the hospitals are apt to suffer from neglect, except in times of panic. When there is an epidemic they are much talked of, and we bestir ourselves. When the death-rate is low the philosophy of the good lady who married Ancient PISTOL is in popular use. We hope there is no need to trouble ourselves with any such thoughts yet. What is needed here, as in the other matters, is a definite system of administration which will prepare for dealing with any possible risk.

THE CHANTREY PURCHASES.

IT is matter of notoriety that this year's additions to the CHANTREY Gallery are regarded with great disfavour, and have been the occasion of uncommon bitterness and discontent. It had been hoped that the precedent set by the purchase of Mr. SARGENT's very novel and brilliant experiment would pass into a tradition, and that in course of time the reproach addressed to the CHANTREY Collection—that it attracted to itself, as by an irresistible force of gravitation, the most commonplace of all the pictures of the year—would, of necessity, be burned and purged away; and when it was found that the Trustees of the CHANTREY Fund had again determined on the presentation of a valuable and pleasant testimonial to a friend and fellow-Academician, the excitement was so considerable that there was some talk of making a Star Chamber matter of the affair and expressing the general discontent by means of a petition. What the petition was to set forth, and to whom it was to be addressed, does not appear. What is certain is that it could hardly have been received by the Academy; and that the public, albeit it is in their "interest" that the so-called "purchases" have been made, are more or less indifferent as to the rights and wrongs of the whole affair. Very properly, therefore, the proposed petition has been allowed to lapse. The discontented are many, but they are practically powerless and voiceless. The matter is in the hands of the members of the Royal Academy; and as they have chosen—for the twentieth time, perhaps—to inflict upon their posterity the sight of a third-rate picture, there is little to be said, and nothing whatever to be done. A work conventional in ambition and design, and manifestly inferior in technique, has been added (at the cost of a masterpiece) to the national treasures. It is nothing to the purpose that some twenty or thirty better pictures might have been bought for the same money. The Trustees are masters of the situation. They have kept the law to the very letter, and against the contract they have made no sort of appeal is possible. Yesterday "The Pool of London" was only one of many things for sale in the greatest of all the picture-bazaars of the year; to-day it is a national heirloom; and, the England of CONSTABLE and TURNER—to say nothing of Cox and DE WINT, of HOOK and GAINSBOROUGH and CROME and COTMAN and GIRTIN!—has received the news of her good fortune with an indifference so complete as to suggest the possibility that the half of it has not been told to her.

It is fair to add that, while "The Pool of London" is, by reason of its enormous costliness, the most flagrant and conspicuous proof of the daring good-feeling of the Trustees of the CHANTREY Fund, its companions in their good books are by no means of the quality which the disinterested spectator is accustomed to associate with either eminence in art or a share of the line in a representative and national collection. Mr. LOGSDAIL has done infinitely better work than the hard and styleless piece of "realism" which the Academy has selected to perpetuate the memory of his virtues as a painter; and so, for that matter, has Mr. ADRIAN STOKES, whose picture, when all is said, is far less characteristic of the artist himself than it is suggestive of JACOBUS MARIS. And this brings us to the consideration of what is, after all, the main point in the discussion. What right and title have the Academicians to a place in the national collection for these "self-presented testimonials" of theirs? By the terms of CHANTREY's will it is lawful for them to purchase (under certain conditions) whatsoever seems good to them; but we know of no provision which enables them to foist their mistakes upon history and the public, "in perpetuity," as the best things of their several years. Their right is indisputable as far as it goes; but the public right, albeit less strictly defined, is indisputable too. Their position as buyers and dispensers is unassailable; but the position of the authorities at South Kensington—who are nothing if not the custodians of the national honour and the national artistic conscience—is in its way as impregnable as theirs. What the former have to do is to purchase and present; and, as we know, they do their work indifferent ill. What the latter have to demand, in the public interest, is that whatever is bought shall be good of its kind; and, as we see, they do it the reverse of well. The question of price is immaterial. In France, it is true, a painter who sells to the State is content with the honour (which is, being interpreted, the advertisement) and a sum of from one to four or five thousand francs; and in France both buyer and seller are satisfied. In England it is otherwise. The Critic of the Future will find himself puzzling over two questions. Why (he will ask himself) were the authorities of the past so idle or so ignorant as to accept so many things that are poor in invention, poor in technique, and poor in style, as worthy of the nation's acceptance and regard? And why, the recipients being thus indifferent to the well-being and honour of that posterity whose agents they were, was none found among the general public who was bold and intelligent enough to attack the buyers in their stronghold, and seek, by Act of Parliament, or Royal Commission, or any means to his hand, to introduce some sense of responsibility?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN is so good a judge of local votes and opinions that his judgment may be trusted when he asserts that his Caucus is more than a match for the Gladstonian Caucus at Birmingham. No other Liberal-Unionist can boast of equal success. The victory, if it has really been achieved, must be attributed partly to Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S personal influence, and in a greater degree it proves the fidelity of the Conservatives to their new political alliance. It may be assumed that they are now, in consideration of their support of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, to be admitted to a place in municipal administration from which they had long been excluded. This is apparently the meaning of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S statement that, as members of the Town Council, they will now not be opposed to the local policy of the Corporation. If Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has not deceived himself, he has done good service, not only to Birmingham, but to the country at large, by removing the interdict which had been placed on an important section of the population of Birmingham. His immediate object was to counteract Mr. GLADSTONE'S influence on the rank and file of the Liberal party. It is natural that he should dwell on the supposed conversion of the present Government and the Parliamentary majority to the opinions which he has himself consistently held. Some exaggeration of the concessions made by his allies is not inexcusable. They might in turn quote Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S satisfactory denunciation of the policy and character of the Separatist party. He would "rather," he said, "make concessions to men who at "all events are animated, as he hopes he is himself, by "patriotic aspirations, and who are proud of the greatness "of the United Kingdom, than to the men who are the "promoters of disorder everywhere—the propounders of "the Plan of Campaign, the instigators of the riots in "Trafalgar Square, and the enemies of England in all "parts of the world." It would be unwise to criticize too curiously the motives and opinions of the most loyal supporters of the Unionist coalition. There is no doubt that, although antagonism to Home Rule is the nominal ground of the alliance, the new combinations and divisions of parties have disclosed many political sympathies which had been almost unconsciously entertained. Disapproval of the Trafalgar Square riots, which were at first encouraged by the Separatist leader, has no direct connexion with hostility to Home Rule. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN would have condemned the Plan of Campaign, even if it had not been associated with schemes for the repeal of the Union.

In his speech at Birmingham he virtually acknowledged his responsibility as author of the legislation for Ireland which has been proposed in the columns of the Daily Post. The scheme is liable to the fundamental objection that it would practically incorporate the branches of the Land League, and legalize or greatly facilitate their machinery of plunder and oppression. The Provincial Councils would be gratuitously dangerous innovations, and the Central Board or Assembly which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN offers to convene at Dublin would, in spite of all prohibitions or restrictions, assume to itself the character of an Irish Parliament. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN truly asserts that some plan of the kind has been at different times countenanced by the language of considerable English politicians, including the questionable authority of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL. Lord HARTINGTON, whom Mr. CHAMBERLAIN mentions, has within a few days protested against the present introduction of measures which would organize and strengthen the party of disaffection and disorder. It is true that he would be willing to make large concessions if resistance to the law were finally abandoned; but in this case the condition is more important than the proposal which it limits or overrules. It will be found that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN also would postpone the institution of his complicated system of Councils till the same remote period. In some mysterious way the landlords are to be bought out by Irish funds, which will be forthcoming for the purpose. When this operation is completed, there would perhaps be no longer any agrarian discontent, and a golden age of County and Provincial Councils will be crowned by the assemblage of a loyal substitute for a Parliament in Dublin. In this case also the condition must be satisfied before the grant of local independence will be obligatory on its theoretical supporters. Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, who has lately proposed to extend the Local Government Bill to Ireland, was much rasher than Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If all the land in Ireland was owned by the occupiers, they might perhaps be safely allowed to levy and expend the rates to which they would be the sole contributors.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, like many less weighty speakers, perhaps committed a rhetorical mistake in taunting Mr. GLADSTONE with the concealment of his Home Rule plan. The explanation of his silence probably is to be found in the non-existence in his own mind of any scheme which would satisfy all his present supporters. A demand on the part of his opponents for the announcement of a measure seems to imply the possibility of a satisfactory answer. It would perhaps be more judicious to rely on the conclusive objections which would be raised to any of the alternative solutions of the problem. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN apparently thought that some controversial advantage would be gained by anticipating Mr. GLADSTONE in a constructive policy. It is not to be regretted that the Nationalists and their English confederates at once condemn and reject an offer which is not made from the proper quarter. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has consequently had the opportunity of vindicating his personal convictions without doing harm to the common cause. His late speech was addressed urbi et orbi to the electors of Birmingham and to the Liberal-Unionists in all parts of the kingdom. If he justly estimates his position in his own town, Birmingham will probably be imitated by some other centres of the Caucus. Mr. SCHNADHORST studied in concert with Mr. CHAMBERLAIN the art of municipal and political organization. Both are masters of their business; but now that they have separated, MR. CHAMBERLAIN has an advantage over his former coadjutor. Mr. SCHNADHORST'S methods are purely mechanical, and he can appeal only to the instinct of partisans. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has proved that on sufficient occasion he can detach himself from the machinery of faction. From the time when Mr. GLADSTONE betrayed his trust as leader of the Liberal party, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has been a vigorous champion of the national cause. The cheerful tone of his Birmingham speech is a proof that he has not repented of his choice.

It fortunately happened that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN was enabled to denounce Mr. GLADSTONE'S latest display of preference for all things which are of evil report. The unnatural alliance between the Temperance fanatics and the Home Rulers has been formally ratified by the Separatist leader. It cost him little to violate one more pledge. In common with the honester part of the community he had formerly held that the suppression of a lawful industry on alleged grounds of public expediency created a right to compensation. Even in one of his most characteristic attacks on constitutional propriety, Mr. GLADSTONE declined to confiscate vested interests which had been acquired with the sanction of custom, though not of law. The extra payments for commissions which had been made with the connivance of the military authorities and of successive Governments might have been disregarded when Purchase was abolished on more plausible grounds than those which affect the goodwill of public-houses. Mr. GLADSTONE, probably judging that an unjust adherence to the letter of the law would then have been condemned by public opinion, recognized the right of officers to the extra price of their commissions. It is difficult to explain his repudiation of public liability for compensation to the holders of licences, except on the ground of his hope that an opportunity has arisen for dividing the Unionist party. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, when he recommended the Gothenburg system, or the acquisition of the right of dealing in alcoholic liquors by the local authorities, had always proposed to effect the transfer of the business by purchase. He is therefore consistent in supporting the claim of the licensed victuallers to compensation when their business is suppressed by the new County or District Councils. As the Radical wing of the Liberal-Unionists will probably follow Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, the Government may reasonably expect, notwithstanding the perversity of the constituency at Southampton, to redeem its pledge by carrying the licensing clauses through the House of Commons. It would be better to withdraw the clauses after a defeat than to yield tamely to menace. If the predatory and revengeful doctrines of the Temperance agitators prevail, perhaps at some future time vegetarian mobs may demand the robbery and punishment of butchers.

The domestic politics of Birmingham would have had little interest for Mr. BRIGHT if he had been able to speak at the meeting, as he had intended. The universal regret which is felt at the cause of his absence is as much personal as public; but his compulsory silence at the present time is a serious loss to the country. No other Unionist-Liberal has, from the first beginning of the crisis, spoken so openly, so vigorously, and with so utter an indifference to factious misconstruction. At Birmingham he would, as on former occasions, have denounced treason and resistance to law. Himself a consistent advocate of abstinence from intoxicating liquors, he would not have made the merits of temperance an excuse for promoting the disruption of the Empire. Mr. BRIGHT'S plain and manly language would have presented a pleasant contrast to the ridiculous exhibitions of Hawarden.

THE WIMBLEDON RIFLE RANGES.

IT is to be regretted, we think, that in the debate on the proposed removal of the Wimbledon rifle ranges, which was raised at the meeting of the National Rifle Association, the most satisfactory, if only it be an attainable, solution of the existing difficulty should have been so summarily dismissed. No one can doubt, we imagine, that, supposing it were reasonably possible, as Major MCKERRELL suggested, to buy up the land affected by the Wimbledon meeting, so as to be able to retain the ranges for their present use, this course ought to be preferred to any other. Lord WANTAGE urged two objections to it of very unequal weight. The cost, he declared, would be enormous; and even if the necessary funds could be raised, it would be a breach of faith on the part of the Association to remain at Wimbledon after having pledged themselves to the Duke of CAMBRIDGE as far back as 1860 to leave when requested by him to do so. Of course, if the financial operation is a hopeless one, there is an end of the matter. But, before assuming that it is so, it would surely be as well to obtain some approximate estimate of the cost and to ascertain what, if any, assistance could be procured from the Government, whose intimate concern in the question is a little too much overlooked, towards the realization of such a scheme. As to the pledge given to the Duke of CAMBRIDGE, it need not surely be assumed that, under the circumstances supposed, His Royal Highness would hesitate to cancel it. His request has only now been made because the increase of population and dwelling-houses on the land adjacent to the ranges has rendered them a danger to the public; and, as this danger would of course cease if the land in question were acquired by the Association, it is reasonable to suppose that the DUKE'S request would in that event be withdrawn.

On the assumption, however, that a new site must be sought for the ranges, it is necessary to consider the alternative localities which have thus far been proposed. And here we cannot but regard it as most unfortunate that so signally unsuitable a spot as Richmond Park should have suggested itself to any one, and still more that HER MAJESTY'S well-meant assent to the proposal should have thrown upon the DUKE, as Ranger of the Park, the invidious duty of interposing his veto. His decision on the point, however, was in our opinion not more invidious than sound. We must confess, indeed, to some surprise at Lord WANTAGE'S apparent approval of the suggestion, and to still greater astonishment at his reasons. Richmond Park, he said, possesses in a pre-eminent degree all the advantages we now enjoy at Wimbledon, with more space, and the great additional attraction of being one of the finest Royal Parks in England. Surely a better reason for not approving of the proposal it would be difficult to find. The Duke of CAMBRIDGE'S objections to it, that it would entail interference with the privileges of free access to the Park now enjoyed by the public, and that its proximity to dwelling-houses would render it a dangerous spot for rifle practice with the new weapon about to be issued, hardly go to the root of the matter. To plant rifle ranges in Richmond Park would do something more than endanger the lives of the neighbouring householders, and something worse than limit the free access of the public. It would go far to destroy that which makes such access mainly valuable, and would certainly impair the title of the Park to be considered "one of the finest Royal Parks in England" for the future. Lord WANTAGE seems to have forgotten that, if there is "more space" in Richmond Park than there is on Wimbledon Common, the former is entirely wanting in those geographical features which so well fit the latter for the purposes of the Association. The steep declivity on the western side of Wimbledon Common in the Kingston direction in itself contributes not a little to render the ranges safe, and to prevent them from being too serious a disfigurement to the spot. How is it proposed to supply the place of this natural ravine in the case of Richmond Park? By excavations extending a little matter of a thousand yards or so in length, or by the erection of some hideous screen of brick or other material, like that which at this moment deforms Sheen Common, just outside the Park walls? But the Richmond proposal hardly bears discussion at all. We are as anxious as any one can be to procure a suitable site for the Rifle meeting—which need not, as was pointed out at the meeting, be identical, as at present, with the ground chosen for the annual exercises in camp—but we protest against the precipitate assumption that this cannot be obtained without spoiling "one of the finest Royal Parks in England." It is surely not necessary, as Lord WANTAGE seems to think, that the site chosen should be pre-eminently "attractive" in the sense of exceptionally picturesque, though, of course, the more pleasing the spot selected the better. Its only indispensable requirements are that it should be healthy, extensive, and easily accessible to London; and, of the various sites mentioned, that in the neighbourhood of Brighton, with that on the Berkshire Downs as a competitor, less taking at first sight but perhaps not less suitable, appear to us the most eligible. But we cannot for a moment believe that, in the enumeration of possible sites for the new ranges, anything like the last word has yet been spoken.

WANTED—A NICKNAME.

WITH what excellent results might CARLYLE have been induced to apply his picturesquely epigrammatic system of double nicknames to English as well as to French revolutionary politicians! And what an admirable subject he would have found to begin with in Mr. LABOUCHERE! We dare not ourselves attempt to compeer with the wand of the magician, and must decline the attempt to find the twofold designation which would best fit the senior member for Northampton. But clearly the two names should unite the ideas of the Merry-Andrew and the mock MARAT, and combine association of purely impish mischief-making with those of stern, and even truculent, political determination. It is difficult to decide which of these two elements in the character predominates in his latest performance in the House of Commons; but, perhaps, the former is a little the more conspicuous of the two. The particular occasion selected for the attack on HER MAJESTY'S Government in connexion with the French Exhibition of next year is such a marvel of untimeliness as to suggest, in this instance at least, the maximum of malicious jocularity and the minimum of serious intent. On Thursday afternoon last a French Minister was gravely replying in the Chamber of Deputies to the irritating speech of a foreign statesman on the very subject—a speech which has, and not unnaturally, left a good deal of soreness behind it. Republican France has, no doubt, received something like a rap on the knuckles from M. TISZA, and while they are still aching it has occurred to Mr. LABOUCHERE that this moment is favourable for endeavouring to persuade Frenchmen that they have been served in exactly the same way some time back by the Government of his own country. HER MAJESTY'S Ministers, he said, had "inflicted a de-"liberate insult upon France." They had "joined in "boycotting" her. They had refused to allow England to be represented at the Exhibition of next year merely because "it happened to be the centenary of the taking of "the Bastille," an event which had been of immense "benefit to France," as would be denied only by "some "fossils of the Faubourg St.-Germain"—a "glorious event" which had been "quite distinct from some atrocities which "had taken place after"—with more to the same effect.

It would be interesting to get from Mr. LABOUCHERE an exact account of the character and specific mode of operation of the "immense benefit" which accrued to France from the taking of the Bastille, and particularly to learn from him in what precise way the destruction of a fortress almost wholly used for the detention of a superior, not to say an aristocratic, class of purely political prisoners could have conferred any more advantages on the French proletariate than they derived, say from the burning of Newgate a few years before by the GORDON rioters. But, though interesting to inquire into these points, it would be quite superfluous; for the simple reason that next year's happening to be the centenary of the fall of the Bastille is not the cause of the refusal of HER MAJESTY'S Government to be represented at the Exhibition. Mr. ROBERTSON, better informed or more candid than Mr. LABOUCHERE, admitted this in his remark that "the beginning of the business was "a disgrace to the late Liberal Government"; inasmuch as it was Lord ROSEBERY who had "instructed our "Ambassador to find out whether it was the fact that the "Exhibition was intended to celebrate the French Revo-"lution."

It was because the result of these inquiries left no doubt that this was the intention that HER MAJESTY'S then Government declined to take part in it. Mr. LABOUCHERE and his friends may or may not approve of the decision; but there is no pretence for saying that it has given the slightest umbrage to the French Government; the force of mischief-making could hardly go further than the insinuation that it has.

HISTORIC GLASGOW.

"A FISHING town on the Clyde." Such is the bald description of Glasgow, before the Union, given in one of the latest and most popular of English histories. No one reading this sentence would suppose that Glasgow was one of the oldest and, looked at historically, the most interesting of the cities of the Northern kingdom. It was as the seat of a cathedral and a university that Glasgow took rank in Scotland, not as a mere fishing centre. Thus it has a history quite unlike that of the other great commercial capitals of the world—as unlike as its quaint armorial bearings are unlike the heraldic devices of these other seats of commerce, yet these very emblems on the city shield recall the earliest chapter of the city's history. The salmon supporters might be thought by strangers symbolic of the fishing interest. But they have no such meaning; they recall the pious Kentigern, the first founder of the church which later grew into an archbishopric, and beneath whose fostering care the town gradually grew into a burgh. It seems a singular anomaly that a city now wholly given over to the matter of fact realities of money-making should perpetuate in its insignia the most mythical of monastic legends. Each of the emblems on the shield records a miracle wrought by the popular saint, best known by the familiar name of Mungo. It seems difficult at first sight to connect Kentigern and Mungo. The latter was a pet name given to Kentigern by St. Serf, and does the greatest credit to his disposition. It is a combination of two Celtic words, "mwyn" mild and "cu" dear, which, softened into gu, became mungu, and later Mongo, in the popular spelling. Tradition says that Kentigern, who on the mother's side was descended from the early British kings, spent his diaconate under St. Serf at the Cistercian settlement at Culross; and, despite the discrepancy of the dates pointed out by modern scepticism, we must stick to the tradition if we want a coherent explanation of the city arms. The tree has grown, like the city, from a small beginning. It was originally a frosted twig, and commemorates a scrape the young saint got himself cleverly out of. Left one winter's day to watch the sacred fire, Mungo fell asleep. His companions put out the fire. But, on awaking, the saint relighted it by breathing on a twig white with rime plucked from a neighbouring bush. These graceless lads afterwards tore the head off St. Serf's pet robin, and threw the blame on the good boy, who quickly restored the bird to life. This is the bird surmounting the tree. The salmon bearing the ring belongs to a later period of his ministry, when the Queen of Cadzow, having got into trouble through the loss of a ring, appealed to the Saint for help, and it was found in the first fish taken out of the river. The bell was given to him by Columba when they met on the banks of the Molendinar, at a place which in its earliest written form appears as Glaschu. The bell was square, like the early Irish bells, and was in use in the town as the "deid bell" till the seventeenth century. Here at Glaschu, on a site hallowed long before by Ninian, Kentigern founded what is called by courtesy a monastery—that is, a group of wattle huts, one of which was used as a church. Here he is described as ploughing with deer and wolves out of the forest which surrounded the little settlement.

After thus standing out in the history of the sixth century Glasgow sinks back into the mists of obscurity that hang over the annals of the kingdom, and is lost sight of for six centuries more. Not until the twelfth century does it again put in an appearance on the stage of history, when David restored the bishopric. The confusions of the country had destroyed all traces of Kentigern's foundation. David caused inquiry to be made into the possessions of the Church and all the lands which had been conferred upon the Church to be restored to it. He appointed John, his former tutor and future chancellor, the first bishop. He replaced the old church by a new one, probably of wood, as it was burnt soon after. But the cathedral as it now stands was begun by Joceline, formerly abbot of Melrose. The crypt was consecrated in 1197, and the eight days' fair was instituted in honour of its foundation. Joceline died two years later, and his work was continued by Bishop Bondington. To raise funds special indulgences were promised to all contributors, and the choir was finished about the middle of the century. The building was still proceeding during the War of Independence. Bishop Wishart, the sturdy champion of the commons of Scotland, begged timber for the spire from Edward of England during his short overlordship. The King sent him sixty oaks from Ettrick Forest, which the Bishop turned into catapults and mangonels for the siege of Kirkintilloch. The next step in the progress of the city was the founding of the University in 1450. It was the second founded in Scotland. The first was under the protection of the Primate at St. Andrews. The Scotch Universities were founded on the model of the University of Paris. Their students were divided into nations, and had privileges of exemption from the jurisdiction of legal tribunals like those on the Continent, had the same mode of teaching and examining, and used the same text-books. Above all, it had that sine quâ non of a real university, a papal bull for its foundation. His Holiness granted this to Glasgow "on account of the healthiness of its climate and the plenty of victuals and of everything necessary for the use of man."

The first College building, called the Schools, had previously been used as a Chapter-house in the Rotten-row. Grants of land were made—the first by James Lord Hamilton on condition that regents and students should twice a day pray for the souls of himself and his wife. On this ground the old College was built. To this Queen Mary added part of the lands of the Preaching Friars. The faculty held its chapter either in the cathedral or the Bishop's Castle. They claimed absolute authority over the students, even in criminal cases. A case is on record of a student who was tried by the faculty on a charge of murder. A verdict of Not Guilty was returned. At another time the faculty resented the interference of the magistrates, and demanded the repayment of certain fines which had been levied on the students.

Other important buildings were the Convents of the Minorites and of the Black Friars within the city, the Bishop's Castle hard by the western door of the cathedral, the ruins of which were standing until the end of the last century. At first it was only a fortress, but it expanded into something more like modern ideas of an episcopal palace. The last of the archbishops was walking in the inner flower garden of his palace when the citizens came to ask him to elect the new magistrates. James IV., seeing the advantage to the Crown of having two rival archbishops, dunned the Pope till he sent the pallium with the right of bearing the Cross and all other dignities of an archbishop to the bishop of Glasgow. The see was thus raised to an archbishopric with the suffragan dioceses of Dunkeld, Dunblane, Whithorn, and Lismore. Had the Pope foreseen the result he would not have been so unwilling to grant the dignity. The claims of the conflicting archbishops were a new element of discord in the much-distracted kingdom. They carried their disputes to Rome to be settled by the Pope till an angry statute was passed by the Estates to stop these appeals. Up to this time the bishop had squabbled for precedence with the mitred abbot of Paisley, the royal abbey lower down the Clyde. The abbot stoutly resisted the claim of superiority set forth by the bishops. And one bitter night, in the depth of winter, it stands on record that the envoy of the bishop was kept waiting outside the abbey and refused admittance until the episcopal legate renounced the claim. The rival claims of the two archbishops being denied the peaceful resource of an appeal to Rome, led to a free fight within the walls of the cathedral. Beaton, of St. Andrews, was a cardinal and papal legate as well. In virtue of holding these offices and of being primate, he attempted to take precedence of the Archbishop of Glasgow. But Dunbar was Chancellor of the Kingdom, and in his own cathedral would yield to no one. The two cross-bearers had a tussle for precedence in the nave of the church. This began, as the graphic historian of the time tells us, in glowering and shouldering, and finally came to blows. They thwacked each other with their crosses, chaunting the psalms the while, till both crosses were broken, and the two retinues followed their example. Then, as the chronicler tells us, began "no little fray, and yet a weary game, for rochets were rent, crowns were knapped, side gowns might have been seen wantonly to wag from the one wall to the other." It was only the sanctuary which prevented wholesale bloodshed. Thus Dunbar tried to recall the fact that he had been a bishop when his rival Beaton was not even an abbot. But the Cardinal never forgave the affront. The Patriarch of Venice was a witness of this disgraceful scene; but his presence was no restraint on the excited feelings of the combatants. It seemed the fate of St. Mungo's Church to be the theatre of party strife. But the next time that it echoed to the clang of arms the fight was outside, not inside, the walls.

The burgh of Glasgow was entirely dependent on its bishops, to whom it owed its corporate existence. This dates from the charter of William the Lion, which grants to Joceline and his successors for ever that they shall have a burgh at Glasgow and a weekly market. The privilege of holding a fair soon followed. This fair was one of the largest in the kingdom, both for native and foreign wares. As early as the fourteenth century French gloves could be bought there. The next step in advance is the grant to Bishop Turnbull, raising his city from a burgh of barony to a burgh of regality. The bishops, too, appointed the bailies and the provost. If the city had a difference with another, the suit was carried on in the bishop's name. All the fees for the erection of the different trades or the upsett of Freemen were appropriated to the repairs and upholding of the Cathedral. When the last of the archbishops of the old church, Botoun, took refuge in Paris, the Council for the first time elected their own magistrates. It was not until the reign of Charles I. that it was raised to rank among the royal burghs. As a matter of fact, however, in material prosperity it ranked much higher than the larger number of these, for the bishops and the Bishop's Court and the University brought a great influx of strangers to the city. We find, as might be expected, that the citizens were not zealous in the cause of reform, and preferred even a "tulchan" bishop to no bishop at all. With the provost at their head they invaded the presbytery which proposed to abolish that dignitary, "put violent hands on the moderator, smote him on the face, pulled him by the beard, knocked out one of his teeth, and put him in the Tolbooth."

The immediate result of the Reformation was the impoverishment of the whole community. The Church lands passed into the hands of rapacious owners who proved very hard landlords, and quite disregarded the feus granted by their predecessors, and the feuholders had to make good their titles by heavy payments. All that part of the city, too, round the cathedral which had been kept up by the concourse of resident clergy fell into decay, the inhabitants being too impoverished to pay for the needful repairs

The cathedral itself was saved from the destruction which overthrew most of the sacred piles of Scotland by the energy of the craft guilds. The magistrates, stirred up by the harangues of Andrew Melville and other ministers, had reluctantly given their consent to the work of demolition. A day was set, and workmen were about to begin to deface the church. Then the crafts gathered with arms in their hands "swearing with many oaths that he who did cast down the first stone should be buried under it." No one being found willing to enjoy this form of martyrdom, the stones remained untouched. And when an attempt was made to punish this defiance of civic authority, the King forbade the ministers who brought their complaint before him "to meddle any more in that business," as too many churches had already been destroyed. The stones were left standing; but, unhappily, the crafts were unable to save the internal decorations and the stained windows from the spoilers' hands. And it would seem as if the roof had been injured, for before many years had elapsed we find the citizens agreeing to a tax to repair the said kirk and hold it waterfast. The next event of note connected with the cathedral, henceforward to be known as the High Church, was the memorable Assembly of 1638 which met within its walls. It was summoned at Glasgow as being in the Hamiltons' country. The church was swept and garnished for the occasion, and it is in great part due to the repairs then made that the state of ruin caused by neglect into which it was falling was stopped. The vaulted roof that had rung with the brawls of the heads of the old church now echoed the harangues of the apostles of the new church. This Protestant synod was the most important ecclesiastical council held in Scotland since the Reformation. It also takes a prominent place in the history of the Civil War. It was the first public defiance of the King, as it continued to sit and passed an Act abolishing episcopacy after Hamilton, the Royal Commissioner, had withdrawn. The tumult was so great that the Principal of the college declared if they had made such din and clamour in his house as they did in the house of God he would not have been content till they were all thrust downstairs. It was William I. who raised the town to a burgh for the benefit of the bishops. It was William II. who raised that burgh to a level with the Royal burghs. Not until the Act of 1690 had the citizens the right of electing their own magistrates without interference from the bishop or his lay representative. The removal of these restrictions gave a great impetus to trade. When the Darien scheme was floated Glasgow was a wealthy place; 56,000*l.* of shares, more than a sixth of the whole amount assigned to Scotland, were taken up there. Some of the ventures ran as high as 1,000*l.* This was counted a large amount for a commoner, the Duke of Hamilton, the highest on the list, having only 3,000*l.*

It was to the tobacco trade that Glasgow first owed its importance in the world of commerce. This trade began in 1707, and seventy years later we find Glasgow importing more than half the tobacco consumed in Britain. The "Tobacco Lords," as they were called, the merchants who had made fortunes in the trade, gave themselves such airs that the meaner citizens durst not walk on the same side of the street with them. They strutted there alone in all the glory of bushy wigs, and long scarlet cloaks, while their still more gorgeous footmen fluttered about with powdered heads and full-dress liveries, with lavish display of gold lace and exaggerated buttons and buckles. The great rise in the price of tobacco after the Declaration of American Independence led to the realization of great fortunes. When tobacco had risen to the enormous price of sixpence a pound most of the merchants realized their stocks, thinking it could rise no further. One farseeing trader bought out all his partners, and held his stock till the price rose to three-and-sixpence. The motto on the city arms is not taken like the emblems from the bishop's seal. It is a contracted form of the inscription on the great bell of the Tron Church—"Lord let Glasgow flourish through the preaching of the word and praising Thy name." It first appeared as a heraldic motto in connexion with the city arms in 1699. The choice has proved a lucky one, for the city has flourished beyond all precedent since it took for its device "Let Glasgow flourish."

A WEEK'S SELF-SACRIFICE.

ON Saturday last certain excursionists visited Hawarden, and, as an entirely exceptional thing, were informed by Mr. Gladstone ("'Tis Mr. Gladstone that owns that station, Which for misinformation cannot compare") that he made a rule never to make speeches there. The Daily News—a paper conducted with considerable ability—judiciously curtails this passage; but, unluckily, the other reporters are more generous. "He made an exception, and addressed them," says the Daily News. The other papers—less concerned for that virginité à la Marion, Mr. Gladstone's consistency—give the disclaimer at much greater length. However, it seems to have been with Mr. Gladstone as with others; it was only the first breach of the rule which counted. He addressed the visitors of Saturday—we again quote the Daily News—"because they came from Rochdale." It is not said that he addressed the visitors on Monday "because they came from Hull"; but no doubt that was the reason. The visitors of Tuesday he could not address because, as far as advices inform us, they were not within addressing distance, or, in other words, there were no visitors. But the visitors of Wednesday had the benefit of positively the only exception to the general rule but two in three days. They were addressed because (we still suppose) they came from Blackpool. These particular recipients of the ten thousand additional lamps had also, if we may trust some reporters (for here again the Daily News is unaccountably reticent), the honour to be asked by Mrs. Gladstone, "Was not Southampton jolly?" The doubtful or double sense of the word "jolly" will cause great grief to the Reverend Basil Wilberforce, who would almost rather see Southampton Tory than "jolly" in the good old English sense. But Mrs. Gladstone clearly did not mean this. She spoke as the youthful poet sang in the greatest poetical effort of the late Charles Dickens:—

Oh! landsmen are folly,
But pirates are jolly.

Pirates, too, were, according to historians, not unfrequently "jolly" in the unholy and anti-Wilberforcian sense. But doubtless the youthful bard and Mrs. Gladstone merely meant to express general approval of pirates and Southampton.

Our business, however, is no more with Mrs. Gladstone's opinion of the jolliness of Southampton (though, in truth, it is a pleasant place enough) than with the extremely interesting and pertinent assurance of another lady at Southampton itself that she loved Mr. Evans and that Mr. Evans loved her, by which the Southampton election is supposed to have been partly won. Liberal ladies, it seems, do these things; and if the husbands of the Liberal ladies like it, that is their affair. The husbands themselves we can tackle in other fashion; and Mr. Gladstone, in the three exceptions which he made in four days to his invariable rule of never speaking to any one at Hawarden unless he, the any one, comes from the place from which he comes, will find us an ample subject. On the first and longest occasion (cuvée exceptionnelle Rochdale) Mr. Gladstone had two reasons for breaking his rule. First of all, they came from Rochdale; and, secondly, he was not in the least afraid of what might happen there—which obviously was a reason for deprecating it. Rochdale, it seems, "at once discerned the great principle" of going for Mr. Gladstone, whatever Mr. Gladstone says or does, in 1886, when unluckily other constituencies did not discern that principle—in fact, turned their blind eyes to it in quite a [illegible] manner. And at Rochdale lives John Bright, [illegible], a bad man. Still, "to ask me whether," even at the bidding of John Bright, "Rochdale will" [illegible] Potter is to ask me "whether [illegible] himself."

Turn we from this loathsome and impossible notion and go we to Southampton. "Southampton," says Mr. Gladstone, "is full of interests which are by no means favourable to Liberal principles"; and this, no doubt, it showed by returning two Liberals to support Mr. Gladstone in 1880, and by now giving a Gladstonian a "thundering majority." And then Mr. Gladstone went off into those details about the licensing clauses which have shocked Mr. Chamberlain, a man not used to be shocked. They don't shock us, who happen to know our Mr. Gladstone at tolerably long hand. The licensing clauses are not more sacred than Protection, than the Church, than the Union—all of which, with many other things, after adoring them, Mr. Gladstone has burnt comfortably at different times to warm himself when his knees got cold with kneeling. And the exceptional Rochdale excursionists further heard that Mr. Gladstone was "not going to retract" anything that he said to the Nonconformists. Again we are not surprised. There was no lawyer's letter sent to Mr. Gladstone, no Colonel Dopping on that occasion. Why should he retract?

The next exception was made on Monday, being, as they would say, in dear old Scotland, the next lawful day. "The weather was not so favourable as on previous days" we read, which seems to mean that Mr. Gladstone made a shorter speech. Still, he "came out together with Professor Stuart," and it is not easy for any one to give greater evidence of wholeheartedness in certain directions than coming out together with Professor Stuart. And he said he "was very happy to see them," and they said, with that delicate flattery which Mr. Gladstone enjoys so much, that "He was the attraction." Whether the distinguished speaker can be said to have a little led up to this compliment by remarking that "it was a long journey, and a great compliment on their part that they should think this park worth being visited," is one of those questions which, of course, readers must settle for themselves. Fishing, we shall only observe, is a noble sport. Then Mr. Gladstone observed that to get sunshine for them was not in his power—a remark which differentiates him at once from the blasphemous monarchs of fable, and shows a combined humility and generosity of mind suggestive (to those who know it) of a famous story of Victor Hugo. And then he talked about the licensing clauses, and about Southampton, and about "getting Ireland out of the way" (an admirably statesmanlike phrase which seems to be growing in favour), and so forth. So much for the Hull exception; the Blackpool exception (next day but one) was a little more remarkable. Mr. Gladstone, perhaps taking the cue of "Was not Southampton jolly?" remarked that he supposed "they were all pretty much of one way of thinking" (which, by-the-bye, when you come to examine it, makes these demonstrations slightly valueless), talked with miraculous novelty of metaphor as to the "flowing tide," said, like Mr. Dowler, that "it was a painful thing" to reflect that malefactors in Ireland are (as, by the way, they are in England) "governed by force," protested against "nonsense being talked" (Mais que messieurs les assassins commencent!), asked "What is Mr. Balfour?" was very wroth with the Liberal-Unionists as usual, and with Birmingham as usual, and with the licensing clauses as usual; and so an end.

"How like a fawning publican he looks!" Or, if that is too brief, take once more the famous passage which the greatest writer of all time seems to have writ express for Mr. Gladstone, and

> Observe his courtship to the common people,
> How he did seem to dive into their hearts
> With humble and familiar courtesy,
> What reverence he did throw away on slaves,
> Wooing poor craftsmen with the craft of smiles
> And patient underbearing of his fortune,
> As 'twere to banish their effects with him.
> Off goes his bonnet to an oyster wench,
> A brace of draymen bid "God speed him well!"
> And had the tribute of his supple knee,

but, apparently, were not told that they had it as an exception, because they came from Rochdale. The application of the passage to Mr. Gladstone is, of course, old enough; we have made it ourselves a ten year, look you, come Lammas. But note how it improves with time, how thoroughly Mr. Gladstone lives up to it; how much more and more is Shakspeare justified of this his child (as of all others) as the years go on! "You are the chief attraction," following the innocent remark that it was very good of the Hull oysterwenches, or the Blackpool draymen, or whoever it was, to "come so far to see the park." Imagine, to name no living persons, and to go no further back than the present century, the Duke of Wellington, or Lord Grey, or Lord Melbourne, or Lord Palmerston, or Lord Beaconsfield himself, bandying compliments in this Mrs. Bardell and Mrs. Cluppins fashion! Think of a man who, with what right does not matter, has obtained a station among the five or six most prominent statesmen of Europe, "making an exception" on Saturday, and a further exception on Monday, and a further still on Wednesday, like a draper in the New Cut who gives "positively the last remnant" or "absolutely the last day of sale price" to the good wives of the neighbourhood. Fortunately there is one relief to the disgust which such things occasion. Most people know some other people who, without being absolute rascals or absolute "smugs," are of the Gladstonian party; and it is very pleasant to talk to them in the grave, chaste, and consolatory manner as to these performances of Mr. Gladstone's. The average Gladstonian, not possessing or not daring to show any humour, cannot carry it off cynically as one of these Tories might do. If he could he dares not; for how if Mr. Wilfrid Blunt were in company, and made it known that a false brother had been jesting at the most sacred feelings of Gladstonian nature? So he writhes, and makes some sport in writhing.

Yet not enough, perhaps, to save the feelings of an Englishman or (to save those of some excellent, though rather incomprehensible, persons northwards, let us say) of a Great British- and Irishman. For it is upon Englishmen (or Great Britons and Irishers) as a whole that the shame of this kind of disgraceful conduct on the part of a prominent politician falls. In decent modern English language it is difficult, if not impossible, to find even metaphorical language fit to express the coarse caresses, the insolent blandishments, of such courtship of the populace as this. It has been done perfectly in Latin by the most gifted, if the least voluminous, of the Roman poets; but the obscurity even of a learned language would hardly carry off that quotation.*

THE TAMING OF THE SHREW.

THE performance of Mr. Augustin Daly's version of the Taming of the Shrew at the Gaiety on Tuesday fully justified the remarkable favour bestowed upon it by the New York public when produced last year. Hitherto Londoners have, for the most part, enjoyed small opportunities of estimating the powers of the Daly Company of Comedians, individually and as an artistic society, in the class of drama most congenial to them. In the lighter Shakspearian comedy and in the comedy of the Restoration they have achieved the highest distinction. The Taming of the Shrew is not perhaps one of those plays which Charles Lamb had in mind when he insisted on the divorce of the ideal from the stage, and circumscribed the art of the actor who aspired to Shakspearian parts with a quaintly determined ne plus ultra. Nevertheless, there is a large element of poetic illusion in the Taming of the Shrew, sufficient, indeed, to test the artistic capacity of the Daly Company in this direction, and it must be admitted that it is hard to conceive the reader of Shakspeare, however exalted his standard of excellence, who would not recognize in Tuesday's performance an interpretation that transcended his ideal. It was altogether a complete vindication of the player's art. Here and there arose points, of course, that were of questionable value or gain; but they do not in the least affect the merit of the representation as a whole. Mr. Daly's acting version is in many respects a Shakspearian restoration, though there is nothing of the restorer, as he is commonly known, in the skill and good taste that distinguish it. Nor will any student of Elizabethan literature fail in commendation of Mr. Daly's inclusion of the Induction scenes and his introduction of a musical interlude in the admirably designed banquet scene of the last act. The chorus of boys, led by Miss St. Quentin, who sang Bishop's "Should he upbraid" from a balcony overlooking the festive hall, was perfectly in accord with tradition; and the character of Bishop's music—which was charmingly sung, by the way—is sufficiently akin to that of the Elizabethan madrigalists to propitiate sticklers for propriety. No defence of the Induction is needed. It belongs to the play, and ought never to have been allowed to lapse from its presentment. The old playgoer, who is nothing if not retrospective, might reasonably find the Christopher Sly of Mr. William Gilbert a little too alert, a little deficient in the characteristic humour of the toper who never drank sack. Only a simple, slow-witted creature, as Sly undoubtedly is, would be quite so readily fooled, so swiftly convinced of his "amendment." Mr. Gilbert plays the part of the awakened tinker with a febrile activity, and shows almost a preternatural intelligence until he accepts the situation. In this he departs from stage tradition. On the other hand, nothing could be more humorous than his bearing towards the courtiers and the page who masquerades as his wife; while his acting as an uninterested spectator of the play is excellent. He does not forget that the play's the thing, to which the Induction is but the curious vestibule; and he is careful not to exaggerate into distractive elements his grunts and snores, his odd waking starts and objurgatory glances, his occasional slidings to the floor and awkward stumblings to his seat. Considering the injunctions of their host to the players, it is natural that the actors should not altogether ignore him. The situation is completed by the whimsical and entirely judicious by-play of Mr. James Lewis as Grumio.

To translate into the measured language of criticism the impression of the fire, the strength, the versatility of Miss Ada Rehan's impersonation of Katharine is not possible, if the chill of a most unjust reserve is to be avoided. Analysis of an impression so rich and complex inevitably leads to bafflement. In storm and in calm, in the later scenes of submission, and during the process of being schooled by the stings of Petruchio's fantastic humour, Miss Rehan's Katharine was a marvellous demonstration of art. The very excellence of her fellow-comedians—markedly of Mr. John Drew's Petruchio and Mr. Charles Fisher's Baptista—seemed rather to enhance the unique force and charm of her acting in the second and third acts, and supplied a striking proof that the actor who dreads this form of competition, or succumbs to it, has nothing of the artist in him. Thus the supreme moments of Miss Rehan's acting—if such may be cited from a performance so exquisitely in keeping, so vitally consistent—were precisely those where Miss Phœbe Russell, as the sweet and gracious Bianca, Mr. Charles Fisher, and Mr. John Drew were also ascendent. Of course these are chiefly what are called "situations," as in the lively scene where Katharine flouts Bianca and Baptista interposes, and where, subsequently, Katharine's gibing at Petruchio culminates in defiance. But the whole wooing of Petruchio, and the grotesque scenes between the two in Act IV., on the return to Petruchio's house, were equally convincing and delightful. Miss Rehan very happily suggested throughout that temperament, not mere "temper," was the source of Katharine's shrewishness. Under all her splendid pride of bearing and freakish outbursts of passion the innate womanliness of her nature was apparent. Petruchio worked no miracle, save in the eyes of the faint-hearted suitors and the general vulgar. Mr. John Drew's Petruchio completely responded to Hazlitt's conception of the part. It was played in the spirit of masterful self-confidence, with untiring vivacity, and a flow of animal spirits that ceased not until the final triumph, when Katharine is commanded to appear before Lucentio's guests. The slight touches that showed Petruchio to be a sly detective of the progress of his experiment were given with delicate art, as also was his sense of the humour of it. The Baptista of Mr. Charles Fisher was excellent in all respects. The humour of the serving-man Grumio found a representative of original method in Mr. James Lewis, whose dry enunciation of a point and diverting by-play were alike admirable. The Gremio of Mr. Charles Leclercq was in some respects a pleasant variant from the conventional race of stage greybeards. The amusing speech in Act III., descriptive of the wedding, was a notable example of picturesque utterance. For the rest, Mr. Otis Skinner was an agreeable Lucentio; Mr. Frederick Bond, as Tranio, was spirited; Mr. Joseph Holland, as Hortensio, was a good representative of the fervid lover, and Mrs. Gilbert—it is needless to say—was all that is desirable in the small part of the housekeeper Curtis. The play is elaborately mounted, the final scene especially being a beautiful example of effective painting and arrangement, and Mr. Henry Widmer's orchestra, with an excellent selection of music, merits commendation.

SCULPTURE IN 1888.

We do not remember a year when the sculpture has been so copious at the Royal Academy, and the average of quality nevertheless so high as it is at the present exhibition. After one or two years in which the show of sculpture, though good of its kind, was rather meagre, we have at last a highly interesting and still more distinctly a promising collection of English work, which is full as well. The new school of sculptors is as much to the front as ever, and we have the pleasure of welcoming no less than three young men of very remarkable talent whose names are new to us, or nearly new. These are, let us say at once, Mr. W. Goscombe John, of whom we know absolutely nothing, but who, not in one specimen only, but in three or four examples, leaps at once to a place among the few very best modellers in the country; Mr. Henry A. Pegram, who to an accomplished touch adds something rarer than modelling power—namely, imagination; and Mr. George G. Frampton. We think it but a duty to point out how excellent is the work of these three young men. At the same time, we bid them remember that a great reputation is not built in a day, and we invite them to look at the sculpture of Mr. Frederick Pomeroy. A year or two ago we greeted him as we now greet Messrs. Frampton, John, and Pegram. But he has already disappointed us. His work this year shows neglect of nature, the facile exchange of a conventional prettiness for real observation and study. Let us add, before we come to the discussion of detail, that the sculpture was never presented to us so tastefully as it is this year. Little pedestals of coloured marbles, careful bronzing of plaster statuettes, various little touches show the increased sensitiveness of English sculptors to general beauty of effect. It is partly, we suppose, because the level of accomplishment is so high that we seem never to have been so much offended as this year at the badness of some of the pretentious and highly-wrought marbles of the old school. It astonishes us that, now the English sculpture is so good, the Council of the Academy has not the courage to reject such pretentious German and Italian pieces as 1927, 2061, 2065, and 2066.

The Central Hall contains several remarkable public monuments. Nothing could be more interesting to a student than to see Mr. Alfred Gilbert's "Queen" (1940) placed between Mr. Woolner's "Sir Stamford Raffles" (1915) and "Dr. Fraser" (1929) and Mr. Birch's "Earl of Dudley" (1936). It is a page out of the artistic history of our time; for here are the two schools—the old and the new—in the act of duel; it is war between them to the knife. The new was never seen so audacious, so carelessly triumphant as in this masterpiece of Mr. Gilbert's; and, if Mr. Birch is rather timid in defiance, the old school finds an unflinching partisan in Mr. Woolner. We are afraid we cannot pretend to doubt on which side victory lies. We desire to do all honour to Mr. Woolner's intentions; we see that in keeping his design so cold and poor, in removing all traces of picturesqueness, in avoiding all the accidents of truth, he is working consciously up towards a supposed sculpturesque ideal. But we cannot pretend to go back to this colourless type. Mr. Thornycroft and Mr. Gilbert have opened our eyes to living possibilities, to splendid varieties in sculpture, and Mr. Woolner's smooth abstractions of humanity speak to us in vain. Mr. Gilbert's "Queen" is a magnificent success. There is no colourlessness here; this sumptuous work—the figure in which is only the centre of a pomp and prodigality of appropriate ornament, voluminous drapery, jewel-like detail of every kind—positively glows with colour. We have no hesitation in saying that this is the most original, as it is obviously the most opulent and magnificent, of English public statues, and Winchester is to be warmly congratulated on so rare a possession. Can a whisper be true which has reached us, to the effect that the Corporation of that city has not yet learned to estimate the value of Mr. Gilbert's work? After the Winchester "Queen" the best public monument at the Royal Academy is Mr. Brock's "Sir Bartle Frere" (1922), a vigorous and picturesque statue. But are not the legs a little too exuberant in development?

Mr. Hamo Thornycroft, whom we have already congratulated on his election as a full Academician, is easily first in the department of ideal work. His "Medea" (2062) more than supports his reputation, and adds another to the list of his great poetic statues. It is a pleasure, too, after a succession of male studies, to find Mr. Thornycroft, whose Muse has threatened to bring forth none but men-children, returning to that chaste and austere type of womanhood with which he first won popular favour. The Medea of his imagination stands erect, with the great ivory lyre in her hand, and as she strikes it with the plectrum, the winged snake, which has tightly bound her in its coils, begins to loosen and fall backwards. The proud pose of her filleted head, the action of the neck and of the right arm, are exceedingly fine. It is, perhaps, in profile, from a point opposite the right elbow, that the full beauty of the design is best seen. There is no large statue which can be compared with this of Mr. Thornycroft's. It is among the statuettes that we look for work to place next to his. On the whole, we are inclined to give second rank to one of a series of groups, four in number, called "An Act of Mercy," and evidently the result of last year's competition for the gold medal. It is hard to believe that No. 1934, by Mr. G. G. Frampton, is the work of one who is still technically a student. There is no statement in the catalogue to inform us which of these groups gained the medal, and, if we ever knew, we have forgotten. But we can hardly doubt that it was Mr. Frampton's. It seems to us that modelling can hardly be more true and delicate than this, or sculpture be wrought out with a greater conscientiousness. The surface is almost pre-Raphaelite in its minute fidelity to nature. The beautiful way in which the girl's head is worked up in shadow is worthy of a great painter. Next to Mr. Frampton's "Act of Mercy" we should place Mr. John's (1920); this is not quite so complete, yet in some respects remarkably good. The body of the wounded Amazon, who is being tenderly borne from the battlefield, is beautifully true to nature. Mr. Nesfield Forsyth's group (1918) of a man and a youth is weaker, but the action is pretty. There is something analogous to these groups, but grander in feeling and more heroically carried out, in Mr. Pegram's large group of "Death liberating a Prisoner" (1968). The design is somewhat awkward, but very impressive. Death—a tall, veiled figure, holding a vast scythe in rest—stands over a nude youth, who beckons to Death as he falls back, expiring. The scythe, very boldly introduced, binds the composition together with originality and success. We should like those old Academicians, if there are any, who deny merit to these younger men, to model us a torso which shall approach in nature and beauty of workmanship to that of the dying man in Mr. Pegram's group.

We must now rapidly indicate a number of ideal works in succession. Mr. George Simonds has not entirely lost his bad Roman manner, and his style is still rather small and affected, but his "Fortune" (1913) is the best statue he has made. Why is the surface of the face so rough? Miss Beatrice Brown's "Foster-Mother" (1915), a child with a nestling, is pretty in design. Another lady, Miss Emily Fawcett, deserves commendation for a careful statue of a nude boy, called "Rustic Music" (1938), but the legs are poorly modelled. In the Lecture Room yet another lady, Miss Edith Gwynn Jeffrays, has done well. Her "Psyche" (1981), a very pretty and simple nude study, is the most accomplished woman's work in sculpture of the year. Miss Jeffrays is advancing in skill. We cannot highly praise two statuettes by Mr. Pomeroy, which, nevertheless, it is needless to say, are above the average of such work. There is graceful feeling and a sculpturesque sense of design in Mr. George Lawson's "Cassandra" (1995); the outline is tragic and noble, and the sculptor shows himself affected by the modern spirit. It is, however, our old quarrel with Mr. Lawson that he will not carry his work far enough. Mr. John's "Reaper whose name is Death" (2040) is not worthy of his other contributions; it is conventional. Mr. Fry's ambitious marble statue of "Hero" (2060) marks an advance; the drapery is excellent, the flesh not so good. A careful and praiseworthy nude study from life is Mr. H. C. Christie's "Scout" (2067). In the centre of the Lecture Room stands Mr. Lawes's very ambitious colossal group of a woman bound on horseback (2070); it is not without merit, but lacks style. The worst group in the Royal Academy is "The Gladiator's Farewell" (1991), by Count Gleichen; if it were not so bad as it is we would pass it by, but there is a point where to be silent is almost a scandal. "Il y a des morts qu'il faut qu'on tue."

The Academy is rich in good busts, signed by names still [illegible]. The best of the year, in our opinion, is the exquisite "Portrait of a Lady" ([illegible]) by Mr. W. [illegible]. This is closely rivalled by Mr. [illegible] "[illegible]" ([illegible]).

which has all that science and delicate refinement which we are accustomed to look for in his work; it is placed on a charming Renaissance pedestal. Mr. Boehm is very unequal, as usual; his "Anthony Froude" (2018) is one of the finest busts of the year; but his "Alfred Gilbert" (1970) seems to us a failure, and we do not question the badness of his "Lord Rosebery" (2021). Mr. Pegram's bronze head of "Harry Dixon" (1957), so vivid that it kills everything near it, is an exquisite piece of work. There is very careful and thorough workmanship in Mr. Brock's marble heads of "Isaac Pitman" (1967) and "Sir Erasmus Wilson" (1969). Mr. John excels again in his "Samuel Poole" (2014), so full of delicate and laborious study that it is almost overdone. Mr. Onslow Ford's brilliant and spirited sketch of a bust of General Gordon (2028) must not be overlooked. We must simply mention a series of busts, each worthy of commendation; these are Mr. Charles May's "Lord Tollemache" (1923), which is, however, too uniformly chiselled; Mr. Herbert Nye's "Age" (1949); Mr. Pomeroy's "Study" (1958); Mr. W. T. Frith's "Thomas Lloyd Baker" (1972); Mr. Rhind's "Millie" (1979); Miss Edith G. Jeffrays's vivacious "Study" (1994); Mr. Montford's "F. R. Pickersgill" (2016), and Mr. George Lawson's bust (2033). The record of the year in iconic sculpture is high.

In miscellaneous work we have Mr. Thornycroft's fine low relief of "Justice and Mercy" (2022), part of his national memorial to General Gordon, and Mr. Pegram's very pretty bronze panel "Charity" (2039). These two artists, the pupil worthy of the master, understand remarkably well what is so rarely grasped in modern sculpture, the just accentuation of relief. There are two good animal figures in the Lecture Room, Mr. Briton Riviere's very careful "Anatomical Lion" (2064), with the skin left on the face, and Mr. Robert Stark's "Rhinoceros" (2002). Miss Alice Chaplin, always a popular favourite, contributes a terrier repenting the impertinence with which he has thrown a lively cat upon her back (2057). Mr. Boehm's best contribution to the show is his statuette of "Richard Cœur de Lion" (2071). This is very accomplished and charming, quite in the style of Mr. Alfred Gilbert; nothing is more remarkable than Mr. Boehm's variety and versatility. Speaking of Mr. Gilbert, let no one miss seeing the Collar he has made for the Corporation of Preston (1985), a triumph of the ingenious use of plain materials. This splendid ornament is found on examination to be constructed by simply bending flat bits of metal and wire into the shape the artist's fancy has dictated.

THE DERBY.

THE history of this year's Derby might be divided into two parts, one describing the winning of the race by Ayrshire, the other the lamentable collapse of Friar's Balsam, perhaps the hottest autumn, winter, and spring favourite ever known. It may be objected that an accident to a favourite is no very rare occurrence, and that for a horse to meet with a mishap three or four weeks beforehand is both less remarkable and less disastrous than a breakdown during the race. It may be so; yet we venture to predict that the Derby of 1888 will be almost as memorable for the Friar's Balsam fiasco as for the victory of Ayrshire.

The earliest betting on a Derby is, as it were, the beginning of its story. Yearling books have long since become obsolete, and the first wager of any consequence on the late Derby took place last summer, when Friar's Balsam was backed at 10,000*l*. to 2,500*l*. When Ayrshire had won the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster, he, too, was introduced into the betting, and the pair were backed together at 5 to 2. At the end of the week four more colts were backed in one lot at 2,000 to 500—namely, Crowberry, Caerlaverock, Galore, and Ossory; and a day or two later Galore was backed alone at 12 to 1. It is not a little remarkable that every one of these bets could since then have been splendidly hedged. On the morning of the Middle Park Plate, Friar's Balsam stood at 5 to 1; but after the race he was readily backed at 6,000 to 2,000, and late in the evening 3,000*l*. was invested on him at 5 to 2. When the racing season was over—that is to say, early in December—he was scarcely so strong a favourite, a fraction over 3 to 1 being laid against him, while Orbit stood at 7, Ayrshire at 9, Hazlehatch at 12, Ossory and Crowberry at 16, and Galore at 50 to 1. When racing began again in March, Friar's Balsam was a firm favourite at a fraction over 2 to 1; Ayrshire had risen to 7½ to 1, Orbit had gone down to 11 to 1, Hazlehatch to 20 to 1, while Galore had risen from 50 to 1, offered, to half that price, taken. At the Newmarket Craven Meeting, Friar's Balsam stood at the short price of 5 to 4, and at the same time Ayrshire had a determined party of backers at 5 to 1. But a revolution in the betting was at hand. When people took up their newspapers on the 3rd of May they found that Ayrshire stood at 6 to 4 and Friar's Balsam at 6 to 1. At the start 6 to 5 was laid on Ayrshire.

We told the melancholy story of the Two Thousand last month. We reminded our readers that, after beating all the best form of his year and winning all his races easily, Friar's Balsam had ended his first season without so much as being pressed in any of his half-dozen races, and with 8,666*l*. to his credit. We repeated the already often told story of the breaking of an ulcer in his jaw on the way to the post, and his inability to obtain even a place in the race. The sporting papers have told all the world how Herr Loeffler, the celebrated horse dentist, performed an operation on the patient and extracted a piece of bone; but that his condition after such treatment did not admit of his being properly prepared for any of his immediate engagements, and that on the 11th of May, precisely at twenty minutes past two o'clock, the pen was put through his name in the entries for the Derby, the Epsom Grand Prize, and the Grand Prix de Paris. Possibly many of his backers may regret that he was able to be trained for the Two Thousand, or that, at any rate, his abscess should not have manifested itself at some other date than that fatal 2nd of May.

So far as the Derby is concerned, there is nothing more to be said of Friar's Balsam except requiescat in pace, and it is necessary that we should turn our attention to his successor in favouritism. The Duke of Portland's bay colt, Ayrshire, by Hampton out of Atalanta, by Galopin out of Feronia by Thormanby, granddam by Stockwell, great-granddam by Touchstone, won five races worth 6,565*l*. last year and lost two. In one of his defeats he was beaten by Briar Root and Caerlaverock, and in the other by Friar's Balsam and Seabreeze. He subsequently beat Caerlaverock at Doncaster. His first appearance in public this season had been at the Newmarket Craven Meeting, when he went through the form of a race with the roaring Disappointment, whom he beat by twenty lengths; but, if the truth must be spoken, his appearance did not altogether please the critics. He looked well and muscular, and he moved with great freedom. What they objected to was his "want of scope" about the neck and shoulders; some said, also, that he had "not improved in the slightest degree" since last autumn, and others considered him light of bone below the knee, and "queer looking" about the fetlocks. When he had won the Two Thousand very easily by two lengths, they changed their minds, nor have we, whose privilege it is to prophesy after the event, any right to blame them for so doing. The critics now declared that he was a charming colt, and that they had always said so.

Some six weeks ago, Mr. Vyner's chestnut colt, Crowberry, stood at 20 to 1. Last season he had been beaten by Ayrshire; and his form on four occasions, at wide intervals, had certainly been very bad. Yet he had won five races, in some of which his worst form appeared to be more than contradicted. In the race for the Two Thousand, Johnny Morgan, Orbit, and Crowberry, who ran second, third, and fourth, were only separated by heads. This running, again, seemed contradictory, for Johnny Morgan had been unplaced to Crowberry, at Manchester last November, when receiving 2 lbs., and had been beaten by two lengths by Orbit at Newmarket, in October, when receiving no less than 16 lbs. At Kempton Park, on the 11th of May, Crowberry won the Grand Prize, giving 16 lbs. to Neapolis, a colt that was said to have been tried very highly, and started first favourite. One of Crowberry's forefeet is perhaps a trifle smaller than the other, and it may be that there are racehorses showing more quality; but he has a great deal of bone, power, and "reach." He won nearly 2,000*l*. in stakes last season, and at Kempton this year he added 850*l*. to that. If his sire, Rosebery, is not the most fashionable of stallions, Crowberry is, take him all in all, a very highly bred colt, having in his veins three strains of Touchstone, three of Birdcatcher, two of Emilius, one of Bay Middleton, and one of Blacklock. The Duke of Westminster's Orbit, a chestnut colt by Bend Or out of Fair Alice, although a winner of three races last season, had run very badly in two others. This season he had won the Craven Stakes, but Cotillon apparently made a fair fight with him, and Cotillon was not considered anything like a Derby trial-horse. For the Two Thousand, although he only ran third, Orbit had appeared to be gaining ground at the finish; it was generally thought that he ran like a stayer, and there were plenty of people who entertained the idea that he might beat Ayrshire over the longer and more tiring Derby course. He has fine shoulders; looked at from behind, however, he has his faults, being flat-sided and, to use a vulgar but expressive phrase, "split up." "Mr. Warblington's" Galore, a bay colt by Galopin out of Lady Maura by Macaroni, granddam by Stockwell, had both lost and won races last year. As we have already said, at the end of last racing season, he stood at 50 to 1, offered, for the Derby. This spring, after starting second favourite for the City and Suburban Handicap, he was unplaced, yet by the middle of May he was backed at 6 to 1. On the 24th of April he had been at 33 to 1; but when he came out on the 1st of May to run for the Hastings Plate at the Newmarket First Spring Meeting, he pleased backers so much that they made him favourite, and he justified their choice by winning very easily by a length and a half from Hazlehatch. He soon went up to 10 to 1 for the Derby, and when he had won the Payne Stakes in a canter from a very moderate field, at the Second Spring Meeting, he rose to 6 to 1. He had been bred by the Duke of Portland and passed on to the Duke of St. Albans, who sold him last April to "Mr. Warblington." He is a magnificent mover and very handsome, although exception was taken by some to his want of substance. Mr. Rose's Van Dieman's Land had shown moderate form as a two-year-old; this season he had lost two races, in one of which he was beaten by Crowberry and Chillington. Mr. J. N. Astley's Netheravon, a chestnut colt by Avontes out of a mare by Mortemer out of Highland Lassie, had lost all his races as a two-year-old; so also had Lord Bradford's bay colt Chillington, by Chippendale.

Although there were only nine starters, they were late in coming out and still later in getting off. Chillington broke away four times, running some distance on his own account, on each occasion. More than forty minutes after the proper time the little field got away in rather straggling order. Mr. Vyner's Gautby made the running for his other horse, Crowberry, and before reaching the top of the hill he was joined by Van Dieman's Land. Half way down the hill Gautby gave up the running, and Van Dieman's Land led round Tattenham Corner, with Orbit and Ayrshire in close attendance; then came Galore, and, at a wide interval, Crowberry. A quarter of a mile from home Ayrshire passed Van Dieman's Land, and gradually increased his lead to the distance, where he held an advantage of three lengths. In the meanwhile, Crowberry, who had been making up his ground in a wonderful way as he came up the straight, passed Van Dieman's Land and Orbit. On reaching the Grand Stand he looked very dangerous, and then he began to tire. Ayrshire, was, therefore, able to maintain his lead to the end and to win by two lengths, while Crowberry finished five lengths in front of Van Dieman's Land. F. Barrett rode the winner and J. Osborne the second in the race. So far as public form is concerned, the result of the Derby is satisfactory enough, although Crowberry improved immensely on his Two Thousand form with Orbit. Van Dieman's Land's position surprised many people; but when a horse finishes a bad third, with others close to him, his performance ought not to be overestimated. The stakes of the late Derby were exceptionally poor, being only 125*l.* more than those of the Two Thousand; the Duke of Portland, however, has little to complain of on the score of paucity of stakes, as in five races this year, with two horses, he has won considerably more than 14,000*l.* in stakes alone.

The fields for the Derby have been lamentably small of late. Ten years have passed since twenty horses have gone to the post; yet for a long period thirty or more was by no means an uncommon field. It was the more disheartening to see such a small field last Wednesday, because it was apparently owing to a scarcity of average Derby horses, and not, as in Ormonde's year, to the presence of one horse of very exceptional merit. Can it be that the new monster stakes are beginning to tell their tale upon the Epsom fields? It may be well worth the while of the Epsom authorities to consider this question. They could, we venture to think, well afford to make a rich addition to the stakes for the Derby; and, even if they were only to offer a few extra hundreds for the second and third in the race, it might have the effect of materially increasing the number of horses at the starting-post.

In the Free Handicap, published a few days before the Derby, Ayrshire and Friar's Balsam are placed on even terms. We do not think that every handicapper would have put the pair on an equal footing. The general opinion is that Friar's Balsam's form in the Two Thousand ought to be totally ignored, and on their two-year-old form—the only other guide—Friar's Balsam would appear undoubtedly the best by a good many pounds. Yet due credit—and that in the substantial form of some pounds in weight—has to be given by a judicious handicapper to a three-year-old who has proved himself to have at least retained, if not improved upon, his two-year-old form, so in this instance it is probable that no mistake has been made.

THE INDIAN EXCHANGES.

THE value of the Indian rupee continues to fall steadily. In March of last year the Indian Finance Minister expressed the belief in his Budget statement that the India Council would be able to sell their bills in London at the rate of 1*s.* 5½*d.* per rupee. During the year the price steadily fell, and in March last it was only about 1*s.* 4½*d.* per rupee. In the course of the year, therefore, there was a fall of about a penny in the rupee, or nearly 6 per cent. Since March there has been a further fall. A fortnight ago the Council sold its bills at only 1*s.* 4⅜*d.* per rupee, the lowest price that had ever up to that time been accepted by the Council. Subsequently there was a slight recovery; but on Wednesday the Council accepted 1*s.* 4$\frac{1}{32}$ per rupee for its bills, and the probability seems to be that there will be a further fall throughout the year. Indeed, it is not easy to understand on what grounds the Finance Minister last March based his expectation that the Council would be able to get for its bills nearly 1*s.* 5*d.* per rupee during the current year. That was the average obtained during the past financial year; but, as stated above, at the time the Budget was published the price was nearly a halfpenny lower. The fall in the rupee is due to a variety of causes. Where two countries trade with one another, and have the same standard of value, the only thing which can bring about a disturbance of the exchange value of the coin of one country measured in that of the other is what is called the balance of trade. If, for example, country A buys from country B more than it sells to it, then there is a balance of debt which sooner or later must be settled in cash by the former. The merchants of country A, seeing this, try to avoid as far as they can sending cash. They buy up the bills held by residents in their own country which are drawn on country B, and which, in plain language, are neither more nor less than orders to pay specified sums at specified dates; but, by the hypothesis, there are fewer bills on country B held in country A than there are bills drawn upon country A held in country B. After a while, therefore, the bills of country B held by country A rise rapidly in price. In other words, the exchange becomes unfavourable to the debtor country and favourable to the creditor country. Where, however, the two countries have different standards of value another cause of perturbation comes in. For instance, the standard of value in England is gold, and the standard of value in India is silver. Silver for many years past, as our readers are aware, has been depreciated relatively to gold, and therefore the Indian exchange has fallen, not only because of the adverse balance of trade as regards India, but because also the Indian coinage is worth less than it formerly was in English coin. At the present moment there does not appear, however, to be any fall going on in silver, taking the world at large. A few months ago there was a very general expectation that silver would rise, and even now the larger holders of silver appear to be of opinion that a recovery in price is more likely than a further fall. It seems to follow, then, that the steady decline in the Indian exchange is due, not to the continued fall in silver, but to the fact that there is an adverse balance of trade against India.

India has to pay every year for her imports of goods and treasure; she has to pay also what are called the home charges—that is, the interest on her Debt held in Europe, the salaries and pensions of her officials, and the purchase-money of stores and materials. Lastly, she has to pay considerable sums in the form of profit on investments in India, and in the form of remittances by persons resident in India on account of their families resident in Europe. All these various charges may be classed together broadly as imports, since they are things for which India has to pay. Now, the means with which India has to pay these various charges are:—first, the goods and treasure which she exports; secondly, the securities she exports—in other words, either the new Debt that she incurs or the old evidences of Debt which she sells; and, lastly, bills drawn upon Europe for such expenditure as that of ships' crews in Indian ports. Classing together as exports all these various means of payment, it is obvious that the imports and exports must balance one another somehow. There are no accurate means of ascertaining the amount of the remittances from India for profits and family requirements; but it is found by experience that where the whole value of the exports do not exceed the whole value of the ascertainable imports by about three hundred lakhs of rupees the Indian exchange falls. Therefore, it is inferred that the remittances on account of profit and family requirements amount in round figures to about 300 lakhs of rupees per annum. But, at the present time, so far from the value of the exports exceeding the value of even the ascertainable imports there is a very considerable balance the other way. Consequently, the opinion seems to be well-founded that in the immediate future the tendency of the Indian exchanges will be downwards, always assuming that the India Council draws bills to the amount estimated for in the Budget, and that there is no considerable rise of prices in regard to Indian exports. Owing to the large investments of European capital in India, the opening up of the country by railway, and the fall in the rupee there has been a very great expansion of the Indian export trade of late years. The wheat trade, for example, is almost entirely new, and the tea trade has of late grown very rapidly. Unfortunately, the advantage to India of this great expansion of her export trade has been largely neutralized by the fall of prices in Europe. Had prices remained as they were twenty years ago, and had the export trade expanded at the rate at which it actually has grown, the purchasing power of India would be enormously larger than it is. The fall in prices, however, has restricted very greatly her purchasing power. At the same time, owing to the improvement in the export trade and to her fortunate escape for so long a time now from famines, the imports of goods into India have increased very largely, and at the same time the home charges are constantly growing. It is the growth of these home charges that is the real cause of the fall in the rupee—apart, of course, from the depreciation of silver. The home charges amount annually to between sixteen and seventeen millions sterling. By one device or another—that is to say, by borrowing or by using the money that comes into its hands on account of the railways and the like—the India Council is able to avoid drawing bills for the whole of this vast amount. In the past financial year, nevertheless, it had to draw bills which realized in sterling not far short of fifteen and a half millions, being about three and a half millions sterling more than it drew for the year before. It was this increase in the drawing of bills, coupled with the fact that the export of wheat from India last year was very small, that caused the fall in the value of the rupee of about 6 per cent. In the current financial year the Budget estimate is that the drawings of bills will amount to fourteen millions sterling. That is, no doubt, a sensible decrease compared with last year; but it is a very considerable increase compared with the year before, and if the whole amount has to be drawn the probability seems to be that the rupee will fall still further.

If the Council can avoid drawing so much, there may be a recovery in the exchange. There will also be a recovery if there should be a marked rise in the prices of Indian exports. For example, the Government returns show that at the beginning of May the winter wheat crop throughout the United States had suffered very severely. Before harvest arrives there may be a great improvement; and it is very probable, moreover, that the spring wheat crop will be large. The fears now entertained may, therefore, be entirely groundless. But, if there should be a failure of the American crop, and if at the same time the wheat crops of the rest of the world should not be exceedingly good, there will be a great demand for Indian wheat, and the price also will probably rise. In that case the greater value of the exports from India will counterbalance the large drawings of Council bills, and may keep up the exchange. So, again, if the hopes so widely entertained at the end of last year were to be realized, and there were to be a marked revival in general trade in Europe, leading to a considerable recovery in the prices of other grains, tea, indigo, and generally of articles of export from India, the increased drawings of the India Council would be neutralized, and the exchange might rise instead of falling. But if there is no marked increase either in the value or the quantity of the exports of goods from India, while the India Council has to draw the full fourteen millions sterling in bills, then it seems inevitable that the exchange must fall. It has been suggested that the Council should borrow; but that is merely putting off the evil day, for every new borrowing adds ultimately to the home charges, and, therefore, increases the drain upon India which is forcing down the exchange. The Council is as well aware as the rest of the world of the effect of these large drawings upon the exchanges; but up to the present it has been able to discover no remedy. Obviously the Debt charges and the pension charges cannot be reduced, and it seems equally clear that the policy of the Indian Government in developing the resources of the country and strengthening its fortifications cannot be reversed. That being so, it seems inevitable that the home charges must increase, and every increase in the home charges displaces a certain amount of goods and silver which otherwise would be sent to India, and consequently cripples the purchasing power of India so far as trade is concerned. But India being now the one great remaining market for silver, when her power of purchasing silver declines the price of the metal tends downwards. Therefore, every increase in the Council drawings of bills not only tends to turn the balance of trade against India, but tends at the same time to limit the market for silver, and, therefore, to reduce the price of the metal. In both ways, consequently, the growth of the home charges acts most unfavourably upon Indian finance.

THE MERRY WIVES OF WINDSOR AT OXFORD.

AS Mr. Adderley, in a pleasant little sketch (The Fight for the Drama at Oxford. By the Hon. and Rev. J. G. Adderley. With a Preface by W. L. Courtney, M.A.), opportunely reminds us, the fight for the drama in Oxford has been no less arduous than prolonged. But even the donniest of Dons, the most self-righteous of reactionaries, must at length sorrowfully admit that the issue of the struggle is no longer doubtful. The battle, though a tough one, has been crowned with victory. The undergraduate dramatically inclined need no longer seek a field for the exercise of his patronage in the rickety—and now happily abandoned—"Vic," nor scope for his histrionic talents in third-rate farces and burlesques, played to fugitive audiences in hole-and-corner retreats. The revolution, due mainly to the persistent efforts of Canon Scott Holland, Mr. Jowett, and Mr. Courtney, is undeniably complete. Vance and Jolly Nash have made way for Euripides; Maddison Morton has given place to Shakspeare. Let those who regret the change continue to do so; they must still admit it. So complete, indeed, is the revulsion of taste and temper, that nowadays not to have seen the latest production of the O. U. D. S. is no less of a reproach to "Doctors and Proctors, and all other heads and governors of Colleges and Halls," than to the freshest of Freshmen and to the most charming of his cousins "up for the Eights."

During the past week academic dignitaries, freshmen, and notable visitors have all alike been jostling for places, in the pretty little Oxford Theatre, wherefrom to view the latest—and as we may at the outset say—the most emphatically successful production of the O. U. D. S. After a departure for one year to Attic drama, the Society has returned—and as we think wisely—to Shakspeare. Successful as the production of the Alcestis was, admirable as was much of the acting, there can be no question that a much better field for the display of the peculiar resources of the O. U. D. S. has been found in the Merry Wives.

To deal with individual successes. So much depends on the Falstaff (though the comedy is full of good parts) that the Society must be cordially congratulated on having secured the co-operation of their veteran ally, Mr. Arthur Bourchier. His Falstaff is brimful of the richest and most unctuous humour. Mr. E. F. Nugent's Slender is excellent. Ford and Dr. Caius are in experienced hands. Mr. W. J. Morris plays the part with which Mr. Frank Benson has lately been identifying himself in the provinces with a scholarly finish and a reserved strength worthy of his high reputation. Ford is a good part, but rather an ungrateful one. He never has the audience thoroughly with him; it is essential, therefore, that the part should be entrusted to an actor who has sufficient self-control and sufficient experience to dare to despise applause won by resort to inartistic tricks. Mr. Morris is equal to the task.

In their ladies the O. U. D. S. are fortunate. Of the two rules laid down by the late Vice-Chancellor for the future government of the Society, one was that it should play nothing but Shakspeare; the other was that under no circumstances should men assume women's parts. The latter rule, regarded originally as something of a restriction, has proved to be the salvation of the Society, and one of the main causes of its success. Rarely has it been more lucky in this respect than in the present revival. The amusing scene between Mistress Ford and Mistress Page are excellently played by Mrs. Jameson and Mrs. Charles Sim, while Mrs. Copleston brings out in clear relief the many excellent points in which Mistress Quickly's part abounds. Sweet Anne Page is entrusted to the skilful hands of the Countess of Abingdon.

CANADA.

LORD LANSDOWNE as Governor-General of Canada has proved himself a popular ruler, amply provided with tact, and has evinced a considerable amount of firmness and administrative capacity. Such business as the Governor-General has to transact he has carried through with ability and all attainable success; and it is not necessary to impute the slightest degree of mismanagement or want of purpose to Lord Lansdowne to express a doubt whether he has left Canada more closely united to England than it was three years ago. After all, the practical influence of the Governor-General over Canadian politics is not absolute. It lies with two parties to unite our American colony more securely to the mother-country—with the Conservative party in the Dominion, under the leadership of Sir John Macdonald, and with the Conservative party at home, under Lord Salisbury. On the other side is arrayed the Yankee-Canadian coalition, whether for the expressed purpose of commercial union, with Mr. Erastus Wiman as preceptor, or for complete union between Canada and the United States, of which section the leader best known to the English public is Mr. Goldwin Smith. The professed aims of this coalition are alternately directed to independence and to a fusion, either complete or for fiscal purposes only, with the American Republic; but their tendency is ever to a final separation of the Dominion from the British Empire. Nor do the body of Canadian Separatists lack ample support from the example, if not from the direct sanction, of the Gladstone-Parnellite coalition on this side of the Atlantic.

This demand for separation from the Empire, which at present it is convenient for Dominion agitators to cloak under the formula of Commercial Union, is of comparatively recent date. But during the last three, and more especially during the last two, years it has been gaining adherents and quasi-adherents to a perilous degree. No expression of dissent is generally heard at the public gatherings of the supporters of Commercial Union when the orators hint at something beyond a mere combination for commerce with the United States; and when two or three of this persuasion are gathered together to discuss in private the affairs of the nation, the advantages of any connexion at all with England are disparaged root and branch.

It is true that Sir John Macdonald's Ministry has since the overthrow of Mr. Mackenzie and the adoption of the scheme under which the Canadian Pacific Railway has been constructed managed to hold on to the reins of government. But the warmest partisans of separation would admit that the Canadian people are not just yet prepared to accept wholly the policy they commend. It must be remembered, also, that the economy of the political arena of the Dominion is not that to which we are now accustomed at home. The protected manufacturers throughout Canada are almost to a man against Commercial Union. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company is no half-hearted partisan of the Minister who has supported it from its beginnings, and of the English Government which has granted to it a substantial subsidy. Both the body of manufacturers and the railway syndicate have considerable influence. Indeed, it is difficult for Englishmen to understand the immense leverage which is possessed by railway directors throughout the continent of North America. But their wealth is more than commensurate with their influence. A good sum of money will go far to carry an election when it can be employed as a personal inducement to an elector; and the promise of a new line of rail to a province or city which has not hitherto enjoyed this advantage has been known to supply any deficiency in canvassing. Added to these very considerable factors, we have Sir John Macdonald's past prestige and great personal popularity, his admirable Parliamentary experience, which might bear comparison with that once exerted by Sir Robert Walpole, and the further consideration that he is reputed not to be adverse to pursuing certain winning methods which the great English Minister of the first Georges carried to a high state of perfection.

But Sir John Macdonald is well stricken in years. The Liberal party in the Dominion Parliament and in the provincial Parliaments is gradually adopting the new creed. The large but injurious French interest is gravitating in the same direction. The money of vested interests is not inexhaustible, and there is a growing feeling against its employment for electioneering purposes and against those who employ it. The extravagance of the present Administration, and its lavish creation of berths for those who support it, has excited a certain amount of discontent in the country. The cry of Commercial Union times in well with discontent; and the present move of the Liberal coalition is to arouse a popular feeling in the Dominion against the Ministry of the National party, and, if this succeeds, it seems probable that the new Government would be to a great extent pledged to the policy of Commercial Union.

Nor is it unlikely that the requisite amount of public feeling will be aroused. The time Mr. Goldwin Smith can spare from ably defending the cause of the Union at home he employs in fomenting separation in our colonies with equal ability. Imperial ideas, however valuable in reality, are not sufficiently attractive in themselves to divert practical men in a new country from primarily regarding their own immediate interests. England in fiscal matters does not discriminate in favour of Canada. The lumber trade of the Dominion has been seriously injured by the withdrawal of the duty which we formerly imposed in its favour against foreign lumber. No apparent advantage, therefore, accrues to the majority of Canadian industries through the union with England. On the other hand, by combining with the United States, the duties imposed by the States against Canadian goods would be removed. Many Canadian manufacturers would lose position and profits, absorbed by American producers. But the main strength of industrial Canada lies in its agriculture and forests and natural riches. These last especially demand capital to develop them. English capital is slow to aid our colonies; but upon a union with the States enterprises would spring up on all sides. At present the greatest field for agitation is in Manitoba and the adjoining territories of the North-West. For there, in close proximity to the territory of the United States, with the Inter-Oceanic Railway running within a score of miles from the boundary line, the farmers of the Dominion are mulcted in what they consider to be excessive rates for the carriage of their produce to be shipped for England; while once a union accomplished, they might convey it by cart or rail to an inexhaustible market almost adjoining their holdings. In spite of the compromise which has been fortunately arrived at, the irritation caused by the Imperial veto upon the provincial Red River Valley Railway scheme still exists. The results of the British North America Act have not yet satisfied either Manitoba, Vancouver, or, we believe, Nova Scotia; and the argument of the Separatists as to the natural union between the two divisions of North America is not without force.

The arguments of Commercial Unionists are the arguments of the Separatists. The two persuasions are one. Even regarding their attitude from a view purely of Canadian interest, we do not for a moment admit its validity or reasonableness. As regards the interest of England, the result which it approves would be baneful beyond measure. But it is imperative that we should understand the real political condition of our American colony, that we may be enabled to take such action as is possible before it is too late—before we are either perforce compelled to be active or to resign ourselves to an irretrievable disaster.

THE STORY OF THE LONDON POLICE.

IV.

IT may be appropriate at this juncture to consider not so much the general efficiency of the Metropolitan Police as the desirableness, or, as some would say, the necessity, of increasing the numerical strength of the force. With every wish to criticize the guardians of the peace and custodians of our lives and property in a spirit of the most complete impartiality and fairness, we must admit that there is no gainsaying the fact that at the present moment a general feeling of insecurity is abroad. We cannot honestly say that we are surprised at the fear which has come over the metropolis, inasmuch as it is the natural consequence of the ill-luck of the police in failing to apprehend the perpetrators of crimes which seem to many to be of a particularly atrocious description. Almost before the murder of the poor woman (Mrs. Samuels) in Kentish Town—considerably more than a year ago—was forgotten, came the tragic and inexplicable tragedy at Canonbury, and the slaying of the prison warder at Oldham by the convict Jackson. Up to now the perpetrators of both crimes remain undetected; albeit, in respect of the Canonbury case, no one can reasonably accuse the police of idleness, as more than a dozen innocent persons have been apprehended "on suspicion" and immediately discharged from custody. We do not remember to have seen any explanation offered of the conduct of the constable who was put on special "point" duty at Canonbury for the express purpose of watching the house which was so soon to be the scene of a revolting crime; it would have been well had an official statement been promulgated with a view to showing how it was the officer in question exercised his specially imposed surveillance over the residence of the poor woman to so little effect. Concerning Jackson's long immunity from arrest we shall speak, perhaps, later on, when we may deal with the organization of the provincial police.

In a previous article we detailed the numbers of the Metropolitan Police Force, and showed in what manner many of them are employed—how some are engaged in the various Dockyards, others at the Royal and other Palaces, and others, again, on private business premises. Of the 11,957 constables comprising the force in the year 1886, only 10,561 were, as we pointed out, available for service within the metropolitan area; in reality, however, the exact number on duty was but 8,465, one-fourth of the force being, on an average, and with certain exceptions, daily on leave, under the regulation which permits each constable to absent himself one day every fortnight. There were, it seems, absent from duty during the year, owing to casualties and illness, no fewer than 520 constables, reducing the number of total effectives, as has been said, to 8,465. It will be interesting, more especially in view of recent circumstances, to see exactly how and where this little army is employed. As might be supposed, night duty absorbs the larger proportion. Between ten o'clock at night and six in the morning 60 per cent. of the total number of available constables are detached for street duty; while the remaining 40 per cent. are employed between 6 A.M. and 10 P.M., in the proportion of four "reliefs" in the town districts and two "reliefs" in the country districts. In the day the "ordinary" beat duty of the whole of the metropolis devolves upon some 1,478 men; there are also (we are quoting the Report for the year 1886) 457 constables on "fixed points," and 78 at cab-stands from 9 A.M. to 1 A.M. We had a word or two to say in a former article with regard to the mounted police, and on this important section of the general subject it may not be inappropriate to make a brief reference to Mr. Superintendent Dunlap's report of the working of the A (or Whitehall) Division in 1886. Mr. Dunlap tells us what we are very glad to hear—namely, that the mounted branch has been augmented and a "reserve" of those trooper-constables placed on the divisional strength; giving him "increased power to patrol thoroughfares, which is done every evening on certain well-defined beats, so that the inhabitants have the benefit of horse patrols frequently passing through their boundaries." This experienced and valuable official also notes the gratifying extension of the telegraph, which, as the reader will remember, was first brought into use for Metropolitan Police purposes in the "Great Exhibition" year, nearly four decades ago; and here it is interesting to note from the N (or Islington) Division alone there were despatched in 1886 not less than 24,554 telegrams, all of them being so satisfactorily transmitted as to cause Mr. Superintendent Sherlock to express the natural hope "that a further extension of the telegraph system will be carried out shortly." An item to note here, too, is the same Superintendent's reference to "double patrols." These, it appears, have been abolished in the exterior districts, thus affording him "an opportunity of shortening some of the long beats and recommending the establishment of additional fixed points"; and he adds, "the change has worked satisfactorily, inasmuch as the public have had the benefit of more police protection in places where it was much needed; notwithstanding this, a substantial augmentation of police is still required in the outer districts."

In the X (or Kilburn) Division, says Mr. Superintendent Skeats, "an augmentation is much needed for the efficient working and protection of lives and property"; while Mr. Superintendent Huntley, of the Y (Highgate) Division, remarks, "the fact cannot be concealed that a considerable increase in the number of police available for ordinary duty is indispensably necessary, and a more efficient system of supervision by inspectors patrolling is urgently needed; the latter, moreover, can in my opinion only be provided for by means of an augmentation of the numbers of the rank in question." We have but to turn to the very elaborate and interesting Report of Mr. Superintendent Fisher, of the T (or Hammersmith) Division, to find additional proof, if any were needed, of the correctness of our argument that an immediate increase of the existing police force is absolutely necessary, especially in the suburban districts. The strength of the T Division has, it appears, been considerably reduced, owing to the redistribution of the force, and the formation of two new divisions during the year 1886. It is true that in March, 1886, the division in question was increased by the addition of three sergeants and twenty-nine constables, but (says Mr. Fisher), "Although the strength of this division may look large on paper, it is not sufficient for the full and proper protection of the district. This want of sufficient strength," he proceeds to point out, "has a bad effect upon the police, as, if a constable is placed upon a beat which is too long for his efficient supervision, he naturally feels that he cannot be held strictly responsible for the proper performance of the work. . . . I shall be very pleased," he adds, "to see a considerable augmentation both of constables and officers during the ensuing year, as I feel that improvement in this direction is an urgent necessity."

Again, although the J (or Bethnal Green) Division (total strength 590) was only formed on the 2nd of August, 1886, Mr. Superintendent Keating "cannot help drawing attention to the fact that in parts of the division the beats both day and night are far too long for police to have proper guard over property; as a consequence offences are of frequent occurrence. I therefore consider that an augmentation is absolutely necessary."

To the dweller in town any proposal to increase the Metropolitan Police Force will doubtless savour of panic, or something akin thereto, accustomed as he is to encounter a policeman at almost every step; the suburban resident, however, views the matter in another light, and will, we are sure, be profoundly grateful for small mercies in this direction. As Mr. Fisher pithily remarks, London "continues to extend still further into the suburbs every year." It is not only "the masses," but "the classes," who, either from inclination or necessity, decide to take up their abode in the fresher air of the outlying districts, where huge mansions rise with mushroom-like rapidity, and where the "household gods" of the wealthy residents offer, as we have lately seen, an irresistible temptation to the predatory gangs always "on the prowl" when the policeman is "out of sight," though by no means out of mind.

THE PROPOSED REVISION OF THE ITALIAN PENAL CODE.

IT is announced from Rome this week that Leo XIII. is preparing an energetic protest addressed to the Nuncios against the new laws affecting the clergy, for which Signor Crispi is so pertinaciously soliciting the countenance of the Italian Parliament, and which, it seems, will be passed with unanimity before many days are over, there being no Conservative party at Monte Citorio to offer any resistance. The Italian Premier appears determined to try his hand at settling the Roman question by sheer force, for several articles included in the revision of the Penal Code are of Draconian severity. No. 101, for instance, punishes by imprisonment with hard labour for life any bishop or priest who may venture to write or speak in public, or even in private, in favour of the restoration to the Pope of any part, however small, of his former territory—a punishment far greater than that which Italian justice administers to a murderer caught red-handed, who, except under very exceptional circumstances, is rarely doomed to more than twenty years' penal servitude. Article 104 treats of stringent measures for the suppression even of what is termed "moral influence in the family" in favour of any solution of the Roman question not in accordance with the views of the Italian Government. This means that, if a bishop or priest is found guilty of expressing an opinion on the Roman question antagonistical to that of the Government, even in a private assembly, if the charge can be proved against him, he will be condemned to terms of imprisonment varying from three months to six years, to pay fines varying from 300 to 6,000 francs, and to the perpetual loss of his salary. As may be expected, these proposed laws have created a profound sensation at the Vatican, and the Italian bishops have already addressed a series of protests to Parliament, which Signor Crispi assures them in the Riforma of May 18 "was a very useless action on their part, and, moreover, an offence which, if the said laws were already promulgated, as they are sure to be before many weeks pass by, would expose them to the unpleasant necessity of regretting their presumption in prison," doubtless with hard labour, for the rest of their days. Were the Roman question already settled by an official arrangement between the Italian Government and the Papacy, it might possibly be deemed necessary to frame rigorous measures for the suppression of any discussion on the subject, either from pulpits or in the press, on the part of the bishops and their subordinates. But since the Head of the Church refuses to recognize the so-called Law of Guarantees, this proposed Italian edition of the Kulturkampf is liable to make martyrs of the minor clergy, and give the Pope an excellent opportunity of rousing the indignation of the Catholic world against Italy; for Signor Crispi has, to use the expression, "given himself away," and, should these laws be promulgated, the Pope will have considerable ground for complaint; and should they not, on the other hand, meet with the approval of representatives of the nation, the mere fact that they have been submitted to Parliament will enable His Holiness to assert that the Italian Premier is so opposed to him that he has actually asked Parliament to pass laws, framed by himself and directed against the Pontiff and the Italian clergy, of so tyrannical a character that this very anti-clerical Assembly was ashamed to give them its sanction. But, even if the new laws do receive official recognition, and are eventually carried into practice, does Signor Crispi imagine that by silencing the Italian bishops and priests he will muzzle the Pope? The very constitution of the Roman Church obliges Governments to deal directly with its chief, and not with his subordinates. It was not, for instance, with the German prelates that Prince Bismarck discussed the Falk-laws, but with the Pontiff.

It requires, therefore, very little political acumen to predict what will most probably occur should Signor Crispi's plan of campaign be carried into practice. The Pope will issue orders to the Italian bishops and priests to maintain a prudent and dignified silence. The other bishops throughout the world will receive contrary orders, and be commanded to agitate the question as much as possible, and the voice of the Pope will be heard more loudly than ever above the din, proclaiming the absolute necessity of his independence being secured to him by foreign intervention. The passing of these laws, moreover, seems to us to offer a danger to the Italian people which they may not realize just at present, and Signor Bonghi himself has lately declared them to be contrary to the constitution and a dangerous precedent. The Republicans and Socialists have within the past fifteen years formed an ever-increasing and certainly, so far as the Italian monarchy is concerned, very dangerous party. Throughout last winter we have heard almost constantly of rowdy manifestations which they have made in the various provincial cities, and indeed in Rome itself, in direct opposition to the interests of the Italian King and the form of Government over which he presides. Thus, for instance, only a few days ago, when the King and Queen of Italy proceeded to Bologna to inaugurate the Exhibition, a hostile demonstration against them was organized by the Democratic students at the University, and resulted in a very unpleasant riot. Last week at Chiavari the Royal arms were torn from the centres of certain flags carried by working-men in a procession in honour of Mazzini; and, indeed, scarcely a day passes without witnessing some hostile display against the Italian Monarchy in one city or another, from Milan to Palermo. Now it is precisely the Republic and Socialistic parties which are urging Signor Crispi to pass these obnoxious laws. May it not come to pass that, in the near future, fresh decrees may be invented, this time directed against these self-same clamorous Republican agitators, and equalling in severity those which Signor Crispi deems necessary for the repression of the Clerical party? There can be no question that these new laws are tyrannical in principle, since they aim at the freedom of the press and liberty of discussion, the two main objects for which Italy demanded and obtained her liberty and unity. It is an unfortunate fact that since Signor Crispi has come to power, he has contrived to create a feeling of exasperation in both the Liberal and the Clerical camps, which may bring matters to an unpleasant crisis when least expected. Signor Bonghi, in a letter addressed last week from London to the Perseveranza of Milan, says that "he foresees at no distant period the possibility of the Pope being obliged to quit Rome, and of the renewal in that capital of the lamentable scenes which disgraced the funeral procession of Pius IX." We trust he is wrong; but we feel quite sure that, should Signor Crispi persevere in his present violent hostility to the Vatican, he will create difficulties for himself and for Italy, the magnitude of which will be felt throughout the Christian world, and which may lead to deplorable complications both for Italy and the Roman Catholic Church. Be this as it may, it seems evident to us that Signor Crispi must have some just ground for fearing the influence of the clergy, and that he, perhaps unwillingly, reveals to us the fact that the Clerical party in his country is stronger than we imagined it to be; for, if the bishops and priests had no real influence, surely they might be left in peace to preach the restoration of the Temporal Power as it were in the wilderness. We must not forget, however, that some of the richest presents sent to the Pope on the occasion of his Jubilee were the gifts of Italians, and that the pectoral cross forwarded to the Vatican as the gift of the City of Florence was subscribed for by no less than 56,000 of its inhabitants. As we have said before, whether these new laws are dictated by fear or simply proposed to vex the Vatican, we fail to perceive what end they can serve, save that of rendering the chances of reconciliation between the head of the Roman Church and the Italian Monarchy more difficult and distant than ever. Is this a consummation devoutly to be prayed for? For our part we think not. Those who are best acquainted with the condition of morals in Italy at present do not hesitate to attribute their low condition to the prolonged antagonism which exists between Church and State—an antagonism which is fanned by an essentially Atheistical press and by the emissaries of the innumerable Socialistic societies which honeycomb Italy and are undermining her loyalty and her Constitution.

THE VOICE OF THE PEOPLE.

[Mr. GLADSTONE, who was again loudly cheered, said—I am very glad that you have been able after the broken weather last night to find your way here in tolerable comfort, and although we want more rain for the country, yet I hope it will hold off for a few hours until you get comfortably back, and then let it come down again.]

WHAT! another! and another!
Scarce can I my feelings smother;
Each fresh tribute seems the mother
Of a legion more.
See! to-day a deputation
Capping yesterday's ovation,
As did that the adoration
Of the day before!

Brave twelve hundred! All together
Faring through the broken weather,
Nobly reckless of shoe-leather,
O'er the weary way.
Welcome! with delight I meet you,
Graciously will I entreat you;
Hawarden decks herself to greet you
In her Spring array.

How the incense of your praises
My dejected spirits raises!
How the fountain of my phrases
Bubbles at your cry!
'Eighty-six is clean forgotten,
From my memory's page outblotten
(Though the Bill is dead and rotten—
That we don't deny).

Yes! the way in which you hear me,
And the noise with which you cheer me,
And the crowd that struggles near me
When I rise to spout,
Prove to perfect demonstration
That your ringing acclamation
Is the utterance of a nation—
Perish all who doubt!

When, in craving your attention
To some Parnellite invention,
Mr. B-lf-r's name I mention,
Some one bawls "Oh! Oh!"

When I ask if he's succeeded
In enacting what is needed
Most for Ireland's good, as we did,
Some one halloas "No!"

When I cry, with deep aversion,
"Ireland yield to mere coercion!
Who believes in that assertion?"
Some one echoes "Who?"
When I ask what politician,
Heaven-born, owns the obvious mission
To her ills to play physician,
Some one bellows "You!"

Wherefore, as by signs not feigning,
Know I that my cause is gaining;
That my enemy's star is waning,
And my triumph nigh.
So farewell! my faithful votaries!
Silencers of Tory coteries
(Let the local journals' notaries
Mark my warm good-bye).

Test again your stout shoe-leather,
Faring through the broken weather;
May, oh! may it hold together
For your homeward stage!
Then, in lightning, rain, and thunder,
Let the storm-cloud burst asunder;
You'll have safely seen the Wonder
Of the Brazen Age.

REVIEWS.

SCIENTIFIC RELIGION.*

"IN this world, the isle of dreams," a constant succession of visions and theories pass, vanish, and return again. We are certainly a mystery, dwelling in the midst of mysteries, moral, material, and spiritual. It is natural that men should go on guessing about these riddles, and natural that their guesses should follow and resemble each other. Just as the belief in official religion is waning in Europe, just as the Christian faith, as commonly held, is ceasing to be as powerful as of old in governing the world, people come forward with a variety of fresh proposals and patent religions. The peculiarity of these is that they satisfy the persons who introduce them, and the peculiarity of the persons who introduce them is that they think this an adequate proof of the correctness of their ideas. In a recent novel one particular shade of Theism was demonstrated correct because it was good enough for the hero, and it was good enough for the hero because it was good enough for his college tutor. Mr. Laurence Oliphant's Scientific Religion is an extremely obscure statement of ideas, which are good enough for him, of dreams which have haunted Yogis and Medicine-men, Rabbis and Mystics, and Mr. Harris. Of Mr. Oliphant's book it is necessary to speak with the respect due to one who has made sacrifices for his ideas, who is honest and ingenious, if all too inadequately learned and inadequately critical. He sees with perfect clearness the excessively unsatisfactory condition of the world. If we all lived lives of ideal excellence, no such condition of things could exist; and, to live lives of ideal excellence, an adequate religion is the only possible general motive. Observing this, Mr. Oliphant has also remarked a vast agitation in what he thinks is an actual invisible world, the world of unseen agencies, spirits, if we are to use the word, which he supposes to be pressing on us from all sides. About fourteen years ago "The consciousness of the sympneumatic presence was first awakened in the organism of a devout pure-minded woman of about sixty-five years of age . . . . . as the inauguration of a new revelation on the subject . . . . . Almost immediately on the sympneumatic descent, above alluded to, taking place, many persons, myself and wife among the number, became conscious of it." We do not profess to understand what a "sympneumatic descent" may be, except that it is the introduction, from without, of moral atoms, which are sentient beings, into the human system. Apparently, Mr. Oliphant's own invaders are "exquisitely formed bisexual beings," which were distributed after the death of Christ, though "their existence was one of the secrets known to the ancients." If we do not misunderstand Mr. Oliphant, the proper inspiration which is the secret of religion can only be attained by man and woman through joint efforts. The training, he says, is severe, "as, for instance, when two young people, who are both in quest of this pearl of great price, and who are passionately attached to each other, feel that they must marry if they would win it, and yet never know in this life what the marriage relation, as commonly understood, is." We shall endeavour to be serious; in dealing with Mr. Oliphant it is only the courtesy of criticism. "Or the discipline may consist in intimacies which, though pure and innocent, are calculated to arouse jealousy in quarters where it would be legitimate under ordinary circumstances." Perhaps this kind of discipline had better be avoided. At all events, the man who is perfect in this discipline ceases to know what it is to be in love. He (and she) are now in a position to begin the reconstruction of society, and, what is more important for us, are able to discover and communicate the secret of scientific religion.

Scientific religion, then, is the secret which Mr. Oliphant communicates. The manner of the communication is what he calls "inspirational." The pages in which this is explained are of some interest. The public is very curious about methods of composition. All that most authors can tell the public is this—they conceive an idea or a situation, then study it; they think it out; they accumulate materials by reading and observation; they arrange the whole mentally; they then sit down and write. The brain being stimulated by the exercise of composition, new ideas enter it as if given from without. When these are fresh, numerous, true, and harmonious in expression, the result is called a work of genius, as if it were composed by some separate spiritual entity which dictates to the writer. Of course "genius" is a mere way of talking, and the sense of having ideas "given" is only the result of their swift unexpected development in the thought. So, at least, most authors would think, but Mr. Oliphant's method and theory are quite different. We quote his own statement:—

> I had been conscious for some months in the summer of 1882 that a book was taking form within my brain, though I could obtain no clear idea of its nature—and indeed the same experience has preceded the pages I am now penning—when I decided one day to attempt a beginning, and trust to the inspiration of the hour to carry me on, as I am now doing. I had scarcely written the first sentence and begun the second, when the ideas which had presented themselves on taking up my pen, suddenly left me, and my mind became a sheet of blank paper. I remarked upon this to my wife, who was sitting in the room, and reading what I had written, asked her if she could finish the sentence: this, without a moment's hesitation, she had no difficulty in doing. I now most laboriously began another, but soon the same difficulty presented itself, which was solved in the same way. I found it hopeless to try and write another work. I therefore said to my wife that it was she evidently who was intended to write the book, and begged her to continue to dictate to me. To this at first she objected, on the ground of a want of literary practice, of material, and of capacity to treat properly so profound a subject; but she finally consented to try, and for a couple of hours dictated to me slowly, but without hesitation or correction.

Mr. Oliphant's new book was written in the same fashion. But Mr. Oliphant, feeling that "a book was taking form in his mind," felt it necessary to withdraw to a house on Mount Carmel, and to work in the room where Mrs. Oliphant died. His thoughts (or her thoughts) were then "projected into his mind with the greatest rapidity."

We regret that the inspirational method of writing is not justified by its results. The sentences are inordinately long and often obscurely complicated, as Mr. Oliphant himself seems to be aware (p. 54). The arrangement is as good as no arrangement at all. Mr. Oliphant constantly insists that the religion of the future "will be founded on personal experience and personal revelation." To get these revelations, and to get them right—for wrong revelations will be suggested by "infernals" on the loose—will prove to every man and woman a most difficult task. So we read in pp. 213, 214, and we expect to be told exactly how to set about securing personal revelations and what "efforts of verification" we are to make. Not at all. Mr. Oliphant leaps (p. 219) to a chapter on "The Generation of Universes." This is an example of the chaotic method, or lack of method, which makes this book so unreadable.

Another objection to the "inspirational" style we would offer. It is independent of knowledge, of scholarship. Mr. Oliphant occasionally touches on the science of religion. He takes the "Hibbert Lectures" seriously. His remarks on Professor Sayce's ideas about Babylonian religion are wholly untainted by an acquaintance with M. Oppert's objections. This would not be odd if Mr. Oliphant were not an "inspirational" writer, because M. Oppert's censures had not been published when Scientific Religion was composed. But then an inspirational writer should know more than other people—should know what M. Oppert knows. Otherwise, as the man in Voltaire says, "Is it worth while to have a guardian spirit," and private information?

Mr. Oliphant's whole work depends on his private information. There may be moral atoms, there may be "infernals" and "celestials" all around us; there may be people whose sensations give them knowledge to us quite unknown. That knowledge may be correct. But one thing undeniably certain is that the source of inspiration, whatever else it knows, does not know Greek. Mr. Oliphant's is "Lady's Greek, without the accents." He criticizes the rendering of the Lord's Prayer, and yet this is how he quotes a line from an Orphic hymn:—

Ζεῦς ἄρσην γενετο, Ζευς αμβροτος επλετο νυμφη.

"Igsplain this, men and hangels," as Jeames demands. Mr. Oliphant makes a great deal of old myths about the original bisexuality of man. He remembers Plato, but forgets the Chippewa legend. Once there were no women, and the Chippewas were as jolly as the day was long. They never quarrelled, naturally they had no problem of population, and they decorated their long tails and frisked about. But the great Manitou, vexed by their impiety, sent a Manitou who cut off the tails and changed the frisky decorative things into women. Since then the Chippewas have scarce known a happy hour.

The great objection to Mr. Oliphant's scientific religion must be manifest to all. It cannot be "scientific" if it depends, in each case, on personal revelation and experience. Everybody who can afford it will have his private revelation. They will differ considerably. Moreover, only a very few people will be able and willing to afford the "discipline," the sacrifice of time, money, affections, natural impulses, which is necessary first for obtaining experience and then for verifying revelation. What are the multitude to do? They will have to do without personal experience, and to settle on some form of faith and practice which rests on the testimony and authority of others. We personally cannot accept Mr. Oliphant's revelations, because we know for certain that his Greek is unsound, and we have a perfectly different theory of myths from that on which he bases a doctrine of the universe. As for his theory of Christ and of sentient moral atoms he offers no proof, he sets it out as an hypothesis. How are we to know whether this causa be vera causa? How are we to distinguish sympneuma from hysterics? We like not Mr. Harris's security, nor Mme. Blavatsky's. We distrust Mr. Oliphant's mystical interpretation of the letter of Scripture, just as we mistrust Porphyry's mystical interpretation of the letter of Homer. Mr. Oliphant's remarks (p. 194) are much on a level with the De Antro Nympharum. There is a place in his system for all old fancies and new, Bryant, Porphyry, Mme. Blavatsky. Professors of every degree, the Psychical Society, the guesses of savages at the origin of things, all come in, all blend in a theory undemonstrated, uncritical, based on subjective experience, real or imaginary, or mixed. When we have studied Mr. Oliphant we find ourselves as we found ourselves before, "in this world, the isle of dreams," with no guide but the moral consciousness, with no true guardian spirits or inspirers but faith, hope, and charity. We have no "sensation of the respiratory motion, which we have learned to recognize as a sympneumatic descent." But we have as high an appreciation of Mr. Oliphant's courageous and devoted attempts to reach truth as we have a low opinion of his erudition and his logic.

* Scientific Religion. By Laurence Oliphant. London and Edinburgh: Blackwood & Sons. 1888.

The Science of Religion. By Emile Burnouf. Translated by Julie Liebe. London: Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 1888.

M. Burnouf's Science of Religion is a work of little value, so translated as to be sometimes scarce intelligible. The author is actually inclined to see a philological connexion between Agni (Fire) and Christ in Agnus Dei (pp. 149, 153); and he fancies that Sanskrit was known to the authors of the Orphic hymns. Nobody who seriously cares for the Science of Religion need linger over this book, which may be left on one side, like the effusions of Anglo-Israel.

NOVELS.*

IN A Woman's Face Miss Warden has succeeded in weaving a web of intrigue worthy of Gustave Flaubert himself. The young doctor, Frank Armathwaite, when he gets into the wrong train, and instead of going on to Glasgow is carried to the quiet Lake-country valley of Mereside, little knows into what an atmosphere of mystery, mesmeric influence, and reckless passion he is intruding himself; but it is not long before he begins to grasp some of the threads, while putting the severest restraint upon himself, in order to be able to tread safely the mazes of the "egg-dance" which life in that apparently peaceful vale turns out to be.

There is a certain Lord Kildonan, the chief landowner, who is an elderly student of retired habits; there is his brilliant and beautiful young wife, whose face gives the story its name, and makes all men more or less her slaves; and there is a Mr. Crosmont, the agent for Lord Kildonan's property, who was a playfellow of Lady Kildonan when they were children, and who now spends his time chiefly in driving about the country with her dressed as her groom, and committing a thousand other compromising escapades. There is also Alma Crosmont, the agent's wife, who is mild, gentle, interesting, and in every way fitted to sing contralto to Lady Kildonan's soprano. Alma is, perhaps, the character who most attracts the reader's attention from the very first, when she mysteriously appears in the snowy night, and warns the hero that his next step will be into the lake. Her husband, who is a strange compound of good and evil impulses, treats Alma with incomprehensible indifference, sometimes with absolute unkindness; yet, in spite of his potations and rudeness, one feels that he is no mere boozy North-country boor, but a man who, if freed from the evil influence which has blighted his life, might rise to better things.

A pleasing contrast to the inmates of "The Crags," and of the agent's house, is afforded by old Dr. Peele, his charming, ugly daughter, and his grenadier wife, who apparently is drawn from Mrs. Yorke, in Shirley. From an artistic point of view it was a mistake to represent such a lady as trying to skate; ladies of her age and opinions notably never skate, but consider it most indecent for any one else to do so. They also wear sausage-curls on each side of their faces, and white muslin caps with lavender ribbons—such being the absolutely necessary costume of the British provincial middle-class female of a certain age. Without these marks none is genuine.

It is a little surprising to find that not only the gentle old doctor, but also his strong-minded wife, are aware of Lady Kildonan's vagaries, and both do their uttermost to shield her from the consequences. We may add that when the day—or, rather, night—of retribution does come, the reader will infallibly be startled to find how far his own conjectures have been from the truth; and this says a great deal for the ingenuity with which the story is written. We cannot call it a pleasant story. Fond as the novel-writers of the present day are of the supernatural, Miss Warden has, we think, surpassed them all in the amount of hypnotism, mesmerism, psychic force, presentiments, and telepathy which we meet with in A Woman's Face. Whenever Alma Crosmont requires aid, Frank Armathwaite immediately is warned of it by the pricking of his thumbs, or whatever its modern equivalent may be. Once when some one says, "You did not expect to find Mrs. Crosmont here," he has the greatest difficulty in checking the answer, "Yes, I did." Lady Kildonan compares herself to an Æolian harp, but really every prominent character in the book more or less resembles that dreary instrument, so that we think regretfully of Miss Heald, the doctor's daughter, in Two Years Ago, who "had only nerves in the sense in which a sirloin of beef has them."

Robert Holt's Illusion is the name of a collection of three short stories by Miss Linskill, besides being the title of the first of them. It contains a capital breezy word-picture of a fishing town on the North-east coast:—

A distance of blue sea, blue changing into dark stormy-looking purple near the horizon; dotted with ships and herring-boats, white sails and red ones. All along the north-east wild dark clouds flying; overhead white clouds shining and glittering. Fitful gleamings of sunlight on the white-washed red-roofed cottages that cling to the sides of the rocks like so many swallow's nests. Dark, stern-looking cliffs with bold irregular outlines on the right and left; huge fragments of black rock standing high out of the white angry little waves. A wide sandy beach stretching right across the bay, and in the middle of the beach, just in front of the little townlet, half-a-dozen bright busy picturesque groups of fisher-folk.

Chief among these is Robert Holt, fish salesman. He is engaged to be married to a vague golden-haired woman who dwells with a blind mother in a half-ruined cottage upon the hills. We are told of Hester that "the merest stranger passing in the street, if he had a soul, knew that another soul spoke to him as she passed." However, Hester did not live in a street, but in a sequestered mountain glen. Robert Holt was in the habit of walking out to see her, and the two would then talk a strange mystic dialect, such as we may conceive Kant and Hegel use whenever they meet in the happy hunting-grounds; at any rate, it is quite unlike the talk of any possible sempstress and fish-salesman on this earth. Weary and dazed with colloquy sublime, Robert falls an easy prey to an airy, coquettish butterfly of a creature who sings songs in character, and flirts with him in a manner which completely dumbfounders him. How he goes to Hester and explains that he wants to marry somebody else, and the experiences which they both undergo before everything comes right, as it does in the end, must be left to the author to tell.

"Godwyn," the second story, is longer and more ambitious. We are introduced to a species of "Jane Eyre" teacher in a girls' school in the country, who is proud, reserved, and much given to self-communing, introspection, and analysis. She craves passionately for human sympathy and friendship, but after trying in vain to find a kindred soul among her fellow-mistresses, consoles herself with work, with communion with great authors, and with the reflection that "Dante was very bad company and was never invited to dinner; Michael Angelo had a sad, sour time of it; and Columbus discovered no isle so lonely as himself." After much indulgence in this morbid brooding, Joanna Woodvyl one day during the summer holidays meets her affinity, Miss Godwyn Barry, in a pony carriage. They swear eternal friendship, and take long drives in the pony carriage, "under the hedgerows, condensing a poet for a text, or inhaling the more stimulating ether of some favourite philosopher." When Joanna's school reassembles, there appears a fascinating drawing-master—Rivers the name of him. Godwyn elopes with him; and Joanna mopes so terribly at her disappearance that she leaves the school and goes to keep house for a feeble clerical cousin with a helpless lackadaisical wife and six children. One winter's night Godwyn, now a widow, reappears most melodramatically, with several children. She fascinates and marries the man who had intended to marry Joanna; but we are happy to say that Joanna also finds consolation.

It will be seen from this brief outline that Godwyn is the central figure of the story; but unhappily we are given no means whatever of forming any estimate of Godwyn's character. Macaulay says of Byron's Lara that we are not given any specimens of his short answers, and so it is with Godwyn. We gain only a negative idea from her words:—

I have had art-dreams from childhood. I do not remember the time when I was not conscious of a longing to express my inner self in some outward and tangible form. But it is a longing I have never been able to satisfy. I have tried poetry; I can write one line; the second eludes my grasp altogether; and as to art, I have never yet drawn a straight line without a ruler.

This confession reminds one somewhat of the Scotch minister, who when riding over the moors used to conceive ideas "of a sublimity far beyond anything that Shakspeare or Milton ever imagined," but who, unfortunately, was never able to formulate them in words. Except that she used to drive a pony carriage "very carefully and slow," and drop her shawl out of it, we know nothing of Godwyn's personal habits; for her conduct in sending a half-naked dumb child at nine o'clock on a cold November evening to walk some miles to a place which it had never seen, to climb a wall there on

* A Woman's Face. By Florence Warden. London: Ward & Downey.
Robert Holt's Illusion. By Mary Linskill. London: Ward & Downey.
Led from Afar. By Mallard Herbertson. London: Remington & Co.

the chance of a lady whom it had never seen being in the garden, and to show her a cross, and point whither she must follow, when a note sent to the front door would have done so much better, must have been due to fever and over-fatigue. "Godwyn" is disappointing; yet it does not come far short of being interesting.

The last story, "Rath Wyke," is a pathetic account of a drowned fisherman, of his wife's frantic love, and jealousy, and grief when he returns no more, though she will not allow the door to be locked, lest he should return and find himself shut out. The story should be compared with Mr. Bramley's treatment of the same theme in this year's Academy.

Led from Afar is a story of telepathy—that is to say, the hero, Hugh Trevelyan, while lying in a tent in Egypt, sees a vision wherein the lady whom he adores, but who has married "another," is brutally informed by her husband, a ruined gambler named Darcy, that he is tired of her, and would gladly be rid of her, and that she is not an honest woman, for he has a previous wife living. Hugh sees the furniture and nick-nacks of the room in which this scene takes place so distinctly that he is able afterwards to recognize each individual bibelot. The room is furnished in the French style; yet there are a few things, such as brass trays with faint Arabic inscriptions, and ostrich eggs, which give it an Oriental character. Hugh starts for France straightway; but, from information which he receives on the steamer which carries him to Marseilles, leaves that place as soon as he reaches it for Algiers. Two French officers whose acquaintance he has made at Marseilles introduce him, at the club at Algiers, to the fire-eater who charged Mr. Darcy most truly with cheating at cards, and when he denied the charge shot him in a duel. His wife Ethel, it appears, quitted him three days before his death, and Hugh now starts upon her track. He is much helped by an American friend whom he met in Egypt. Mr. Ephraim C. Slack is the conventional "Wal, I guess" American who is becoming rare in actual life, but who still abounds on the English stage and in the works of lady novelists. Between them the pair discover Ethel's retreat—a lodging in London which she had once occupied when a schoolgirl—for, remembering her husband's words, she considers herself to be disgraced, and unworthy to go home to her father, a clergyman in the North of England. Both she and Hugh display a somewhat irritating amount of "sensibility." Hugh proceeds to hunt up all the past life of Mr. Darcy, in order to set Ethel's mind at rest as to her having been his lawful wife. He has no more visions to assist in the accomplishment of this task, but has such truly remarkable luck in his search that he does not really need them. He is always overhearing scraps of important conversations, and he has an able coadjutor in Ephraim C. Slack, who supplies some of the comic element which the story needs, and finally brings the two lovers together by telling Ethel plainly that Hugh is dying of love for her, but is too shy to say so. Hugh, of course, overhears him, and all ends happily.

In spite of the masculine sound of "Mallard Herbertson," the book is evidently written by a lady. If the writer wishes to conceal her sex, she should speak with less enthusiasm about the institution of afternoon tea. The intense solicitude, too, which Ethel displays as to the exact date of the death of Mr. Darcy's first wife seems to us essentially feminine. A man would suppose that her thankfulness at being rid of such a scoundrel would outweigh all other considerations. Ethel, however, feels it impossible for her to return to her father's house while there is any doubt about the lawfulness of her marriage, although she herself had acted in perfect good faith.

The book is just a little thin; there is not enough plot to reach over the two volumes without being spun into a very fine thread. As soon as Darcy dies and Hugh finds Ethel the story is at an end, and at that point it should have ended. It is very carefully written, and great pains have evidently been taken with the American language of Mr. Slack, the Welsh language of Mrs. Jones, "The Lamb," and the inhabitants of Ystrad y Rhedyn, the village from which the first Mrs. Darcy came, with the Marseilles merchant, proud of his Cannebière, the French officers, and the descriptions of the scenery of Egypt, Algiers, and the North of England. Unless we are mistaken, better work than Led from Afar may be expected from "Mallard Herbertson."

THE BASTILLE.*

ALTHOUGH Captain Bingham's volumes owe much to paste and scissors, it is impossible not to feel kindly towards them. He has chosen an attractive subject, and no one will quarrel with his book on the score of dulness. If, as we are of opinion, it is too long, it is at least excellent to dip into, while the conscientious reader who goes steadily through it will find that it contains ample information as to the part the Bastille played in the history of France, its internal economy, and the experiences of the most notable, and indeed of a good many not especially notable, prisoners who were confined there. It is founded on the seventeen volumes of the Archives of the Bastille, edited by the late M. Ravaisson, who spent twenty years on the work, and died when he had all but completed it. After the surrender of the ill-garrisoned and antiquated fortress, the mob among other spoils carried off a large number of the documents that contained its history, and left heaps of others exposed to the weather in the courtyards. An attempt was made to collect the stolen documents," and this produced a good many restitutions, especially in the way of registers and lettres de cachet." Beaumarchais, for example, who "had plundered not a little," was called on to give up his share of the spoil. Nothing, however, was done towards setting the papers in order, and their very existence seems to have been forgotten until M. Ravaisson lighted on them in the library of the Arsenal. His work begins at 1661. The earlier part of Captain Bingham's story, which begins with the building of the Bastille in the reign of Charles V., has been put together from various sources. He quotes in a truly catholic spirit, and makes little attempt to work up his materials. When he wishes to convey to his readers the method of torture by the "boot," he imports into his text the description in Old Mortality of how Macbriar was tortured before the Council, and in doing so mutilates and garbles the passage in a manner that rouses our anger. His next page consists of an extract from Burnet, the next of one from Jardine; this is followed by a couple of pages from the Curiosities of Literature, and these by some sentences from Frederick the Great. All through his book he seems overweighted by a mass of facts; he has no power of arrangement, and is given to repetition. Nevertheless his history is both amusing and valuable. He is generally careful and accurate in what he states on his own authority, though he is mistaken in saying that when the Princess of Condé left the Bastille with her husband on October 20, 1619, she was shortly about to become the mother of "a son who is now known to fame as the Great Condé"; for the Great Condé was not born until September 8, 1621; indeed, the Princess had been delivered of a daughter not two months before the Prince's release. Nor do we understand why he speaks of the story of the Chevalier de Jars as "enveloped in mystery." The intrigue for which he was punished is perfectly intelligible. And, though De Jars was a pleasant companion, he can scarcely be said to have "inspired interest in the heart of Charles I."; for he got into trouble through attempting to forward a scheme that was contrary to the King's wishes. He worked on behalf of the Queen and her mother, and Henriet . Maria, after some ineffectual efforts, succeeded in obtaining his release. Captain Bingham's account of the forms observed in committing a prisoner to the Bastille, and of the constant supervision that was exercised over the treatment of its inmates, disposes of the popular idea that "the simple signature of the King to a lettre de cachet was a sufficient formality to procure incarceration," and that the prisoners were forgotten and left to the mercy of their gaolers. Still, we fail to see that the counter-signature of a Minister necessarily implied any restraint on the arbitrary action of a French monarch. The prisoners were, of course, treated differently according to the cause for which each was imprisoned, whether on some serious criminal charge, or for the purpose of "correction." A good deal is told us about the infliction of torture both before and after condemnation. This was a recognized part of the French criminal process in capital cases, and was not peculiar to the Bastille. The two methods of torture practised there were the questions by water and the boot. Although the question was not wholly abolished until the Revolution, no instruments of torture were found in the prison when it fell into the hands of the mob. The small chambers under the foundations of the towers, which were said to be oubliettes of a peculiarly horrible kind, have been pronounced by Viollet le Duc to have been nothing more than ice-houses. At the same time the Bastille, like most if not all prisons everywhere until a late date, contained some loathsome cells, which seem to have been used for the punishment of the refractory. An Englishman imprisoned in 1691 for tampering with French naval officers was, as a punishment for interrupting the chapel service, placed in a cell "infested with rats, spiders, and toads, and there contracted a mortal disease"; and Latude, who escaped in 1756 and was retaken, spent forty months underground. Several other prisoners made their escapes at different times, and among them "an interesting young Englishwoman, named Vion," who was imprisoned in 1686 for helping to send the children of Protestant parents out of the kingdom—a crime always punished with severity.

As a rule, those who were imprisoned for the purpose of "correction," and not for any serious crime, were treated with extraordinary indulgence. In its later years the Bastille contained a library of seven hundred volumes, and on the arrival of one of these prisoners the Governor sent him a catalogue, that he might choose the books he wanted. When Dumouriez, who had been a prisoner there, found that one of his aides-de-camp, the Duke of Chartres, afterwards King Louis Philippe, had not read Statius or Silius Italicus, he said:—"Ah, it is clear that you have never had time to read. It is because you have not been in the Bastille." The food was excellent; there were always five dishes for dinner and three for supper. Wine was supplied without stint. And this liberality was not confined to people of rank; for De Renneville, a man of no particular importance, who was arrested in 1702, records that he was allowed two bottles of champagne or burgundy for dinner, and one for drinking during the day; and sixty years later Marmontel, after making a very fair dinner on the first day of his imprisonment, was surprised to find another and more sumptuous meal set before him; the dinner he had eaten with some satisfaction had been intended for his servant. People were shut up in the Bastille for all sorts of reasons. Young men of good family were imprisoned for debauchery; and occasionally a husband who was dissatisfied with his wife's conduct procured a lettre de cachet on her behalf. When, "through the kindness of His Majesty," M. d'Esclainvilliers had got his wife imprisoned for immorality, he wrote to the Governor of the Bastille, "May I dare to beg you to ask Mme. d'Esclainvilliers what has become of my two cravates of point lace, with the sleeves? I shall be very much obliged to you, for I cannot find them." We hope he never did. Captain Bingham tells us numberless stories of prisoners of all degrees. He gives a full and interesting account of the "Man with the Iron Mask." Our old friend D'Artagnan appears in command of a body of Musketeers, protecting his prisoner, Fouquet, from the fury of the mob. A page or two further on we are told how Lauzun, who in after days treated "La Grande Mademoiselle" with such brutal ingratitude, was imprisoned for treading on the hand of the Princess of Monaco, as she and the other ladies of the Court were sitting on the ground, "the floor being very clean," playing for a jewel. Captain Bingham ought not to have pandered to the morbid taste some people have for horrors by importing into his book the account of the tortures inflicted on Damiens; the affair does not belong to his subject, for, as he remarks, Damiens was not committed to the Bastille, and so revolting a story should not be repeated needlessly. When the Bastille was attacked it had ceased to be used as a State prison, and was of no military importance. The mob gained nothing by its destruction; it had never been a prison for poor people, and it had been largely used in repressing the violence of the aristocracy. Even the rascals who demolished it felt this, and the day after its fall one of them asked the Abbé Rudemarre for money to drink his health, on the plea "It is not for ourselves we are working; it is for you. We don't taste of the Bastille; they cram us into Bicêtre." And Marat told the Parisians that they had destroyed "a monument of tyranny which was used only for the punishment of their oppressors." Next year the French will celebrate the centenary of the fall of the Bastille, and much nonsense will probably be talked and written about it. We recommend any one who is inclined to believe that a great nation has cause to look back with satisfaction on the events of the 14th of July to read the contemporary narratives of the attack on the Bastille, and the murders that took place after its surrender, to be found in Captain Bingham's work. They will enlighten him as to the exact amount of danger faced by the mob, the number and temper of the garrison, and the condition of the guns of the castle. De Launay had neither ammunition nor provisions; his handful of men fought unwillingly, and had had no rations served out to them for forty-eight hours, and only one of the guns on the towers could be pointed. Frenchmen surely will scarcely remember with pleasure how the mob attempted to burn a young lady alive, and slaughtered men who had surrendered in due form and on a distinct promise that their lives should be spared. The true character of the events of the 14th of July is admirably expressed in a sentence of M. Léon de Poncin's that is quoted here:—"An ill-defended fortress opening its gates to the rabble; scoundrels taking advantage of a capitulation to massacre unarmed men; there was nothing more."

* The Bastille. By Captain the Hon. D. Bingham. 2 vols. Illustrated. London: Chapman & Hall (Lim.) 1888.

BOOKS ON DIVINITY.*

IN his thick volume on a portion of the New Testament Dr. Vincent claims to have supplied a want. He thinks the English Biblical student wants something midway between the exegetical commentary and the grammar and lexicon which will give him the native force of Greek words, with their etymology, history and usage, and he adds that he writes first of all for those who are ignorant of Greek. Yet he is very often a commentator and very seldom gives an etymology, unless the component parts of an obvious compound are to be so called—e.g. συναγωγήν, from "σύν, together, and ἄγω, to [sic] bring," and his book seems to presuppose a knowledge of Greek throughout. He is right in saying that it is neither a commentary nor a lexicon. It might have been a better book if it had been decidedly one or the other; and if he had made up his mind to write either for Greek or for English readers, he might have spared the one class some of his needless derivations, and the other from being perpetually reminded of their inferiority by the intrusion of a language they do not understand. Dr. Vincent is great on the tenses, but all is not known about them yet, and it is not always safe to stickle for an aorist, or to conclude that the A.V. is always wrong when it does not give the grammar rendering of an imperfect. "The nicely-calculated force of that potent little instrument—the article," as well as the significance of its omission, we venture to think, are beyond Dr. Vincent's scholarship, as they are perhaps beyond that of better scholars, and he misses the opportunity of accounting both for its presence and its absence in Mark i. 1—υἱοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ. But the book has merits of its own; notably the use made by the author of his wide knowledge of Scripture in giving the comparative uses of words, and those who know a little Greek will find him a suggestive and not uninteresting companion in their study of the Gospels and Epistles.

It is a pleasure to be able to speak with less qualified approbation of Dr. Vincent's Sermons than we were able to accord to his Word-Studies. They have the great merit of being true to their intention. Written to correct the errors, to solve the difficulties, and to relieve the depression of religious people, they are marked throughout by sympathy.

Dr. McCook has the rather uncommon advantage as a preacher of being (as Sir John Lubbock describes him) a "most patient and loving student" of nature. This is indeed an inadequate account of his qualifications for dealing with such a subject as the Gospel in Nature, for Mr. Carruthers, who writes a short introduction to the volume, speaks of him as opening "the book of nature and the book of grace with the hand of a master." Expectation is naturally raised by such an introduction, and those who are led to expect sermons rather above the level of the ordinary evangelical type, brightened by illustrations from nature, by one who knows his subject, will not be disappointed.

If however Dr. McCook wishes to see what is wanting to complete his design in writing, he cannot do better than study Faith and Conduct. The anonymous writer wisely limits the scope of his inquiry to verifiable religion—religion, that is, which may be tested by the application of reason and science, as distinguished from religion based on authority, and to that portion of verifiable religion only which relates to persons, and not that which relates to societies. It would be an inadequate description of his book to say that it is an argument for the Divine government of the world, derived from the facts of consciousness and from the meaning and necessities of conduct. But he is aware that arguments so derived are, or are thought to be, just as much exposed to objections based on science and on history as the edicts of authority, and he accordingly devotes his earlier chapters to meeting them. Dismissing the theory of a crude and harsh materialism as explaining neither the generation nor the sustentation of the world, and as demolished by the progress of science itself because it explains nothing, and demonstrating (while he gladly accepts the theory of evolution) in how many ways it is controlled in good and wise directions by a power from without, he passes on to the question of history. With his invariable candour he admits that, though beliefs may be shown to have aided morality in the past, this is by no means the same thing as showing that there were any grounds for them. So he turns to conduct, and, regarding it from without, comes to the conclusion that the action of natural selection and the survival of the fittest would hinder rather than help the higher principles of action, unless some superhuman force were added. The book is a valuable contribution to religio laici.

The only fault to be found with Dr. Maclaren's Colossians and Philemon is its description on the title-page as a contribution to the Expositor's Bible, when, in fact, it is a volume of sermons, evidently written to be preached, and we are bound to say well worth preaching. In a well-compounded blend of comment, paraphrase, and exhortation the writer enlarges on the familiar thesis of the letter to Colossæ with its practical inferences, in pulpit language of course, but he is rarely florid, and often illustrates what he has to say with very appropriate figures and apt similes.

A reviewer need hardly do more than notice the fact that Mr. Stopford Brooke has published another volume of sermons, by no means because all his sermons are alike, but because they are all such full-length portraits of himself. His varied accomplishments, no less than his various attitudes towards society, thought, and institutions, stand out in every one of them, and what is true of his previous volumes holds good of his latest, The Early Life of Jesus.

Jesus Bar Rabba or Jesus Bar Abba? is a book which is true throughout to the riddle of its title-page, and we hazard, with much misgiving, a conjecture about the author's aim. As far as we can understand him, he seems to think that man was meant to lead a purely natural life, and that our great mistake has been that we have not led it. We were going on very well until we were tempted by "Spirit"; but who or what this Spirit is, whether good or bad, of this world or the next, is the pervading

* Word-Studies in the New Testament. Vol. I. By Marvin R. Vincent, D.D. London: Nisbet & Co.

The Covenant of Peace. By Marvin R. Vincent, D.D. London: Nisbet & Co.

The Gospel in Nature: Scripture Truths illustrated by Facts in Nature. By Henry C. McCook, D.D. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 1888.

Faith and Conduct: an Essay on Verifiable Religion. London: Macmillan & Co.

The Expositor's Bible—Colossians and Philemon. By Alexander Maclaren, D.D. London: Hodder & Stoughton.

The Early Life of Jesus. By the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke. London: David Stott. 1888.

Jesus Bar Rabba or Jesus Bar Abba? By Henry Pratt, M.D. London and Edinburgh: Williams & Norgate.

The Faith of the Gospel. By Arthur James Mason, B.D. London: Rivingtons. 1888.

Love the Fulfilling of the Law. Extracts from the Writings and MSS. of the late Norman Macleod, D.D. Selected and arranged by his Daughter, A. C. Macleod. London: Burnet & Co.

Sermons. By the late Rev. William Binnie, D.D. London: Macmillan & Co.

Honey in the Comb: Homespun Homilies. By J. Jackson Wray. Second series. London: Nisbet & Co.

A Manual for Confirmation Classes. By the Rev. W. Frank Shaw, B.D. London: Griffith, Farran, & Co.

Papers on Preaching. London: Nisbet & Co.

Hear the Church: Lectures on Church Principles. By George Edward Jelf, M.A., Canon of Rochester. London: Smith & Innes.

A Manual of Confirmation. By Daniel Moore, M.A. London: Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.

mystery. Anyhow he brought death into the world and all our woe, and, when Jesus came to win men back to the natural life designed for them by God, then, to mar his work, the Spirit Christ personated him after His death and introduced again the old dominion of Spirit, with all its consequences of Church and Creed, belief in future punishment, and all the spiritual influences which concentrate their pressure on the soul to wean men from the true life dictated by their circumstances and in accordance with their nature. This is the secret of the title. It is put in the form of a question. Like Pilate, the author asks "Whom will ye" have—Jesus Bar Rabba, the son of the robber, the personator who appeared as the risen Christ and founded (through the baneful instrumentality of Paul) a "spiritual Christianity," or Jesus Bar Abba—the Son of God—who made men children of nature and intended them to find salvation by following its suggestions? We submit this guess about the author's teaching with genuine humility, and with the sincere conviction, begotten of experience, that we are not of the number of the initiated "who can receive it," to whom alone the volume containing it is inscribed.

The Faith of the Gospel is an able and honest attempt to exhibit a Christian philosophy from a strictly orthodox point of view. It is addressed to English church people, and presupposes no qualifications in its readers but an average English education and a devout mind. The writer's purpose is set forth in a preface conspicuous for the modesty, earnestness, and reverence of its tone; he writes in a spirit of genuine liberality to Christians who differ from him, and in a style that is simple and clear. It is obvious that his primary aim involves a consideration of all the relations of God and man from the beginning to the end of time, so that there can be no pretence of exhaustive treatment in a volume of 400 pages. But enough probably is said for such readers as are expected, and the purpose of philosophic treatment even of the greatest subjects is wisely kept in view.

It may be said without disparagement of either that no two books by Christian ministers could well be more different than Love the Fulfilling of the Law and The Faith of the Gospel. It would be a very inadequate description of Canon Mason's religious attitude to say that to him Christianity was a creed, and of Norman Macleod's that to him it was a temper; but such, perhaps, may be said to be the dominant aspects of their faith to the several men, and the title selected by Miss Macleod for her book, designedly representative of her father, is an implicit confirmation of this estimate. There is some advantage in a book of extracts. Its composite character best represents a man; it brightens up the reminiscences of those who knew the author and his writings and his talk, and it brings his many sides together as no unaided memory could, nor any study of all his "Remains." Norman Macleod was a conspicuous figure. His physique aided the impression of his masculine and expansive nature, and his portrait helped to explain his sermons to those who had never seen him. So that, in reading the table of contents of this volume of extracts, it seems possible to be quite sure what he would say on every subject, whether it is asceticism or a Highland manse. But those who have only heard of the author will find more love and humour, more pathos and common sense, than they gave him credit for; and those who knew him and his way of looking at things will welcome a volume that keeps his memory green.

It is only fair to give a lenient consideration to posthumous sermons, because it is impossible generally to say how far the writer is responsible for their publication. In the case of Dr. Binnie's a reviewer is exempted from any such obligation, as the piety of his friends only gave effect to his known intention. It is to be regretted that they did not trust his reputation to the memory of his hearers, for this volume is not likely to enlarge it. The sermons are what is called well worked out. They look all round a text, and give point by point all that it implies, with much pious feeling and large knowledge of Scripture. They are dull to read, though possibly the voice and manner of the preacher may have made them better to hear. But even from the pulpit they must have seemed wanting in eloquence, fervour, and exhortation. They lack the essence of a good sermon—namely, a dominant idea in each. The writer's force is frittered away in divisions of his subject, and there is a want of summing up and concentrating all his arguments in a final appeal to the feelings of his audience. They are thoughtful, devout, and irreproachable; but they do not move.

We plead guilty to having read very few pages of Mr. Jackson Wray's Honey in the Comb, for the first four pages of his first sermon convinced us that his ignorance (we do not charge him with reliance on the ignorance of his hearers) absolved us from the duty of reading any more. It will scarcely be believed that he takes such a very doubtful text as Jacob's prophecy about "Shiloh," without a hint of its many interpretations, though he might have seen that the Revised Version gives two various renderings in the margin, one not in the least favouring, and one wholly inconsistent with, his exposition of it as a Messianic prophecy, and that the Septuagint Version has no Messianic allusion at all. He goes on to say, "Shiloh. This is the Messiah . . . every Jewish scribe will tell you that." Yet he does not say what the ablest Christian students and critics of the Old Testament tell us. But there is worse to come:—"David, of the tribe of Judah, and Judah's posterity succeeds to the throne of Israel right down the centuries, down to the very day the Shiloh" (i.e. Messiah according to Mr. Wray) "comes." Is Mr. Wray ignorant that the last king of Judah—not of "Israel"—died five hundred years before "Shiloh" came, and that for at least five hundred years after the Captivity there was no king in Judah or Israel, and that Herod was an Idumæan? These are schoolboy facts to remind a popular preacher of; but, unless we have misunderstood him, Mr. Wray appears to be ignorant of them. A preacher owes the duty of research and conscientiousness even to the most ignorant audience.

As Mr. Shaw's Manual for Confirmation Classes is a volume of 150 pp., it may be inferred that it contains a good deal more than the usual questions, instruction, and exhortation addressed to candidates. Perhaps an extract will enable our readers to conjecture how the pages are filled, which by no art of expansion could have been necessary for a genuine manual for confirmation classes. "The altar should be vested in white and the clergy should have white stoles. . . . No stole at all is better than a black one. Lay the list of candidates on the altar. See that there is Hymn-book for the Bishop and (i.) seats, (ii.) kneelers, and (iii.) books for the clergy," &c., with much more that savours rather of a manual for the verger than for the confirmation classes.

The various authors of Papers on Preaching have hit some common blots and given some useful hints. Bishop Baldwin thinks that preaching is, as a rule, deficient in courage and outspokenness, and so does Mr. Allen. Principal Rainy, though "Topics" is his subject, discourses on the general character rather than the special topics of sermons. Mr. Burnett, in the best paper of the series, writes about what he evidently understands—namely, preaching to rustics. His article is full of apt quotations and good stories, and he notes that agricultural labourers are much oftener deaf than townspeople—a fact worth knowing to country clergy. Mr. Vernon, at needless length, tells a story of a clergyman who was "courageous" enough to go to an actor to be taught to read, and came away with the mischievous notion that emphasis was the thing to cultivate, as if most hearers did not suffer more from hearing the Bible and the Prayer-book mangled and vulgarized with emphasis than from any other fault in the performance of Divine Service. Mr. Sandlands goes into the Physiology of Tone, and says the clergy would not be so exhausted on Mondays if they knew how to manage their voice on Sundays; and Dr. Campbell, Dr. Fisher, Mr. Hastings, and Mr. Williams contribute short papers on Manner, Study, Repetition, and Effect. Something may be gathered from the volume as it is; but it would be more useful if the longer papers were reduced to the brevity of the shorter (and better) ones.

Canon Jelf's Hear the Church is, as may be conjectured from its title, a confident restatement of "decided Church principles," on the chief rites, the Creeds, and the organization of the Anglican Communion. People in general like to hear their own views confidently restated, and to such his volume will be acceptable, but it is difficult to share his hope that it will contribute to a reunion with the Greek and Roman Churches, or that it will increase the attraction of the Church for English Christians outside it. It is because the principles he asserts are Church principles that they are outside it.

Mr. Daniel Moore's Manual of Confirmation is not, as might be imagined from its title, a syllabus for the use of clergymen in their preparation of candidates; but an address, preparatory to preparation, to the candidates themselves. It is admirably adapted to the more intelligent and older among them, being a sober, orthodox, and sensible instruction in the history, meaning, and obligations of the rite, maintaining an elevated tone of spiritual feeling throughout, but free from overstrained or artificial sentiment, and from impossible requirements.

CARICATURES IN FRANCE.*

IN connexion (it would seem) with the exhibition of caricatures which is now on view at the Ecole des Beaux-Arts, M. Armand Dayot has edited, and M. Quantin has published, a volume of reproductions, in colour and in black and white, of works by the greater and earlier caricaturists of modern France—the Daumiers, the Gavarnis, the Grandvilles, the Monniers, with whom the art was born, and with whom it has, to all appearances, become extinct. This volume—in an edition called "du Figaro"—is now before us. The reproductions are satisfactory; and M. Dayot's introductory essay, if a trifle breathless and hurried, is lacking neither in discretion nor in enthusiasm. At times, indeed, he goes over the score, and we find him (for instance) equalling the "art" of Gavarni—whose interest is rather literary than plastic—with the "art" of Honoré Daumier, in whom the literary interest is not far from being non-existent, while the technical quality—the elements of observation and expression—is merely prodigious. All this to the contrary, M. Dayot's essay is easily read and not soon forgotten; is, indeed, as good and suggestive an introduction to the subject as need be. The fault of the book is that the hundred or so of caricatures of which it presents us with reduced facsimiles are accompanied by not so much as a word of commentary, but are left to appeal to the public on their bare merits as works of art. This is unfortunate enough, for the essence of a caricature consists in its actuality and intelligibility. It is not always—it is, indeed, infrequent—that the caricaturist is a great draughtsman, and that his work is good enough to challenge opinion as an achievement in expression merely. What is wanted nine times in ten is, that the spectator should be au courant of the times of which the thing was born—that he should have this or that scandal within his reach, and be able to think of this or the other personage as of somebody not altogether unknown. A case in point is the caricature of H. B. It is pleasant, it is not inelegant, it is gay and cheerful, it is altogether gentlemanlike and decent; but, unless one has the originals by heart, there is scarce an experience in the range of comic art that is (we do not scruple to say it) to be matched for mournfulness and tedium with that which comes of turning over the sheets wherein H. B. delighted his contemporaries. Gillray himself is scarce above the same reproach; he is saved to a great extent by his admirable imagination and the fact that he dealt as often as not with great historic characters and issues. And even of him there is much that needs elucidation to be apprehended at all; while there is scarce any but comes home to the student with greater intensity and directness with the aid of a certain amount of commentary. What is true of Gillray and H. B. is true—and that in France and England alike—of Grandville and Traviès and Philipon. The average Frenchman is, no doubt, the most intelligent of created beings; but it is not to be believed that he has at his fingers' ends the allusions with which Les Maîtres de la Caricature Française is fraught. The citizens of "la Ville-Lumière," indeed, are tenfold more sagacious, and a hundredfold more cultured, than we suppose them to be if they take the half of the hints which are here suggested to them.

* Les Maîtres de la Caricature Française au Dix-neuvième Siècle. Paris: Quantin. London: Hachette. 1888.

Caricature in France attained, like all the other arts, a culmination in the great age of Romanticism. Honoré Daumier, the prince of caricaturists, may be said, indeed, to have occupied the same place in comic and satirical art as Hugo in poetry, Delacroix in painting, Berlioz in music, Frédérick and Dorval in acting, and Dumas in drama. Like these he is a sommité, and like these his genius and accomplishment were inventions of his own. Like them, too, he came at the beginning of things, for—as M. Dayot is careful to note—the origins of caricature in France date back no further than 1830, and the foundation, by the undaunted and the irresistible Philipon, of La Caricature, the strongest, if not the earliest, of French satirical prints. Daumier, it may be surmised, was not primarily a caricaturist. He was a prodigious draughtsman, with a plastic instinct of the grotesque of the strongest and the most abundant type; but it is probable enough that had his milieu been other than it was—had the years of his initiation into life not been the years of savage and desperate warfare between authority on the one hand and the press at bay on the other—he would have distinguished himself in other ways and expressed his genius in other terms than he did. There exist of him, M. Dayot tells us, "plus de deux cents toiles riches de couleur comme des peintures de Delacroix, de Decamps, de Millet, et souvent dignes d'être signées par ces grands maîtres"; his black and whites, his fusains and his water-colours are numbered by the thousand; he was the most indefatigable of workers, and (for he was a draughtsman of the type of—to say the least—the Millet of Le Semeur and Le Berger au Parc) he left his mark on everything he did. But his function was not the production of "painted literature." His intelligence—his Mephistopheles—was the redoubtable Philipon. His legends were the work of Philipon, and—it seems probable enough—as often as not the ideas of his political satires were Philipon's likewise. Nowadays the literary element in his work has ceased to have much interest save for the student. What one considers in a work of his is, not the legend underneath—not the jape which, if it rejoiced the hearts and quickened the understandings of a certain number of millions of Frenchmen some fifty years since, has for us of to-day a cryptic significance, like an inscription in cuneiform or a jest in Japanese—but the admirable sense of form, the extraordinary gift of exaggeration, the incomparable power of expression, the leaven of genius and style, which are apparent in the design to which the aforesaid legend is appended. In Les Maîtres de la Caricature Française there are included some thirty specimens of the work of this great and puissant master; and there is scarce one that we could wish to be without. They are mostly political; and, as we think, it is not in this section of his achievement that Daumier is to be seen and studied to the most advantage. His power is enormous; his ferocity is almost as that of Gillray; he brands, he bruises, he fustigates; he stamps his victims ridiculous, or hateful, or both, for all time. But good art is hardly to be divorced from good nature. Daumier is most himself when he is dealing with, not the individual but the species, not a particular offence but offensiveness in general, not the hatefulness of Thiers or Royer-Collard but the meanness and silliness of a whole division of society. M. Dayot divides his work into a dozen sections, and only one of these is political. What is wanted is a fairly representative selection from the other eleven. The time will come, no doubt, when there will be a Salle-Daumier in the Louvre, and his immense achievement will be reproduced in such publications de luxe as are consecrated just now to (say) Rembrandt and Moreau le Jeune. Meanwhile, his lithographs are difficult to get, and the fact of his pre-eminence is not easily demonstrable to the general.

Daumier was by no means the eldest of the battalion of caricaturists who served under Philipon's orders. Grandville and Gabriel Decamps, both born in 1803, were his elders by seven years; he was six years younger than Traviès, the artist of the Liard, the creator of the abominable little hunchback Mayeux, who was himself the junior by five years of Henri Monnier, the creator of the immortal Joseph Prudhomme. Decamps was rather a painter than a caricaturist, but, like all the artists of his time, he was a master of lithography, and his attacks upon the Government are lacking neither in savagery nor in wit; while Monnier was, for one thing, too careful of his liberty, and, for another, too keenly interested in the absurdities of the bourgeoisie, to addict himself steadily to politics. In this department Philipon's best hands, after Daumier, were Grandville and Traviès. Both were good haters, and both—the former especially—were capable on occasion of quite terrific work; but neither is adequately represented in the present book. Grandville, it must be noted, was a stronger man than Traviès, who was only now and then a good expressive draughtsman, and whose humour is too often either venomous or merely indecent. Some of his portraits, however, are superb, as his savage grotesques of Charles X. as a pastrycook—"Charlot, Premier Pâtissier de la Cour"—and Soult, here reproduced, will show. Grandville's most famous efforts—the terrible lithograph entitled, "L'Ordre règne à Varsovie," and "L'Ordre règne aussi à Paris"—are not given. The best specimens of his peculiar talent quoted by M. Dayot are, perhaps, "La Résurrection de la Censure," which is shockingly effective, and "Les Ombres Portées," a grotesque the cruelty of which almost amounts to genius. Gabriel Decamps is represented by "Le Roi Pieu"—Charles X. as a post—which is fair hitting enough; by a brilliant fantasy in which the benches of the Legislature are shown to us sufficiently peopled, not with their human tenants, but with the wigs, the shoes, the umbrellas, and so forth, with whose possession their human tenants are familiarly associated; and by the scandalous picture of Charles X. "chassant au tir dans ses appartements"—blazing away, that is to say, with a toy gun at a toy rabbit which his Chamberlain is trailing past him at the end of a string. The best of the Monniers are certainly the majestic full-length portraits of M. and Mme. Prudhomme. Charlet was never a caricaturist in the sense that Daumier and Decamps were caricaturists; he was far too good-tempered and too amiable; what interested him were the humours of linesmen and troopers, and his sketch of Hutinet ("fusilier de la 3me du 2me du 43me"), in act to scale a hill in heavy marching order, is as good a specimen of his buxom and cheerful talent as could have been chosen. "Quand il a fait des montagnes, le Père Éternel," says Hutinet, "bien sûr que s'il avait pris l'sac sur le dos y n'zaurait pas fait si hautes." Charlet has heard and enjoyed the reflection, and he makes us hear and enjoy it fifty years after date. His great contemporary, Raffet, was of sterner stuff. The fantasy in which he pictures the advent of the cholera—"Les Polonais se battent, les puissances font des protocoles, et la France . . . !"—is like a page of Gillray. There are fourteen or a dozen Gavarnis, all from the series called Par-ci, Par-là; they are well chosen, for they give a very favourable idea of the artist's vigour and touch of expressiveness of line; the best perhaps—the most suggestive certainly—is the strange and dreadful morality entitled, simply, "Phèdre au Théâtre-Français: Débuts de M. Paul de Trois-Étoiles dans le rôle d'Hippolyte." First among the Daumiers is a magnificent grotesque of Hugo—with the most ultra-Shakspearian forehead ever beheld of man—considering the comet outside the Théâtre-Français, which is decorated with a playbill of the Burgraves:—

> Hugo, lorgnant les voûtes bleues,
> Au Seigneur demande tout bas :
> Pourquoi les astres ont des queues
> Quand les Burgraves n'en ont pas.

Other admirable portraits are those of David d'Angers, Wolowski, Royer-Collard ("en vieille marquise de l'ancienne Cour"), Louis Philippe as Macaire, and Henri Monnier as Joseph Prudhomme, engaged in uttering the immortal declaration, "Jamais ma fille ne deviendra la femme d'un écrivassier." To the plate quoted from the Macaire series we should have preferred the hero's funeral oration over the Commandite—the greatest and finest realization of Tartufe which we know; and for the cruel and offensive "Cortège du Commandant-Général des Apothicaires" we should certainly have substituted the epic and dreadful "Rue Transnonnain"—a design which, as M. Dayot notes, is better than Goya's best, and which to our mind is the most tremendous achievement in pictorial satire which has yet been compassed. We may note, too, that among the political caricatures are reproductions of the famous "Primo saignare, deinde purgare," &c., and the awful "Fantôme" (of Ney), and that the choice from Daumier's world of social subjects is by no means a happy one.

Isabey and Carle Vernet are represented, each after his kind, by a number of Merveilleuses and Incroyables and dandies; Giraud by capital portraits of Ste.-Beuve and Flaubert; Durandeau by his admirable "Frédérick Lemaître"; Gill by a fairly good selection, which includes the excellent grotesque of Thiers as Clairette; Cham, by a set of three, among them "La République." Then there are specimens of Hadol, Philipon, Benjamin, Hugo, Doré, and Edouard de Beaumont, and—to conclude—a choice of four anonymous caricatures dating from the brave days of 1830-1848, and quite worthy of their epoch.

THE OGLANDER MEMOIRS.*

SIR JOHN OGLANDER, deputy lieutenant of the Isle of Wight in the reign of Charles I., and the representative of a family that had been settled at Nunwell, in the parish of Brading,

* The Oglander Memoirs: Extracts from the MSS. of Sir J. Oglander, Kt., of Nunwell, Isle of Wight. By W. H. Long. London: Reeves & Turner. Portsmouth: W. H. Long. 1888.

ever since the reign of Henry I., appears to have left a considerable mass of papers on various subjects. Portions of these papers were transcribed early in the present century, and from these transcripts the "Memoirs" before us have been extracted. The editor, Mr. Long, does not tell us whether the original manuscripts are still in existence, or whether there is reason to believe that they were in existence when Sir Richard Worsley, who refers to the knight's papers, wrote his History of the Isle of Wight, published in 1781. The most interesting part of Mr. Long's volume consists of Sir John's notices of events that concerned the island from 1627 to 1632, together with his account of the coming of the King in May 1647. There is a curious record of the scare occasioned by the appearance of some Dutch ships off the island in 1627. Word was sent to the Court that a Spanish fleet was making for Portsmouth, and "all London and most of England had a fielinge of itt, and possessed with feare or armes." The war with France caused considerable uneasiness, and Sir John notes that he "was the first that after the Rochell voyge provided a howse for [his] children in the mayne, and sent them thether." He dwells with much indignation on the troubles that followed the billeting of a Scotch regiment, "a people insolent by reason of theyre unanimous holdinge togeather, and the weaknesse of theyre commaundors, as beinge most unexperienced sowldiors, and farthoringe all thinges on a nationale raunkle;" and, in spite of his attachment to the King, he warns his "counterymen ever hereaftor, seeinge the bilettinge of sowldiors is contrarye to the lawe, and libertie of freemen, nevor to suffor anye moore att anye tyme to come into the Island, but raythor with the daunger of theyre lives to hindor them att the landinge." He afterwards suffered fine and imprisonment for his adherence to the Royal cause. The circumstantial narrative of the murder of Buckingham adds nothing to our knowledge, and represents the Duke as living "not above half an hower" after he was stabbed, though it seems certain that his death was almost instantaneous. Sir John laboured hard to persuade the Council to put the island in a state of defence. The King came over and took some interest in his plans, and, though money was scarce, something was done towards carrying them out. Of Lord Conway, who as governor of the island was his official superior, he had no high opinion. "He wase," he writes, "a mere verbal man." Conway was exceedingly unpopular on account of an attempt he made to secure the nomination of one of the members for each of the three boroughs at the election of 1628. His nominees were rejected, and his two lieutenants Dennis and Oglander were returned for Yarmouth, "whyche thinge he tooke verie ill," professing himself "noe frynd to the Island in generoll, or his liftennants in particular." When Charles landed in 1647 Hammond sent for all the gentlemen of the island to come to Carisbrooke, made them a speech, and allowed them to pay their respects to the King. Sir John wrote his account of these transactions the next day, and two days later Charles visited him at Nunwell. Besides a good many notices of the social condition of the island, his Memoirs contain some lively remarks on the characters, and especially on the failings, of his neighbours; and his description of the habits of James I., though it tells us nothing new, is worth reading as the work of a contemporary; for Sir John was born in 1585. Mr. Long has written a careful, but needlessly long, introduction to the Memoirs, and has supplied some useful foot-notes.

WOOD-CARVING.*

It is but a very few years since the amateurs of wood-carving in England were few and far between, and its professional followers generally regarded as a species of carpenters—as artisans, perhaps, but not artists. When an art is very little cultivated by amateurs there will be no general familiarity with it, and no interest in its specimens. "The children of Holland," says an old rhyme, "take pleasure in making What the children of England take pleasure in breaking." Here we have, in brief space, the whole history and philosophy of art-eras. It is only where arts are practically pursued that there is any popular appreciation of their value.

The work before us is one of the results of a great and sudden change. There is every indication that ere long the minor arts—that is to say, design, and the ability to develop it in modelling, wood-carving, and other decorative forms, will form a part of every child's education, as a preparation for more practical work. Within the past four years the Home Arts and Industries Association alone have established over Great Britain more than two hundred schools and classes, in most of which wood-carving is taught. In the People's Palace for the Poor, in the East-End schools of London, in innumerable societies of workmen, carvers are beginning to revive the old reputation of their ancestors as "chisellers." Meanwhile, in the higher schools of the art, as in the South Kensington, there is a correlative advance. Many thousands of ladies and gentlemen can now carve with skill, as our nobility did in Danish and Saxon days; for there is many a chance anecdote in Sagas and chronicles which indicates that even princes were given to the "carvers' worke," which in Anglo-Saxon was ceorfan. It is not unusual now to see young ladies at watering-places with panels and little kits of tools working by the seaside, even as others embroider. And if parents only knew the ease with which children, by the aid of Major-General Seaton's shilling manual and a few shilling's-worth of tools, can learn to carve; and if they could realize how far superior carving is, even to carpenter's work, to give deftness or skill to the fingers and awaken the constructive faculty, it would ere long form as essential a part of every education as drawing, or even writing itself.

To all who are interested in this beautiful and useful art the book under our notice will be very welcome. It is a folio with clear illustrations, fit to use as working copies, of many authentic specimens of antique carved furniture and woodwork, dating from the fifteenth to the eighteenth centuries, which specimens, as the author assures us, are "at present in the possession of private collectors, and taken from such other sources as are accessible only to the few." Mr. Marshall is evidently sincere in his desire "to enlist the sympathies of the public in favour of an art which has been somewhat"—he might have said "very"—"inadequately treated in English literature," and has shown his fitness to do so both by his text and illustrations. "The old furniture of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries," as he remarks, "was characterized by simplicity and stability of construction, adaptability, and the successful conversion of objects of utility into those of beauty." We cannot quite agree with him in attributing its introduction to England to the Flemings, though there was a great influence of the kind from the Low Countries in those days when a burgher of Ghent was more magnificently lodged than a king of England. There was always in this country a deeply-seated devotion to carving, both in stone and wood, and the perishable nature of the latter is the reason why so few specimens of work in it survived ages of storm and chances of burning. Few, indeed, were the chairs in those good old times which never figured in a free fight; rare, indeed, the tables whose "legs," like those in the American ballad, were not occasionally wrenched out to serve as weapons, nor were there many "Standarde" or "trussyng-Chestes" which were not in the long or short run knocked in to make them give out their treasures. In the sieges of towns and castles, furniture which a duchess would pray for in these days was burned as fuel to a terrible extent—perhaps the wonder is not that so little, but that so much still remains.

It is not generally known or acted on, but it is a fact fully proved by thousands of instances, that mere children, if properly taught, can be quite as well employed on making such cabinets, credences, and other furniture as are given in Mr. Marshall's book, as in whittling out and sawing little trifles of no value. The writer has seen in Philadelphia, and still more in Budapest, Gothic chests, armchairs, cabinets, and other furniture carved by pupils of from twelve to fourteen years' of age; all pupils in the public schools, whose work was fully equal in every respect to anything set forth in this book. The deduction is, that it may be sincerely commended to the hundreds, perhaps thousands, of evening and other classes all over the kingdom as very far superior for subjects to study and copy than the vast majority of the frivolous, petty rococo trash which is generally followed. For these fine English models, whether they be of the old settle at Retford, the screen of Wilne, the combination cabinet of Charles I., or any of the old chairs, are all large and liberal in design, and very easy as regards manual execution. In fact, the great majority of the actual tool-work on all this furniture, and on all that of its time, is often very inferior to the carving executed to-day by schoolboys who have had a few lessons. Yet the general effect is very far superior indeed to that of the sawed-out by machinery and glued-on trash of modern furniture, though the latter is by far more "finished," or what the vulgar suppose is "artistic." For the breadth or largeness of the old designs gave them an advantage as regards effect which all the machinery finish in the world can never approach. It has been said that almost any building is of superior character if the walls are only thick enough. We may add that almost any piece of furniture which is very substantially made, and decorated with designs in which the pattern does not cover more than one-third of the ground, belongs to the aristocracy of meubles. It is a lesson which not a few modern manufacturers of wall-paper and wood-carving patterns may study to advantage in the better work of the olden time, that when ornaments are so crowded together that a great general design is lost sight of, weakness and frivolity begin. It is idle to waste time on what might as well have been a mere background, diaper-pattern. It is folly to reduce all ornament to foliage.

Mr. Marshall has given altogether fifty plates of whole examples, or details of old-fashioned furniture; and if every wood-carver in England would study them carefully and catch their spirit, and reproduce them as a whole, there would be an incredible improvement in all our household goods or gods. Unfortunately the majority of carvers are not, as yet, capable of really understanding the patterns or the advice. Again, it is very often urged that these old designs are not in accordance with the age. But the truth is that all that is in them which is worth retaining is precisely what the age most needs—that is to say, freedom from conventionalism, freshness, vigour, and strength. It is needed in social life, in art, and in politics. This may be a far cry from furniture; but "honest in one thing, honest in all" applies well enough here to him who sees it; and "the first departure" in art, and in all things, if it be not characterized by simplicity and power, will be to something worse.

Mr. Marshall seems to be inspired with the proper spirit of his vocation, since he cites with small-capital reverence the lines:—

'Mid all the lights a happier day has brought,
We work not [illegible]

* Specimens of Antique Carved Furniture and Woodwork, Measured and Drawn. By Arthur Marshall, A.R.I.B.A., Architect. London: [illegible] & Co. 1888.

and he deserves the assurance that his own work will go far among the craft of those "cunning in wood" to rehabilitate what was good of yore. It would form a very welcome present to a carver, and may be appropriately placed in the library of every technical school, or awarded as a prize to pupils excelling in the graceful art of which it treats.

SOME MINOR POETS.*

THERE is enough variety in this sheaf of poesy to afford at least a whimsical sort of interest in their juxtaposition, however little encouragement is yielded to the hopeful student of contemporary verse. The range of subject is considerable. There are historical drama, epic, lyrics both true and nondescript, a little timid didactics, and the tender bleating of the superfluous amorist

> Who says that fictions only and false hair
> Become a verse!

Apparently, not a few. The poet, as here represented, is, for the most part, the feigner, rather than the maker, with somewhat less of the poet than the verser, to use the Jonsonian distinction. Even Mr. Michael Field is less intent on re-creating history, and making great personages live again in dramatic action, than in presenting pyschological problems, and tracking the slow-working of spiritual influences. No one would dispute the subtlety of the author's characterization in Canute the Great. Canute and Emma are both delineated with remarkable skill and power. You are made to feel the least circumstance in the environment of each with an acuteness that stirs sensibility to the utmost. And this is admirable, indeed, so long as the process of self-revelation accords with and vitalizes the action. Unfortunately at times the voices we hear become merely ghostly; the visual scene fades, and nature is replaced by over-refining analysis. Emma, Canute, and the rest are possessed of the poet, whose method is one of research into heart and conscience, whose speech is non-natural and purely introspective. All the persons in the play are too much given to a highly ornate language. It is, in fact, Mr. Michael Field in possession. The character of Canute is probably suggested by a passage in one of Professor Freeman's essays. We see the Viking spirit subdued to softer influences, among which Anglo-Saxon civilization and the Church are of course potent. But Mr. Michael Field is perfectly justified, for dramatic purposes, in tracing the alienation of Canute from his fatherland and its faith to the influence of a woman. "Strange," says Hardegon, the untamable old Dane, "you should have taken to fretting, and all since the siege of London." And Canute replies:—

> All, all since then. Ah, yes! Above me bent
> A sweet, soft-shouldered woman, with supreme > Abashing eyes, and such maturity—
> The perfect flower of years—such June of face. . . .
> So ceremonious, and yet so fearless
> In passionate grace, that I was struck with shame,
> And knew not where I was, nor how to speak,
> Confounded to the heart. She made me feel
> That I was lawless and uncivilized—> Barbarian!

The influence here indicated is developed too far in the second act. It is extremely doubtful if any woman, even Emma, could have so wrought on the nature of Canute as to make him the vacillating sentimentalist represented in the second scene of this act. There is much, however, in the fine scene at Glastonbury between the two, at the end of the drama, that lessens the force of this objection. The Cup of Water we cannot prefer to the simpler form, merely suggestive though it was, in which Rossetti left it. If the execution of this little drama were not in itself sufficiently convincing, we should have thought that the choice of such a theme was not only unhappy, but almost incredible.

An epic poem, and in a new metre, is at any time a novelty, and notable indeed in these days, when great ventures are scarce, and our poets mostly exercise their wits, like allotment holders, within the congenial limits of the Parnassian petite culture. Mr. J. F. Rowbotham has chosen a high theme and made a bold experiment in his romantic epic. He sings in unrhymed catalectic octometers

> The glory of Roland, the peerless Paladin, and the great rout at Roncesvalles.

In an interesting note on the recitation of epic poetry he sets forth the constituents of his metre and the reasons for his choice. He rejects pentameter and heptameter because they are not compatible with that equality of phrasing which is essential to musical rhythm. He wanted, in fact, an even-footed verse, and doubled the four-foot ballad measure. Why, however, did Mr. Rowbotham reject the hexameter? The reason must be given in his own words:—

> The rhythm of the hexameter was constituted agreeably to the phrasing of Greek music, which normally ran in pairs of phrases of three bars or feet apiece. A line of six feet was therefore the exact representative of the common musical sentence in Greek music; but in the dominion of modern music is archaic and unnatural, since no such phrasing of three bars in pairs is in fashion to-day. . . . Modern music normally proceeds in pairs of phrases of four bars or feet, and the octometer is therefore the most perfect representative of the common musical sentence of to-day.

This learned explanation certainly accords with Mr. Rowbotham's very modern treatment of the Chanson de Roland, and it does not seem to have been given because the author feared, like Chaucer, that the reader would "mis-metre" him. Of course there are gifted souls who could not do so, just as there are young people who can read the most difficult music at sight; but they are only a portion of those who sing or play, or read poetry. Not every one could translate into Mr. Rowbotham's metre at sight the following seven verses printed as prose:—

> Thus cried Oliver, and Roland replying cried, "Nay, Oliver, what mean'st thou? Thou who erstwhile with such emphasis pressed me to wind this very horn, now in deprecation standest, forbidding me to do't. What mean'st thou?" "What I say, brother. Early this morning thou should'st have done it, or not at all. Then the emperor would have heard thee. Only some miles in front of us were he and his regiments then; and welcome aid had saved many a brave. Thou should'st have done what I told thee, Roland, and when. But now it is too late."

We fear there are not a few who would find the task suggested as thorny as the ravine of Roncesvalles proved to Roland and his brave Franks. Despite occasional vagaries in the employment of optional feet in the first six of his octometer, Mr. Rowbotham has on the whole justified his experiment. Apart from this, we confess to having read his poem with considerable pleasure. It is often extremely spirited, moving, and picturesque, and always unconventional and spontaneous. Mr. Rowbotham's use of simile is profuse and elaborate, as befits an epic subject, and if it is frequently homely or familiar to contemporary ears, he may cite Dante and other great exemplars. That he can emulate the heroic with success is shown in not a few vigorous passages, such as the Homeric contest between the Saracen leader and Roland (93–94). When he likens the sudden appearance of the Saracens to the Epsom racecourse after the finish, or to the Paris rats foraging at night, the simile is both natural and enforced with effect; but he provokes a smile when the dusky multitude is compared to smaller deer, e.g.:—

> As when one in a London kitchen, entering with candle late at night;
> Some hours the light has been extinguished, and on the floor black beetles crawl,
> Thick as sawdust, over each other in moving masses upon the ground.

Mr. St. Clair Baddeley's volume is as handsome as type and paper can make it. The contents are of blank verse and sonnets chiefly. The former is smooth and a good deal cloying. The latter do not arrive at any especial distinction, though there is one poem in the sonnet sequence, "Costanza; or, Love in the Shadow of Death," that is Elizabethan both in fervour and hyperbole. Herein the poet's heart is said to take fire "phœnix-like," most unmiraculously, "each day,"

> Fanning the tender flame of deep Desire,
> Yet pointing heavenward where Devotion springs.

Dr. Weir Mitchell has the accomplishment of verse, if he is not altogether the poet born of nature. Probably he does not pretend to any such claim. His "Masque of Death and the Miser" is a quaint concept skilfully presented; his legends in blank verse are good of their kind, and his book altogether is as elegant as anything and everything put forth by the Riverside Press of Boston. We must note as excellent in point and neatly turned the stanzas of greeting "To George Bancro, aged 86," on a decanter of Madeira aged 86. This form of courtesy is becoming almost as rare as the wine it celebrates. We sincerely trust the wine was as good as it proclaims itself in the poet's verse:—

> The days that went have made you wise,
> There's wisdom in my rare bouquet.
> I'm rather paler than I was;
> And on my soul you're growing grey.

Of Miss May Kendall's Dreams to Sell, "merry and sad to tell," to quote her title taken from Beddoes, we should greatly prefer to buy the former, the humorous, the quaint, and the whole sections labelled "Science" and "Art." These have a flavour all their own. The remainder are graceful, ingenious, pretty enough, it is true; but the piquancy of humour and fancy that belongs to those of our choice is a very individual quality. The evolutionary lyrics are delightful. It would be shameful to spoil them of a stanza for quotation purposes, and unhappily we cannot give the whole of that diverting lyric, "The Conscientious Ghost," or the poet's feeling aspiration for "liberty and ease" and the blameless life of a simple Trilobite "in the Silurian seas." Such things were too good for a dull world if the wise knew not how to value them.

Raygarth's Gladys was a lovely maiden, "svelte was her form," her "brow and neck a slack-drawn bow," and Gertrude, her blonde rival—for Gladys was brunette—was not less lovely.

* Canute the Great—The Cup of Water. By Michael Field. London: G. Bell & Sons.

The Death of Roland. An Epic Poem. By John Frederick Rowbotham. London: Trübner & Co.

Lotus-Leaves. By St. Clair Baddeley. London: Trübner & Co.

A Masque; and other Poems. By S. Weir Mitchell, M.D. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, & Co.

Dreams to Sell. By May Kendall. London: Longmans, Green, & Co.

Raygarth's Gladys; and other Poems. By James Saunders. London: T. Laurie. 1888.

Fires of Green Wood. By Francis Prevost. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.

Poems. By Joseph McKim. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co. 1888.

Penelope; and other Poems. By the Author of "Edward the Confessor." London: Trübner & Co. 1888.

Between the two Raygarth has a terrible time of it. Gladys wins, however, and Gertrude, it is satisfactory to know, > was won

> By Clerk in Holy Orders, virtuous, whole.

It all comes of Gladys going "a lady's mile" from the seashore, and getting in deadly peril on the throbbing breast of ocean—"that hoary Charteris"—whose "myrmidons" (? the waves) stifle her cries, when down comes Raygarth and rescues her from the rude embraces of the libertine sea. Then came the doctor, and tries all his "chymic lore" and "surgeon's craft." And still he labours, until "the evening sun," as might his Grace of Portland, > Enters its Welbeck subterranean.

She revives, however, by the blessed inspiration of Raygarth's breath:—

> Her lips part! and that alabastrine cheek
> Incontinent the rosy nard reveals.

What more? Not much; except to say, of course, he marries Gladys, jilting the faithful Gerty, who comfort finds at length, and loves, we hope, her virtuous curate whole. Only Mr. Saunders, perhaps, could surpass this. He does so, triumphantly, however, in "A Dreadful Moment" and "The Leper-Man." The opening stanzas of each are enough to show the unconscious humour of the poet:—

> That is the House; long years agone,
> When we dwelt there, my aunt and I,
> On reaching home, our school-work done,
> We brooded o'er a mystery.

And now for "The Leper-Man"—

> O Loathsome Leper-man, begone!
> And wail "Unclean!" through all the coast;
> No rest for thee in Jewry's host;
> O Loathsome Leper-man, begone!

Mr. Francis Provost is a serious, if not a very original, bard. In a fragment of a drama, Heristal of Mortain, we read:—

> Who tends a flower
> Has touched the skirts of God, who helps a man
> Has kissed His hand.

The last stanza of "Life Marks" runs thus:—

> Till in the shuttle's ceaseless spin
> That weaves God's skirts you lost the cries
> Of light wares from the world-fair's din—
> And I re-found your eyes.

After the obscure Mr. Prevost, the simple art of Mr. McKim is almost pleasing. Various lyrics "from the opera Eulalie" show a distinct aptitude in the author for libretto poetry. In "William the Silent," an historical ballad, Mr. McKim is more independent and more successful than in the operatic line. The author of Penelope has obviously studied the Faery Queene assiduously, with results common to copyists of the masters. Temperance, Fear, Jealousy, Devotion, and the rest of the abstract personalities that figure in the author's gallery of portraits are somewhat thin and ghostly. Many poets have essayed to imitate Spenser in their youth, but in each instance in the humour of an artist or with a technical aim, and not as an allegorist.

DOMESDAY STUDIES.*

EVER since there has been any systematic study of English antiquities Domesday Book has been a puzzle to antiquaries. For a long time before that it was not a puzzle only because no one thought of trying to understand it at all. There has not been, since the thirteenth century at latest, any continuous use of the book, though it has now and then been referred to for evidence of the ancient rights of the Crown, still less any traditional interpretation. Only within the present century has the full text been made public, and only within its latter half has something like an apparatus criticus been gradually formed. Now, indeed, not only is the text to be found in every good public and corporate library in England and many private ones, but the facsimile published by the Ordnance Survey is as easily accessible and more easily procurable. It is hardly less important that we have now in print a considerable number of mediæval surveys and extracts from records which deal with the same matters as Domesday, though not altogether for the same purposes. References to many of these authorities are conveniently collected at the head of the opening chapter of Mr. W. J. Ashley's Economic History; a chapter, we take this opportunity of saying, which, though not long, represents a great deal of careful work and selection, and will be found an excellent general introduction to the history of the English manor and "village community." If Mr. Ashley's book were here directly before us, we should no doubt have to take exception to this and that statement or inference, especially with regard to the relative weight of legal and economic documents. But he will send students, in the main, to the right authorities and in the right way. Those authorities, including many which were practically inaccessible forty, thirty, or even ten years ago, will not enable us to understand Domesday Book without further trouble; very far from it. They will enable us, however, to avoid certain kinds of obvious errors, and to concentrate work on the really promising lines.

A good opportunity for such concentration of work, and for forming a nucleus of permanent interest in it, was afforded by the Domesday Commemoration Meeting of 1886. The volume now published shows that the opportunity has been well used. It is true that the scholar's first impression may be of something like despair. For the main part of the volume consists of detailed and laborious discussion contributed by those learned persons Canon Isaac Taylor, Mr. J. H. Round, and Mr. O. C. Pell; certainly there are no other three men in England who have read Domesday more diligently or with more searching comparison of the facts and documents capable of illustrating it; and on the first reading it is hard to see that these three learned persons, or any two of them, are completely agreed on any point save one, which is that there is still very much to be learnt. We may find, however, that things are better than they look; and meantime the reader may turn to Mr. Stuart Moore's introductory essay on the study of Domesday Book. It will be found as readable as the subject admits of, and the only thing we have to complain of is a certain excess of zeal in defending the Conqueror's memory. There was no need to administer a solemn rebuke to the English chronicler for allowing himself his grumble about Domesday. Englishmen have always grumbled at taxation and official returns of every sort, and probably always will. And English learned persons, when not in office themselves, have always looked on official interference in the matters of their learning with a certain mixed affection of fear, suspicion, and contempt. Lord St. Leonards used language about the imposition of Succession Duty not less violent than that of the English Chronicle, though, one would think, on less provocation. Mr. Stuart Moore further omits to point out that the grumble of a monastic writer—"growl of the unintelligent, unthrifty Saxon monk," as he is pleased to call it—proceeds from the landlord's point of view, not the labouring tenant's. On p. 4 the "Dialogus de Scaccario" is, by an unlucky misprint, ascribed to the latter part of the reign of Henry III. instead of Henry II. Towards the end of his paper Mr. Stuart Moore (having properly observed that Domesday Book is not a survey at all in the modern sense of the word, and does not assume the existence of one) argues that, if we ever have a new Domesday for the purpose of registration of titles, it "must be based on cadastral survey on elaborate and accurate plan." Mr. Moore, it would seem, is of opinion that the 25-inch Ordnance map, with which of course he is acquainted, is not good enough or not full enough to be taken as a basis. One would like to know more of the grounds of this opinion.

With regard to the matters discussed by Canon Taylor, Mr. Round, and Mr. Pell, we shall not attempt here to follow out the details of their investigations. Every one who means really to work at the subject must check those details for himself and exercise his own judgment; and those who are not prepared to do this would find little or no interest in a mere statement of evidences and inferences which would have to be interrupted at every turn by doubts, exceptions, and qualifications, if it were to represent our existing knowledge with tolerable accuracy. We prefer to give, on our own responsibility, a summary of those results which we believe to be now either accepted as certain, or at least rendered highly probable by the labours of the learned contributors to Domesday Studies.

The primary object of the Domesday inquest was to ascertain the contributions on which, according to existing law and custom, the king could count for maintaining the armed force of the country. Part of the king's revenue was in the nature of rent, derived from lands of which he was lord. But rent (gafol) due to the king as territorial lord must be carefully distinguished from the public tax (geld) due to him in his political capacity.

The taxpaying capacity or liability of land was assessed in terms of units of superficial measure, which were the hide, generally speaking, in the southern or properly English counties; the carucate or ploughland in the northern counties, where Danish influence had been strong. These measures of surface had a real and definite value—that is to say, a hide or a carucate meant, in a given district, a certain number of acres. We need not here and now consider whether they had always been definite. Perhaps we might find that the native English hide began as a term of vague description, and only by degrees acquired a numerical meaning; whereas the carucate is more likely to have come in, so to speak, ready measured. It is certain that the number of acres in a hide or a carucate, and also the actual dimensions of the acre itself, might and did vary from district to district, and there might be different customary acres even in different fields within the same township. Mr. Pell's elaborate research has collected a mass of tabulated materials which will henceforth be indispensable for reference and verification on this head, whether the student does or does not accept all his conclusions. Further, the number of hides or carucates for which a given manor is assessed is not necessarily equal to the actual acreage, any more than the modern rateable value of land or a house is necessarily or usually equal to the full rental. In many cases the assessment is plainly small in proportion, not only to the total amount of land, but to the extent of cultivated land. This may be well seen by turning to any of the royal manors in Devonshire; a task which the excellent parallel edition of the Exchequer and Exeter texts of the survey now in course of publication by the Devonshire Association enables us to apply with peculiar convenience. Local and personal considerations of policy [illegible] favour procured here and elsewhere an assessment which might be greatly below the real value. No fixed [illegible] between the assessed or "geldable" value and the actual area can be assigned. Further, it seems probable that even where the assessment was intended to correspond with the actual extent of cultivated land, only the land which was under cultivation at one time was counted—in other words, the fallow was not counted. Thus, under the two-field system of mediæval tillage which held its own long after the Conquest, only half the ploughland would be reckoned; under the three-field system, only two-thirds. We owe this suggestion to Canon Taylor, who has worked it out in detail for many parts of the northern counties, and has made it explain many apparent anomalies. Among other things, it accounts at once for the hide being sometimes called 120 acres (the taxable quantity) and sometimes 240 (the full acreage of both the tilled and the fallow fields in a two-field course). In a three-field course the 180 acres assigned to a ploughland by Fleta give for the taxable area the same number of 120 acres.

* Domesday Studies; being the Papers read at the Meetings of the Domesday Commemoration, 1886. Edited by P. Edward Dove. Vol. I. London: Longmans, Green, & Co. 1888.

Although the hide, carucate, and so forth had various customary values in different parts of the country, there is a good deal of evidence that at the time of the Conquest there was a tendency to a mean or normal value, and that for the hide this was 120 acres (or a long hundred, according to the method of counting then so popular as to be called "anglicus numerus") divided into four virgates or yardlands. The carucate was normally of the same acreage as the hide, but divided into eight bovates or ox-gangs, implying that the carucate was fixed with reference to the quantity of land which a full team of eight oxen (caruca) could till in the year. How far and where this eight-ox team was an existing fact, and how far and where an ideal common denominator used by the surveyors for the comparison of different areas and qualities of land, is one of the questions which seem still to demand further and more minute examination. The phrase "aratra fortissima in dominio," which occurs several times in the Burton Cartulary, should be noted in connexion with it. Many other questions of detail arise, which we purposely do not specify.

The hide was commonly divided into four yardlands, but we meet with a division into six, pointing perhaps to a change from two-field to three-field tillage, and also (as Mr. Stuart Moore has pointed out) with an odd and puzzling division into five. When the number of acres in the virgate is not the normal number of thirty, it is generally a multiple of twelve, such as forty-eight or thirty-six. These cases may be evidence of a two-field system; in the Worcester Register virgates of thirty-six acres are expressly said to consist of "xviij. in utroque campo." But it must also be remembered that thirty-six of the ordinary decimal reckoning is thirty in the duodecimal system, or "anglicus numerus," of which the long hundred is only one example. It appears from the Ramsay Cartulary that sometimes Danish influence displaced the measurement by hides and virgates, without putting measurement by carucates in its place. As to the dimensions of the local acre, it may always be conceived as formed by a strip of a furlong (=40 rods or 10 chains) in length and four rods in breadth. The result varied according to the length taken for the rod, which might be less or more than the statutory rod of 15½ feet. Thus the "forest acre," constructed with the rod of 18 feet, was in use for measuring woodlands in relatively modern times. Many of us have wondered from our youth up why such a seemingly irrational number as 5½ yards should make one rod, pole, or perch. Mr. Pell suggests that the standard measure was fixed at this value as a kind of compromise among the many customary measures.

For the present we omit mention of Mr. Pell's ingenious connexion of land "extra hidam" and "sexlond" or "sexacra" with the Norman application of decimal reckoning to districts where "anglicus numerus" had prevailed; and also of his still more ingenious and elaborate identification of the divisions of land with the divisions of the pound of silver; these being points which do not admit of concise explanation, and do still, to our mind, require further consideration.

Finally, Domesday was a survey of estates and their taxpaying capacity, not of population for its own sake. Inferences as to the actual numbers and personal condition of the dwellers on the land must therefore be made with caution. A second volume of these Studies is to follow. If it contains anything like such good work as the first, historical scholars will be eager to welcome it.

WOFFINGTON.*

THE usual good fortune of Peg Woffington has attended her in the matter of her biography. She has, it is true, had long to wait. When, however, the first serious memoir appears Peg once more distances all competitors. It is permissible to imagine how the cheek of the actress would have glowed could she have foreseen the noble monument to her fame which was to be erected by a foreigner, and reach her or us from over-sea. Peg has received in full measure the tribute ordinarily awarded women of her position. She has been a constant theme of elegy and lampoon. Fancy pictures of her amours with "persons of the first rank" have been drawn, and imaginary dialogue with her enemies or her rivals has been put into her mouth. She has, moreover, been the heroine of a romance which is more than half a memoir, and a memoir which is more than half a romance. That she has outlived all these dignities or indignities, and retains a recognizable individuality, is due less to her self-constituted biographers than to the friends and associates who have preserved traits and anecdotes concerning her. Peg's grace, beauty, and vivacity have warmed the most commonplace scribes, and garrulous old Tate Wilkinson, who began life by imitating and offending her, praises her with the eloquence of a second Colley Cibber. Genest, even, the soberest and most trustworthy of chroniclers, goes into what in his case may almost be called raptures, and declares that she "was perhaps the most beautiful woman that ever appeared on the stage." His evidence on this point, however, can scarcely be of much value, since Peg died in 1760, and Genest can only in his childhood, if at all, have seen her in her decline.

The chief lesson taught by Woffington's conspicuous success is the value of hard work. Her piquant Irish face was accompanied by a harsh voice. Horace Walpole describes her at the outset of her London career as a "bad actress," but adds that "she has life"; to Conway she only appeared "an impudent-faced Irish girl," and Campbell, speaking of course at secondhand, declares that "she used to bark out 'The Fair Penitent' with most dissonant notes." Her voice appears to have remained obdurate. Over other difficulties she triumphed. She had the wisdom to avail herself of the teaching of Garrick, and of the opportunities which her close intimacy with him afforded. To her many brilliant qualities she joined a common sense that in her profession is one of the rarest of gifts. Thanks to this, she had few of the vapours of her occupation and her sex. She did not deceive or disappoint the audience by feigned pleas of illness, and she resorted to none of the whimsies which in her day were looked upon almost as badges of her profession. She could hate, however, with fervour, and her quarrels with Kitty Clive and George Anne Bellamy stand forward among the fiercest and most prolonged of stage feuds.

Of Mrs. Woffington's varied career Mr. Daly writes sensibly and eloquently. It may be urged in favour of those who have romanced concerning Peg that she presents herself under fugitive aspects, and is not much more easy to depict than a bird upon the wing. Mr. Daly has aspired to "fix the identity of this visionary face, to catch the glance and smile of this popular favourite." As much success as was to be hoped in so difficult a task has been obtained, and the presentment of the actress is spirited. Mr. Daly's method contrasts favourably with that of his predecessors. Instead of placing imaginary dialogue in the mouths of those surrounding Peg Woffington, of whose real words no recorded syllable survives, he supplies an animated and an accurate picture of the life in the midst of which she dwelt. To do this well requires tact and research. The opening chapter shows the method on which the biographer has proceeded. It contains a good account of the public amusements of Dublin at the moment when Peg first came before the world. For the opening pictures of the Aungier Street Theatre under the management of the Elringtons and of the booth in Fownes's Court—Mr. Daly calls it Fawnes's Court—in which, under Mme. Violante, Peg made her début as dancer and singer, and that in George's Court, in which she played Polly Peachum in a representation by children of The Beggar's Opera, Hitchcock's History of the Irish Stage is principally responsible. From more recondite sources, indicated with commendable fulness, are however drawn the particulars of the infant Woffington's earliest appearances, when she was carried on the tightrope in a basket attached to the ankles of Mme. Violante. Between this period and that at which, in a juvenile cast comprising Isaac Sparks as Peachum, Bensley as Lockit, Barrington as Filch, and Betty Martin as Macheath—all of them to be heard of hereafter—she won her first recognition as an actress, Peg sold watercress to the students at Trinity College, or fetched from the river the water necessary to her mother's occupation as a washerwoman. From the earliest period Peg showed herself anxious to benefit by counsel, and from one or other of the Elrington brothers she obtained her first knowledge of the mechanics of acting and the rudiments of elocution.

"From Lilliput to Ophelia" Mr. Daly heads the chapter in which he describes how, under the teaching of Charles Coffey, the author of The Devil to Pay, Peg won acceptance, and then favour, in Dublin. In 1733, when she was fifteen years of age, according to Mr. Daly, she first appeared at the Aungier Street Theatre, acting comic characters, and even, strange as it may seem, obscuring her juvenile charms and playing such old women as Mrs. Peachum and Mother Midnight in Farquhar's Twin Rivals. Not, however, until she appeared in the "breeches parts," for which her fine figure admirably qualified her, did Peg Woffington obtain a complete hold over the public. Sylvia, in The Recruiting Officer, which she took for her first benefit, and in which she dresses as a youth, and Sir Harry Wildair, in The Constant Couple, carried Dublin by storm. So firm a grip did she take on the latter character that Garrick is said to have abandoned it to her. It was in this that Hogarth painted her, and it was in this that in subsequent years she provoked the repartee of Quin, who, when she said, after some more than usually fervid demonstration on the part of her admirers, "I have played the part so often that half the town believes me to be a real man," consoled her with the assurance that the other half knew to the contrary. In London, where Peg appeared playing in 1740 at Covent Garden, she became instanter the rage; and Macklin, who is quoted by Mr. Daly, declares that she "represented the gay, good-humoured, dissipated rake of fashion, with an ease and elegance of deportment that seemed almost out of the reach of female accomplishments." The relations between Garrick and Peg Woffington are treated with a light hand, the biographer naturally espousing the side of his heroine. Upon the handsome provision that the actress made for her mother and her sister, and upon her generally charitable disposition, Mr. Daly lays some stress. He espouses her cause warmly against her rivals and enemies. Miss Bellamy he characterizes as "an unamiable little minx" and "a spiteful and artful woman." Mrs. Cibber and Mrs. Pritchard were Peg's "most envious rivals," and Kitty Olive is said to have had "a coarse vulgar nature," and to have been "a perfect mistress of invective." For the last accusation there is perhaps some foundation. Lee Lewes, from whose Memoirs Mr. Daly constantly quotes, says that, "to a conceit inconceivable, Clive joined a passionate temper that knew neither government nor reason; with a volume of language such as is only given to her sex; and a command of vituperation that was not hindered by delicacy nor confined by art." In the case of Peg Woffington's other rivals, and even in that of Clive herself, it is conceivable that Peg was not seldom the aggressor. A full measure of masculine admiration is reconcilable with dealings with her own sex that are not wholly angelic.

* Woffington: a Tribute to the Actress and the Woman. By Augustin Daly. Printed for the Author.

Mr. Daly's indignation is, however, mainly directed against the anonymous author of Woffington's Ghost, a broadside in verse, published in 1761, and purporting to be a vindication. Some very vapid passages from this "scurrilous screed," as Mr. Daly calls it, are published in the appendix, and some more vigorous lines are with much ingenuity turned against the scribe himself.

It is, of course, impossible to follow Mr. Daly in his description of Peg Woffington's brilliant and notable career. Concerning her stage triumphs and the marvellous popularity that raised her to a position, unique in its class, of President of the Dublin Beef-Steak Club, he has collected interesting and curious information, much of it not easily obtainable. It is difficult to add to the pathos of the statement of Tate Wilkinson, who had previously charged her with blighting his early prospects, concerning her last appearance upon the stage. After speaking as Rosalind a part of the epilogue "I would kiss as many of you as had beards that pleased me," "her voice," says Wilkinson, "broke, she faltered, endeavoured to go on, but could not proceed—she screamed out in a voice of tremor and tottered to the stage-door, where she was caught. The audience, of course, applauded till she was out of sight, and then sank into awful looks of astonishment, at seeing a favourite actress struck so suddenly by the hand of death (for so it seemed) in such a situation of time and place, and in her prime of life, for she was then only forty-four." This was, in fact, her last appearance. She recovered to some extent, but acted no more, and lasted for two or three years "as a mere skeleton." The story is told at more length in the new biography, without, however, being rendered more impressive. Mr. Daly has written a useful, a pleasing, and a scholarly work, which is a valuable contribution to theatrical biography. Its appearance meanwhile and its illustrations are such as render it one of the most covetable of possessions, and will secure its becoming a bibliographical treasure. So reverently have, indeed, the pages of the goodly volume to be turned that the task of mastering its contents becomes difficult. Its lovely illustrations include a reproduction of Hogarth's fine picture of Peg as Sir Harry Wildair, which serves as a frontispiece, and twelve other portraits representing Peg in various characters or at different epochs of life. The beauty and interest of these can scarcely be overpraised. There are besides pictures of the Woffington Almshouses, the little church at Teddington, and the tablet to Woffington therein, together with a facsimile of her autograph. The book is, indeed, a worthy tribute. Not the least of its recommendations is a full index.

TROPICAL AFRICA.*

PROFESSOR DRUMMOND has been on a visit to the Lake Nyassa district of Central Africa, and, as a proper and natural consequence, he has written a book. It will, however, be as well to remove any apprehensions that may arise in the jaded minds of readers of history of travel by saying at once that it is a charmingly written book. Nor do its merits end there, for it is also short and instructive. Professor Drummond has not inflicted the entire contents of his note-books upon a long-suffering public; he has been content, with valuable and suggestive results, to compress the sum of his observations into a few well-weighed and well-written pages. But sporting readers are warned off; there are neither shooting nor other great adventures to be discovered here. Our author does not seem to have sought them; he sauntered along the banks of the Zambesi, observed the ways of ants and men, and, when opportunity occurred, caught beetles. Africa has still much to teach the student of our human history. This is what Professor Drummond forcibly tells us in a passage which we will quote, both on account of its truth and as a specimen of his style:—

> It is a wonderful thing to start from the civilization of Europe, pass up these mighty rivers, and work your way into that unknown land—work your way alone and on foot, mile after mile, month after month, among strange birds and beasts and plants and insects, meeting tribes which have no name speaking tongues which no man can interpret, till you have reached its secret heart and stood where white man has never trod before. It is a wonderful thing to look at this weird world of human beings—half animal, half children, wholly savage, and wholly heathen—and to [illegible] come back again to civilization before the impressions have had time to fade and while the myriad problems of so strange a spectacle are still seething in the mind. It is an education to see this sight—an education in the meaning and history of man. To have been here is to have lived before Moses. It is to have watched the dawn of evolution. It is to have the great moral and social problems of life, of anthropology, of ethnology, and even of theology, brought home to the imagination in the most new and startling light.

How true this is and how well put! Professor Drummond, after spending some time in the Lake Shirwa and Shiré districts, passed on towards Lake Nyassa. On the banks of the Shiré he found the Illala, a little steamer that plies between the Upper Shiré and Lake Nyassa, taking supplies to the missionaries on the western shore. In due course he reached the Livingstonia mission-station and walked up to the manse. Everything was clean and well ordered, there were the books, there lay the crockery, but nobody was to be found. He passed on to the school-house, looked at the benches and the blackboard, but still found nobody. A similar experience awaited him in the blacksmith's shop and in the other houses. At last he arrived at the graveyard, and there beneath some oblong heaps of earth he found the missionaries. They were all dead of fever, the awful malarial fever that is a stronger enemy to the white man and civilization than all the savages and wild beasts in Africa. Professor Drummond has a good deal to say about the slave-traffic, which is now flourishing with renewed vigour in the Great Lakes Region. He points out what has been too much overlooked, the intimate connexion that exists between slave-hunting and the ivory trade. Slaves are necessary to buy the tusks with, then more slaves to carry them to the coast. When the elephant is exterminated in Africa a great blow will have been dealt to the traffic in human beings. As it is, the Arab trader's method of slave-catching is at once simple and effective. He settles in some quiet district, and for a long while behaves exceedingly well, doing an honest business in ivory. When he has enough to load a caravan, he picks a quarrel and organizes a slaughter of the people among whom he has lived. This is successfully carried out, enough only being spared to carry the tusks. Then he marches to the coast with the merchandise, and on arrival sells both the tusks and those who bear them, or rather so many of the latter as survive the horrors of the journey. Professor Drummond's remedy for this awful state of things is the old and only effective one—extension of British influence, the English being the only power that really discourages the trade in human beings. Perhaps the pleasantest part of this interesting book is that which deals with the habits of the white ant and other African insects. From the observations there set out we learn how, in the economy of Nature, the white ant does for Africa what Darwin showed the earth-worm does for Europe. No ground is too hard for it to plough, and it is owing to its humble efforts that the surface of the whole interior is continually renewed. Even more remarkable are the facts given about mimetic insects, which for their protection from enemies are fashioned by the working of the great principles of self-preservation and survival of the fittest into the most extraordinary imitations of inanimate objects. Thus Professor Drummond found creatures exactly resembling a leaf, a bit of moss, a dry stick, a crumpled stalk of hay, and even a bird dropping. We must, however, venture to differ with him when he attributes the fallen leaf colouring of the puff-adder to the fact that it is "essentially a forest animal." The puff-adder is by no means an exclusive habitué of woodlands. Upon the bare South African veldt, and among sun-scorched rocks, the traveller may find more of these deadly reptiles than he will ever wish to see again. It would, however, be interesting to learn whether the markings of the forest puff-adder vary from those of the veldt puff-adder.

Professor Drummond closes his book with a political warning which is sadly needed. When on his return he reached Quilimane he was requested by the Portuguese authorities to pay a "tax for residing in the interior." On inquiry he found that Portugal claims the whole of Africa stretching inland from the coast province of Mozambique, including the vast territories of the Upper Shiré, the Shiré Highlands, Lake Shirwa, and Lake Nyassa. As a matter of fact the Portuguese flag is not to be found in these regions, and at this time only one Portuguese had set foot in the country, and he did so under English auspices. Professor Drummond refused to pay; but as other travellers may not be so determined, it is well to record the attempt to secure recognition of a purely imaginary sovereignty. In reflecting upon the question it is also well to remember that Portugal is no enemy to the slave-trade, that whatever has been done for the civilization and improvement of the Nyassa district has been done by English missionaries, and that their path of progress is marked out by a chain of English graves.

* Tropical Africa. By Henry Drummond, F.R.S.E., F.G.S. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 1888.

FINANCE AND POLITICS.*

IN an autobiographical dedication and preface, if we may use the phrase, these volumes explain their origin and character. Mantua me genuit, &c. Sir John Lubbock suggested them, Mr. Sydney Buxton composed them, and Mrs. Sydney Buxton supplied indispensable help and encouragement. The work, on the whole, justifies the suggestion, the labour, and the encouragement. It has in some slight degree the defect inseparable from books written for the sake, and in the act, of acquiring the information which is to be communicated to the reader. Facts are raked in perhaps somewhat too copiously, interspersed indeed with intelligent comment. But the book is not animated throughout by principles; the grouping and arrangement of details are not subordinated to ideas from the first clearly conceived. Discit docendo is, with certain limitations, a good maxim; but, as a rule, the learning should precede the teaching by an appreciable distance of time and thought. Mr. Buxton writes a little too much as if he were the sole member of a self-improvement society. Mr. Buxton's original design was to continue Sir Stafford Northcote's work, Twenty Years of Financial Policy, by adding the survey of another term of twenty years—from 1862 to 1882. But he soon saw the expediency of enlarging the scope of his work and extending the period which it reviews. The twenty years grew into a century; and Mr. Buxton found it inconvenient to separate finance from politics. The revenue of the State, said Burke, is the State. Lord Beaconsfield expressed another side of the same truth when he said that expenditure depended upon policy. The accidental circumstances which, until recently, have given the rank of Prime Minister to the First Lord of the Treasury, and the association, up till 1841, of the Chancellorship of the Exchequer with the latter office when it was held by a commoner, have in England led to a closer recognition than can be found elsewhere of the essential interdependence of policy and finance. The Minister who dictated the end found the means. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not also the head of the Government his functions are more limited. He has simply to solve a problem set him by others. Being required to raise a certain sum, he has to determine how it shall be raised. Hence the phenomenon, which has been sometimes exhibited, notably by Mr. Gladstone in Lord Palmerston's Government, of a Chancellor of the Exchequer raising sums which he considers to be excessive, for the carrying out of a policy which he but partially approves.

* Finance and Politics [illegible] By Sydney Buxton, M.P. 2 vols. London: [illegible]

Mr. Buxton, as we have seen, has extended the limits of the period which he originally intended to review a long way backward and a little way forward. Instead of beginning with 1862, he begins with 1783. Instead of stopping with 1882, he has gone on to 1885. He would have done better to have begun still earlier. The period of politics and finance in which we live has its origin, not with Mr. Pitt, but with Walpole. He was a great Prime Minister mainly because he was a great Chancellor of the Exchequer. The abolition of duties on imports and exports, the reduction of the National Debt by the operation of a Sinking Fund, the device of borrowing economically by means of Exchequer Bills, the introduction of the warehousing system, and the project at least of an Excise—these things contain in germ the financial policy which subsequent Chancellors of the Exchequer, from Henry Pelham to Mr. Goschen, have more or less boldly and completely developed. Mr. Pelham, to whose sober, if timid, good sense, history, occupied with the glaring follies of his brother, has done scanty justice, anticipated Mr. Goschen, and some of Mr. Goschen's predecessors, in the simplification of the different branches of the National Debt, and the reduction of the interest to a lower and uniform rate. The financial measures of the younger Pitt during the peace period of his administration were really based upon the doctrines and practice of Walpole and Pelham. Mr. Buxton's work would have been logically and historically more complete if he had included the sixty years which intervene between the formation of Walpole's Administration and that of the younger Pitt. The statement of Tucker—not Abraham, who pursued the Light of Nature, but Josiah, Dean of Gloucester, who anticipated the doctrines of Adam Smith—that Walpole was the best commercial Minister this country ever had was by no means extravagant. With the exception of Montague, Walpole was the first and only commercial Minister England in Tucker's time had had. Tucker's praise is probably true still. Taking into account circumstances, opportunities, and the economic ideas of his time, Walpole may perhaps still be counted the best commercial Minister England ever had. Pelham, the younger Pitt, Huskisson, Peel, and Mr. Gladstone have done little more than develop and apply the principles on which Walpole acted. They raised the flower, but they got the seed from him.

It is not merely by the omission of Walpole and Pelham that Mr. Buxton's survey of finance and policy is deficient. The elder Pitt was not a Minister of peace or of commerce; but the expansion of England which he effected, in the foundation practically of our Indian and the enlargement of our Colonial Empire, the supremacy which he secured for English influence in Asia and America, had vital effects upon the commerce of the country, and strikingly indicate that interdependence of policy and finance which is Mr. Buxton's theme. This period is also marked by the mechanical inventions of Watt, Hargreaves, Arkwright, Crompton, and others, the development of which has revolutionized the industrial character of England. Not less instruction might be drawn from the petty meddling of Grenville, to whom, as Burke said, regulation was commerce, and the mistakes of Lord North, as to the connexion of finance and policy.

It may seem scarcely fair to speak of what Mr. Buxton's work does not contain rather than of what it presents to the reader. But the omissions are vital, and deprive the book of the organic character which it ought to have. Practically, in spite of the title-page, it begins with Sir Robert Peel's second Administration. The sixty years between Pitt and Peel are dismissed in about forty pages. The twenty years which followed are the twenty years of which Sir Stafford Northcote has kept the financial record. Mr. Buxton gets upon the ground which is proper to himself after the middle of the first volume, which is devoted to what with substantial accuracy may be called the later Gladstone period of our financial history. It would be unjust to say that Mr. Gladstone is to Peel what Pelham was to Walpole and what Huskisson was to Pitt. His capacities infinitely excel those of Pelham, and his opportunities were greater than those of Huskisson. But it is true that, while Peel was in practical statesmanship the re-originator of a sound commercial policy, Mr. Gladstone's merit lies in having with thoroughness and variety of resources developed and applied it. The two principles by which he has been guided are "to lighten the springs of industry," as his phrase is, by relieving it from a vexatious complexity of taxes, and to simplify the sources and cheapen the collection of revenue by drawing it from a few articles of general consumption. Mr. Gladstone's great financial work was done under the Ministry of Lord Palmerston, when, much complaining of extravagance, he had to meet a comparatively moderate expenditure. It is strange, and illustrates the connexion of finance and politics, that as Prime Minister he has imposed upon a Chancellor of the Exchequer of his own the necessity of providing for an expenditure of 91,000,000*l.*—a sum greater than has ever been reached before or since. Mr. Gladstone is often wise in the parsimony which is itself a revenue; he has often been guilty of the unwisdom which, shrinking from the outlay required by an immediate emergency, ensures its recurrence, doubled or trebled, at an interval of a few years. Sober opinion will probably pronounce that his most useful work for England was done when Chancellor of the Exchequer under Ministers of truer statesmanship than his own; that his finance aided their policy; while in later years his policy marred his own finance. The materials for a judgment on the fiscal controversies of our recent history are carefully and skilfully brought together by Mr. Buxton in these volumes, the possession of which will save the political student and disputant from much weariness of research in Parliamentary papers and debates.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

A CARPING critic might object to the Duke of Broglie's Marie-Thérèse Impératrice (1) that, though it is in two stout volumes and does not deal with much more than two years, there is, especially in the first volume, not much about Maria Theresa in it—certainly less than about Frederick, and a great deal less than about Belleisle, Louis XV., the Duchess of Châteauroux and D'Argenson. This, however, is only a matter of nomenclature. In this, as in his former volumes, M. de Broglie's real aim has been to set in what is certainly a new and, what he thinks to be a true light, the French policy, in relation to Germany, of those wars and alliances in the middle of the last century which gave, indeed, to France the almost solitary glory of Fontenoy, but which ended by stripping her of her colonial empire, disorganizing and disgracing her army, landing her in bankruptcy, and exhibiting something like a complete breakdown of her executive and administrative system. This aim the Duke has followed with immense industry, with considerable acuteness, and with an historical faculty which is only a little the worse for employing a style which is sometimes rather dry and more than sometimes rather diffuse. We own, as we have owned before, that to his general idea we can by no means subscribe. That general idea is that during these wars France, so far from deliberately and discreditably planning the dismemberment of Germany, was following, it is true in a blundering fashion and with frequent incapacity, a noble and chivalrous policy. Hence, whether he is talking of Frederick, of Rex Noster Maria Theresia, or of anybody else, he has always one eye on his own country. There are some inconveniences in this; but they are, we think, compensated by the advantages of composing the historical picture from one definite point of view. For our friend the general reader the most interesting passage in the present volumes will probably be the account of Fontenoy, which is very good. Full justice is done to one of the most miraculous feats (though it ended in defeat, not victory) that an army ever performed, the famous onslaught of the English column; and perhaps rather more than justice is done to Cumberland's generalship. But we are sorry to see the disparaging tone of the note in which the Duke remarks of Carlyle, while acknowledging his value in this particular instance, that "Cet écrivain ne se fait aucun scrupule, pour rendre son récit plus dramatique, d'emprunter le détail des faits à son imagination." We are afraid that the Duke has not forgiven "Broglie the War-god," and other Carlylisms more picturesque than flattering to his own ancestors, and that this has made him guilty not merely of injustice (into which we all fall now and then) but of something like stupidity, which is certainly not usual with him. Carlyle, we grant, has more imagination than some other historians, of whom perhaps we need not go very far for an example. But to say or to insinuate that he invents his details is altogether a blunder. No historian ever lived who took such patient care to ascertain details to the uttermost jot and tittle. What Carlyle does and others do not is to weave these carefully ascertained details into a connected whole by supplying links the origin of which every intelligent reader can perceive, and which no such reader is likely to confuse with the actual documentary facts. However, it is probably impossible for a Frenchman to understand Carlyle. Let us only add that the finale of the Duke's remarks on Fontenoy as the sunset of the

(1) Marie-Thérèse Impératrice. Par le Duc de Broglie. Tomes I., II. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

Ancien Régime is an excellent piece of writing, combining the sober sense of his usual style with a touch of feeling which he seldom shows.

M. Louis Ulbach has rather a wondrous tale to tell in his preface to the unfortunate Gérard's newly-discovered Prince des sots (2). Readers of the Histoire du Romantisme can hardly have forgotten Gautier's picturesque and regretful indication to "Romantic" book-hunters of the MS. of a Mystery Play of Gérard de Nerval's under this title—a MS. of which he gives a careful description. Now M. Ulbach publishes a Prince des sots, which he says he bought in 1866—that is to say, eleven years after the luckless author's murder or suicide. But this Prince des sots is not a drama, but a prose romance; it is not, as Théo assures us the other was, all clean-copied by Gérard's own hand and illustrated by him, Gautier, but a copy by an ignorant amanuensis, heavily corrected by the author; and the whole thing is said to have been in such a mess that its condition deterred its purchaser from investigating or publishing it during the last twenty years. All this is a little incomprehensible; but of course when a serious person like M. Ulbach, who knew Gérard and his writing well, assures us that the MS. is "perfectly authentic," we have nothing more to say in that direction. We must, however, say in another direction that some disappointments await those who open the book as it is. Whether in any case Gérard could have written a sustained mediæval romance may be doubted. He certainly had the knowledge; but more suitable employment can be imagined for the fantastic, mysterious, intermittent genius which flashes and fades alternately in the pictures of the Voyage en Orient, and the sketches of the Filles du feu. But certain it is that, whatever be the history of this Prince des sots, it is by no means a precious possession. In fact, we should say that it is not above the capacity of any tolerably ready literary apprentice who knew his Hugo and his Dumas, and we have looked in vain for any touch of Gérard's hand.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

MINGLED with some rather unnecessary information of the guide-book kind, there is much that is entertaining concerning the natives of our West African coast settlements in Mr. G. A. Lethbridge Banbury's Sierra Leone; or, the White Man's Grave (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.) The pleasing little ways of Kroomen, Mendis, and Timanehs, the odd customs, fetish lore, alligator, "palaver," noted by Mr. Banbury, certainly do not blend successfully with the oft-told story of colonial enterprise, administration, and so forth. It is but fair to acknowledge that Mr. Banbury is decidedly amusing, though he does not altogether forget to be tedious. He tells some capital stories, and tells them well, and is not superior to the humour of a yarn that tells against himself. Like the immortal Tartarin in the suburbs of Algiers did Mr. Banbury and a companion go forth one night after wild game—leopards to wit—for which they had set cunningly a tethered kid for lure. After an insufferable time they heard an encouraging bleating, saw the dark shadow of the bloodthirsty foe bound across the narrow space, and blazed away in an ecstasy. The cruel morning showed them nothing but the dead kid and a dead goat, over whose bodies the sportsmen proceeded to bind themselves to silence anent the horrid deed. Mr. Banbury got more fun out of alligators. He explains why a dead alligator is as unlikely a sight as a dead donkey; how an alligator becomes "demonized" and works the wicked will of a witch; and why you cannot surpass the abuse implied by the epithet "nonsense foolish fellow," when slanging a nigger. "Massa, dat bery bad word," said the author's boatman; "you can call me anything you like—idiot, jackass, n'a fool—damn fool—nigger; but, massa, nebber say me 'nonsense foolish fellow.'" This same boatman tells a good story of a bewitched alligator. There were a man and a woman who, after living together "country fashion," determined to have a wedding in Freetown, having put by enough money in the old kettle to celebrate the occasion. Unhappily the man was induced to change his mind by another woman he had met in Freetown. He has a warm time in his native village where the "country wedding" is recognized as binding, but is not to be frightened. There is nothing for it but witchcraft. The witch arrives, and makes a ring round the ill-used woman and the old kettle, just as is shown in Mr. Waterhouse's picture, and instructs the woman to blow a piece of lighted charcoal, saying between each puff, "N'a ju-ju—n'a ju-ju—come cuss dis man." The kettle is found to be empty of money, and the woman is avenged. The gay deceiver is haled into the river by a demoniac alligator while on his way to Freetown, and everybody agrees he was rightly served for running counter to country fashions.

Mme. de Gasparin has probably as large a reading public in this country as in France, and her last volume—Sunny Fields and Shady Woods (Sampson Low & Co.)—is not likely to diminish her popularity. Some of these sketches of peasant life in the Jura country are extremely pretty and charming, though the characteristic idyllism of others is impaired by the somewhat forced introduction of evangelical sentiment and a didactic aim needlessly pointed.

Mrs. Marshall's Bristol Diamonds (Seeley & Co.) is a story of the last century, the Hot Wells of Clifton in part the scene of it, Edmund Burke and Mrs. Hannah More some of the high historic personages introduced in it. The local colour is more striking than the historic, perhaps, for it is a dubious gain to a very pretty and interesting love story to thrust Burke, with odd violence, upon the sentimental reader. By the way, we know from anecdotes collected concerning William Combe that Mrs. Hannah More was not unwilling to shine among the fashionable folk at St. Vincent's Rocks before she took up practical education.

The Planning of Ornament (Batsford) is a useful and lucid addition to Mr. Lewis F. Day's series of text-books of ornamental design. The nature, development, and artistic application of border or frame ornament are admirably dealt with in the opening chapters. Like its companions, the book is profusely illustrated, after designs by the author, and text and plates are in every instance mutually illustrative.

A useful compilation, both as a reference book for students and a guide for tourists, is the Handbook of the Italian Schools in the Dresden Gallery, by C. J. Ff. (Allen & Co.) Dr. Richter contributes a short preface; the pictures are described with sufficient fulness under an alphabetical arrangement of the artists represented; the various schools are fairly well classified; and there is a good index both to subjects and numbers. The few illustrations do not make us regret there are no more of them.

Mr. Charles M. Kurtz's National Academy Notes (Cassell & Co.) is quite up to the standard of the last seven years, and affords a good general survey of the New York Exhibition. Not a few of the illustrations are remarkably good—superior, indeed, to similar catalogues of London galleries.

The decorative ornament in relief on plaster known as pargework or pargeting is the subject of a brief but interesting paper by the Rev. E. S. Corrie, printed in the current Transactions of the Essex Archæological Society (Colchester: Wiles). Those who know the originals depicted in the photo-lithographs of Mr. Corrie's paper will agree with the writer's praise of this lost art.

Perhaps the most interesting item in the tenth Journal of the Derbyshire Archæological and Natural History Society (Bemrose) is the "Rhymed Chronicle of John Harestaffe," printed by permission of Lord Vernon, and edited by the Rev. Dr. J. Charles Cox. The MS. is inscribed "John Harestaffe's Poetry while he lived at Sudbury, 1635, of the Vernon family and concerns." It is certainly curious reading and interesting, though verbose rather than poetical. The local antiquarian and historian is favourably represented by the work of Mr. Arthur Mee—Llanelly Parish Church—which deals with the history, records, registers of Llanelly, and is issued from the South Wales Press Office.

We have received the Report of the Minister of Education (Ontario) for the year 1887 (Toronto: Warwick); the Annual Report for 1887 of the Royal Humane Society; the Proceedings of the Bi-metallic Conference at Manchester, 1888 (Effingham Wilson), and the Civil Service Calendar for 1888 (Allen & Co.)

Among new editions we have the second of the Politics of Aristotle, translated by J. C. Welldon, M.A., Head-master of Harrow (Macmillan & Co.); the thirteenth of the Right Hon. G. J. Goschen's Theory of Foreign Exchanges (Effingham Wilson); the third of the Rev. Dr. Hatch's Bampton Lectures, The Organization of the Early English Churches (Rivingtons); the third of Messrs. A. H. Dyke Acland and Cyril Ransome's Handbook of the Political History of England (Rivingtons); the late Rev. W. G. Humphry's Commentary on the Revised Version of the New Testament (S. P. C. K.); the third of Mr. Eustace Smith's Summary of Ecclesiastical Law (Stevens & Haynes); the seventeenth of The Tourists' Church Guide, 1888-9 (English Church Union); and the second of Mr. Henry J. Swallow's The Catherines of History (Elliot Stock).

We have also received Mr. E. C. K. Gonner's Political Economy, an elementary text-book of "the dismal science," by no means dismal, but clear and readable (Sutton & Co.); Elementary Physiography, by John Thornton (Longmans & Co.); Elements of Logarithms, by W. Gellatly (Hodgson); Redress by Arbitration, by H. Foulks Lloyd (Effingham Wilson); Land and Work, by Warneford Moffat (Sampson Low & Co.); The Three Principles of Book-keeping, by J. G. Chaplin (Sampson Low & Co.); Natural Laws and Gospel Teaching, by Herbert W. Morris, D.D. (Religious Tract Society); Through Lent, edited by the Rev. W. Kerr-Smith (Wells Gardner & Co.); Plain Readings in the Minor Prophets, by Robert Fisher (Heywood); Foreign Missions of the Protestant Churches, by J. Murray Mitchell, LL.D. (Nisbet); The Religion of the Cross, by the Rev. H. B. Chapman (Swan Sonnenschein); Four of Our Lives on Earth, by the Rev. C. H. Grundy (Wells Gardner & Co.); The Belfry Bell: Thoughts for Every Hour, by Emily C. Orr (S.P.C.K.); The Golden Sceptre, a book of texts (Marcus Ward & Co.); One Body: the Story of the Church of England (Wells Gardner & Co.); Solomon Maimon: an Autobiography, translated from the German by J. Clark Murray, LL.D. (Alexander Gardner); Infant Feeding and Infant Foods, by Dr. James McNaught (Heywood); Monkey Island, "freely translated" from the French of Léon Gozlan—Les Emotions de Polydore Marasquin—by Charles S. Cheltnam (Warne & Co.); Shod with Wool: a Mystery, by Ernest Netherby, and dreadful of its kind (Arrowsmith), and Miss Varian of New York (New York: Dillingham).

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

For CONTENTS see page 676.

(2) Le Prince des sots. Par Gérard de Nerval. Avec une préface de Louis Ulbach. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

NOTICE.—On and after the 2nd of July next all ADVERTISEMENTS intended for insertion in the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed direct to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT, SATURDAY REVIEW OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

The SATURDAY REVIEW is duly registered for transmission abroad.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW may be obtained in Paris every Saturday of Mr. J. G. FOTHERINGHAM, 8 Rue Neuve des Capucines, and of Messrs. GALIGNANI, 224 Rue de Rivoli.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW Bill of Contents will be forwarded every Friday Evening by post, prepaid, to any Newsagent in Town or Country on application to the Publisher.

Nearly all the back Numbers of the SATURDAY REVIEW may be obtained through any Bookseller, or of the Publisher, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

The publication of the SATURDAY REVIEW takes place on Saturday Mornings, in time for the early trains, and copies may be obtained in the Country, through any Newsagent, on the day of publication.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,701, JUNE 2, 1888:

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY.
Established 1836
LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.
INCOME and FUNDS (1885).

Fire Premiums	£562,000
Life Premiums	198,000
Interest	138,000
Accumulated Funds	£3,207,000

NATIONAL PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

FOR MUTUAL LIFE
ESTD. ASSURANCE. 1835.

DIVISION of PROFITS.
£612,900 CASH PROFIT has just been apportioned amongst the Members, being more than 38 per cent. of the amount paid in Premiums during the past five years.

48 Gracechurch Street, London.

LONDON ASSURANCE CORPORATION.
Established by Royal Charter, A.D. 1720.
7 ROYAL EXCHANGE, AND 43A PALL MALL, S.W.

Marine, Fire, and Life Assurances have been granted by the Corporation for more than a century and a half.
Funds in hand exceed £3,400,000.

STANDARD LIFE OFFICE.

HALF A MILLION paid in Death Claims every year.
Funds—SIX AND A HALF MILLIONS, increasing yearly.

83 KING WILLIAM STREET, E.C.
3 PALL MALL EAST, W.

PHŒNIX FIRE OFFICE.
LOMBARD STREET and CHARING CROSS, LONDON.—Established 1782.
Insurances against Loss by Fire and Lightning effected in all parts of the World.
Loss claims arranged with promptitude and liberality.
WILLIAM C. MACDONALD, FRANCIS B. MACDONALD } Joint Secretaries.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.
Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PALL MALL, S.W.
Subscribed Capital, £1,200,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000.
E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.
THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables, the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons, and the purchase and sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

CARDINAL AND HARFORD,

The oldest established Importers of

ORIENTAL CARPETS.

THE LEVANT WAREHOUSE,
108 & 109 HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.
Catalogues post free.

FINDLATER'S WHISKIES.

BEST OLD IRISH and BEST ISLAY MALT
41s. per dozen bottles.
Are the production of the Old-fashioned Pot Stills, matured and mellowed by age only.
Note the bronze green label, with Trade Mark, a "Stag's Head."
83 WELLINGTON STREET, Covent Garden, and 219 BROMPTON ROAD, S.W.

SOAP SOAP

PEARS'

SOAP SOAP

Mr. C. B. HARNESS, Consulting Medical Electrician and Inventor of the world-famed Electropathic Belt, may be consulted daily free of charge, personally or by letter, at the ELECTROPATHIC ESTABLISHMENT of the Medical Battery Company, Limited, 52 OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W. (corner of Rathbone Place). All in search of health should call to-day, if possible, or write at once. Thousands of testimonials. Note only address, as above.

A LUXURY HITHERTO UNKNOWN IN ENGLAND.

BARBER & COMPANY'S FRENCH COFFEE.
(See that you have none other.) As used in Paris in its highest perfection, 10d. per lb. This is the choicest and most carefully selected Coffee "roasted on the French principle," and mixed with the finest Bruges Chicory. 2 lbs. sample in tins sent free for 2s. 4d. by parcels post to any post town in the United Kingdom and Channel Islands; 5 lbs. in tins for 5s. 6d.; 8 lbs. in tins for 8s. 10d.

BARBER & COMPANY, 274 REGENT CIRCUS, OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.

61 Bishopsgate Street, E.C.	Brighton—147 North Street.	Manchester—93 Market St.
102 Westbourne Grove, W.	Birmingham—Quadrt. New St.	Bristol—38 Corn Street.
King's Cross, N.	Liverpool—1 Church Street and Minster Buildings and London Road.	Preston—Fishergate.
42 Great Titchfield Street, W.		Hastings—Robertson St. & Havelock Road.
The Borough, London Bridge.

STRUVE'S
BRIGHTON SELTZER WATER.
PREPARED FROM THE WORLD-RENOWNED SPRING OF THE
ROYAL GERMAN SPA, BRIGHTON,
And supplied uninterruptedly to Royalty by Royal Warrant of His late Majesty King William IV. and H.M. the Queen-Empress Victoria.
OF ALL CHEMISTS AND WINE MERCHANTS THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY.
Carriage Paid on Six Dozen and upwards.
ROYAL GERMAN SPA, BRIGHTON.

FRY'S

J. WYBRANTS OLPHERTS, M.D., says: "I find it the most agreeable beverage of the kind I have ever tasted, delicious both in flavour and odour."

PURE CONCENTRATED COCOA.

E. BUCKNILL, M.D., says: "Your Pure Concentrated Cocoa is so extremely nice that I have ordered it for family use."

BOOKS, &c.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly, London. All the New and Standard Books, Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c. Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York, and 27 KING WILLIAM STREET, STRAND, LONDON, desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICATIONS, and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS. CATALOGUES sent on application.

Now ready.

LONDON LIBRARY CATALOGUE. The Fifth Edition, including an Alphabetical List of Books under the names of the Authors, an Index of Subjects, the contents of voluminous sets of books and other matter. 2 vols. royal 8vo. 1888, price 21s.; to Members of the Library, 16s.
ROBERT HARRISON, Secretary and Librarian.

Price 1s. post free.

COLD CATCHING, COLD PREVENTING, COLD CURING.
By JOHN H. CLARKE, M.D.
London: JAMES EPPS & Co., 48 Threadneedle Street, and 170 Piccadilly.

DEDICATED BY SPECIAL PERMISSION TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

Crown 8vo. cloth, 5s.

"NOR'ARD OF THE DOGGER"

Or, Deep-Sea Trials and Gospel Triumphs.

Being the Story of the Initiation, Struggles, and Successes of the Mission to Deep-Sea Fishermen.

By E. J. MATHER, Founder and Director.

With Preface by THOMAS GRAY, Esq., C.B., Marine Department, Board of Trade.

And numerous Illustrations by J. R. WELLS and C. J. STANILAND, R.I.

"A very full account of the origin and work of the Mission to Deep-Sea Fishermen, written by its Founder and Director, Mr. E. J. Mather. No time more fitting than the present could have been found for publishing this very interesting volume. No reader will lay down the book after finishing it without feeling that he has learnt much of the life that our fishermen lead when out with the trawling fleets. ....We can strongly recommend this book, and hope that more people than do so at present may be induced to support the Mission after learning its history."
Saturday Review.

"A more thrilling narrative we have seldom met with..........Talk of 'the romance of Missions'! This book is the record of one continuous miracle.......... The telling pictures by Messrs. Wells and Staniland are worthy of the narratives they illustrate, and the whole forms in our judgment the book of the season."
Christian.

London: J. NISBET & CO., Berners Street, W.

May be had of all Booksellers, or from the Offices of the Mission to Deep-Sea Fishermen,

BRIDGE HOUSE, BLACKFRIARS BRIDGE, E.C.

HURST & BLACKETT'S NEW NOVELS.

THE LASSES of LEVERHOUSE. By JESSIE FOTHERGILL, Author of "Kith and Kin," "The First Violin," &c. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

ALL ELSE of NO AVAIL. By BEN HAYWARD. 3 vols.

THE WEB of FATE: a Dramatic Story. By W. J. WILDING. 2 vols.

IN WHITE and GOLD: a Story. By Mrs. F. H. WILLIAMSON. 3 vols.

JOY COMETH in the MORNING: a Country Tale. By ALGERNON GISSING. 2 vols.

BERNARD and MARCIA: a Story of Middle Age. By ELIZABETH GLAISTER. 3 vols.

LONDON: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

NEW NOVEL AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

A CLOUD on ST. ANGELO. By CYRIL BENNETT, Author of "The Massage Case." 2 vols. crown 8vo. cloth.

"The conclusion is pathetic, and well brought about. Both in tone and manner, 'A Cloud on St. Angelo' has much that merits commendation."—Morning Post.

NATURAL CAUSATION. An Essay in Four Parts. By C. E. PLUMPTRE, Author of "General Sketch of the History of Pantheism" &c. Demy 8vo. cloth, 7s. 6d.

"There is in it a great deal that is deserving of careful consideration, and a great deal that is calculated to stimulate thought."—Scotsman.

JEWISH PORTRAITS. By Lady MAGNUS, Author of "Outlines of Jewish History" &c. Small crown 8vo. with Frontispiece by Harry Furniss. Cloth, 5s.

"The volume is full of suggestive material for all who are interested in Judaism, either in its historical or religious aspect."—Scotsman.

THE NEW VOLUME OF "THE STORY OF THE NATIONS."

ASSYRIA: from the Rise of the Empire to the Fall of Nineveh. By ZENAÏDE A. RAGOZIN, Author of "Chaldea" &c. Large crown 8vo. with Maps and Illustrations, cloth, 5s.

"Assyrian life has become a reality in her hands. Assyriologists, as well as the general public, will find her book a charming one to read."—Extract from Letter from Prof. SAYCE.

The Century for JUNE contains an account of a visit GEORGE KENNAN paid to a CONVICT BARGE in TIUMEN, SIBERIA; and Pictures of the EXILES in the Cages, in Prison, and on the March. See also Mr. DE VINNE'S paper, "A PRINTER'S PARADISE," on a famous Printing-Office of three hundred years ago. Price 1s. 4d.

LONDON: T. FISHER UNWIN, 26 PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

THE NEW NOVEL.

MISS BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

At all Libraries, 3 vols.

THE FATAL THREE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"Lady Audley's Secret," "Mohawks," &c.

LONDON: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & CO.

Just published (New Series), 8vo. 18s.

THE ANNUAL REGISTER:

A Review of Public Events at Home and Abroad for the Year 1887.

LONDON: RIVINGTONS, WATERLOO PLACE, AND THE OTHER PROPRIETORS.

THE HENRY IRVING SHAKESPEARE.

Now ready, Vols. I., II., and III. To be Completed in Eight Quarterly Volumes, small 4to. cloth, gilt top, each 10s. 6d.

THE HENRY IRVING SHAKESPEARE.

EDITED BY

HENRY IRVING and FRANK A. MARSHALL.

With Notes and Introductions to each Play by F. A. MARSHALL and other Shakespearian Scholars,

AND NEARLY 600 ILLUSTRATIONS BY GORDON BROWNE.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME I.

Love's Labour's Lost—The Comedy of Errors—Romeo and Juliet—The Two Gentlemen of Verona—King Henry VI. Part I.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME II.

King Henry VI. Part II.—King Henry VI. Part III.—King Henry VI. Condensed by Ch. Kemble—The Taming of the Shrew—A Midsummer Night's Dream—King Richard II.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME III.

King Richard III.—King John—Merchant of Venice—King Henry IV. Part I.—King Henry IV. Part II.

"Edited in a really good workmanlike manner, and beautifully printed. Mr. Gordon Browne's illustrations are amongst the most perfect things of the kind that we have ever seen."—St. James's Gazette.

"This handsomely printed edition aims at being popular and practical, and will win public recognition by its unique and serviceable qualities."—Spectator.

 A Detailed Prospectus, with Specimen Page, sent post free on application.

LONDON: BLACKIE & SON, 49 AND 50 OLD BAILEY.

CHEAP EDITION of HAWLEY SMART'S NEW NOVEL.

Now ready, picture boards, 2s.; cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

A FALSE START.

By HAWLEY SMART.

Uniform, and by the same Author, each 2s.

FROM POST TO FINISH.	PLAY OR PAY.
TIE AND TRICK.	CECILE.
FALSE CARDS.	SUNSHINE AND SNOW.
COURTSHIP.	BELLES AND RINGERS.
BROKEN BONDS.	AT FAULT.
BOUND TO WIN.	HARD LINES.
THE GREAT TONTINE.	SOCIAL SINNERS.
RACE FOR A WIFE.	SALVAGE.

At all Booksellers' and Railway Bookstalls, and WARD, LOCK, & CO., SALISBURY SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS:

FROM ONE GUINEA PER ANNUM.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS:

FROM TWO GUINEAS PER ANNUM.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY:

For Books exchangeable by the Library Messengers,

FROM TWO GUINEAS PER ANNUM.

ALL THE BEST AND MOST POPULAR BOOKS OF THE SEASON ARE IN CIRCULATION AT MUDIE'S LIBRARY.

MUDIE'S CLEARANCE LIST contains many thousand Volumes of Standard and other Works withdrawn from circulation, and now offered for Sale at Greatly Reduced Prices.

Prospectuses and Clearance Lists sent postage free on application.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LIMITED,

30 TO 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.

BRANCH OFFICES:

281 REGENT STREET, AND 2 KING STREET, CHEAPSIDE.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates per annum, paid in advance:

	£	s.	d.
Any part of the United Kingdom	1	8	2
India and China	1	12	6
Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America	1	10	6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

NEW WORK BY PROFESSOR HENRY DRUMMOND.

This day. With 6 Maps and Illustrations, 6s.

TROPICAL AFRICA.

By HENRY DRUMMOND, F.R.S.E., F.G.S.
Author of "Natural Law in the Spiritual World."

Daily Telegraph.—"Professor Henry Drummond, thinks that heavy books of travel have had their day, and so he gives us in 'Tropical Africa' a single volume, 'dealing with the larger features of the country, lightly sketched, and just enough of narrative to make you feel that you are really there.' Throughout brevity has been aimed at, but the style is so genial, and the facts for the most part so novel, one could well have pardoned Professor Drummond had he been more voluminous."

Scotsman.—"Professor Drummond is a keen observer of natural history; he is not without humour and pathos; and he possesses the power of presenting graphic sketches of scenery or character in simple language. There is nothing heavy or redundant in his book. It is lively and interesting from the first page to the last; and though students of African travel may ask for fuller details, the non-specialist public will probably gain a clearer idea of Central Africa from Professor Drummond than from any other writer. His chapter on the termites, or so-called white ants, is probably the most graphic extant, and his theory that these insects perform for Africa the work done by earth-worms in temperate climes is original and is likely to stand."

Globe.—"This volume is something more than a record of travel and observation. It has a wider scope and aim. It contains, for example, 'a political warning,' as the author calls it, to which it is desired that the attention of the public may be given. The Professor reminds us of the extent to which European nations are making claims upon African territory, and exhorts us to look after our own interests in the matter."

Glasgow Herald.—"It is certainly not a slight advantage, when great questions are stirring, to have the clear and candid opinions which so accomplished and able a traveller has gathered on the spot concerning the future of Africa."

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

NATURAL LAW in the SPIRITUAL WORLD.

Twenty-second Edition. Completing an issue of 77,000 copies. Cheap Edition, 3s. 6d.

LONDON: HODDER & STOUGHTON, 27 PATERNOSTER ROW.

SIR J. W. DAWSON'S NEW WORK.

Crown 8vo, with Illustrations, 9s.

MODERN SCIENCE IN BIBLE LANDS.

By Sir J. WILLIAM DAWSON, F.R.S.

This work is intended as a supplement to the Author's previous volumes, entitled "The Story of the Earth," "The Origin of the World," and "Fossil Men," and more especially to bring out the new information obtained in his recent travels in the East, and his matured conclusions respecting certain debated points not treated of, or only slightly noticed, in the works named above.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

THE ORIGIN of the WORLD according to REVELATION and SCIENCE.

Fifth Edition, 7s. 6d.

LONDON: HODDER & STOUGHTON, 27 PATERNOSTER ROW.

THE ANCIENT AND MODERN LIBRARY OF THEOLOGICAL LITERATURE.

The NEW VOLUME (Vol. XIV.) is

THE FIRST PRAYER BOOK OF KING EDWARD VI.

Cloth, price One Shilling.

THE VOLUMES NOW READY ARE:

1. THE CONFESSIONS OF S. AUGUSTINE.
2. KEBLE'S CHRISTIAN YEAR.
3. À KEMPIS'S IMITATION OF CHRIST.
4. GEORGE HERBERT'S ENGLISH POEMS.
5. WILBERFORCE'S THE FIVE EMPIRES.
6. ANDREWES' SERMONS ON THE INCARNATION.
7. TAYLOR'S HOLY LIVING.
8 & 9. BAXTER'S SAINTS' REST.
10. LAW'S SERIOUS CALL.
11. THE LIVES OF THE POPES to the ACCESSION OF GREGORY VII. By B. PLATINA.
12. GILES FLETCHER'S VICTORY OF CHRIST.
13. THE ORATIONS OF S. ATHANASIUS AGAINST THE ARIANS.
14. THE FIRST PRAYER BOOK OF EDWARD VI.

GRIFFITH, FARRAN, OKEDEN, & WELSH,
ST. PAUL'S CHURCHYARD, LONDON.

NEW NOVEL BY AUTHOR OF "OLD SHIPMATES."

At all Libraries, 1 vol. 6s.; postage, 5d.

DERELICT:

A Tale of Moving Accidents by Flood and Field.

By CLAUD HARDING, R.N.

LONDON: SPENCER BLACKETT (Successor to J. & R. MAXWELL),
35 ST. BRIDE STREET, E.C.

Just published, Third Edition, with Index, 8s.

STRUGGLES FOR LIFE.

By WM. KNIGHTON, Esq., LL.D.
Vice-President of the Royal Society of Literature, Author of "The History of Ceylon," "Forest Life in Ceylon," "The Private Life of an Eastern King," &c.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14 HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON; AND 20 SOUTH FREDERICK STREET, EDINBURGH.

MR. MURRAY'S LIST.

Now ready, with an Index (800 pp.), 2 vols. 8vo. 26s.

FINANCE and POLITICS: an Historical Study, 1783-1885.

By SYDNEY BUXTON, M.P., Author of "A Handbook of Political Questions."

"A well-digested history of the Government of England during the last hundred years. ....Though the book must have been terribly hard to write, it is pleasantly easy to read. Mr. Buxton has the great gift of lucid statement; indispensable in dealing with those complicated questions of policy which have a special attraction for him."—Liverpool Post.

This day, with 2 Portraits, 8vo. 15s.

MEMOIR of GEORGE EDMUND STREET, R.A., ARCHITECT.

By his Son, ARTHUR EDMUND STREET.

"The Memoir of George Edmund Street is a very charming book."—Saturday Review.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE ETON LATIN GRAMMAR. For use in the Higher Forms.

By FRANCIS A. RAWLINS, M.A., and WILLIAM RALPH INGE, M.A., Fellows of King's College, Cambridge, and Assistant Masters at Eton College.

 The Elementary Eton Latin Grammar, 3s. 6d., and the Preparatory Eton Latin Grammar, 2s., are already published.

BOOKS OF THE SEASON.

1. SIR H. LAYARD'S EARLY ADVENTURES. 2 vols. 24s.
2. THE HON. EMILY LAWLESS'S NEW NOVEL, MAJOR LAWRENCE. 3 vols. 31s. 6d.
3. LORD JUSTICE BOWEN'S VIRGIL in ENGLISH VERSE. Price 12s.
4. MR. MACDONALD'S HISTORY of the NILE CAMPAIGN. Price 12s.
5. MR. R. INGE'S SOCIETY in ROME under the CÆSARS. Price 6s.
6. CHARLES DARWIN'S LIFE. 3 vols. 36s.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.'S LIST.

Demy 8vo. with Portrait and Map, 14s.

REYNELL TAYLOR, C.B., C.S.I.: a Biography.

By E. GAMBIER PARRY, Author of "Suakin, 1885."

"A piece of excellent work....He deserved a tribute to his memory. 'He feared God,' says one of his friends, 'but nothing on earth. Not only in battle and in any bodily exposure was he a hero, absolutely fearless, but in every daily occupation of his life.' This is the language of eulogy and affection, but if any one doubts its trueness, let him read Mr. Parry's lucid and unaffected pages and then judge. ......Into the details of his strenuous career we cannot enter; but enough has been said to indicate its exciting nature and the wonderful beauty of Reynell Taylor's character. In the pages of Mr. Parry's book they must be read, and they will warrant all we have written."—Spectator.

Crown 8vo. with Frontispiece, 6s.

A COUNSEL of PERFECTION.

By LUCAS MALET, Author of "Colonel Enderby's Wife," "Little Peter," &c. [Next week.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

SYLVIA ARDEN.

By OSWALD CRAWFURD, Author of "The World we Live In," "Beyond the Seas," &c.

Crown 8vo. 5s.

A ROMANCE of the RECUSANTS.

By the Author of "The Life of a Prig," "Dulce Domum," &c.

2 vols. demy 8vo. with Portrait, 21s.

LIFE of JOHN MITCHEL.

By W. DILLON. With Introduction by JOHN DILLON, M.P.

Large crown 8vo. with Portrait, 7s. 6d.

MADAME DE MAINTENON.

By EMILY BOWLES.

"Excellent account of the rise and progress of this most remarkable personage." Morning Post.

"The book is written in a charming style; and the numerous letters of Madame de Maintenon—fresh and crisp as letters can be—will always be full of interest."—Scotsman.

Crown 8vo. with 8 Illustrations and 2 Maps, 7s. 6d.

A FIGHT with DISTANCES: The States, The Hawaiian Islands, Canada, British Columbia, Cuba, The Bahamas.

By J. J. AUBERTIN, Translator of "The Lusiads" &c.

"He appears to have thoroughly enjoyed himself, and his reader enjoys with him." Saturday Review.

"What he saw he describes with excellent effect, great good-humour, and not infrequently with a keenness of penetration which gives his book a distinct value."—Academy.

Crown 8vo. 5s.

ORIGIN of FLORAL STRUCTURES through INSECT and other AGENCIES.

By the Rev. Professor GEORGE HENSLOW, F.L.S., F.G.S. With 88 Figures in Text. [International Scientific Series.

New and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

POEMS of RURAL LIFE in the DORSET DIALECT.

By WILLIAM BARNES.

Small crown 8vo. 8s. 6d.

THE BANSHEE; and other Poems.

By JOHN TODHUNTER, Author of "Helena in Troas," "Alcestis," "Laurella," &c.

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S LIST.

Now ready, 1s.

THE TEMPLE BAR MAGAZINE

for JUNE contains, besides the continuations of FROM MOOR ISLES, by JESSIE FOTHERGILL, and THE ROGUE, by W. E. NORRIS, ABOUT TWO GREAT NOVELISTS, by HERMAN MERIVALE; HEALTH RESORT VIGNETTES, by CHARLES EDWARDES; CAROLINE, by Lady LINDSAY; SOME RECOLLECTIONS OF BISHOP WILBERFORCE, &c. &c.

Now ready, 2 vols demy 8vo. price 30s.
THE FOURTH EDITION OF

MR. and MRS. BANCROFT ON and OFF the STAGE. Written by THEMSELVES.

The FIFTH EDITION will be ready immediately at all Libraries and Booksellers'.
"It may safely be said that there is not one single uninteresting page in the whole of the two handsome volumes which Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft have spent their leisure in compiling."—The Theatre.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL LIBRARIES.

THE REBEL ROSE.

A New Novel
In 3 vols. crown 8vo.

THE ACADEMICIAN. By HENRY ERROLL,

Author of "An Ugly Duckling" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.
"A clever and charming work." Daily Telegraph.
"An interesting story agreeably told."—Globe.

THE PARTING of the WAYS. By Miss

BETHAM-EDWARDS, Author of "Kitty" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.
"A novel of brilliancy and distinction. There is always cleverness in anything that Miss Betham-Edwards writes, and this story forms no exception." Academy.
"A witty and lively story." Daily Telegraph.

JOAN VELLACOT. By Miss ESMÉ STUART,

Author of "Muriel's Marriage" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.
"As 'Joan Vellacot' is from the pen of Esmé Stuart, it is almost unnecessary to say that it is full of good writing and good workmanship. The literary style is throughout excellent and the admirably grouped characters which really live for us have a sharp distinctness of outline which is achieved with hardly a single touch of caricature or exaggeration."—Spectator.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

TRÜBNER & CO.'S LIST.

NOW READY.
Vol. II. (M–Z), demy 4to. pp. 459, cloth, 21s.

THE LITERATURE of EGYPT and the SOUDAN, from the Earliest Times to the Year 1885, inclusive, with Appendix of Additional Works to May, 1887. A Bibliography, comprising Printed Books, Periodical Writings and Papers of Learned Societies, Maps and Charts, Ancient Papyri, Manuscripts, Drawings, &c. In 2 vols. By H.H. Prince IBRAHIM HILMY. Dedicated to H.H. the Khedive Ismail.

Volume I., uniform in size and price, can still be obtained.

Royal 8vo. cloth, 18s.

NEW SOUTH WALES.—The MINERALS of NEW

SOUTH WALES, &c. By A. LIVERSIDGE, M.A., F.R.S., Professor of Chemistry and Mineralogy in the University of Sydney. With Illustrations, a large Coloured Map, and 3 Diagrams.

Crown 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.

EX VOTO: an Account of the Sacro Monte or New Jerusalem at Varallo-Sesia. With some notice of Tabachetti's remaining Work at the Sanctuary of Crea. By SAMUEL BUTLER, Author of "Alps and Sanctuaries," "Erewhon," &c. &c. With 21 Collotype Plates.

NEW VOLUME OF POEMS BY SIR EDWIN ARNOLD.
Crown 8vo. cloth.

POEMS, NATIONAL and NON-ORIENTAL (with some New Pieces). Selected from the Works of Sir EDWIN ARNOLD, M.A., K.C.I.E., C.S.I., Author of the "Light of Asia" &c. &c. [Nearly ready.

ALSO BY THE SAME AUTHOR.
Second Edition. Crown 8vo. cloth, 7s. 6d.

LOTUS and JEWEL. Containing "In an Indian

Temple," "A Casket of Gems," "A Queen's Revenge," with other Poems.

ALSO BY THE SAME AUTHOR.
Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d.; paper cover, 1s.

DEATH—and AFTERWARDS. Reprinted, from the "Fortnightly Review," with a Supplement.

With Portrait. Demy 8vo. cloth, 12s. 6d.

D. D. HOME: his Life and Mission. By Mme.

DUNGLAS HOME.

Crown 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

THE PRACTICAL VALUE of CHRISTIANITY.—

Two Prize Essays. 1. CHRIST or CHAOS. By the Rev. JOHN BROADHURST NICHOLS. 2. CHRISTIANITY at the BAR. By CHARLES WILLIAM DYMOND, F.S.A.

Demy 8vo. with Plate, 2s. 6d.

THE NESTORIAN MONUMENT of HSI-AN FU

in SHEN-HSI, CHINA, relating to the Diffusion of Christianity in China in the Seventh and Eighth Centuries. With the Chinese Text of the Inscription, a Translation, and Notes, and a Lecture on the Monument, with a Sketch of subsequent Christian Missions in China, and their present state. By JAMES LEGGE, Professor of the Chinese Language and Literature in the University of Oxford.

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., 57 & 59 LUDGATE HILL.

MESSRS. WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS' PUBLICATIONS.

This day is published.

SCIENTIFIC RELIGION;

Or, Higher Possibilities of Life and Practice through the Operation of Natural Forces.
By LAURENCE OLIPHANT.
8vo. 16s.

RUSSIA AND THE AFGHAN FRONTIER.
This day is published.

NORTHERN AFGHANISTAN;

Or, Letters from the Afghan Boundary Commission.
By Major C. E. YATE, C.S.I., Bombay Staff Corps.
8vo. with Maps, 18s.

This day is published

SHAKESPEARE or BACON? By Sir THEODORE

MARTIN, K.C.B. Printed on hand made paper, and bound with parchment cover, 3s.
"An unanswerable refutation to the Baconian craze."—Scotsman.

Immediately will be published, NEW and CHEAPER EDITION.

WANDERINGS in CHINA. By C. F. GORDON

CUMMING, Author of "At Home in Fiji," "A Lady's Cruise in a French Man-of-War," "Fire Fountains," &c. &c. Third Edition, with Portrait of the Author, and numerous Illustrations. Complete in 1 vol. 8vo. 10s.

This day is published, a NEW and CHEAPER EDITION.
ON SOME OF

SHAKESPEARE'S FEMALE CHARACTERS.

In a Series of Letters. By HELENA FAUCIT (Lady MARTIN). Third and Cheaper Edition. 8vo. with Portrait, 7s. 6d.
